To form, in regard to persons, is simply to put into a form; to compose is to put together into a form; and to constitute is to make to stand together in a form; to form, therefore, does not qualify the action: one forms a thing without defining how, whether at once or by degrees, whether with one or several materials; to compose and constitute are both modes of forming by the help of several materials, with device and contrivance; compose is said of that which only requires to be put together; constitute of that to which a certain degree of stability must be given. God formed man, man forms a cup or a vessel; he composes a book; he constitutes offices, bodies politic, and the like.

The liquid ore he drain'd
Into fit moulds prepar'd, from which he form'd
First his own tools. MILTON.

Words so pleasing to God as those which the Son of God himself hath composed, were not possible for men to frame. HOOKE.

This makes the constitution of a state, and the due distribution of its powers, a matter of the most delicate and complicated skill. BURKE.

When employed to characterize things, form signifies simply to have a form, be it either simple or complex; compose and constitute are said only of those things which have complex forms; the former as respecting the material, the latter the essential parts of an object: thus we may say that an object forms a circle, or a semicircle, or the segment of a circle: a society is composed of individuals; but law and order constitute the essence of society: so letters and syllables compose a word; but sense is essential to constitute a word.

All animals of the same kind which form a society are more knowing than others.

ADDISON.

Nor did Israel 'scape
Th' infection, when their borrow'd gold compos'd
The calf in Oriel.

MILTON.

To receive and to communicate assistance constitutes the happiness of human life.

JOHNSON.

FORM, CEREMONY, RITE, OBSERVANCE.

FORM, v. Form, figure. CEREMONY, in Latin ceremonia, is supposed to signify the rites of Ceres. RITE, in Latin ritus, is probably changed from ratus, signifying a custom that is esteemed. OBSERVANCE signifies the thing observed.

All these terms are employed with regard to particular modes of action in civil society. Form is here, as in the preceding sections, the most general in its sense and application; ceremony, rite, and observance are particular kinds of form, suited to particular occasions. Form, in its distinct application, respects all determinate modes of acting and speaking, that are adopted by society at large, in every transaction of life; ceremony respects those forms of outward behavior which are made the expressions of respect and deference; rite and observance are applied to national ceremonies in matters of religion. A certain form is requisite for the sake of order, method, and decorum, in every social matter, whether in affairs of state, in a court of law, in a place of worship, or in the private intercourse of friends. So long as distinctions are admitted in society, and men are agreed to express their sentiments of regard and respect to each other, it will be necessary to preserve the ceremonies of politeness which have been established. Administering oaths by the magistrate is a necessary form in law; kissing the king's hand is a ceremony practised at court.

A long table, and a square table, or seat about the walls, seem things of form, but are things of substance; for at a long table a few at the upper end in effect sway all the business; but in the other form there is more of the counsellors' opinions that sit lower.

BACON.

Not to use ceremonies at all, is to teach others not to use them again, and so diminish respect to himself.

BACON.

As far as form, ceremonies, rites, and observances respect religion, the first is used in the most universal and unqualified sense in respect to religion generally or any particular form: the second may be said either of an individual or a community; the third only of a community; and the last, more properly, of an individual either in public or private. There can be no religion without some form, but there may be different forms which are equally good. Every country has adopted certain rites founded upon its peculiar religious faith, and prescribed certain observances by which individuals can make a public profession of their faith: baptism is one rite of initiation into the Christian church; kneeling at prayer is a ceremony, prayer itself is an observance.

You may discover tribes of men without policy, or laws, or cities, or any of the arts of life; but nowhere will you find them without some form of religion.

BLAIR.

He who affirmeth speech to be necessary among all men throughout the world, doth not thereby import that the men must necessarily speak one language; even so the necessity of polity and regimen in all churches, without holding any one certain form to be necessary in them all.

HOOKE.

Bring her up to the high altar, that she may
The sacred ceremonies partake.

SPENSER.

Live thou to mourn thy love's unhappy fate,
To bear my mangled body from the foe,
Or buy it back, and fun'ral rites bestow.

DRYDEN.

Incorporated minds will always feel some inclination toward exterior acts and ritual observances.

JOHNSON.

FORMAL, CEREMONIOUS, CEREMONIAL.

FORMAL and CEREMONIOUS, from form and ceremony (v. Form, ceremony), are either taken in an indifferent sense with respect to what contains form and ceremony, or in a bad sense, expressing the excess of form and ceremony. A person expects to have a formal dismissal before he considers himself as dismissed; people of fashion pay each other ceremonious visits, by way of keeping up a distant intercourse.

I have not thought fit to return them any formal answer.

ADDISON.

Throw away respect,
Tradition, form, and ceremonious duty,
For you have but mistook me all this while.

SHAKESPEARE.

CEREMONIAL is employed in the sense of appertaining to prescribed ceremonies; and formal implies appertaining to prescribed forms in public matters, as formal communications from one government to another: it is the business of the church to regulate the ceremonial part of religion.

As there are formal and written leagues, respective to certain enemies, so there is a natural and tacit confederation among all men against the common enemies of human society. BACON.

Christ's Gospel is not a ceremonial law (as much of Moses's law was), but it is a religion to serve God, not in the bondage of the figure or shadow, but in the freedom of the Spirit, being content only with those which do serve to a decent order and godly discipline.

PREFACE TO THE COMMON PRAYER BOOK.

Ceremonious was formerly used in the same sense as ceremonial.

Under a different ceremony of religion God was more tender of the shell and ceremonious part of his worship. SOUTH.

Formal, in the bad sense, is opposed to easy: ceremonious to the cordial. A formal carriage prevents a person from indulging himself in the innocent familiarities of friendly intercourse; a ceremonious carriage puts a stop to all hospitality and kindness. Princes, in their formal intercourse with each other, know nothing of the pleasures of society; ceremonious visitants give and receive entertainments, without tasting any of the enjoyments which flow from the reciprocity of kind offices.

Formal in apparel,
In gait and countenance surely like a father. SHAKESPEARE.

From the moment one sets up for an author, one must be treated as ceremoniously, that is, as unfaithfully, "as a king's favorite, or as a king." POPE.

FORMERLY, IN TIMES PAST, OR OLD TIMES, DAYS OF YORE, ANCIENTLY, OR ANCIENT TIMES.

FORMERLY supposes a less remote period than IN TIMES PAST: and that less remote than IN DAYS OF YORE and ANCIENTLY. The first two may be said of what happens within the age of man; the last two are extended to many generations and ages. Any individual may use the word formerly with regard to himself: thus, we enjoyed our health better formerly than now. An old man may speak of times past, as when he says he does not enjoy himself as he did in times past. OLD TIMES, days of yore, and anciently are more applicable to nations than to individuals; and all these express different degrees of remoteness. With respect to our present period, the age of Queen Elizabeth may be called old times; the days of Alfred, and still later, the days of yore: the earliest period in which Britain is mentioned may be termed ANCIENT TIMES.

Men were formerly disputed out of their doubts. ADDISON.

In times of old, when time was young,
And poets their own verses sung,
A verse could draw a stone or beam. SWIFT.

Thus Edgar proud, in days of yore,
Held monarchs laboring at the oar. SWIFT.

In ancient times the sacred plough employ'd
The kings and awful fathers of mankind. THOMSON.

FORMIDABLE, DREADFUL, TERRIBLE, SHOCKING.

FORMIDABLE is applied to that which is apt to excite fear (v. To apprehend); DREADFUL (v. To apprehend) to what is calculated to excite dread; TERRIBLE (v. Alarm) to that which excites terror; and SHOCKING (from shake) is applied to that which violently shakes or agitates (v. To agitate). The formidable acts neither suddenly nor violently; the dreadful may act violently, but not suddenly: thus the appearance of an army may be formidable; but that of a field of battle is dreadful. The terrible and shocking act both suddenly and violently; but the former acts both on the senses and the imagination, the latter on the moral feelings: thus, the glare of a tiger's eye is terrible; the unexpected news of a friend's death is shocking.

France continued not only powerful, but formidable, to the hour of the ruin of the monarchy. BURKE.

Think, timely think, on the last dreadful day. DRYDEN.

When men are arrived at thinking of their very dissolution with pleasure, how few things are there that can be terrible to them! STEELE.

Nothing could be more shocking to a generous nobility than the intrusting to mercenary hands the defence of those territories which had been acquired or preserved by the blood of their ancestors. ROBERTSON.

FORSAKEN, FORLORN, DESTITUTE.

To be FORSAKEN (v. To abandon) is to be deprived of the company and assistance of those we have looked to; to be FORLORN, in the German verloren, lost, is to be forsaken in time of difficulty, to be without a guide in an unknown road; to be DESTITUTE, from the Latin destitutus, is to be deprived of the first necessities of life. To be forsaken is a partial situation; to be forlorn and destitute is a permanent condition. We may be forsaken by a fellow-traveller on the road; we are forlorn when we get into a deserted path with no one to direct us; we are destitute when we have no means of subsistence, nor the prospect of obtaining the means. It is particularly painful to be forsaken by the friend of our youth, and the sharer of our fortunes; the orphan who is left to travel the road of life without counsellor or friend is of all others in the most forlorn condition; if to this be added poverty, his misery is aggravated by his becoming destitute.

But fearful for themselves, my countrymen
Left me forsaken in the Cyclops' den. DARWIN.

Conscience made them (Joseph's brethren) recollect that they who had once been deaf to the supplications of a brother were now left friendless and forlorn. BLAIR.

Friendless and destitute, Dr. Goldsmith was exposed to all the miseries of indigence in a foreign country. JOHNSON.

TO FORSWEAR, PERJURE, SUBORN.

FORSWEAR is Saxon; PERJURE is Latin; the prepositions for and per are both privative, and the words signify literally to swear contrary to the truth; this is, however, not their only distinction: to forswear is applied to all kinds of oaths; to perjure is employed only for such oaths as have been administered by the civil magistrate. A soldier forswears himself who breaks his oath of allegiance by desertion; and a subject fornswears himself who takes an oath of allegiance to his Majesty which he afterward violates; a man perjures himself in a court of law who swears to the truth of that which he knows to be false. Forswear is used only in the proper sense: perjure may be used figuratively with regard to lovers' vows; he who deserts his mistress to whom he has pledged his affection is a perjured man.

False as thou art, and more than false, forsworn!

Not sprung from noble blood, nor goddess-born;
Why should I own? what worse have I to fear?

DRYDEN.

Be gone! forever leave this happy sphere!

For perjur'd lovers have no mansions here.

LEE.

Forswear and perjure are the acts of individuals; SUBORN, from the Latin subornare, signifies to make to forswear: a perjured man has all the guilt upon himself; but he who is suborned shares his guilt with the suborner.

They were suborn'd;

Malcolm and Donalbain, the king's two sons,

Are stole away and fled. SHAKESPEARE.

FORTUNATE, LUCKY, FORTUITOUS, PROSPEROUS, SUCCESSFUL.

FORTUNATE signifies having fortune (v. Chance, fortune). LUCKY signifies having luck, which is in German gluck, and in all probability comes from gelingen, to succeed. FORTUITOUS, from forts, chance, signifies according to chance. PROSPEROUS, v. To flourish. SUCCESSFUL signifies full of success, enabled to succeed.

The fortunate and lucky are both applied to that which happens without the control of man; but the latter, which is a collateral term, describes the capricious goddess Fortune in her most freakish humors, while fortunate represents her in her more sober mood: in other words, the fortunate is more according to the ordinary course of things; the lucky is something sudden, unaccountable, and singular: a circumstance is said to be fortunate which turns up suitably to our purpose; it is said to be lucky when it comes upon us unexpectedly, at the moment that it is wanted: hence we speak of a man as fortunate in his business and the ordinary concerns of life, but lucky in the lottery or in games of chance: a fortunate year will make up for the losses of the past year; a lucky hit may repair the ruined spendthrift's fortune only to tempt him to still greater extravagances.

Several of the Roman emperors, as is still to be seen upon their medals, among their other titles, gave themselves that of Felix, or fortunate.

ADDISON.

This lucky moment the sly traitor chose,
Then starting from his ambush up he rose.

DRYDEN.

Fortunate and lucky are applied to particular circumstances of good fortune and luck, but fortuitous is employed only in matters of chance generally and indifferently.

A wonder it must be that there should be any man found so stupid as to persuade himself that this most beautiful world could be produced by the fortuitous concurrence of atoms.

RAY.

Prosperous and successful seem to exclude the idea of what is fortuitous; although prosperity and success are both greatly aided by good fortune. Fortunate and lucky are applied as much to the removal of evil as to the attainment of good; prosperous and successful are concerned only in what is good, or esteemed as such: we may be fortunate in making our escape; we are prosperous in the acquirement of wealth. Fortunate is employed for single circumstances; prosperous only for a train of circumstances; a man may be fortunate in meeting with the approbation of a superior; he is prosperous in his business. Prosperity is extended to whatever is the object of our wishes in this world; success is that degree of prosperity which immediately attends our endeavors; wealth, honors, children, and all outward circumstances, constitute prosperity; the attainment of any object constitutes success: the fortunate and lucky man can lay no claim to merit, because they preclude the idea of exertion; the prosperous and successful man may claim a share of merit proportioned to the exertion.

O fortunate old man, whose farm remains
For you sufficient, and requites your pains!

DRYDEN.

Riches are oft by guilt or baseness earn'd,
Or dealt by chance to shield a lucky knave.

ARMSTRONG.

Prosperous people (for happy there are none) are hurried away with a fond sense of their present condition, and thoughtless of the mutability of fortune.

STEELE.

The Count d'Olivares was disgraced at the court of Madrid, because it was alleged against him that he had never success in his undertakings.

ADDISON.

The epithet prosperous may be applied to those things which promote prosperity or ultimate success.

Ye gods, presiding over lands and seas,
And you who raging winds and waves appease,
Breathe on our swelling sails a prosperous wind.

DRYDEN.

TO FOSTER, CHERISH, HARBOR, INDULGE.

To FOSTER is probably connected with father, in the natural sense, to bring up with a parent's care; to CHERISH, from the Latin carus, dear, is to feed with affection; to HARBOR, from a harbor or haven, is to provide with a shelter and protection; to INDULGE, from the Latin dulcis, sweet, is to render sweet and agreeable. These terms are all employed here in the moral acceptance, to express the idea of giving nourishment to an object. To foster in the mind is to keep with care and positive endeavors; as when one fosters prejudices by encouraging everything which favors them: to cherish in the mind is to hold dear or set a value upon; as when one cherishes good sentiments, by dwelling upon them with inward satisfaction: to harbor is to allow room in the mind, and is generally taken in the worst sense, for giving admission to that which ought to be excluded; as when one harbors resentment by permitting it to have a resting-place in the heart: to indulge in the mind is to give the whole mind to it, to make it the chief source of pleasure; as when one indulges an affection, by making the will and the outward conduct bend to its gratifications.

The greater part of those who live but to infuse malignity, and multiply enemies, have no hopes to foster, no designs to promote, nor any expectations of attaining power by insolence.

JOHNSON.

As social inclinations are absolutely necessary to the well-being of the world, it is the duty and interest of every individual to cherish and improve them to the benefit of mankind.

BERKELEY.

This is scorn,
Which the fair soul of gentle Athenais
Would ne'er have harbor'd.

LEE.

She made use of his exalted situation to indulge her avarice.

CLARENDON.

TO FOUND, GROUND, REST, BUILD.

FOUND, in French fonder, Latin fundere, comes from fundus, the ground, and, like the verb GROUND, properly signifies to make firm in the ground, to make the ground the support. To found implies the exercise of art and contrivance in making a support; to ground signifies to lay a thing so deep that it may not totter; it is merely in the moral sense that they are here considered, as the verb to ground with this signification is never used otherwise. Found is applied to outward circumstances; ground to what passes inwardly: a man *found*s his charge against another upon certain facts that are come to his knowledge; he grounds his belief upon the most substantial evidence: a man should be cautious not to make any accusations which are not well founded; nor to indulge any expectations which are not well grounded: monarchs commonly found their claims to a throne upon the right of primogeniture; Christians ground their hopes of immortality on the word of God.

The only sure principles we can lay down for regulating our conduct must be founded on the Christian religion.

BLAIR.

I know there are persons who look upon these wonders of art (in ancient history) as fabulous; but I cannot find any ground for such a suspicion.

ADDISON.

To found and ground are said of things which demand the full exercise of the mental powers; to REST is an action of less importance: whatever is founded requires and has the utmost support; whatever is rested is more by the will of the individual: a man *found*s his reasoning upon some unequivocal fact; he rests his assertion upon mere hearsay. The words found, ground, and rest have always an immediate reference to the thing that supports; to BUILD has an especial reference to that which is supported, to the superstructure that is raised: we should not say that a person *found*s an hypothesis, without adding something, as observations, experiments, and the like, upon which it was founded; but we may speak of his simply building systems, supposing them to be the mere fruit of his distempered imagination; or we may say that a system of astronomy has been built upon the opinion of Copernicus respecting the motion of the earth.

It cannot, I should suppose, after this be believed that the religion and the transaction on which it was founded were too obscure to engage the attention of Josephus, or to obtain a place in his history.

L'ALEY.

We might, for its (honor's) further recommendation, allege the authority of the more cool and candid sort of philosophers, such as grounded their judgment of things upon notions agreeable to common-sense and experience.

BARROW.

Our distinction must rest upon a steady adherence to rational religion, when the multitude are deviating into licentious and criminal conduct.

BLAIR.

They who, from a mistaken zeal for the honor of Divine revelation, either deny the existence, or vilify the authority of natural religion, are not aware that, by disallowing the sense of obligation, they undermine the foundation on which revelation builds its power of commanding the heart.

BLAIR.

FOUNDATION, GROUND, BASIS.

FOUNDATION and GROUND derive their meaning and application from the preceding article: a report is said to be without any foundation, which has taken its rise in mere conjecture, or in some arbitrary cause independent of all fact; a man's suspicion is said to be without ground which is not supported by the shadow of external evidence: unfounded clamors are frequently raised against the measures of government; groundless jealousies frequently arise between families, to disturb the harmony of their intercourse.

If the foundation of a high name be virtue and service, all that is offered against it is but rumor, which is too short-lived to stand up in competition with glory, which is everlasting.

STEELE.

Every subject of the British government has good grounds for loving and respecting his country.

BLAIR.

Foundation and BASIS may be compared with each other, either in the proper or the improper signification: both foundation and basis are the lowest parts of any structure; but the former lies under ground, the latter stands above: the foundation supports some large and artificially erected pile; the basis supports a simple pillar: hence we speak of the foundation of St. Paul's, and the base or basis of the Monument.

The stateliness of houses, the goodness of trees, when we behold them, delighteth the eye; but that foundation which beareth up the one, and that root which ministereth to the other nourishment, is in the bosom of the earth concealed.

HOOKE.

In altar-wise a stately pile they rear,
The basis broad below, and top advanced in air.

DRYDEN.

This distinction is likewise preserved in the moral application of the terms: disputes have too often their foundation in frivolous circumstances; treaties have commonly their basis in some acknowledged general principle; with governments that are at war pacific negotiations may be commenced on the basis of the uti possidetis.

I can never prevail on myself to make complaints which have no cause, in order to raise hopes which have no foundation. BURKE.

It is certain that the basis of all lasting reputation is laid in moral worth. BLAIR.

FRAGILE, FRAIL, BRITTLE.

FRAGILE and FRAIL, in French frêle, both come from the Latin fragilis, signifying breakable; but the former is used in the proper sense only, and the latter more generally in the improper sense: man, corporeally considered, is a fragile creature, his frame is composed of fragile materials; mentally considered, he is a frail creature, for he is liable to every sort of frailty.

An appearance of delicacy, and even of fragility, is almost essential to beauty. BURKE.

What joys, alas! could this frail being give,
That I have been so covetous to live. DRYDEN.

BRITTLE comes from the Saxon brittan, to break, and by the termination le or lis, denotes likewise a capacity to break, that is, properly breakable; but it conveys a stronger idea of this quality than fragile: the latter applies to whatever will break from the effects of time; brittle to that which will not bear a temporary violence: in this sense all the works of men are fragile, and, in fact, all sublunary things; but glass, stone, and ice are peculiarly denominated brittle.

Much ostentation, vain of fleshy arm
And fragile arms, rough instrument of war,
Long in preparing, soon to nothing brought,
Before mine eyes thou hast set. MILTON.

The brittle chain of this world's friendships is as effectually broken when one is "oblitus in eorum," as when one is "obliviscendus et illis," CAOET.

FRAME, TEMPER, TEMPERAMENT, CONSTITUTION.

FRAME, in its natural sense, is that which forms the exterior edging of anything, and consequently determines its form; it is applied to man physically or mentally, as denoting that constituent portion of him which seems to hold the rest together; which by an extension of the metaphor is likewise put for the whole contents, the whole body, or the whole mind. TEMPER and TEMPERAMENT, in Latin temperamentum, from tempero, to govern or dispose, signify the particular modes of being disposed or organized. CONSTITUTION, from constitute or appoint, signifies the particular mode of being constituted or formed.

Frame, when applied to the body, is taken in its most universal sense: as when we speak of the frame being violently agitated, or the human frame being wonderfully constructed: when applied to the mind, it will admit either of a general or restricted signification. Temper, which is applicable only to the mind, is taken in the general or particular state of the individual. The frame comprehends either the whole body of mental powers, or the particular disposition of those powers in individuals; the temper comprehends the general or particular state of feeling as well as thinking in the individual. The mental frame which receives any violent concussion is liable to derangement; it is necessary for those who govern to be well acquainted with the temper of those whom they govern. By reflection on the various attributes of the Divine Being, a man may easily bring his mind into a frame of devotion: by the indulgence of a fretful, repining temper, a man destroys his own peace of mind, and offends his Maker.

The soul
Contemplates what she is, and whence she came,
And almost comprehends her own amazing frame. JENYNS.

'Tis he
Sets superstition high on virtue's throne,
Then thinks his Maker's temper like his own. JENYNS.

Temperament and constitution mark the general state of the individual; the former comprehends a mixture of the physical and mental; the latter has a purely physical application. A man with a warm temperament owes his warmth of character to the rapid impetus of the blood; a man with a delicate constitution is exposed to great fluctuations in his health; the whole frame of a new-born infant is peculiarly tender. Men of fierce tempers are to be found in all nations; men of sanguine tempers are more frequent in warm climates; the constitutions of females are more tender than those of the male, and their frames are altogether more susceptible.

There is a great tendency to cheerfulness in religion; and such a frame of mind is not only the most lovely, but the most commendable in a virtuous person. ADDISON.

The sole strength of the sound from the shouting of multitudes so amazes and confounds the imagination, that the best established tempers can scarcely forbear being borne down. BURKE.

I have always more need of a laugh than a cry, being somewhat disposed to melancholy by my temperament. COWPER.

How little our constitution is able to bear a remove into parts of this air not much higher than that we commonly breathe in! LOCKE.

FRANK, CANDID, INGENUOUS, FREE, OPEN, PLAIN.

FRANK, in French franc, German, etc., frank, is connected with the word frech, bold, and frei, free. CANDID, v. Candid. INGENUOUS comes from the Latin ingenuus, which signifies literally free-born, as distinguished from the liberti, who were afterward made free: hence the term has been employed by a figure of speech to denote nobleness of birth or character. FREE is to be found in most of the northern languages under different forms, and is supposed by Adelung to be connected with the preposition from, which denotes a separation or enlargement. OPEN, v. Candid. PLAIN, v. Apparent, also evident.

All these terms convey the idea of a readiness to communicate and be communicated with; they are all opposed to concealment, but under different circumstances. The frank man is under no constraint; his thoughts and feelings are both set at ease, and his lips are ever ready to give utterance to the dictates of his heart; he has no reserve: the candid man has nothing to conceal; he speaks without regard to self-interest or any partial motive; he speaks nothing but the truth: the ingenuous man throws off all disguise; he scorns all artifice, and brings everything to light; he speaks the whole truth. Frankness is acceptable in the general transactions of society; it inspires confidence, and invites communication: candor is of peculiar use in matters of dispute; it serves the purposes of equity, and invites to conciliation: ingenuoussness is most wanted where there is most to conceal; it courts favor and kindness by an acknowledgment of that which is against itself.

Frankness is associated with unpolished manners, and frequently appears in men of no rank or education; sailors have commonly a deal of frankness about them: candor is the companion of uprightness; it must be accompanied with some refinement, as it acts in cases where nice discriminations are made: ingenuoussness is the companion of a noble and elevated spirit: it exists most frequently in the unsophisticated period of youth. Frankness displays itself in the outward behavior; we speak of a frank air and frank manner: candor displays itself in the language which we adopt, and the sentiments we express; we speak of a candid statement, a candid reply: ingenuoussness shows itself in all the words, looks, or actions; we speak of an ingenuous countenance, an ingenuous acknowledgment, an ingenuous answer.

My own private opinion with regard to such recreations (as poetry and music) I have given with all the frankness imaginable. STEELE.

If you have made any better remarks of your own, communicate them with candor: if not, make use of those I present you with. ADDISON.

We see an ingenuous kind of behavior not only make up for faults committed, but in a manner expiate them in the very commission. STEELE.

Free, open, and plain have not so high an office as the first three: free and open may be taken either in a good, bad, or indifferent sense; but seldomer in the first than in the last two senses.

The frank, free, and open man all speak without constraint; but the frank man is not impertinent like the free man, nor indiscreet like the open man. The frank man speaks only of what concerns himself; the free man speaks of what concerns others: a frank man may confess his own faults or inadvertencies; the free man corrects those which he sees in another: the frank man opens his heart from the warmth of his nature; the free man opens his mind from the conceit of his temper; and the open man says all he knows and thinks, from the inconsiderate levity of his temper.

We cheer the youth to make his own defence,
And freely tell us what he was, and whence.

DRYDEN.

If I have abused your goodness by too much freedom, I hope you will attribute it to the openness of my temper.

POPE.

Plainness, the last quality to be here noticed, is a virtue which, though of the humbler order, is not to be despised: it is sometimes employed, like freedom, in the task of giving counsel; but it does not convey the idea of anything unauthorized either in matter or manner. A free counsellor is more ready to display his own superiority than to direct the wanderer in his way; he rather aggravates faults than instructs how to amend them; he seems more like a supercilious enemy than a friendly monitor: the plain man is free from these faults: he speaks plainly but truly; he gives no false coloring to his speech; it is not calculated to offend, and it may serve for improvement: it is the part of a true friend to be plain with another whom he sees in imminent danger. A free speaker is in danger of being hated; a plain dealer must at least be respected.

Satire has always shone among the rest,
And is the boldest way, if not the best,
To tell men freely of their foulest faults,
To laugh at their vain deeds and vainer thoughts.

DAYDEN.

He had, in the plain way of speaking and delivery, without much ornament of elocution, a strange power of making himself believed.

CLARENDON.

FREAK, WHIM.

FREAK most probably comes from the German frech, bold and petulant. WHIM, from the Teutonic wimmen, to whine or whimper: but they have at present somewhat deviated from their original meaning; for a freak has more of childishness and humor than boldness in it, a whim more of eccentricity than of childishness. Fancy and fortune are both said to have their freaks, as they both deviate most widely in their movements from all rule; but whims are at most but singular deviations of the mind from its ordinary and even course. Females are most liable to be seized with freaks, which are in their nature sudden and not to be calculated upon: men are apt to indulge themselves in whims which are in their nature strange and often laughable. We should call it a freak for a female to put on the habit of a male, and so accoutred to sally forth into the streets: we term it a whim in a man who takes a resolution never to shave himself any more.

But the long pomp, the midnight masquerade,
With all the freaks of wanton wealth array'd,
In these, ere trifles half their wish obtain,
The toiling pleasure sickens into pain.

GOLDSMITH.

'Tis all bequeath'd to public use.

To public uses! There's a whim!

What had the public done for him?

SWIFT.

FREE, LIBERAL.

In the former section (v. Frank) FREE is considered only as it respects communication by words, in the present case it respects actions and sentiments. In all its acceptations, free is a term of dispraise, and LIBERAL that of commendation. To be free signifies to act or think at will; to be liberal is to act according to the dictates of an enlarged heart and an enlightened mind. A clown or a fool may be free with his money, and may squander it away to please his humor, or gratify his appetite; but the nobleman and the wise man will be liberal in rewarding merit, in encouraging industry, and in promoting whatever can contribute to the ornament, the prosperity, and improvement of his country.

Their pretensions to be freethinkers is no other than rakes have to be free-livers, and savages to be freemen.

ADDISON.

For me, for whose well-being
So amply, and with hands so liberal,
Thou hast provided all things.

MILTON.

A man who is free in his sentiments thinks as he pleases; the man who is liberal thinks according to the extent of his knowledge. The freethinking man is wise in his own conceit, he despises the opinions of others; the liberal-minded thinks modestly on his own personal attainments, and builds upon the wisdom of others.

The freethinkers plead very hard to think freely; they have it: but what use do they make of it? Do their writings show a greater depth of design, or more just and correct reasoning, than those of other men?

BREKELEY.

The desire of knowledge discovers a liberal mind.

BLAIR.

TO FREE, SET FREE, DELIVER, LIBERATE.

To FREE is properly to make free, in distinction from SET FREE; the first is employed in what concerns ourselves, and the second in that which concerns another. A man frees himself from an engagement; he sets another free from his engagement: we free, or set ourselves free, from that which has been imposed upon us by ourselves or by circumstances; we are DELIVERED or LIBERATED from that which others have imposed upon us; the former from evils in general, the latter from the evil of confinement. I free myself from a burden; I set my own slave free from his slavery; I deliver another man's slave from a state of bondage; I liberate a man from prison. A man frees an estate from rent, service, taxes, and all encumbrances; a king sets his subjects free from certain imposts or tributes, he delivers them from a foreign yoke, or he liberates those who have been taken in war.

She then
Sent Iris down to free her from the strife
Of laboring nature, and dissolve her life.

DRYDEN.

When heav'n would kindly set us free,
And earth's enchantment end;
It takes the most effectual means,
And robs us of a friend.

YOUNG.

However desirous Mary was of obtaining discrepancy from Darnley's caprices, she had good reasons for rejecting the method by which they proposed to accomplish it.

ROBERTSON.

The inquisitor rang a bell, and ordered Nicolas to be forthwith liberated.

CUMBERLAND.

FREE, FAMILIAR.

FREE has already been considered as it respects words, actions, and sentiments (v. Free); in the present case it is coupled with FAMILIARITY, inasmuch as they respect the outward behavior or conduct in general of men one to another. To be free is to be disengaged from all the constraints which the ceremonies of social intercourse impose; to be familiar is to be upon the footing of a familiar, of a relative, or one of the same family.

Upon equality depends the freedom of discourse, and consequently the ease and good-humor of every society.

TYRREWHITT.

Familiar converse improved general civilities into an unfeigned passion on both sides.

STEELE.

Neither of these terms can be admitted as unexceptionable; freedom is authorized only by particular circumstances and within certain limitations; familiarity sometimes shelters itself under the sanction of long, close, and friendly intercourse. Free is a term of much more extensive import than familiar; a man may be free toward another in a thousand ways; but he is familiar toward him only in his manners and address. A man who is free makes free with everything as if it were his own; a familiar man only wants to share with another, and to stand upon an equal footing in his social intercourse. No man can be free without being in danger of infringing upon what belongs to another, nor familiar without being in danger of obtruding himself to the annoyance of others, or of degrading himself.

You were stark mad when you writ Catiline, and stark mad when you writ Sejanus; but when you writ your Epigrams, and the Magnetic Lady, you were not so mad, inasmuch that I perceive there be degrees of (poetic) madness in you. Excuse me that I am so free with you.

HOWELL.

A careless, coarse, and over-familiar style of discourse, without sufficient regard to persons and occasions, and an almost total want of political decorum, were the errors by which he was most hurt in the public opinion.

BURKE.

FREE, EXEMPT.

FREE, v. Free, liberal. EXEMPT, in Latin exemptus, participle of eximo, signifies set out or disengaged from anything.

The condition and not the conduct of men is here considered. Freedom is either accidental or intentional; the exemption is always intentional; we may be free from disorders, or free from troubles; we are exempt, that is exempted by government, from serving in the militia. Free is applied to everything from which any one may wish to be free; but exempt, on the contrary, to those burdens which we should share with others; we may be free from imperfections, free from inconveniences, free from the interruptions of others; but exempt from any office or tax. We may likewise be said to be exempt from troubles when speaking of these as the dispensations of Providence to others.

O happy, if he knew his happy state,
The swain who, free from business and debate,
Receives his easy food from nature's hand.

DRYDEN.

To be exempt from the passions with which others are tormented, is the only pleasing solitude.

ADDISON.

FREEDOM, LIBERTY.

FREEDOM, the abstract noun of free, is taken in all the senses of the primitive. LIBERTY, from the Latin liber, free, is only taken in the sense of free from external constraint, from the action of power.

Freedom is personal and private; liberty is public. The freedom of the city is the privilege granted by the city to individuals; the liberties of the city are the immunities enjoyed by the city. By the same rule of distinction we speak of the freedom of the will, the freedom of manners, the freedom of conversation, or the freedom of debate; but the liberty of conscience, the liberty of the press, the liberty of the subject.

The ends for which men unite in society, and submit to government, are to enjoy security to their property, and freedom to their persons, from all injustice or violence.

BLAIR.

The liberty of the press is a blessing when we are inclined to write against others, and a calamity when we find ourselves overborne by the multitude of our assailants.

JOHNSON.

Freedom serves, moreover, to qualify the action; liberty is applied only to the agent: hence we say, to speak or think with freedom; but to have the liberty of speaking, thinking, or acting.

I would not venture into the world under the character of a man who pretends to talk like other people, until I had arrived at a full freedom of speech.

ADDISON.

Blush, when I tell you how a bird,
A prison, with a friend, prefer'd
• • • To liberty without.

COWPER.

Freedom and liberty are likewise employed for the private conduct of individuals toward each other; but the former is used in a qualified good sense, the latter often in an unqualified bad sense. A freedom may sometimes be licensed or allowed; a liberty, if it be taken, may be something not agreeable or allowed. A freedom may be innocent and even pleasant; a liberty may do more or less violence to the decencies of life, or the feelings of individuals. There are little freedoms which may pass between youth of different sexes, so as to heighten the pleasures of society; but a modest woman will be careful to guard against any freedoms which may admit of misinterpretation, and resent every liberty offered to her as an insult.

It would be uncourtly to speak in harsher terms to the fair, but to (with) men one may take a little more freedom.

TATLER.

If I took the liberty to stroke him, he would grunt, strike with his forefoot, spring forward and bite.

COWPER.

FREIGHT, CARGO, LADING, LOAD, BURDEN.

FREIGHT is in the Danish fragt, Swedish, etc., fracht, in the sense of a ship, but in the sense of a burden it seems to be most nearly allied to the Latin fero, to bring, and the Greek φορoς, a burden. CARGO, in French cargaison, probably a variation from charge, is employed for all the contents of a vessel, with the exception of the persons that it carries. LADING and LOAD (in German laden, to load) come most probably from the word last, a burden, signifying the burden or weight imposed upon any carriage. BURDEN, from bear, conveys the idea of weight which is borne by the vessel.

A captain speaks of the freight of his ship as that which is the object of his voyage, by which all who are interested in it are to make their profit; he speaks of the lading as the thing which is to fill the ship; the quantity and weight of the lading are to be taken into the consideration: he speaks of the cargo as that which goes with the ship, and belongs as it were to the ship; the amount of the cargo is that which is first thought of: he speaks of the burden as that which his vessel will bear; it is the property of the ship which is to be estimated. The ship-broker regulates the freight: the captain and the crew dispose the lading: the agent sees to the procuring of the cargo: the ship-builder determines the burden: the carrier looks to the load which he has to carry.

TO FREQUENT, RESORT TO, HAUNT.

FREQUENT comes from frequent, in Latin frequens, crowded, signifying to come in numbers, or come often to the same place. RESORT, in French ressortir, compounded of re and sortir, signifies to go backward and forward. HAUNT, from the French hanter, to frequent, is in all probability connected with hunt.

Frequent is more commonly used of an individual who goes often to a place; resort and haunt of a number of individuals. A man is said to frequent a public place; but several persons may resort to a private place: men who are not fond of home frequent taverns; in the first ages of Christianity, while persecution raged, its professors used to resort to private places for purposes of worship.

For my own part, I have ever regarded our inns of court as nurseries of statesmen and lawgivers, which makes me often frequent that part of the town.

BUDGELL.

Home is the resort

Of love, of joy, of peace, and plenty, where,
Supporting and supported, polish'd friends
And dear relations mingle into bliss. THOMSON.

Frequent and resort are indifferent actions; but haunt is always used in a bad sense. A man may frequent a theatre, a club, or any other social meeting, innocent or otherwise; people from different quarters may resort to a fair, a church, or any other place where they wish to meet for a common purpose; but those who haunt any place go to it in privacy for some bad purpose.

But harden'd by affronts, and still the same,
Lost to all sense of honor and of fame,
Thou yet canst love to haunt the great man's board,
And think no supper good but with a lord.

LEWIS.

TO FRIGHTEN, INTIMIDATE.

BETWEEN FRIGHTEN and INTIMIDATE there is the same difference as between fright (v. Alarm) and fear (v. To apprehend): the danger that is near or before the eyes frightens; that which is seen at a distance intimidates: hence females are oftener frightened, and men are oftener intimidated: noises will frighten; threats may intimidate: we may run away when we are frightened; we waver in our resolution when we are intimidated; we fear immediate bodily harm when we are frightened; we fear harm to our property as well as our persons when we are intimidated; frighten, therefore, is always applied to animals, but intimidate never.

And perch, oh horror! on his sacred crown,
If that such profanation were permitted

Of the by-standers, who with reverend care
Fright them away.

CUMBERLAND.

Cortez, unwilling to employ force, endeavored alternately to soothe and intimidate Montezuma.

ROBERTSON.

FROLIC, GAMBOL, PRANK.

FROLIC, in German, etc., fröhlich, cheerful, comes from froh, merry, and freude, joy. GAMBOL signifies literally leaping into the air, from gamb, in French jamb, the leg. PRANK is changed from prance, which literally signifies to throw up the hind feet after the manner of a horse, and is most probably connected with the German prangen, to make a parade or fuss, and the Hebrew parang, to set free, because the freedom indicated by the word prank is more or less discoverable in the sense of all these terms. The frolic is a merry, joyous entertainment; the gambol is a dancing, light entertainment; the prank is a freakish, wild entertainment. Laughing, singing, noise, and feasting constitute the frolic of the careless mind; it belongs to a company; conceit, levity, and trick, in movement, gesture, and contrivance, constitute the gambol; it belongs to the individual: adventure, eccentricity, and humor constitute the prank; it belongs to one or many. One has a frolic; one plays a gambol or a prank.

I have heard of some very merry fellows, among whom the frolic was started and passed by a great majority, that every man should immediately draw a tooth.

STEELE.

What are those crested locks
That make such wanton gambols with the wind?

SHAKESPEARE.

Some time afterward (1756) some young men of the college, whose chambers were near his (Gray's), diverted themselves by frequent and troublesome noises, and, as is said, by pranks yet more offensive and contemptuous.

JOHNSON.

TO FULFIL, ACCOMPLISH, REALIZE.

TO FULFIL is literally to fill quite full, that is, to bring about full to the wishes of a person; ACCOMPLISH (v. To accomplish) is to bring to perfection, but without reference to the wishes of any one;

to REALIZE is to make real, namely, whatever has been aimed at. The application of these terms is evident from their explanations: the wishes, the expectations, the intentions, and promises of an individual are appropriately said to be fulfilled; national projects, or undertakings, prophecies, and whatever is of general interest, are said to be accomplished: the fortune, or the prospects of an individual, or whatever results successfully from specific efforts, is said to be realized: the fulfilment of our wishes may be as much the effect of good fortune as of design; the accomplishment of projects mostly results from extraordinary exertion, as the accomplishment of prophecies results from a miraculous exertion of power; the realization of hopes results more commonly from the slow process of moderate well-combined efforts than from anything extraordinary.

The palsied dotard looks around him, perceives himself to be alone; he has survived his friends, and he wishes to follow them; his wish is fulfilled; he drops torpid and insensible into that gulf which is deeper than the grave.

HAWKESWORTH.

God bless you, sweet boy! and accomplish the sweet hope I conceived of you.

SIR PHILIP SIDNEY.

After my fancy had been busied in attempting to realize the scenes that Shakspeare drew, I regretted that the labor was ineffectual.

HAWKESWORTH.

FULNESS, PLENITUDE.

ALTHOUGH PLENITUDE is no more than a derivative from the Latin for FULNESS, yet the latter is used either in the proper sense to express the state of objects that are full, or in the improper sense to express great quantity, which is the accompaniment of fulness; the former only in the higher style and in the improper sense: hence we say in the fulness of one's heart, in the fulness of one's joy, or the fulness of the Godhead bodily; but the plenitude of glory, the plenitude of power.

All mankind
Must have been lost, adjudg'd to death and hell,
By doom severe, had not the Son of God,
In whom the fulness dwells of love divine,
His dearest mediation thus renew'd. MILTON.

The most beneficent Being is he who hath an absolute fulness of perfection in himself, who gave existence to the universe, and so cannot be supposed to want that which he communicated without diminishing from the plenitude of his own power and happiness. GROVE.

FUNERAL, OBSEQUIES.

FUNERAL, in Latin funus, is derived from funis, a cord, because lighted cords or torches were carried before bodies which were interred by night; the term funeral, therefore, denotes the ordinary solemnity which attends the consignment of a body to the grave. OBSEQUIES, in Latin exequiæ, are both derived from æquor, which, in its compound sense, signifies to perform or execute; they comprehend, therefore, funerals attended with more than ordinary solemnity.

We speak of the funeral as the last sad office which we perform for a friend; it is accompanied by nothing but by mourning and sorrow: we speak of obsequies as the greatest tribute of respect which can be paid to the person of one who was high in station or public esteem: the funeral, by its frequency, becomes so familiar an object that it passes by unheeded; obsequies which are performed over the remains of the great attract our notice from the pomp and grandeur with which they are conducted.

That pluck'd my nerves, those tender strings of life,
Which, pluck'd a little more, will toll the bell
That calls my few friends to my funeral.

YOUNG.

Some in the flow'r-strewn grave the corpse have laid,
And annual obsequies around it paid. JENYNS.

G.

GAIN, PROFIT, EMOLUMENT, LUCRE.

GAIN signifies in general what is gained (v. To acquire). PROFIT, v. Advantage. EMOLUMENT, from emolior, signifies to work out or get by working. LUCRE is in Latin lucrum, gain, which probably comes from luc, to pay, signifying that which comes to a man's purse.

Gain is here a general term, the other terms are specific: the gain is that which comes to a man; it is the fruit of his exertions, or agreeable to his wish: the profit is that which accrues from the thing.

Thus, when applied to riches, that which increases a man's estate are his gains; that which flows out of his trade or occupation are his profits; that is, they are his gains upon dealing. Emolument is a species of gain from labor, or a collateral gain; of this description are a man's emoluments from an office: a man estimates his gains by what he receives in the year; he estimates his profits by what he receives on every article; he estimates his emoluments according to the nature of the service which he has to perform: the merchant talks of his gains; the retail dealer of his profits; the placeman of his emoluments.

The gains of ordinary trades and vocations are honest, and furthered by two things, chiefly by diligence and by a good name. BACON.

The profits of my living, which amounted to about thirty-five pounds a year, I made over to the orphans and widows of the clergy of our diocese. GOLDSMITH.

Except the salary of the Laureate, to which King James added the office of historiographer, perhaps with some additional emoluments, Dryden's whole revenue seems to have been casual. JOHNSON.

Gain and profit are also taken in an abstract sense; lucre is never used otherwise; but the latter always conveys a bad meaning; it is, strictly speaking, unhallowed gain: an immoderate thirst for gain is the vice of men who are always calculating profit and loss; a thirst for lucre deadens every generous feeling of the mind.

No son of Mars descend for servile gains
To touch the booty, while the foe remains. POPE.

Why may not a whole estate, thrown into a kind of garden, turn as much to the profit as the pleasure of the owner? ADDISON.

O sacred hunger of pernicious gold!
What bands of faith can impious lucre hold? DRYDEN.

Gain and profit may be extended to other objects, and sometimes opposed to each other; for as that which we gain is what we wish only, it is often the reverse of profitable.

A few forsake the throng; with lifted eyes
Ask wealth of heaven, and gain a real prize,
Truth, wisdom, grace, and peace like that above,
Sealed with his signet, whom they serve and love. COWPER.

I think the profit and pleasure of that study are both so very obvious that a quick reader will be beforehand with me, and imagine faster than I write. DRYDEN.

GALLANT, BEAU, SPARK.

THESE words convey nothing respectful of the person to whom they are applied; but the first, as is evident from its derivation, has something in it to recommend it to attention above the other: as true valor is ever associated with a regard for the fair sex, a GALLANT man will always be a gallant when he can render a female any service; sometimes, however, his gallantries may be such as to do them harm rather than good: insignificance and effeminacy characterize the BEAU or fine gentleman; he is the woman's man—the humble servant to supply the place of a lackey: the SPARK has but a spark of that fire which shows itself in impertinent puerilities; it is applicable to youth who are just broke loose from school or college, and eager to display their manhood.

The god of wit, and light, and arts,
With all acquir'd and natural parts,
Was an unfortunate gallant. SWIFT.

His pride began to interpose,
Preferr'd before a crowd of beaus. SWIFT.

Oft it has been my lot to mark
A proud, conceited, talking spark. MERRICK.

TO GAPE, STARE, GAZE.

To GAPE, in German gaffen, Saxon geopnian, to make open or wide, is to look with an open or wide mouth. STARE, from the German starr, fixed, signifies to look with a fixed eye. GAZE comes very probably from the Greek αγαζομαι, to admire, because it signifies to look steadily from a sentiment of admiration.

Gape and stare are taken in a bad sense; the former indicating the astonishment of gross ignorance; the latter not only ignorance but impertinence: gaze is taken always in a good sense, as indicating a laudable feeling of astonishment, pleasure, or curiosity: a clown gapes at the pictures of wild beasts which he sees at a fair; an impertinent fellow stares at every woman he looks at, and stares a modest woman out of countenance: a lover of the fine arts will gaze with admiration and delight at the productions of Raphael or Titian; when a person is stupefied by affright, he gives a vacant stare: those who are filled with transport gaze on the object of their ecstasy.

It was now a miserable spectacle to see us nodding and gaping at one another, every man talking and no man heard. SIR JOHN MANDEVILLE.
Astonish'd Aunus just arrives by chance
To see his fall, nor farther dares advance;
But, fixing on the maid his horrid eye,
He stares and shakes, and finds it vain to fly.

DRYDEN.

For, while expecting there the queen, he rais'd
His wond'ring eyes, and round the temple gas'd,
Admir'd the fortune of the rising town,
The striving artists, and their art's renown.

DRYDEN.

TO GATHER, COLLECT.

To GATHER, in Saxon gaderian, low German gadden, from gade, a sort, that is to bring things of a sort together. To COLLECT (v. To assemble, collect) annexes also the idea of binding or forming into a whole; we gather that which is scattered in different parts: thus stones are gathered into a heap; vessels are collected so as to form a fleet. Gathering is a mere act of necessity or convenience; collecting is an act of design or choice: we gather apples from a tree, or a servant gathers books from off a table; the antiquarian collects coins, and the bibliomaniac collects rare books.

As the small ant (for she instructs the man,
And preaches labor) gathers all she can.

CREECH.

The royal bee, queen of the rosy bower,
Collects her precious sweets from every flower.

C. JOHNSON.

GENDER, SEX.

GENDER, in Latin genus, signifies properly a genus, or kind. SEX, in French sexe, Latin sextus, comes from the Greek ἕξις, signifying the habit or nature. The gender is that distinction in words which marks the distinction of sex in things; there are, therefore, three genders, but only two sexes. By the inflections of words are denoted whether things are of this or that sex, or of no sex. The genders, therefore, are divided in grammar into masculine, feminine, and neuter; and animals are divided into male and female sex.

GENERAL, UNIVERSAL.

THE GENERAL is to the UNIVERSAL what the part is to the whole. What is general includes the greater part or number; what is universal includes every individual or part. The general rule admits of many exceptions; the universal rule admits of none. Human government has the general good for its object: the government of Providence is directed to universal good. General is opposed to particular, and universal to individual. A scientific writer will not content himself with general remarks, when he has it in his power to enter into particulars; the universal complaint which we hear against men for their pride shows that in every individual it exists to a greater or less degree. It is a general opinion that women are not qualified for scientific pursuits, but many females have proved themselves honorable exceptions to this rule: it is a universal principle that children ought to honor their parents; the intention of the Creator in this respect is manifested in such a variety of forms as to admit of no question.

GENERATION, AGE.

GENERATION is said of the persons who live during any particular period; and AGE is said of the period itself.

Those who are born at the same time constitute the generation; that period of time which comprehends the age of man is the age: there may, therefore, be many generations spring up in the course of an age; a fresh generation is springing up every day, which in the course of an age pass away and are succeeded by fresh generations. We consider man in his generation as to the part which he has to perform. We consider the age in which we live as to the manners of men and the events of nations.

I often lamented that I was not one of that happy generation who demolished the convents.

JOHNSON.

Throughout every age, God hath pointed his peculiar displeasure against the confidence of presumption, and the arrogance of prosperity.

BLAIR.

GENTEEL, POLITE.

GENTEEL, in French gentil, Latin gentilis, signifies literally one belonging to the same family, or the next akin to whom the estate would fall, if there were no children; hence by an extended application it denoted to be of a good family. POLITE, v. Civil.

Gentility respects rank in life; politeness the refinement of the mind and outward behavior. A genteel education is suited to the station of a gentleman; a polite education fits for polished society and conversation, and raises the individual among his equals. There may be gentility without politeness; and vice versa. A person may have genteel manners, a genteel carriage, a genteel mode of living as far as respects his general relation with society; but a polite behavior and a polite address, which may qualify him for every relation in society, and enable him to shine in connection with all orders of men, is independent of either birth or wealth; it is in part a gift of nature, although it is to be acquired by art. His equipage, servants, house, and furniture may be such as to entitle a man to the name of genteel, although he is wanting in all the forms of real good-breeding; while fortune may sometimes frown upon the polished gentleman, whose politeness is a recommendation to him wherever he goes.

A lady of genius will give a genteel air to her whole dress by a well-fancied suit of knots, as a judicious writer gives a spirit to a whole sentence by a single expression. GAY.

In this Isle remote,
Our painted ancestors were slow to learn,
To arms devote, in the politer arts,
Nor skilled, nor studious. SOMERVILLE.

GENTILE, HEATHEN, PAGAN.

THE Jews comprehended all strangers under the name of Goim, nations or GENTILES: among the Greeks and Romans they were designated by the name of barbarians. By the name Gentile was understood especially those who were not of the Jewish religion, including, in the end, even the Christians. Some learned men pretend that the Gentiles were so named from their having only a natural law, and such as they imposed on themselves, in opposition to the Jews and Christians, who have a positive revealed law to which they are obliged to submit. Frisch and others derive the word HEATHEN from the Greek εθνη, εθνικος, which is corroborated by the translation in the Anglo-Saxon law of the word heathne by the Greek εθνη. Adelung, however, thinks it to be more properly derived from the word helde, a field, for the same reason as PAGAN is derived from pagus, a village, because when Constantine banished idolaters from the towns they repaired to the villages, and secretly adhered to their religious worship, whence they were termed by the Christians of the fourth century Pagani, which, as he supposes, was translated literally into the German heidener, a villager or worshipper in the field. Be this as it may, it is evident that the word heathen is in our language more applicable than pagan to the Greeks, the Romans, and the cultivated nations who practised idolatry; and, on the other hand, pagan is more properly employed for rude and uncivilized people who worship false gods.

The Gentile does not expressly believe in a Divine Revelation; but he either admits of the truth in part, or is ready to receive it: the heathen adopts a positively false system that is opposed to the true faith: the pagan is a species of heathen, who obstinately persists in a worship which is merely the fruit of his own imagination. The heathens or pagans are Gentiles; but the Gentiles are not all either heathens or pagans. Confucius and Socrates, who rejected the plurality of gods, and the followers of Mohammed, who adore the true God, are, properly speaking, Gentiles. The worshippers of Jupiter, Juno, Minerva, and all the deities of the ancients, are termed heathens. The worshippers of Fo, Bralima, Xaca, and all the deities of savage nations, are termed pagans.

The Gentiles were called to the true faith, and obeyed the call: many of the illustrious heathens would have doubtless done the same, had they enjoyed the same privilege: there are to this day many pagans who reject this advantage, to pursue their own blind imaginations.

There might be several among the Gentiles in the same condition that Cornelius was before he became a Christian. TILLOTSON.

Not that I believe that all virtues of the heathens were counterfeit, and destitute of an inward principle of goodness. God forbid we should pass so hard a judgment upon those excellent men, Socrates, and Epicetus, and Antinous. TILLOTSON.

And nations laid in blood; dread sacrifice
To Christian pride! which had with horror shock'd
The darkest pagans, offered to their gods.

GENTLE, TAME.

GENTLENESS lies rather in the natural disposition; TAMENESS is the effect either of art or circumstances. Any unbroken horse may be gentle, but not tame: a horse that is broken in will be tame, but not always gentle. Gentle, as before observed (v. Gentle), signifies literally well-born, and is opposed either to the fierce or the rude: tame, in German zahn, from zaum, a bridle, signifies literally curbed or kept under, and is opposed either to the wild or the spirited. Animals are in general said to be gentle who show a disposition to associate with man, and conform to his will; they are said to be tame if, either by compulsion or habit, they are brought to mix with human society. Of the first description there are individuals in almost every species which are more or less entitled to the name of gentle; of the latter description are many species, as the dog, the sheep, the hen, and the like.

This said, the hoary king no longer staid,
But on his car the slaughter'd victims laid;
Then seiz'd the reins, his gentle steeds to guide,
And drove to Troy, Antenor at his side. POPE.
For Orpheus' lute could soften steel and stone,
Make tigers tame, and huge Leviathans.

SHAKESPEARE.

In the moral application, gentle is always employed in the good, and tame in the bad, sense: a gentle spirit needs no control, it amalgamates freely with the will of another: a tame spirit is without any will of its own; it is alive to nothing but submission: it is perfectly consistent with our natural liberty to have gentleness, but tameness is the accompaniment of slavery. The same distinction marks the use of these words when applied to the outward conduct or the language: gentle bespeaks something positively good; tame bespeaks the want of an essential good: the former is allied to the kind, the latter to the abject and mean qualities which naturally flow from the compression or destruction of energy and will in the agent. A gentle expression is devoid of all acrimony, and serves to turn away wrath: a tame expression is devoid of all force or energy, and ill-calculated to inspire the mind with any feeling whatever. In giving counsel to an irritable and conceited temper, it is necessary to be gentle: tame expressions are nowhere such striking deformities as in a poem or an oration.

Gentleness stands opposed, not to the most determined regard to virtue and truth, but to harshness and severity, to pride and arrogance.

BLAIR.

Though all wanton provocations and contemptuous insolence are to be diligently avoided, there is no less danger in timid compliance and tame resignation.

JOHNSON.

TO GET, GAIN, OBTAIN, PROCURE.

To GET signifies simply to cause to have or possess; it is generic, and the rest specific: to GAIN (v. To acquire) is to get the thing one wishes, or that is for one's advantage: to OBTAIN is to get the thing aimed at or striven after: to PROCURE, from pro and curo, to care for, is to get the thing wanted or sought for.

Get is not only the most general in its sense, but its application; it may be substituted in almost every case for the other terms, for we may say to get or gain a prize, to get or obtain a reward, to get or procure a book; and it is also employed in numberless familiar cases, where the other terms would be less suitable, for what this world gains in familiarity it loses in dignity: hence we may with propriety talk of a servant's getting some water, or a person getting a book off a shelf, or getting meat from the butcher, with numberless similar cases in which the other terms could not be employed without losing their dignity. Moreover, get is promiscuously used for whatever comes to the hand, whether good or bad, desirable or not desirable, sought for or not; but gain, obtain, and procure always include either the wishes or the instrumentality of the agent, or both together. Thus a person is said to get a cold, or a fever, a good or an ill name, without specifying any of the circumstances of the action; but he is said to gain that approbation which is gratifying to his feelings; to obtain a recompense which is the object of his exertions; to procure a situation which is the end of his endeavors.

The word gain is peculiarly applicable to whatever comes to us fortuitously; what we gain constitutes our good fortune; we gain a victory, or we gain a cause; the result in both cases may be independent of our exertions. To obtain and procure exclude the idea of chance, and suppose exertions directed to a specific end: but the former may include the exertions of others; the latter is particularly employed for one's own personal exertions. A person obtains a situation through the recommendation of a friend: he procures a situation by applying for it. Obtain is likewise employed only in that which requires particular efforts, that which is not immediately within our reach; procure is applicable to that which is to be got with ease, by the simple exertion of a walk, or of asking for.

The miser is more industrious than the saint: the pains of getting, the fears of losing, and the inability of enjoying his wealth, have been the mark of satire in all ages. SPECTATOR.

Neither Virgil nor Horace would have gained so great reputation in the world had they not been the friends and admirers of each other.

ADDISON.

Ambition pushes the soul to such actions as are apt to procure honor and reputation to the actor.

GIFT, PRESENT, DONATION.

GIFT is derived from to give, in the sense of what is communicated to another gratuitously of one's property. PRESENT is derived from to present, signifying the thing presented to another. DONATION, in French donation, from the Latin dono, to present or give, is a species of gift.

The gift is an act of generosity or condescension; it contributes to the benefit of the receiver: the present is an act of kindness, courtesy, or respect; it contributes to the pleasure of the receiver. The gift passes from the rich to the poor, from the high to the low, and creates an obligation; the present passes either between equals, or from the inferior to the superior. Whatever we receive from God, through the bounty of his providence, we entitle a gift; whatever we receive from our friends, or whatever princes receive from their subjects, are entitled presents. We are told by all travellers that it is a custom in the East never to approach a great man without a present; the value of a gift is often heightened by being given opportunely. The value of a present often depends upon the value we have for the giver; the smallest present from an esteemed friend is of more worth in our eyes than the costliest presents that monarchs receive.

The gifts of Heav'n my following song pursues, Aërial honey and ambrosial dews. DRYDEN.

Have what you ask, your presents I receive;
Land, where and when you please, with ample leave. DRYDEN.

The gift is private, and benefits the individual: the donation is public, and serves some general purpose: what is given to relieve the necessities of any poor person is a gift; what is given to support an institution is a donation. The clergy are indebted to their patrons for the livings which are in their gift: it has been the custom of the pious and charitable in all ages to make donations for the support of almshouses, hospitals, infirmaries, and such institutions as serve to diminish the sum of human misery.

And she shall have them, if again she sues,
Since you the giver and the gift refuse.

DRYDEN.

Estates held by feudal tenure, being annually gratuitous donations, were at that time denominated beneficia.

BLACKSTONE.

GIFT, ENDOWMENT, TALENT.

GIFT, v. Gift. ENDOWMENT signifies the thing with which one is endowed. TALENT, v. Ability.

Gift and endowment both refer to the act of giving and endowing, and of course include the idea of something given, and something received: the word talent conveys no such collateral idea. When we speak of a gift, we refer in our minds to a giver; when we speak of an endowment, we refer in our minds to the receiver; when we speak of a talent, we only think of its intrinsic quality. A gift is either supernatural or natural; an endowment is only natural. The primitive Christians received various gifts through the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, as the gift of tongues, the gift of healing, etc. There are some men who have a peculiar gift of utterance; beauty of person, and corporeal agility, are endowments with which some are peculiarly invested.

But Heav'n its gifts not all at once bestows,
These years with wisdom crowns, with action
those. POPE.

A brute arrives at a point of perfection that he can never pass ; in a few years he has all the en- dowments he is capable of. ADDISON.

The word gift excludes the idea of anything acquired by exertion ; it is that which is communicated to us altogether independently of ourselves, and enables us to arrive at that perfection in any art which could not be attained any other way. Speech is denominated a general gift, inasmuch as it is given to the whole human race, in distinction from the brutes ; but the gift of eloquence is a peculiar gift granted to a few individuals, in distinction from others, and one which may be exerted for the benefit of mankind. Endowments, though inherent in us, are not independent of our exertions ; they are qualities which admit of improvement by being used ; they are, in fact, the gifts of nature, which serve to adorn and elevate the possessor, when employed for a good purpose. Talents are either natural or acquired, or in some measure of a mixed nature ; they denote powers without specifying the source from which they proceed ; a man may have a talent for music, for drawing, for mimicry, and the like ; but this talent may be the fruit of practice and experience, as much as of nature. It is clear from the above that an endowment is a gift, but a gift is not always an endowment ; and that a talent may also be either a gift or an endowment, but that it is frequently distinct from both. The terms gift and talent are applicable to corporeal as well as spiritual actions ; endowment to corporeal or mental qualities. To write a superior hand is a gift, inasmuch as it is supposed to be unattainable by any force of application and instruction ; it is a talent, inasmuch as it is a power or property worth our possession, but it is never an endowment. On the other hand, courage, discernment, a strong imagination, and the like, are both gifts and endowments ; and when the intellectual endowment displays itself in any creative form, as in the case of poetry, music, or any art, so as to produce that which is valued and esteemed, it becomes a talent to the possessor.

Although he had the gift of seeing through a question at a glance, yet he never suffered his discernment to anticipate another's explanation.

CUMBERLAND.

He was of a noble nature and generous disposition, and of such other endowments as made him very capable of being a great favorite to a great king. CLARENDON.

Mr. Locke has an admirable reflection upon the difference of wit and judgment, whereby he endeavors to show the reason why they are not always the talents of the same person.

ADDISON.

TO GIVE, GRANT, BESTOW.

GIVE, in Saxon gifan, German geben, etc., is derived by Adelung from the old word gaff, the hollow of the hand. GRANT and BESTOW, v. To allow.

The idea of communicating to another what is our own, or in our power, is common to these terms ; this is the whole signification of give ; but grant and bestow include accessory ideas in their meaning. To grant is to give at one's pleasure ; to bestow is to give from a certain degree of necessity. Giving is confined to no object ; whatever property we transfer into the hands of another, that we give ; we give money, clothes, food, or whatever is transferable : granting is confined to such objects as afford pleasure or convenience ; they may consist of transferable property or not : bestowing is applied to such objects only as are necessary to supply wants, which always consist of that which is transferable. We give what is liked or not liked, asked for or unasked for : we grant that only which is wished for and requested. One may give poison or medicine ; one may give to a beggar, or to a friend ; one grants a sum of money by way of loan ; we give what is wanted or not wanted ; we bestow that only which is expressly wanted : we give with an idea of a return or otherwise : we grant voluntarily, without any prospect of a return : we give for a permanency or otherwise ; we bestow only in particular cases which require immediate notice.

Milton afterward gives us a description of the morning, which is wonderfully suitable to a divine poem. ADDISON.

But there is yet a liberty, unseen
By poets, and by senators unpraised,
Which monarchs cannot grant, nor all the powers
Of earth and hell confederate take away.

COWPER.

Charity, decent, modest, easy, kind,
Softens the high and rears the abject mind,
Each other gift which God on man bestows,
Its proper bounds and due restrictions knows.

PRIOR.

To give has no respect to the circumstances of the action or the agent; it is applicable to persons of all conditions: to grant bespeaks not only the will, but the power and influence of the grantor: to bestow bespeaks the necessitous condition of the receiver. Children may give to their parents and parents to their children, kings to their subjects or subjects to their kings; but monarchs only grant to their subjects, or parents to their children; and superiors in general bestow upon their dependents that which they cannot provide for themselves.

Such notes as, warbled to the string,
Drew from tears down Pluto's cheek,
And made hell grant what love did seek.

MILTON.

In an extended application of the terms to moral objects or circumstances, they strictly adhere to the same line of distinction. We give our consent; we give our promise; we give our word; we give credit; we give in all cases that which may be simply transferred from one to another. Liberties, rights, privileges, favors, indulgences, permissions, and all things are granted, which are in the hands only of a few, but are acceptable to many. Blessings, care, concern, and the like, are bestowed upon those who are dependent upon others for whatever they have.

Happy when both to the same centre move,
When kings give liberty, and subjects love.

DENHAM.

The gods will grant
What their unerring wisdom sees they want.

DRYDEN.

Give and bestow are likewise said of things as well as of persons; grant is said only of persons. Give is here equally general and indefinite; bestow conveys the idea of giving under circumstances of necessity and urgency. One gives a preference to a particular situation; one gives a thought to a subject that is proposed; one gives time and labor to any matter that engages one's attention: but one bestows pains on that which demands particular attention; one bestows a moment's thought on one particular subject, out of the number which engage attention.

He frankly offered to join them in his Majesty's service, and so gave some countenance to the reproach that was first most injuriously cast upon him.

CLARENDON.

After having thus treated at large of Paradise Lost, I could not think it sufficient to have celebrated this poem, in the whole, without descending to particulars: I have therefore bestowed a paper on each book.

ADDISON.

TO GIVE, AFFORD.

GIVE (v. To give, grant) and AFFORD (v. To afford) are allied to each other in the sense of sending forth: but the former denotes an unqualified and unconditional action, as in the preceding article; the latter bears a relation to the circumstances of the agent. A person is said to give money without any regard to the state of his finances: he is said to afford what he gives, when one wishes to define his pecuniary condition. The same idea runs through the application of these terms to all other cases, in which inanimate things are made the agents. When we say a thing gives satisfaction, we simply designate the action; when we say it affords pleasure, we refer to the nature and properties of the thing thus specified—that is to say, its capacity to give satisfaction; the former is employed only to declare the fact, the latter to characterize the object. Hence, in certain cases, we should say, this or that posture of the body gives ease to a sick person; but, as a moral sentiment, we should say, nothing affords such ease to the mind as a clear conscience. Upon the same grounds the use of these terms is justified in the following cases: to give rise; to give birth; or give occasion; to afford an opportunity; to afford a plea or a pretext; to afford ground, and the like.

Are these our great pursuits? Is this to live? *
These all the hopes this much-lov'd world can give!

JENYNS.

Our paper manufacture takes into use several mean materials, which could be put to no other use, and affords work for several hands in the collection of them, which are incapable of any other employment.

ADDISON.

TO GIVE, PRESENT, OFFER, EXHIBIT.

THESE terms have a common signification, inasmuch as they designate the manual act of transferring something from one's self to another. The first is here as elsewhere (v. To give, grant) the most Indefinite and extensive in its meaning; it denotes the complete act: the two latter refer rather to the preliminaries of GIVING than to the act itself. What is given is actually transferred: what is PRESENTED, that is, made a present to any one; or OFFERED, that is, brought in his way, is put in the way of being transferred: we present in giving, and offer in order to give; but we may give without presenting or offering; and, on the other hand, we may present or offer without giving, if the thing presented or offered be not received.

To give is the familiar term which designates the ordinary transfer of property: to present is a term of respect; it includes in it the formality and ceremony of setting before another that which we wish to give: to offer is an act of humility or solemnity; it bespeaks the movement of the heart, which impels to the making a transfer or gift. We give to our domestics; we present to princes; we offer to God: we give to a person what we wish to be received; we present to a person what we think agreeable; we offer what we think acceptable: what is given is supposed to be ours; what we offer is supposed to be at our command; what we present need not be either our own or at our command: we give a person not only our external property, but our esteem, our confidence, our company, and the like: an ambassador presents his credentials at court; a subject offers his services to his king.

Of seven smooth joints a mellow pipe I have,
Which with his dying breath Dametas gave.
DRYDEN.

It fell out at the same time that a very fine colt, which promised great strength and speed, was presented to Octavius: Virgil assured them that he would prove a jade: upon trial, it was found as he had said.
WALSH.

Alexis will thy homely gifts disdain;
Nor, should'st thou offer all thy little store,
Will rich Iolas yield, but offer more.
DRYDEN.

They bear the same relation to each other when applied to words or actions, instead of property: we speak of giving a person an assurance, or a contradiction; of presenting an address, and offering an apology: of giving a reception, presenting a figure, or offering an insult. They may likewise be extended in their application, not only to personal and individual actions, but also to such as respect the public at large: we give a description in writing, as well as by word of mouth; one presents the public with the fruit of one's labors; we offer remarks on such things as attract notice, and call for animadversion.

Sacred interpreter of human thought,
How few respect or use thee as they ought;
But all shall give account of every wrong
Who dare dishonor or defile the tongue.
COWPER.

He carefully retained the secret, and did not communicate to any person living that he received any letter from the king, till the very minute he presented it to the House of Commons.
CLARENDON.

Socrates deterred Alcibiades from the prayers and sacrifices which he was going to offer.
ADDISON.

These terms may also be employed to designate the actions of unconscious agents, by which they are characterized: in this sense they come very near to the word EXHIBIT, which, from exhibeo, signifies to hold or put forth. Here the word give is equally indefinite and general, denoting simply to send from one's self, and applies mostly to what proceeds from another, by a natural cause: thus, a thing is said to give pain, or to give pleasure. Things are said to present or offer: thus, a town is said to present a fine view, or an idea presents itself to the mind; an opportunity offers, that is, offers itself to our notice. To exhibit is properly applied in this sense of setting forth to view; but expresses, likewise, the idea of attracting notice also: that which is exhibited is more striking than what is presented or offered; thus a poem is said to exhibit marks of genius.

The apprehension of the good
Gives but the greater feeling to the worse.
SHAKESPEARE.

TO GIVE UP, DELIVER, SURRENDER, YIELD, CEDE, CONCEDE.

WE GIVE UP (v. To give, grant) that which we wish to retain; we DELIVER that which we wish not to retain. Deliver does not include the idea of a transfer;

but give up implies both the giving from, and the giving to: we give up our house to the accommodation of our friends; we deliver property into the hands of the owner. To give up is a colloquial substitute for either SURRENDER or YIELD, as it designates no circumstance of the action; it may be employed in familiar discourse, in almost every case, for the other terms: where the action is compulsory, we may either say an officer gives up or surrenders his sword; when the action is discretionary, we may either say he gives up or yields a point of discussion: give up has, however, an extensiveness of application, which gives it an office distinct from either surrender or yield. When we speak of familiar and personal subjects, give up is more suitable than surrender, which is confined to matters of public interest or great moment: a man gives up his place, his right, his claim, and the like; he surrenders a fortress, a vessel, or his property to his creditors. When give up is compared with yield, they both respect personal matters; but the former expresses a much stronger action than the latter: a man gives up his whole judgment to another; he yields to the opinion of another in particular cases: he gives himself up to sensual indulgences; he yields to the force of temptation.

CEDE, from the Latin cedo, to give, is properly to surrender by virtue of a treaty: we may surrender a town as an act of necessity; but the cession of a country is purely a political transaction: thus, generals frequently surrender such towns as they are not able to defend; and governments cede such countries as they find it not convenient to retain. To CONCEDE, which is but a variation of cede, is a mode of yielding which may be either an act of discretion or courtesy; as when a government concedes to the demands of the people certain privileges, or when an individual concedes any point in dispute for the sake of peace.

The peaceable man will give up his favorite schemes; he will yield to an opponent rather than become the cause of violent embroilments.

BLAIR.

TO GIVE UP, ABANDON, RESIGN, FOREGO.

THESE terms differ from the preceding (v. To give up), inasmuch as they designate actions entirely free from foreign influence. A man GIVES UP, ABANDONS (v. To abandon), and RESIGNS (v. To abandon), from the dictates of his own mind, independently of all control from others. To give up and abandon both denote a positive decision of the mind; but the former may be the act of the understanding or the will, the latter is more commonly the act of the will and the passions: to give up is applied to familiar cases; abandon to matters of importance: one gives up an idea, an intention, a plan, and the like; one abandons a project, a scheme, a measure of government.

Upon his friend telling him he wondered he gave up the question, when he had visibly the better of the dispute; I am never ashamed, says he, to be confuted by one who is master of fifty legions.

ADDISON.

They have totally abandoned the shattered and old-fashioned fortress of prerogative.

BURKE.

To give up and resign are applied either to outward actions, or merely to inward movements; but the former is active, and determinately fixes the conduct; the latter seems to be rather passive, it is the leaning of the mind to the circumstances: a man gives up his situation by a positive act of his choice; he resigns his office when he feels it inconvenient to hold it: so, likewise, we give up expectations, and resign hopes. In this sense, FOREGO, which signifies to let go, is comparable with resign, inasmuch as it expresses a passive action; but we resign that which we have, and we forego that which we might have: thus, we resign the claims which we have already made; we forego the claims which we might make: the former may be a matter of prudence; the latter is always an act of virtue and forbearance.

He declares himself to be now satisfied to the contrary, in which he has given up the cause.

DRYDEN.

The praise of artful numbers I resign,
And hang my pipe upon the sacred pine.

DRYDEN.

Then, pilgrim, turn, thy cares forego;
All earth-born cares are wrong.

GOLDSMITH.

When applied to the state of a person's mind, or the actions flowing from that state, to give up is used either in a good, bad, or indifferent sense; abandon always in a bad sense; resign always in a good sense: a man may give himself up either to studious pursuits, to idle vagaries, or vicious indulgences; he abandons himself to gross vices; he resigns himself to the will of Providence, or to the circumstances of his condition: a man is said to be given up to his lusts who is without any principle to control him in their gratification; he is said to be abandoned when his outrageous conduct bespeaks an entire insensibility to every honest principle; he is said to be resigned when he discovers composure and tranquillity in the hour of affliction; so one is said to resign a thing to another when one is contented with what one has.

The mind, I say, might give itself up to that happiness which is at hand, considering that it is so very near, and that it would last so very long. But what words are sufficient to express that folly and want of consideration which in such a case makes a wrong choice.

THOMSON.

GLAD, PLEASED, JOYFUL, CHEERFUL.

GLAD is obviously a variation of glee and glow (v. Fire). PLEASED, from to please, marks the state of being pleased. JOYFUL bespeaks its own meaning either as full of joy or productive of great joy. CHEERFUL, v. Cheerful.

Glad denotes either a partial state, or a permanent and habitual sentiment: in the former sense it is most nearly allied to pleased; in the latter sense to joyful and merry. Glad and pleased are both applied to the ordinary occurrences of the day; but the former denotes rather a lively and momentary sentiment, the latter a gentle but rather more lasting feeling: we are glad to see a friend who has been long absent; we are glad to have good intelligence from our friends and relatives; we are glad to get rid of a troublesome companion; we are pleased to have the approbation of those we esteem: we are pleased to hear our friends well spoken of; we are pleased with the company of an intelligent and communicative person.

O sole, in whom my thoughts find all repose,
My glory, my perfection! glad I see

The soul has many different faculties, or, in other words, many different ways of acting, and can be intensely pleased or made happy by all these different faculties or ways of acting.

ADDISON.

Glad, joyful, and cheerful, all express more or less lively sentiments; but glad is less vivid than joyful, and more so than cheerful. Gladness seems to arise as much from physical as mental causes; wine is said to make the heart glad: joy has its source in the mind, as it is influenced by external circumstances; instances of good fortune, either for ourselves, our friends, or our country, excite joy: cheerfulness is an even tenor of the mind, which it may preserve of itself independently of all external circumstances; religious contemplation produces habitual cheerfulness. Glad is seldom employed as an epithet to qualify things, except in the scriptural or solemn style, as glad tidings of great joy: joyful is seldomer used to qualify persons than things; hence we speak of joyful news, a joyful occurrence, joyful faces, joyful sounds, and the like: cheerful is employed either to designate the state of the mind or the property of the thing; we either speak of a cheerful disposition, a cheerful person, a cheerful society, or a cheerful face, a cheerful sound, a cheerful aspect, and the like.

Man superior walks
Amid the glad creation, musing praise.

THOMSON.

Thus joyful Troy maintain'd the watch of night,
While fear, pale comrade of inglorious flight,
And heaven-bred horror, on the Grecian part,
Sat on each face, and sadden'd every heart.

POPE.

No sun e'er gilds the gloomy horrors there,
No cheerful gales refresh the lazy air.

POPE.

When used to qualify one's actions, they all bespeak the temper of the mind:

gladly denotes a high degree of willingness as opposed to aversion: one who is suffering under excruciating pains gladly submits to anything which promises relief: joyfully denotes unqualified pleasure, unmixed with any alloy or restrictive consideration; a convert to Christianity joyfully goes through all the initiatory ceremonies which entitle him to all its privileges, spiritual and temporal: cheerfully denotes the absence of unwillingness, it is opposed to reluctantly; the zealous Christian cheerfully submits to every hardship to which he is exposed in the course of his religious profession.

For his particular I'll receive him gladly,
But not one follower. SHAKESPEARE.

Never did men more joyfully obey,
Or sooner understand the sign to fly. DRYDEN.

Doctrine is that which must prepare men for discipline, and men never go so cheerfully as when they see where they go. SOUTH.

TO GLANCE AT, ALLUDE TO.

GLANCE, probably from the German glänzen, to shine, signifies to make appear to the eye. ALLUDE, v. To allude.

These terms are nearly allied in the sense of indirectly referring to any object, either in written or verbal discourse: but glance expresses a cursory and latent action; allude, simply an indirect but undisguised action: ill-natured satirists are perpetually glancing at the follies and infirmities of individuals; the Scriptures are full of allusions to the manners and customs of the Easterns: he who attempts to write an epitome of universal history must take but a hasty glance at the most important events.

Entering upon his discourse, Socrates says he does not believe any the most comic genius can censure him for talking upon such a subject (the immortality of the soul) at such a time (that of death). This passage, I think, evidently glances upon Aristophanes, who writ a comedy on purpose to ridicule the discourses of that divine philosopher. ADDISON.

The author, in the whole course of his poem, has infinite allusions to places of Scripture. ADDISON.

GLARING, BAREFACED.

GLARING is here used in the figurative sense, drawn from its natural signification of broad light, which strikes powerfully upon the senses. BAREFACED signifies literally having a bare or uncovered face, which denotes the absence of all disguise or all shame.

Glaring designates the thing; barefaced characterizes the person: a glaring falsehood is that which strikes the observer in an instant to be falsehood; a barefaced lie or falsehood betrays the effrontery of him who utters it. A glaring absurdity will be seen instantly without the aid of reflection; a barefaced piece of impudence characterizes the agent as more than ordinarily lost to all sense of decorum.

The glaring side is that of enmity. BURKE.

The animosities increased, and the parties appeared barefaced against each other. CLARENDON.

GLEAM, GLIMMER, RAY, BEAM.

GLEAM is in Saxon gleomen, German glimmen, etc. GLIMMER is a variation of the same. RAY is connected with the word row. BEAM comes from the German basen, a tree.

Certain portions of light are designated by all these terms, but gleam and glimmer are indefinite; ray and beam are definite. A gleam is properly the commencement of light, or that portion of opening light which interrupts the darkness: a glimmer is an unsteady gleam: ray and beam are portions of light which emanate from some luminous body; the former from all luminous bodies in general, the latter more particularly from the sun: the former is, as its derivation denotes, a row of light issuing in a greater or less degree from any body; the latter is a great row of light, like a pole issuing from a body. There may be a gleam of light visible on the wall of a dark room, or a glimmer if it be movable; there may be rays of light visible at night on the back of a glow-worm, or rays of light may break through the shutters of a closed room; the sun in the height of its splendor sends forth its beams.

A dreadful gleam from his bright armor came,
And from his eyeballs flash'd the living flame. POPE.

The glimmering light which shot into the chaos from the utmost verge of the creation, is wonderfully beautiful and poetic. ADDISON.

A sudden ray shot beaming o'er the plain,
And show'd the shores, the navy, and the main. POPE.

The stars shine smarter; and the moon adorns,
As with unborrow'd beams, her horns. DAYDEN.

GLIMPSE, GLANCE.

A GLIMPSE is the action of the object appearing to the eye; a GLANCE is the action of the eye seeking the object: one catches a glimpse of an object; one casts a glance at an object: the latter therefore is properly the means for obtaining the former, which is the end: we get a glimpse by means of a glance. The glimpse is the hasty, imperfect, and sudden view which we get of an object; the glance is the hasty and imperfect view which we take of an object: the former may depend upon a variety of circumstances; the latter depends upon the will of the agent. We can seldom do more than get a glimpse of objects in a carriage that is going with rapidity: when we do not wish to be observed to look, we take but a glance of an object.

Of the state with which practice has not acquainted us, we snatch a glimpse, we discern a point, and regulate the rest by passion and by fancy. JOHNSON.

Here passion first I felt,
Commotion strange! in all enjoyments else
Superior, unmoved; here only weak
Against the charm of beauty's pow'rful glance. MILTON.

GLOBE, BALL.

GLOBE, in Latin globus, comes probably from the Greek γλοβος, a hillock of earth. BALL, in Teutonic ball, is doubtless connected with the words bow, bow, bend, and the like, signifying that which is turned or rounded.

Globe is to ball as the species to the genus; a globe is a ball, but every ball is not a globe. The globe does not in its strict sense require to be of an equal roundness in all its parts; it is properly an irregularly round body: a ball, on the other hand, is generally any round body, but particularly one that is entirely, regularly round; the earth itself is therefore properly denominated a globe from its unequal roundness: and for the same reason the mechanical body, which is made to represent the earth, is also denominated a globe: but in the higher style of writing the earth is frequently denominated a ball, and in familiar discourse every solid body which assumes a circular form is entitled a ball.

It is said by modern philosophers, that not only the great globes of matter are thinly scattered through the universe, but the hardest bodies are so porous, that if all matter were compressed to perfect solidity, it might be contained in a cube of a few feet. JOHNSON.

What though in solemn silence all
Move round the dark terrestrial ball,
In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice. ADDISON.

GLOOM, HEAVINESS.

GLOOM has its source internally, and is often independent of outward circumstances; HEAVINESS is a weight upon the spirits, produced by a foreign cause: the former belongs to the constitution; the latter is occasional. People of a melancholy habit have a particular gloom hang over their minds which pervades all their thoughts; those who suffer under severe disappointments for the present, and have gloomy prospects for the future, may be expected to be heavy at heart; we may sometimes dispel the gloom of the mind by the force of reflection, particularly by the force of religious contemplation: heaviness of spirits is itself a temporary thing, and may be succeeded by vivacity or lightness of mind when the pressure of the moment has subsided.

If we consider the frequent reliefs we receive from laughter, and how often it breaks the gloom which is apt to depress the mind, one would take care not to grow too wise for so great a pleasure of life. ADDISON.

Worldly prosperity flattens as life descends. He who lately overflowed with cheerful spirits and high hopes, begins to look back with heaviness on the days of former years. BLAIR.

GLOOMY, SULLEN, MOROSE, SPLENETIC.

ALL these terms denote a temper of mind the reverse of easy or happy: GLOOMY lies either in the general constitution or the particular frame of the mind; SULLEN lies in the temper: a man of a gloomy disposition is an involuntary agent; it is his misfortune, and renders him in some measure pitiable: the sullen man yields to his evil humors; sullenness is his fault, and renders him offensive. The gloomy man distresses himself most; his pains are all his own: the sullen man has a great share of discontent in his composition; he charges his sufferings upon others, and makes them suffer in common with himself. A man may be rendered gloomy for a time by the influence of particular circumstances; but sullenness creates pains for itself when all external circumstances of a painful nature are wanting.

Th' unwilling heralds act their lord's commands,
Pensive they walk along the barren sands:

Arriv'd, the hero in his tent they find
With gloomy aspect, on his arm reclin'd. Pope.

At this they ceased; the stern debate expir'd;
The chiefs in sullen majesty retir'd. Pope.

Sullenness and MOROSENESS are both the inherent properties of the temper; but the former discovers itself in those who have to submit, and the latter in those who have to command: sullenness therefore betrays itself mostly in early life; moroseness is the peculiar characteristic of age. The sullen person has many fancied hardships to endure from the control of others; the morose person causes others to endure many real hardships, by keeping them under too severe a control. Sullenness shows itself mostly by an unseemly reserve; moroseness shows itself by the hardness of the speech, and the roughness of the voice. Sullenness is altogether a sluggish principle, that leads more or less to inaction; moroseness is a harsh feeling, that is not contented with exacting obedience unless it inflicts pain.

The morose philosopher is so much affected by these and some other authorities that he becomes a convert to his friend, and desires he would take him with him when he went to his next ball.

BUDGELL.

Moroseness is a defect of the temper; but SPLEEN, from the Latin splen, is a defect in the heart: the one betrays itself in behavior, the other more in conduct. A morose man is an unpleasant companion; a splenetic man is a bad member of society; the former is ill-natured to those about him, the latter is ill-humored with all the world. Moroseness vents itself in temporary expressions, spleen indulges itself in perpetual bitterness of expression.

While in that splenetic mood we amused ourselves in a sour critical speculation of which we ourselves were the objects, a few months effected a total change in our variable minds. BURKE.

GLORY, HONOR.

GLORY is something dazzling and widely diffused. The Latin word gloria, anciently written gloria, is in all probability connected with our words gloss, glaze, glitter, glow, and the Northern words gleisarn, glotzen, glänzen, glühen, all which come from the Hebrew gehul, a live coal. That the moral idea of glory is best represented by light is evident from the glory which is painted round the head of our Saviour. HONOR is something less splendid, but more solid, and probably comes from the Hebrew hon, wealth or substance.

Glory impels to extraordinary efforts and to great undertakings. Honor induces to a discharge of one's duty. Excellence in the attainment, and success in the exploit, bring glory; a faithful exercise of one's talents reflects honor. Glory is connected with everything which has a peculiar public interest; honor is more properly obtained within a private circle. Glory is not confined to the nation or life of the individual by whom it is sought; it spreads over all the earth, and descends to the latest posterity: honor is limited to those who are connected with the subject of it, and eye-witnesses to his actions. Glory is attainable but by few, and may be an object of indifference to any one; honor is more or less within the reach of all, and must be disregarded by no one. A general at the head of an army goes in pursuit of glory; the humble citizen who acts his part in society so as to obtain the approbation of his fellow-citizens is in the road for honor. A nation acquires glory by the splendor of its victories, and its superiority in arts as well as arms; it obtains honor by its strict adherence to equity and good faith in all its dealings with other nations.

Hence is our love of fame; a love so strong,
We think no dangers great nor labors long,
By which we hope our beings to extend,
And to remotest times in glory to descend.

JEMYNE.

As virtue is the most reasonable and genuine source of honor, we generally find in titles an intimation of some particular merit which should recommend men to the high stations which they possess.

ADDISON.

Glory is a sentiment selfish in its nature, but salutary or pernicious in its effect, according as it is directed; honor is a principle disinterested in its nature, and beneficial in its operations. A thirst for glory is seldom indulged but at the expense of others, as it is not attainable in the plain path of duty; there are but few opportunities of acquiring it by elevated acts of goodness, and still fewer who have the virtue to embrace the opportunities that offer: a love of honor can never be indulged but to the advantage of others; it is restricted by fixed laws; it requires a sacrifice of every selfish consideration, and a due regard to the rights of others; it is associated with nothing but virtue.

If glory cannot move a mind so mean,
Nor future praise from fading pleasures wean,
Yet why should he defraud his son of fame,
And grudge the Romans their immortal name?

DRYDEN.

The sense of honor is of so fine and delicate a nature that it is only to be met with in minds which are naturally noble, or in such as have been cultivated by great examples or refined education.

GUARDIAN.

TO GLORY, BOAST, VAUNT.

To GLORY is to hold as one's glory (v. Glory). To BOAST is to set forth to one's advantage. To VAUNT, from the French avant, before, is to set one's self up before others. The first two terms denote the value which the individual sets upon that which belongs to himself, the last term may be employed in respect to others.

To glory is more particularly the act of the mind, the indulgence of the internal sentiment: to boast denotes rather the expression of the sentiment. To glory is applied only to matters of moment; boast is rather suitable to trifling points: the former is seldom used in a bad sense, the latter still seldomer in a good one. A Christian martyr glories in the cross of Christ; a soldier boasts of his courage, and his feats in battle. To vaunt is properly to proclaim praises aloud, and is taken either in an indifferent or bad sense.

All the laymen who have exerted a more than ordinary genius in their writings, and were the glory of their times, were men whose hopes were filled with immortality.

ADDISON.

If a man looks upon himself in an abstracted light, he has not much to boast of; but if he considers himself with regard to others, he may find occasion of glorying, if not in his own virtues, at least in the absence of another's imperfections.

ADDISON.

Not that great champion
Whom famous poets' verse so much doth eulge,
And hath for twelve huge labors high extoll'd,
So many furies and sharp hits did haunt.

SPENSER.

TO GLOSS, VARNISH, PALLIATE.

GLOSS and VARNISH are figurative terms, which borrow their signification from the act of rendering the outer surface of any physical object shining. To gloss, which is connected with to glaze, is to give a gloss or brightness to anything by means of friction, as in the case of japan or mahogany: to varnish is to give an artificial gloss, by means of applying a foreign substance. Hence, in the figurative use of the terms, to gloss is to put the best face upon anything by various artifices; but to varnish is to do the same thing by means of direct falsehood; to PALLIATE, which likewise signifies to give the best possible outside to a thing (v. To extenuate), requires still less artifice than either. One glosses over that which is bad, by giving it a soft name; as when a man's vices are glossed over with the name of indiscretion, or a man's mistress is termed his friend: one varnishes a bad character by ascribing good motives to his bad actions, by withholding many facts that are to his discredit, and fabricating other circumstances in his favor; an unvarnished tale contains nothing but the simple truth; the varnished tale, on the other hand, contains a great mixture of falsehood: to palliate is to diminish the magnitude of an offence, by making an excuse in favor of the offender; as when an act of theft is palliated by considering the starving condition of the thief.

If a jealous man once finds a false gloss put upon any single action, he quickly suspects all the rest.

ADDISON.

The waiting tears stood ready for command,
And now they flow to varnish the false tale.

ROWE.

A man's bodily defects should give him occasion to exert a noble spirit, and to palliate those imperfections which are not in his power, by those perfections which are.

ADDISON.

GODLIKE, DIVINE, HEAVENLY.

GODLIKE bespeaks its own meaning, as like God, or after the manner of God. DIVINE, in Latin divinus, from divus or Deus, signifies appertaining to God.

HEAVENLY, or HEAVEN-LIKE, signifies like or appertaining to heaven.

Godlike is a more expressive, but less common term than divine: the former is used only as an epithet of peculiar praise for an individual; divine is generally employed for that which appertains to a superior being, in distinction from that which is human. Benevolence is a godlike property: the Divine image is stamped on the features of man, whence the face is called by Milton "the human face divine." As divine is opposed to human, so is heavenly to earthly; the term Divine Being distinguishes the Creator from all other beings; but a heavenly being denotes the angels or inhabitants of heaven, in distinction from earthly beings, or the inhabitants of earth. A divine influence is to be sought for only by prayer to the Giver of all good things; but a heavenly temper may be acquired by a steady contemplation of heavenly things, and an abstraction from those which are earthly: the Divine will is the foundation of all moral law and obligation; heavenly joys are the fruit of all our labors in this earthly course. These terms are applied to other objects with similar distinction.

Sure he that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not
That capability and godlike reason,
To rust in us unus'd. SHAKESPEARE.

Of all that see or read thy comedies,
Whoever in those glasses looks may find
The spots return'd, or graces of his mind;
And by the help of so divine an art,
At leisure view and dress his nobler part. WALLER.

Reason, alas! It does not know itself;
But man, vain man! would with his short-lin'd plummet

Fathom the vast abyss of heavenly justice. DRYDEN.

GODLY, RIGHTEOUS.

GODLY is a contraction of godlike (v. Godlike). RIGHTEOUS signifies conformable to right or truth.

These epithets are both used in a spiritual sense, and cannot, without an indecorous affectation of religion, be introduced into any other discourse than that which is properly spiritual. Godliness, in the strict sense, is that outward deportment which characterizes a heavenly temper; prayer, reading of the Scriptures, public worship, and every religious act, enters into the signification of godli- ness, which at the same time supposes a temper of mind, not only to delight in, but to profit by such exercises: righteousness, on the other hand, comprehends Christian morality; in distinction from that of the heathen or unbeliever; a righteous man does right, not only because it is right, but because it is agreeable to the will of his Maker, and the example of his Redeemer; righteousness is therefore to godliness as the effect to the cause. The godly man goes to the sanctuary, and by converse with his Maker assimilates all his affections to the character of that Being whom he worships; when he leaves the sanctuary he proves the efficacy of his godliness by his righteous converse with his fellow-creatures. It is easy, however, for men to mistake the means for the end, and to rest content with godliness without righteousness, as too many are apt to do who seem to make their whole duty to consist in an attention to religious observances, and in the indulgence of extravagant feelings.

It hath been the great design of the devil and his instruments in all ages to undermine religion, by making an unhappy separation and divorce between godliness and morality. But let us not deceive ourselves; this was always religion, and the condition of our acceptance with God, to endeavor to be like God in purity and holiness, in justice and righteousness. TILLOTSON.

GOLD, GOLDEN.

THESE terms are both employed as epithets, but GOLD is the substantive used in composition, and GOLDEN the adjective, in ordinary use. The former is strictly applied to the metal of which the thing is made, as a gold cup, or a gold coin; but the latter to whatever appertains to gold, whether properly or figuratively: as the golden lion, the golden crown, the golden age, or a golden harvest.

GOOD, GOODNESS.

GOOD, which under different forms runs through all the Northern languages, and has a great affinity to the Greek αγαθος, is supposed by Adelung to be derived from the Latin gaudeo, Greek γαύειν, and Hebrew chada, to rejoice.

Good and GOODNESS are abstract terms, drawn from the same word; the former to denote the thing that is good, the latter the inherent good property of persons or things. All good comes from God, whose goodness toward his creatures is unbounded. The good we do is determined by the tendency of the action; but our goodness in doing it is determined by the motive of our actions. Good is of a twofold nature, physical and moral, and is opposed to evil; goodness is applicable either to the disposition of moral agents or the qualities of inanimate objects; it is opposed to badness. By the order of Providence the most horrible convulsions are made to bring about good; the goodness or badness of any fruit depends upon its fitness to be enjoyed.

Each form'd for all, promotes through private care
The public good, and justly takes its share.

JENYNS.

The reigning error of his life was, that Savage mistook the love for the practice of virtue, and was indeed not so much a good man as the friend of goodness.

JOHNSON.

GOOD, BENEFIT, ADVANTAGE.

GOOD (v. Good) is an abstract universal term, which in its unlimited sense comprehends everything that can be conceived of, as suited in all its parts to the end proposed. In this sense BENEFIT and ADVANTAGE (v. Benefit and Advantage) are modifications of good; but the term good has likewise a limited application, which brings it to a just point of comparison with the other terms here chosen: the common idea which allies these words to each other is that of good as it respects a particular object. Good is here employed indefinitely; benefit and advantage are specified by some collateral circumstances. Good is done without regard to the person who does it, or him to whom it is done; but benefit has always respect to the relative condition of the giver and receiver, who must be both specified. Hence we say of a charitable man that he does much good, or that he bestows benefits upon this or that individual. In like manner, when speaking of particular communities or society at large, we may say that it is for the good of society or for the good of mankind that every one submits to the sacrifice of some portion of his natural liberty; but it is for the benefit of the poorer orders that the charitably disposed employ their money in charity.

Good is limited to no mode or manner, no condition of the person or the thing; it is applied indiscriminately: benefit is more particularly applicable to the external circumstances of a person, as to his health, his improvement, his pecuniary condition, and the like; it is also confined in its application to persons only: we may counsel another for his good, although we do not counsel him for his benefit; but we labor for the benefit of another when we set apart for him the fruits of our labor: exercise is always attended with some good to all persons; it is of particular benefit to those who are of a lethargic habit: an indiscreet zeal does more harm than good to the cause of religion; a patient cannot expect to derive benefit from a medicine when he counteracts its effects.

Our present good the easy task is made,
To earn superior bliss when this shall fade.

JENYNS.

Unless men were endowed by nature with some sense of duty or moral obligation, they could reap no benefit from revelation.

BLAIR.

A benefit is a positive and direct good, an advantage is an adventitious and indirect good: the benefit serves to supply some want, to remove some evil, and afford some sort of relief: an advantage serves to promote some ulterior object. An advantage, therefore, will not be a benefit unless it be turned to a good use. Education may be a benefit to a person, if it enable him to procure a competence; a polite education is of advantage to one who associates with the great.

It was late before this country found out the benefits of inland navigation.

HISTORY OF INLAND NAVIGATION.

The true art of memory is the art of attention. No man will read with much advantage who is not able at pleasure to evacuate his mind.

JOHNSON.

GOOD-NATURE, GOOD-HUMOR.

GOOD-NATURE and GOOD-HUMOR both imply the disposition to please and be pleased; but the former is habitual and permanent, the latter is temporary and partial: the former lies in the nature and frame of the mind, the latter in the state of the humors or spirits. A good-natured man recommends himself at all times for his good-nature; a good-humored man recommends himself particularly as a companion: good-nature displays itself by a readiness in doing kind offices; good-humor is confined mostly to the ease and cheerfulness of one's outward deportment in social converse: good-nature is apt to be guilty of weak compliances; good-humor is apt to be succeeded by fits of peevishness and depression. Good-nature is applicable only to the character of the individual; good-humor may be said of a whole company: it is a mark of good-nature in a man not to disturb the good-humor of the company he is in, by resenting the affront that is offered him by another.

I concluded, however unaccountable the assertion might appear at first sight, that good-nature was an essential quality in a satirist.

ADDISON.

When Virgil said "He that did not hate Bavius might love Mævius," he was in perfect good-humor.

ADDISON.

GOODS, FURNITURE, CHATTELS, MOVABLES, EFFECTS.

ALL these terms are applied to such things as belong to an individual: the first term is the most general, both in sense and application; all the rest are species.

FURNITURE comprehends all household goods; wherefore in regard to an individual, supposing the house to contain all he has, the general is put for the specific term, as when one speaks of a person's moving his GOODS for his furniture: but in the strict sense goods comprehends more than furniture, including not only that which is adapted for the domestic purposes of a family, but also everything which is of value to a person: the chairs and tables are a part of furniture; papers, books, and money are included among his goods: it is obvious, therefore, that goods, even in its most limited sense, is of wider import than furniture.

Now I give up my shop and dispose of all my poetical goods at once; I must therefore desire that the public would please to take them in the gross, and that everybody would turn over what he does not like.

PRIOR.

Considering that your houses, your place and furniture, are not suitable to your quality, I conceive that your expense ought to be reduced to two-thirds of your estate.

WENTWORTH.

CHATTELS, which is probably changed from cattle, is a technical term in law, and therefore not so frequent in ordinary use, but still sufficiently employed to deserve notice. It comprehends that species of goods which is in a special manner separated from one's person and house; a man's cattle, his implements of husbandry, the partial rights which he has in land or buildings, are all comprehended under chatteis: hence the propriety of the expression to seize a man's goods and chatteis, as denoting the disposable property which he has about his person or at a distance. MOVABLES comprehends all the other terms in the limited application to property, as far as it admits of being removed from one place to the other; it is opposed either to fixtures, when speaking of furniture, or to land as contrasted with goods and chatteis.

Honor's a lease for lives to come,
And cannot be extended from
The legal tenant; 'tis a chattel
Not to be forfeited in battle.

HUDIBRAS.

EFFECTS is a term of nearly as extensive a signification as goods, but not so extensive in its application: whatever a man has that is of any supposed value, or convertible into money, is entitled his goods; whatever a man has that can effect, produce, or bring forth money by sale, is entitled his effects; goods, therefore, is applied only to that which a man has at his own disposal; effects more properly to that which is left at the disposal of others. A man makes a sale of his goods on his removal from any place; his creditors or executors take care of his effects either on his bankruptcy or decease: goods, in this case, is seldom employed but in the limited sense of what is removable; but effects includes everything real as well as personal.

There can be no doubt but that movables of every kind become sooner appropriated than the permanent substantial soil.

BLACKSTONE.

The laws of bankruptcy compel the bankrupt to give up all his effects to the use of the creditors without any concealment.

BLACKSTONE.

GOODS, POSSESSIONS, PROPERTY.

ALL these terms are applicable to such things as are the means of enjoyment; but the former term respects the direct quality of producing enjoyment, the two latter have regard to the subject of the enjoyment; we consider GOODS as they are real or imaginary, adapted or not adapted for the producing of real happiness; those who abound in the goods of this world are not always the happiest: POSSESSIONS must be regarded as they are lasting or temporary; he who is anxious for earthly possessions forgets that they are but transitory, and dependent upon a thousand contingencies: PROPERTY is to be considered as it is legal or illegal, just or unjust; those who are anxious for great property are not always scrupulous about the means by which it is to be obtained. The purity of a man's Christian character is in danger from an overweening attachment to earthly goods; no wise man will boast the multitude of his possessions, when he reflects that if they do not leave him, the time is not far distant when he must leave them; the validity of one's claim to property which comes by inheritance is better founded than any other.

The worldling attaches himself wholly to what he reckons the only solid goods, the possession of riches and influence. BLAIR.

While worldly men enlarge their possessions, and extend their connections, they imagine they are strengthening themselves. BLAIR.

For numerous blessings yearly shower'd,
And property with plenty crown'd,
Accept our pious praise. DRYDEN.

TO GOVERN, RULE, REGULATE.

GOVERN is in French gouverner, Lat. in gubernare, Greek κυβερνᾶν. RULE and REGULATE signify to bring under a rule, or make by rule.

The exercise of authority enters more or less into the signification of these terms; but to govern implies the exercise likewise of judgment and knowledge. To rule implies rather the unqualified exercise of power, the making the will the rule; a king governs his people by means of wise laws and an upright administration: a despot rules over a nation according to his arbitrary decision; if he have no principle, his rule becomes an oppressive tyranny. These terms are applied either to persons or things: persons govern or rule others; or they govern, rule, or regulate things.

In regard to persons, govern is always in a good sense, but rule is sometimes taken in a bad sense; it is frequently associated with an abuse of power: to gov- ern is so perfectly discretionary, that we speak of governing ourselves; but we speak only of ruling others: nothing can be more lamentable than to be ruled by one who does not know how to govern himself: it is the business of a man to rule his house by keeping all its members in due subjection to his authority: it is the duty of a person to rule those who are under him in all matters wherein they are incompetent to govern themselves.

Slaves to our passions we become, and then
It becomes impossible to govern men. WALLER.

Marg'ret shall now be queen, and rule the king,
But I will rule both her, the king, and realm.
SHAKESPEARE.

In application to things, govern and rule admit of a similar distinction: a minister governs the state, and a pilot governs the vessel: the movements of the machine are in both cases directed by the exercise of the judgment; a person rules the times, seasons, fashions, and the like; it is an act of the individual will. Regulate is a species of governing simply by judgment; the word is applicable to things of minor moment, where the force of authority is not so requisite: one governs the affairs of a nation, or a large body where great interests are involved; we regulate the concerns of an individual, or we regulate in cases where good order or convenience only is consulted: so likewise in regard to ourselves, we govern our passions, but we regulate our affections.

Whence can this very motion take its birth?
Not sure from matter, from dull clods of earth?
But from a living spirit lodg'd within,
Which governs all the bodily machine. JENYNS.

When I behold a factious band agree
To call it freedom when themselves are free;
Each wanton judge new penal statutes draw;
Laws grind the poor, and rich men rule the law;
I fly from petty tyrants to the throne. GOLDENITE.

Regulate the patient in his manner of living.
WISMAN.

These terms are all properly used to denote the acts of conscious agents, but by a figure of personification they may be applied to inanimate or moral objects: the price of one market governs the price of another, or governs the seller in his demand; fashion and caprice rule the majority, or particular fashions rule them: the time of one clock regulates that of many others.

The gross of men are governed more by appearances than realities. TATLER.

Distracting thoughts by turns his bosom rul'd,
Now dr'd by wrath, and now by reason cool'd.

Pope.

Though a sense of moral good and evil be deeply impressed on the heart of man, it is not of sufficient power to regulate his life. BLAIR.

GOVERNMENT, ADMINISTRATION.

BOTH these terms may be employed either to designate the act of GOVERNING and ADMINISTERING, or the persons governing and administering. In both cases government has a more extensive meaning than administration: the former includes every exercise of authority; while administration implies only that exercise of authority which consists in putting the laws or will of another in force.

Government is an art above the attainment of an ordinary genius. SOUTH.

In treating of an invisible world, and the administration of government there carried on by the Father of spirits, particulars occur which appear incomprehensible. BLAIR.

When we speak of the government, as it respects the persons, it implies the whole body of constituted authorities; and the administration, only that part which puts in execution the intentions of the whole: the government of a country, therefore, may remain unaltered, while the administration undergoes many changes: it is the business of the government to make treaties of peace and war; and without a government it is impossible for any people to negotiate: it is the business of the administration to administer justice, to regulate the finances, and to direct all the complicated concerns of a nation; without an administration all public business would be at a stand.

What are we to do if the government and the whole community is of the same description? BURKE.

GOVERNMENT, CONSTITUTION.

GOVERNMENT is here, as in the former article (v. Government), the generic term; CONSTITUTION the specific. Government implies generally the act of governing, or exercising authority under any form whatever; constitution implies any constituted or fixed form of government: we may have a government without a constitution; we cannot have a constitution without a government. In the first formation of society, government was placed in the hands of individuals who exercised authority according to discretion rather than any positive rule or law: here then was government without a constitution: as time and experience proved the necessity of some established form, and the wisdom of enlightened men discovered the advantages and disadvantages of different forms, government in every country assumed a more definite shape, and became the constitution of the country; hence then the union of government and constitution. Governments are divided by political writers into three classes, monarchical, aristocratic, and republican; but these three general forms have been adopted with such variations and modifications as to impart to the constitution of every country something peculiar. The term constitution is now particularly applied to any popular form of government, or any government formed at the pleasure of the people, and in a still more restricted sense to the government of England.

Free governments have committed more flagrant acts of tyranny than the most perfect despotic governments which we have ever known. BURKE.

The physician of the state who, not satisfied with the cure of distempers, undertakes to regenerate constitutions, ought to show uncommon powers. BURKE.

GRACE, FAVOR.

GRACE, in French grace, Latin gratia, comes from gratus, kind, because a grace results from pure kindness, independently of the merit of the receiver; but FAVOR is that which is granted voluntarily and without hope of recompense, independently of all obligation.

Grace is never used but in regard to those who have offended and made themselves liable to punishment; favor is employed for actual good. An act of grace, in the spiritual sense, is that merciful influence which God exerts over his most unworthy creatures from the infinite goodness of his Divine nature; it is to his special grace that we attribute every good feeling by which we are prevented from committing sin: the term favor is employed indiscriminately with regard to man or his Maker; those who are in power have the greatest opportunity of conferring favours; but all we receive at the hands of our Maker must be acknowledged as a favor.

But say I could repent and could obtain,
By act of grace, my former state, how soon
Would height recall high thoughts! MILTON.

A bad man is wholly the creature of the world.
He hangs upon its favor. BLAIR.

GRACE, CHARM.

GRACE is altogether corporeal; CHARM is either corporeal or mental: the grace qualifies the action of the body; the charm is an inherent quality in the body itself. A lady moves, dances, and walks with grace; the charms of her person are equal to those of her mind.

Savage's method of life particularly qualified him for conversation, of which he knew how to practise all the graces. JOHNSON.

Music has charms to soothe the savage breast.
CONGREVE.

GRACEFUL, COMELY, ELEGANT.

A GRACEFUL figure is rendered so by the deportment of the body. A COMELY figure has that in itself which pleases the eye. Gracefulness results from nature improved by art; comeliness is mostly the work of nature. It is possible to acquire gracefulness by the aid of the dancing-master, but for a comely form we are indebted to nature aided by circumstances. Grace is a quality pleasing to the eye; but ELEGANCE, from the Latin eligo, electus, select and choice, is a quality of a higher nature, that inspires admiration; elegant is applicable, like graceful, to the motion of the body, or like comely to the person, and is extended in its meaning also to language, and even to dress. A person's step is graceful; his air or his movements are elegant; the grace of an action lies chiefly in its adaptation to the occasion.

The first who approached her was a youth of graceful presence and courtly air, but dressed in a richer habit than had ever been seen in Arcadia. STEELE.

Isidas, the son of Phœbidas, was at this time in the bloom of his youth, and very remarkable for the comeliness of his person. ADDISON.

The natural progress of the works of men is from rudeness to convenience, from convenience to elegance, and from elegance to nicety.

JOHNSON.

GRACIOUS, MERCIFUL, KIND.

GRACIOUS, when compared with MERCIFUL, is used only in the spiritual sense; the latter is applicable to the conduct of man as well as of the Deity. Grace is exerted in doing good to an object that has merited the contrary; mercy is exerted in withholding the evil which has been merited. God is gracious to his creatures in affording them not only an opportunity to address him, but every encouragement to lay open their wants to him; their unworthiness and sinfulness are not made impediments of access to him. God is merciful to the vilest of sinners, and lends an ear to the smallest breath of repentance; in the moment of executing vengeance, he stops his arm at the voice of supplication: he expects the same mercy to be extended by man toward his offending brother. An act of grace in the largest sense, as not only independent of, but opposite to, the merits of the person, is properly ascribable to God alone, but by analogy it has also been considered as the prerogative of earthly princes: thus we speak of acts of grace, by which insolvent debtors are released: in like manner, the grace of the sovereign may be exerted in various ways.

So gracious hath God been to us, that he hath made those things to be our duty which naturally tend to our felicity. TELLSTON.

He that's merciful

Unto the bad is cruel to the good. RANDOLPH.

Gracious, when compared with KIND, differs principally as to the station of the persons to whom it is applied. Gracious is altogether confined to superiors; kind is indiscriminately employed for superiors and equals: a king gives a gracious reception to the nobles who are presented to him; one friend gives a kind reception to another by whom he is visited. Gracious is a term in peculiar use at court, and among princes. Kindness is a domestic virtue; it is found mostly among those who have not so much ceremonial to dispense with.

He heard my vows, and graciously decreed
My grounds to be restor'd, my former flocks to feed. DRYDEN.

Love that would all men just and temperate make,
Kind to themselves and others for his sake.

WALLER.

GRANDEUR, MAGNIFICENCE.

GRANDEUR, from grand, in French grand, great, Latin grandis, low German grand, grand, which is the same as groot, great. MAGNIFICENCE, in Latin magnificentia, from magnus and facto, signifies making or acting on a large scale.

An extensive assemblage of striking qualities in the exterior constitutes the common signification of these terms, of which grandeur is the genus, and magnificence the species. Magnificence cannot exist without grandeur, but grandeur exists without magnificence: the former is distinguished from the latter both in degree and in application. When applied to the same objects, they differ in degree; magnificence being the highest degree of grandeur. As it respects the style of living, grandeur is within the reach of subjects; magnificence is mostly confined to princes.

There is a kind of grandeur and respect, which the meanest and most insignificant part of mankind endeavor to procure in the little circle of their friends and acquaintance. ADDISON.

The wall of China is one of those Eastern pieces of magnificence which makes a figure even in the map of the world, although an account of it would have been thought fabulous, were not the wall itself extant. ADDISON.

TO GRATIFY, INDULGE, HUMOR.

To GRATIFY, make grateful or pleasant (v. Acceptable), is a positive act of the choice. To INDULGE, from the Latin indulgeo and dulcis, to sweeten or make palatable, is a negative act of the will, a yielding of the mind to circumstances. One gratifies his desires or appetites; and indulges his humors, or indulges in pleasures: by the former, one seeks to get the pleasure which the desire promises; by the latter, one yields to the influence which the humor or passion exercises. Gratifying as a habit becomes a vice, and indulging as a habit is a weakness. In this sense of the words, gratification is mostly applied to mental objects, as to gratify one's curiosity; indulgence to matters of sense or partial feeling, as to indulge one's palate. A person who is in search of pleasure gratifies his desires as they rise; he lives for the gratification, and depends upon it for his happiness. He who has higher objects in view than the momentary gratification, will be careful not to indulge himself too much in such things as will wean him from his purpose.

It is certainly a very important lesson to learn how to enjoy ordinary things, and to be able to relish your being, without the transport of some passion, or gratification of some appetite.

STEELE.

No man could have fewer avocations, whether natural or artificial, for he was slave to no passion or excess, and indulged no humor.

CUMBERLAND.

As occasional acts, gratify and indulge may be both innocent.

Titles, estates, and fantastical pleasures are more ardently sought after by most men than the natural gratifications of a reasonable mind.

ADDISON.

Still in short intervals of pleasing woe,

Regardful of the friendly dues I owe;

I to the glorious dead forever dear,

Indulge the tribute of a grateful tear. POPE.

We gratify and indulge others as well as ourselves, and mostly in the good sense: to gratify is for the most part in return for services; it is an act of generosity: to indulge is to yield to the wishes or be lenient to the infirmities of others; it is an act of kindness or good-nature.

Good-humor is a state between gayety and unconcern; the act or emanation of a mind at leisure to regard the gratification of another.

JOHNSON.

A little more indulgence for common understandings, and somewhat less of austerity of temper, might have preserved this illustrious man to the councils of his country. BARNETT.

To HUMOR is mostly taken in a bad sense.

A skilful manager of the rabble, with two or three popular empty words, such as "right of the subject and liberty of conscience," well tuned and humored, may whistle them backward and forward till he is weary. SOUTH.

GRATUITOUS, VOLUNTARY.

GRATUITOUS is opposed to that which is obligatory. VOLUNTARY is opposed to that which is compulsory, or involuntary. A gift is gratuitous when it flows entirely from the free will of the giver, independently of right: an offer is voluntary which flows from the free will, independently of all external constraint. Gratuitous is therefore to voluntary as a species to the genus. What is gratuitous is voluntary, although what is voluntary is not always gratuitous. The gratuitous is properly the voluntary in regard to the disposal of one's property; and the voluntary is applicable to all other actions.

The heroic band of cashiers of monarchs were in haste to make a generous diffusion of the knowledge which they had thus gratuitously received.

BURKE.

Their privileges relative to contribution were voluntarily surrendered.

BURKE.

GRATUITY, RECOMPENSE.

THE distinction between these terms is very similar to the above (v. Gratuitous). They both imply a gift, and a gift by way of return for some supposed service; but the gratuity is independent of all expectation as well as right: the recompense is founded upon some admissible claim. Those who wish to confer a favor in a delicate manner, will sometimes do it under the shape of a gratuity: those who overrate their services, will in all probability be disappointed in the recompense they receive.

If there be one or two scholars more, that will be no great addition to his trouble, considering that, perhaps, their parents may recompense him by their gratuities.

MOLYNEUX.

What could be less than to afford him praise, The easiest recompense.

MILTON.

GRAVE, SERIOUS, SOLEMN.

GRAVE, in Latin gravis, heavy, denotes the weight which keeps the mind or person down, and prevents buoyancy; it is opposed to the light. SERIOUS, in Latin serius, late or slow, marks the quality of slowness or considerateness, either in the mind or that which occupies the mind: it is opposed to the jocose.

Grave expresses more than serious; it does not merely bespeak the absence of mirth, but that heaviness of mind which is displayed in all the movements of the body; seriousness, on the other hand, bespeaks no depression, but simply steadiness of action, and a restraint from all that is jocular. A man may be grave in his walk, in his tone, in his gesture, in his looks, and all his exterior; he is se- rious only in his general air, his countenance, and demeanor. Gravity is produced by some external circumstance; seriousness springs from the operation of the mind itself, or from circumstances. Misfortunes or age will produce gravity: seriousness is the fruit of reflection. Gravity is, in the proper sense, confined to the person, as a characteristic of his temper; serious, on the other hand, is a characteristic either of persons or things: hence we should speak of a grave assembly, not a serious assembly, of old men; grave senators, not serious senators; of a grave speaker, not a serious speaker: but a serious, not a grave sermon; a serious, not a grave writer; but grave is sometimes extended to things in the sense of weighty, as when we speak of grave matters of deliberation, a grave objection, sentiment. Gravity is peculiarly ascribed to a judge, from the double cause that much depends upon his deportment, in which there ought to be gravity, and that the weighty concerns which press on his mind are most apt to produce gravity: on the other hand, both gravity and seriousness may be applied to the preacher; the former only as it respects the manner of delivery; the latter as it respects especially the matter of his discourse: the person may be grave or serious; the discourse only is serious.

If then some grave and pious man appear, They hush their noise, and lend a listening ear.

DRYDEN.

In our retirements everything disposes us to be serious.

ADDISON.

SOLEMN expresses more than either grave or serious, from the Latin solemnis, yearly; as applied to the stated religious festivals of the Romans, it has acquired the collateral meaning of religious gravity: like serious, it is employed not so much to characterize either the person or the thing: a judge pronounces the solemn sentence of condemnation in a solemn manner; a preacher delivers many solemn warnings to his hearers. Gravity may be the effect of corporeal habit, and seriousness of mental habit; but solemnity is something occasional and extraordinary. Some children discover a remarkable gravity as soon as they begin to observe; a regular attention to religious worship will induce a habit of se- riousness; the admonitions of a parent on his death-bed will have peculiar solemnity.

In most of our long words which are derived from the Latin we contract the length of the syllables, that gives them a grave and solemn air in their own language. ADDISON.

GRAVE, TOMB, SEPULCHRE.

ALL these terms denote the place where bodies are deposited. GRAVE, from the German graben, etc., has a reference to the hollow made in the earth. TOMB, from tumulus and tumeo, to swell, has a reference to the rising that is made above it. SEPULCHRE, from sepelio, to bury, has a reference to the use for which it is employed. From this explanation it is evident that these terms have a certain propriety of application: "to sink into the grave," is an expression that carries the thoughts where the body must rest in death, consequently to death itself: "to inscribe on the tomb, or to encircle the tomb with flowers," carries our thoughts to the external of that place in which the body is interred. To inter in a sepulchre, or to visit or enter a sepulchre, reminds us of a place in which bodies are deposited, or, by a figure, where anything may be buried.

The path of glory leads but to the grave. GRAY.
Nor you, ye proud, impute to these the fault,
If mem'ry o'er their tombs no trophies raise. GRAY.

The Lay itself is either lost or buried, perhaps forever, in one of those sepulchres of MSS. which by courtesy are called libraries. TRENCH.

GREAT, LARGE, BIG.

GREAT, in Saxon great, Dutch and low German groot, comes from grow, as the Latin crassus, thick, from creasco, to grow, is applied to all kinds of dimensions in which things can grow or increase. LARGE, in Latin largus, wide, is probably derived from the Greek λα and πειν, to flow plentifully; for largior signifies to give freely, and large has in English a similar sense: it is properly applied to space, extent, and quantity. BIG, from the German bauch, belly, and the English bulk, denotes great as to expansion or capacity. A house, a room, a heap, a pile, an army, etc., is great or large; an animal or a mountain is great or big: a road, a city, a street, and the like, is termed rather great than large.

At one's first entrance into the Pantheon at Rome, how the imagination is filled with something great and amazing! and at the same time how little in proportion one is affected with the inside of a Gothic cathedral, although it be five times larger than the other! ADDISON.

We are not a little pleased to find every green leaf swarm with millions of animals, that at their largest growth are not visible to the naked eye. ADDISON.

An animal no bigger than a mite cannot appear perfect to the eye, because the sight takes it in at once. ADDISON.

Great is used generally in the improper sense; large and big are used only occasionally: a noise, a distance, a multitude, a number, a power, and the like, is termed great, but not large; we may, however, speak of a large portion, a large share, a large quantity; or of a mind big with conception, or of an event big with the fate of nations.

Among all the figures of architecture, there are none that have a greater air than the concave and the convex. ADDISON.

Sure he that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not
That capability and godlike reason
To rust in us unus'd. SHAKESPEARE.

Amazing clouds on clouds continual heap'd,
Or whirl'd tempestuous by the gusty wind,
Or silent borne along heavy and slow,
With the big stores of streaming oceans charg'd. THOMSON.

GREAT, GRAND, SUBLIME.

THESE terms are synonymous only in their moral application. GREAT simply designates extent; GRAND includes likewise the idea of excellence and superiority. A great undertaking characterizes only the extent of the undertaking; a grand undertaking bespeaks its superior excellence: great objects are seen with facility; grand objects are viewed with admiration. It is a great point to make a person sensible of his faults; it should be the grand aim of all to aspire after moral and religious improvement.

Grand and SUBLIME are both superior to great; but the former marks the dimension of greatness; the latter, from the Latin sublimis, designates that of height. A scene may be either grand or sublime: it is grand as it fills the imagination with its immensity; it is sublime as it elevates the imagination beyond the surrounding and less important objects. There is something grand in the sight of a vast army moving forward, as it were, by one impulse; there is something peculiarly sublime in the sight of huge mountains and craggy cliffs of ice, shaped into various fantastic forms. Grand may be said either of the works of art or nature; sublime is peculiarly applicable to the works of nature. The Egyptian pyramids and the ocean are both grand objects; a tempestuous ocean is a sublime object. Grand is sometimes applied to the mind; sublime is applied both to the thoughts and the expressions.

There is nothing in this whole art of architecture which pleases the imagination, but as it is great, uncommon, or beautiful. ADDISON.

There is generally in nature something more grand and angust than what we meet with in the curiosities of art. ADDISON.

Homer fills his readers with sublime ideas. ADDISON.

GRIEVANCE, HARSHIP.

GRIEVANCE, from the Latin gravis, heavy or burdensome, implies that which lies heavy at heart. HARSHIP, from the adjective hard, denotes that which presses or bears violently on the person.

Grievance is in general taken for that which is done by another to grieve or distress: hardship is a particular kind of grievance that presses upon individuals. There are national grievances, though not national hardships. An infraction of one's rights, an act of violence or oppression, are grievances to those who are exposed to them, whether as individuals or bodies of men: an unequal distribution of labor, a partial indulgence of one to the detriment of another, constitute the hardship. A weight of taxes, levied in order to support an unjust war, will be esteemed a grievance: the partiality and caprice of the collector in making it fall with unequal weight upon particular persons will be regarded as a peculiar hardship. Men seek a redress of their grievances from some higher power than that by which they are inflicted: they endure their hardships until an opportunity offers of getting them removed.

It is better private men should have some injustice done them, than a public grievance should not be redressed. This is usually pleaded in defence of all those hardships which fall on particular persons, in particular occasions which could not be foreseen when the law was made. SPECTATOR.

TO GRIEVE, MOURN, LAMENT.

To GRIEVE (v. Affliction) is the general term; MOURN, like moan and murmur, being an imitation of the sound produced by pain, is a particular term. To grieve, in its limited sense, is an inward act; to mourn is an outward act: the grief lies altogether in the mind; the mourning displays itself by some outward mark. A man grieves for his sins; he mourns for the loss of his friends. One grieves for that which immediately concerns one's self, or that which concerns others; one mourns for that which concerns others; one grieves over the loss of property; one mourns the fate of a deceased relative.

Achates, the companion of his breast,
Goes grieving by his side, with equal cares oppress'd. DAYDEN.

My brother's friends and daughter left behind,
False to them all, to Paris only kind;
For this I mourn, till grief or dire disease
Shall waste the form, whose crime it was to please. POPE.

Grieve is the act of an individual; mourn may be the common act of many: a nation mourns, though it does not grieve, for a public calamity. To grieve is applicable to domestic troubles; mourn may refer to public or private ills. The distractions of a state will cause many to grieve for their own losses, and mourn the misfortunes of their country.

Who fails to grieve when just occasion calls,
Or grieves too much, deserves not to be blessed. YOUNG.

Ye banks that oft my weary limbs have borne,
Ye murmuring brooks that learn'd of me to mourn,
Ye birds that tune me with your plaintive lay,
Ye groves, where love once taught my steps to stray,
You, ever sweet, and ever fair, renew
Your strains melodious. STR W. JONES.

Grieve and mourn are permanent sentiments; LAMENT (v. To bewail) is a transitory feeling: the former are produced by substantial causes, which come home to the feelings; the latter respects things of a more partial, oftentimes of a more remote and indifferent, nature. A real widow mourns all the remainder of her days for the loss of her husband; we lament a thing to-day which we may forget to-morrow. Mourn and lament are both expressed by some outward sign; but the former is composed and free from all noise; the latter displays itself either in cries or simple words. In the moment of trouble, when the distress of the mind is at its height, it may break out into loud lamentation, but commonly grieving and mourning commence when lamentation ceases.

So close in poplar shades, her children gone,
The mother nightingale laments alone.

DRYDEN.

As epithets, grievous, mournful, and lamentable have a similar distinction. What presses hard or unjustly on persons, their property, connections, and circumstances, is grievous; what touches the tender feelings, and tears asunder the ties of kindred and friendship, is mournful; whatever excites a painful sensation in our mind is lamentable. Famine is a grievous calamity for a nation; the violent separation of friends by death is a mournful event at all times, but particularly so for those who are in the prime of life and the fulness of expectation; the ignorance which some persons discover even in the present cultivated state of society is truly lamentable.

To a mother grievous, this Grievous to high-born Laius, this disgrace
To be allied to strangers.

POTTER.

Ye friendless orphans, and ye dowerless maids,
With eager haste your mournful mansions leave.

SIR W. JONES.

What dost thou mean by shaking of thy head?
Why dost thou look so sadly on my son?
What means that head upon that breast of thine?
Why holds thine eye that lamentable rheum,
Like a proud river peering o'er his bounds?

SHAKESPEARE.

TO GROAN, MOAN.

GROAN and MOAN are both onomatopœias, from the sounds which they express. Groan is a deep sound produced by hard breathing: moan is a plaintive, long-drawn sound produced by the organs of utterance. The groan proceeds involuntarily as an expression of severe pain, either of body or mind: the moan proceeds often from the desire of awakening attention or exciting compassion. Dying groans are uttered in the agonies of death: the moans of a wounded sufferer are sometimes the only resource he has left to make his destitute case known.

The plain ox, whose toll,
Patient and ever ready, clothes the land
With all the pomp of harvest, shall he bleed,
And struggling groan beneath the cruel hands
E'en of the clown he feeds? THOMSON.

The fair Alexis lov'd, but lov'd in vain,
And underneath the beechen shade, alone,
Thus to the woods and mountains made his moan. DRYDEN.

GROSS, COARSE.

GROSS derives its meaning in this application from the Latin crassus, thick from fat, or that which is of common materials. COARSE, v. COARSE.

These terms are synonymous in the moral application. Grossness of habit is opposed to delicacy; coarseness to softness and refinement. A person becomes gross by an unrestrained indulgence of his sensual appetites, particularly in eating and drinking; he is coarse from the want of polish either as to his mind or manners. A gross sensualist approximates very nearly to the brute; he sets aside all moral considerations; he indulges himself in the open face of day in defiance of all decency: a coarse person approaches nearest to the savage, whose roughness of humor and inclination have not been refined down by habits of restraining his own will, and complying with the will of another. A gross expression conveys the idea of that which should be kept from the view of the mind, which shocks the moral feeling; a coarse expression conveys the idea of an unseemly sentiment in the mind of the speaker. The representations of the Deity by any sensible image is gross, because it gives us a low and grovelling idea of a superior being; the doing a kindness, and making the receiver at the same time sensible of your superiority and his dependence, indicates great coarseness in the character of the favorer.

A certain preparation is requisite for the enjoyment of devotion in its whole extent: not only must the life be reformed from gross enormities, but the heart must have undergone that change which the Gospel demands.

BLAIR.

The refined pleasures of a pious mind are, in many respects, superior to the coarse gratifications of sense.

BLAIR.

GROSS, TOTAL.

GROSS is connected with the word great: from the idea of size which enters into the original meaning of this term is derived that of quantity: TOTAL, from the Latin totus, signifies literally the whole: the gross implies that from which nothing has been taken: the total signifies that to which nothing need be added: the gross sum includes everything without regard to what it may be; the total includes everything which one wishes to include; we may, therefore, deduct from the gross that which does not immediately belong to it; but the total is that which admits of no deduction. The gross weight in trade is applicable to any article, the whole of which, good or bad, pure or dross, is included in opposition to the neat weight; the total amount supposes all to be included which ought to form a part, in opposition to any smaller amount or subdivisions; when employed in the improper sense, they preserve the same distinction: things are said to be taken or considered in the gross, that is, in the large and comprehensive way, one with another; things are said to undergo a total change.

I have more than once found fault with those general reflections which strike at kingdoms or commonwealths in the gross. ADDISON.

Nature is either collected into one total, or diffused and distributed. BACON.

TO GUARANTEE, BE SECURITY, BE RESPONSIBLE, WARRANT.

GUARANTEE and WARRANT are both derived from the Teutonic währen, to defend or make safe and binding; SECURITY, from secure (v. Certain), has the same original meaning; RESPONSIBLE, v. Amenable.

To guarantee and be security have respect to what is done for others; to be responsible respects what is done by one's self or others; to warrant, what is done by one's self only. To guarantee is applied to matters of public or private interest; to be security, to private matters only. The larger governments frequently guarantee for the performance of stipulations entered into by minor powers; one man becomes security to another for the payment of a sum of money by a third person. Guarantee may be taken for the person or thing that guarantees.

The people of England, then, are willing to trust to the sympathy of regicides the guarantee of the British monarchy. BURKE.

One is security for another in pecuniary concerns, but he is responsible for his own conduct or that of others; he becomes a security by virtue of his contract, as one tradesman becomes security for another, he is responsible by virtue of his relative office or situation; masters are responsible for the conduct of their servants; a jailer is responsible for the safe custody of the prisoner; every man is responsible for that which is placed under his charge. To warrant is applied to commercial transactions: one warrants the goodness of any commodity that is sold.

What a dreadful thing is a standing army, for the conduct of the whole, or any part of which, no one is responsible. BURKE.

Richard Cromwell desired only security for the debts he had contracted. BURKE.

The warrant serves to indemnify against loss, or, in a moral sense, to protect against censure, to give a sanction to.

No man's mistake will be able to warrant an unjust surmise, much less justify a false censure. SOUTH.

TO GUARD, DEFEND, WATCH.

GUARD is but a variation of ward, which is connected with the German währen, to look to. DEFEND, v. Apology, and to defend. WATCH and WAKE are in the German, etc., wachen, to watch, Latin vigil, watchful, vigore, to flourish, and Greek αγαλλω, to exult or be in spirits.

To guard, in its largest sense, comprehends both watching and defending, that is, both the preventing the attack and the resisting it when it is made. In the restricted sense, to guard is properly to keep off an enemy; to defend is to drive him away when he makes the attack. The soldier guards the palace of the king in time of peace, and defends his country in time of war.

Fixed on defence, the Trojans are not slow To guard their shore from an expected foe. DRYDEN.

Forthwith on all sides to his aid was run, By angels many and strong, who interpos'd Defence. MILTON.

Watch, like guard, consists in looking to the danger, but it does not necessarily imply the use of any means to prevent the danger: he who watches may only give an alarm.

But in his duty prompt at every call
He watch'd and wept, he pray'd, and felt for all.
GOLDSMITH.

In the improper application they have a similar sense: modesty guards female honor; clothing defends against the inclemency of the weather: a person who wants to escape watches his opportunity to slip out unobserved.

One of the principal charges which Stanhope had received from his friends in England, was to be on his guard against the intrigues of Sanderland.
COXE.

And here th' access a gloomy grove defends,
And here th' unnavigable lake extends.
DRYDEN.

But see the well-plum'd hearse comes nodding on,
Stately and slow, and properly attended
By the whole sable tribe, that painful watch
The sick man's door, and live upon the dead.
BLAIR.

GUARD, SENTINEL.

THESE terms are employed to designate those who are employed for the protection of either persons or things. GUARD has been explained above (v. To guard); SENTINEL, in French sentinelle, is properly a species of guard, namely, a military guard in the time of a campaign; any one may be set as guard over property, who is empowered to keep off every intruder by force; but the sentinel acts in the army as the watch (v. To guard) in the police, rather to observe the motions of the enemy than to repel any force.

Fast as he could, he sighing quits the walls,
And thus descending, on the guards he calls.
POPE.

One of the sentinels who stood on the stage to prevent disorder burst into tears.
STEELE.

They are figuratively applied to other objects; the guard in this case acts on ordinary occasions, the sentinel in the moments of danger.

Modesty is not only an ornament but a guard to virtue.
ADDISON.

Conscience is the sentinel of virtue. JOHNSON.

GUARD, GUARDIAN.

THESE words are derived from the verb guard (v. To guard); but they have acquired a distinct office. GUARD is used either in the literal or figurative sense; GUARDIAN only in the improper sense. Guard is applied either to persons or things; guardian only to persons. In application to persons, the guard is temporary; the guardian is fixed and permanent: the guard only guards against external evils; the guardian takes upon him the office of parent, counsellor, and director: when a house is in danger of being attacked, a person may sit up as a guard; when a parent is dead, a guardian supplies his place: we expect from a guard nothing but human assistance; but from our guardian angel we may expect supernatural assistance.

Him Hermes to Achilles shall convey,
Guard of his life, and partner of his way. POPE.
Ye guides and guardians of our Argive race!
Come all! let gen'rous rage your arms employ,
And save Patroclus from the dogs of Troy. POPE.

TO GUARD AGAINST, TAKE HEED.

BOTH these terms imply express care on the part of the agent; but the former is used with regard to external or internal evils, the latter only with regard to internal or mental evils: in an enemy's country it is essential to be particularly on one's guard, for fear of a surprise; in difficult matters, where we are liable to err, it is of importance to TAKE HEED lest we run from one extreme to another: young men, on their entrance into life, cannot be too much on their GUARD AGAINST associating with those who would lead them into expensive pleasures; in slippery paths, whether physically or morally understood, it is necessary to take heed how we go.

One would take more than ordinary care to guard one's self against this particular imperfection (changeableness), because it is that which our nature very strongly inclines us to.
ADDISON.

Take heed of that dreadful tribunal where it will not be enough to say that I thought this or I heard that.
SOUTH.

TO GUESS, CONJECTURE, DIVINE.

GUESS, in Saxon and low German gissen, is connected with the word ghost, and the German geist, etc., spirit, signifying the action of a spirit. CONJECTURE, v. Conjecture. DIVINE, from the Latin divinus and deus, a god, signifies to think and know as a god.

We guess that a thing actually is; we conjecture that which may be: we guess that it is a certain hour; we conjecture as to the meaning of a person's actions. Guessing is opposed to the certain knowledge of a thing; conjecturing is opposed to the full conviction of a thing: a child guesses at that portion of his lesson which he has not properly learned; a fanciful person employs conjecture where he cannot draw any positive conclusion.

And these discoveries make us all confess
That sublimary science is but guess. DENHAM.
Now hear the Grecian fraud, and from this one Conjecture all the rest. DENHAM.

To guess and to conjecture are natural acts of the mind: to divine, in its proper sense, is a supernatural act; in this sense the heathens affected to divine that which was known only to an Omniscient Being; and impostors in our time presume to divine in matters that are set above the reach of human comprehension. The term is, however, employed to denote a species of guessing in different matters, as to divine the meaning of a mystery.

Walking they talk'd, and fruitlessly divin'd
What friend the priestess by those words design'd. DRYDEN.

GUEST, VISITOR, OR VISITANT.

GUEST, from the Northern languages, signifies one who is entertained; VISITOR or VISITANT is the one who pays the visit. The guest is to the visitor as the species to the genus: every guest is a visitor, but every visitor is not a guest; the visitor simply comes to see the person, and enjoy social intercourse; but the guest also partakes of hospitality: we are visitors at the tea-table, at the card-table, and round the fire; we are guests at the festive board.

Some great behest from heav'n
To us perhaps he brings, and will vouchsafe
This day to be our guest. MILTON.
No palace with a lofty gate he wants,
T' admit the tides of early visitants. DRYDEN.

GUIDE, RULE.

GUIDE is to RULE as the genus to the species: every rule is a guide to a certain extent; but the guide is often that which exceeds the rule. The guide, in the moral sense, as in the proper sense, goes with us, and points out the exact path; it does not permit us to err either to the right or left: the rule marks out a line, beyond which we may not go; but it leaves us to trace the line, and consequently to fail either on the one side or other. The Bible is our best guide for moral practice; its doctrines, as interpreted in the articles of the Christian Church, are the best rule of faith.

You must first apply to religion as the guide of life, before you can have recourse to it as the refuge of sorrow. BLAIR.

There is something so wild, and yet so solemn, in Shakspeare's speeches of his ghosts and fairies, and the like imaginary persons, that we cannot forbear thinking them natural, though we have no rule by which to judge them. ADDISON.

GUILTLESS, INNOCENT, HARMLESS.

GUILTLESS, without guilt, is more than INNOCENT: innocence, from nocere, to hurt, extends no farther than the quality of not hurting by any direct act; guiltless comprehends the quality of not intending to hurt: it is possible, therefore, to be innocent without being guiltless, though not vice versa; he who wishes for the death of another is not guiltless, though he may be innocent of the crime of murder. Guiltless seems to regard a man's general condition; innocent his particular condition: no man is guiltless in the sight of God, for no man is exempt from the guilt of sin; but he may be innocent in the sight of men, or innocent of all such intentional offences as render him obnoxious to his fellow-creatures. Guiltlessness was that happy state of perfection which men lost at the fall; innocence is that relative or comparative state of perfection which is attainable here on earth: the highest state of innocence is an ignorance of evil.

Ah! why should all mankind
For one man's fault thus guiltless be condemn'd,
If guiltless? But from me what can proceed
But all corrupt? MILTON.

When Adam sees the several changes of nature about him, he appears in a disorder of mind suitable to one who had forfeited both his innocence and his happiness. ADDISON.

Guiltless is in the proper sense applicable only to the condition of man; and, when applied to things, it still has a reference to the person: innocent is equally applicable to persons or things; a person is innocent who has not committed any injury, or has not any direct purpose to commit any injury; or a conversation is innocent which is free from what is hurtful. Innocent and HARMLESS both recommend themselves as qualities negatively good; they designate a freedom either in the person or thing from injuring, and differ only in regard to the nature of the injury: innocence respects moral injury, and harmless physical injury: a person is innocent who is free from moral impurity and wicked purposes; he is harmless if he have not the power or disposition to commit any violence; a diversion is innocent which has nothing in it likely to corrupt the morals; a game is harmless which is not likely to inflict any wound, or endanger the health.

But from the mountain's grassy side
A guiltless feast I bring;
A scrip with fruits and herbs supplied,
And water from the spring. GOLDSMITH.

A man should endeavor to make the sphere of his innocent pleasures as wide as possible, that he may retire into them with safety. ADDISON.

Full on his breast the Trojan arrow fell,
But harmless bounded from the plated steel. ADDISON.

GUISE, HABIT.

GUISE and wise are both derived from the Northern languages, and denote the manner; but the former is employed for a particular or distinguished manner of dress. HABIT, from the Latin habitus, a habit, fashion, or form, is taken for a settled or permanent mode of dress.

The guise is that which is unusual, and often only occasional; the habit is that which is usual among particular classes: a person sometimes assumes the guise of a peasant, in order the better to conceal himself; he who devotes himself to the clerical profession puts on the habit of a clergyman.

Anubis, Sphinx,
Idols of antique guise, and horned Pan,
Terrific monstrous shapes! DYER.

For 'tis the mind that makes the body rich,
And as the sun breaks through the darkest cloud
So honor appears in the meanest habit. SHAKESPEARE.

GULF, ABYSS.

GULF, in Greek κολπος, from κοιλος, hollow, is applied literally in the sense of a deep concave receptacle for water, as the gulf of Venice. ABYSS, in Greek αβυσσος, compounded of a, privative, and βυσσος, a bottom, signifies literally a bottomless pit.

One is overwhelmed in a gulf; it carries with it the idea of liquidity and profundity, into which one inevitably sinks never to rise: one is lost in an abyss; it carries with it the idea of immense profundity, into which he who is cast never reaches a bottom, nor is able to return to the top; an insatiable voracity is the characteristic idea in the signification of this term.

A gulf is a capacious bosom, which holds within itself and buries all objects that suffer themselves to sink into it, without allowing them the possibility of escape; hell is represented as a fiery gulf, into which evil spirits are plunged, and remain perpetually overwhelmed: a guilty mind may be said, figuratively, to be plunged into a gulf of woe or despair when filled with the horrid sense of its enormities. An abyss presents nothing but an interminable space which has neither beginning nor end; he does wisely who does not venture in, or who retreats before he has plunged too deep to retrace his footsteps; as the ocean, in the natural sense, is a great abyss; so are metaphysics an immense abyss, into which the human mind precipitates itself only to be bewildered.

Sin and death remain
Following his track, such was the will of heav'n,
Pav'd after him a broad and beaten way
Over the dark abyss, whose boiling gulf
Tameless endur'd a bridge of wond'rous length,
From hell continu'd. MILTON.

His broad-wing'd vessel drinks the whelming tide,
Hid in the bosom of the black abyss. THOMSON.

H.

TO HAPPEN, CHANCE.

To HAPPEN, that is, to fall out by a hap, is to CHANCE (v. Chance, fortune) as the genus to the species; whatever chances happens, but not vice versa. Happen respects all events, without including any collateral idea; chance comprehends likewise the idea of the cause and order of events: whatever comes to pass happens, whether regularly in the course of things, or particularly in the course of order; whatever chances happens, altogether without concert, intention, and often without relation to any other thing. Accidents happen daily which no human foresight could prevent; the newspapers contain an account of all that happens in the course of the day or week: listeners and busybodies are ready to catch every word that chances to fall in their hearing.

With equal mind what happens let us bear,
Nor joy, nor grieve too much for things beyond our care. DRYDEN.

An idiot, chancing to live within the sound of a clock, always amused himself with counting the hour of the day whenever the clock struck: but the clock being spoiled by accident, the idiot continued to count the hour without the help of it. ADDISON.

HAPPINESS, FELICITY, BLISS, BLESS- EDNESS, BEATITUDE.

HAPPINESS signifies the state of being happy. FELICITY, in Latin felicitas, from felix, happy, most probably comes from the Greek ἡλιξ, youthful, youth being the age of purest enjoyment. BLISS, BLESS-EDNESS, signify the state or property of being blessed. BEATITUDE, from the Latin beatus, signifies the property of being happy in a superior degree.

Happiness comprehends that aggregate of pleasurable sensations which we derive from external objects. It is the ordinary term which is employed alike in the colloquial or the philosophical style: felicity is a higher expression, comprehending inward enjoyment, or an aggregate of inward pleasure, without regard to the source whence they are derived: bliss is a still higher term, expressing more than either happiness or felicity, both as to the degree and nature of the enjoyment. Happiness is the thing adapted to our present condition, and to the nature of our being, as a compound of body and soul; it is impure in its nature, and variable in degree; it is sought for by various means and with great eagerness; but it often lies much more within our reach than we are apt to imagine: it is not to be found in the possession of great wealth, of great power, of great dominions, of great splendor, or the unbounded indulgence of any one appetite or desire; but in moderate possessions, with a heart tempered by religion and virtue for the enjoyment of that which God has bestowed upon us: it is, therefore, not so unequally distributed as some have been led to conclude.

Ah! whither now are fled
Those dreams of greatness? those unsolid hopes
Of happiness? THOMSON.

No greater felicity can genius attain than that of having purified intellectual pleasure, separated mirth from indecency, and wit from licentious-ness. JOHNSON.

The fond soul,
Wrapt in gay visions of unreal bliss,
Still paints th' illusive form. THOMSON.

Happiness admits of degrees, since every individual is placed in different circumstances, either of body or mind, which fit him to be more or less happy. Felicity is not regarded in the same light; it is that which is positive and independent of all circumstances: domestic felicity and conjugal felicity are regarded as moral enjoyments, abstracted from everything which can serve as an alloy. Bliss is that which is purely spiritual; it has its source in the imagination, and rises above the ordinary level of human enjoyments: of earthly bliss little is known but in poetry; of heavenly bliss we form but an imperfect conception from the utmost stretch of our powers. Blessedness is a term of spiritual import, which refers to the happy condition of those who enjoy the Divine favor, and are permitted to have a foretaste of heavenly bliss by the exaltation of their minds above earthly happiness. Beatitude denotes the quality of happiness only which is most exalted; namely, heavenly happiness.

In the description of heaven and hell we are surely interested, as we are all to reside hereafter either in the regions of horror or of bliss.
JOHNSON.

So solid a comfort to men, under all the troubles and afflictions of this world, is that firm assurance which the Christian religion gives us of a future happiness, as to bring even the greatest miseries which in this life we are liable to, in some sense, under the notion of blessedness. TILLOTSON.

As in the next world, so in this, the only solid blessings are owing to the goodness of the mind, not the extent of the capacity; friendship here is an emanation from the same source as beatitude there. POPE.

HAPPY, FORTUNATE.

HAPPY and FORTUNATE are both applied to the external circumstances of a man; but the former conveys the idea of that which is abstractedly good, the latter implies rather what is agreeable to one's wishes. A man is happy in his marriage, in his children, in his connections, and the like: he is fortunate in his trading concerns. Happy excludes the idea of chance; fortunate excludes the idea of personal effort: a man is happy in the possession of what he gets; he is fortunate in getting it.

O happy, if he knew his happy state,
The swain, who, free from business and debate,
Receives his easy food from nature's hand,
And just returns of cultivated land. DRYDEN.

Visit the gayest and most fortunate on earth only with sleepless nights, disorder any single organ of the senses, and you shall (will) presently see his gayety vanish. BLAIR.

In the improper sense, they bear a similar analogy. A happy thought, a happy expression, a happy turn, a happy event, and the like, denote a degree of positive excellence; a fortunate idea, a fortunate circumstance, a fortunate event, are all relatively considered, with regard to the wishes and views of the individual.

'Tis manifest that some particular ages have been more happy than others in the production of great men. DRYDEN.

Homer is less fortunate in his subject than Virgil. BLAIR.

HARBOR, HAVEN, PORT.

THE idea of a resting-place for vessels is common to these terms, of which HARBOR is general, and the two others specific in their signification. Harbor, from the Teutonic herbergen, to shelter, carries with it little more than the common idea of affording a resting or anchoring place. HAVEN, from the Teutonic haben, to have or hold, conveys the idea of security. PORT, from the Latin portus and porta, a gate, conveys the idea of an enclosure. A haven is a natural harbor; a port is an artificial harbor. We characterize a harbor as commodious; a haven as snug and secure; a port as safe and easy of access. A commercial country profits by the excellence and number of its harbors; it values itself on the security of its havens, and increases the number of its ports accordingly. A vessel goes into a harbor only for a season; it remains in a haven for a permanency; it seeks a port as the destination of its voyage. Merchantmen are perpetually going in and out of a harbor; a distressed vessel, at a distance from home, seeks some haven in which it may winter; the weary mariner looks to the port, not as the termination of his labor, but as the commencement of all his enjoyments.

But here she comes,
In the calm harbor of whose gentle breast
My tempest-beaten soul may safely rest. DRYDEN.
Safe thro' the war her course the vessel steers,
The haven gain'd, the pilot drops his fears.

SIRILEY.

What though our passage through this world be never so stormy and tempestuous, we shall arrive at a safe port. TILLOTSON.

TO HARBOR, SHELTER, LODGE.

THE idea of giving a resting-place is common to these terms: but HARBOR (v. To foster) is used mostly in a bad sense: SHELTER (v. Asylum) in an indefinite sense: LODGE, in French loge, is connected with the German liegen, to lie, in an indifferent sense. One harbors that which ought not to find room anywhere; one shelters that which cannot find security elsewhere; one lodges that which wants a resting-place. Thieves, traitors, conspirators, are harbored by those who have an interest in securing them from detection: either the wicked or the unfortunate may be sheltered from the evil with which they are threatened: travellers are lodged as occasion may require.

My lady bids me tell you that, though she harbors you as her uncle, she's nothing allied to your disorders. SHAKESPEARE.

The hen shelters her first brood of chickens with all the prudence that she ever attains.

JOHNSON.

My lord was lodged in the duke's castle.

HOWELL.

As the word harbor does not, in its original sense, mean anything more than affording a temporary entertainment, it may be taken in a good sense for an act of hospitality.

We owe this old house the same kind of gratitude that we do to an old friend who harbors us in his declining condition, nay, even in his last extremity. POPE.

Harbor and shelter are said of things in the sense of giving a harbor or shelter; lodge in the sense of being a resting-place: furniture harbors vermin, trees shelter from the rain, a ball lodges in the breast; so in the moral sense, a man harbors resentment, ill-will, evil thoughts, and the like; he shelters himself from a charge by retorting it upon his adversary; or a particular passion may be lodged in the breast, or ideas lodged in the mind.

She harbors in her breast a furious hate
(And thou shalt find the dire effects too late);
Fix'd on revenge, and obstinate to die. DRYDEN.
In vain I strove to check my growing flame,
Or shelter passion under friendship's name:
You saw my heart. PRIOR.

They too are tempered high,
With hunger stung, and wild necessity,
Nor lodge pity in their shaggy breast. THOMSON.

HARD, FIRM, SOLID.

THE close adherence of the component parts of a body constitutes HARDNESS. The close adherence of different bodies to each other constitutes FIRMNESS (v. Fixed). That is hard which will not yield to a closer compression; that is firm which will not yield so as to produce a separation. Ice is hard, as far as it respects itself, when it resists every pressure; it is firm, with regard to the water which it covers, when it is so closely bound as to resist every weight without breaking.

I see you laboring through all your inconveniences of the rough roads, the hard saddle, the trotting horse, and what not. FORB.

The loosen'd ice
Rustles no more; but to the sedge bank
Fast grows, or gathers round the pointed stone,
A crystal pavement, by the breath of heaven
Cemented firm. THOMSON.

Hard and SOLID respect the internal constitution of bodies, and the adherence of the component parts; but hard denotes a much closer degree of adherence than solid: the hard is opposed to the soft; the solid to the fluid; every hard body is by nature solid; although every solid body is not hard. Wood is always a solid body, but it is sometimes hard, and sometimes soft; water, when congealed, is a solid body, and admits of different degrees of hardness.

It is said by modern philosophers, that the hardest bodies are so porous that if all matter were compressed to perfect solidity it might be contained in a cube of a few feet. JOHNSON.

In the improper application, hardness is allied to insensibility; firmness to fixeness; solidity to substantiality; a hard man is not to be acted upon by any tender motives; a firm man is not to be turned from his purpose; a solid man holds no purposes that are not well-founded. A man is hardened in that which is bad, by being made insensible to that which is good; a man is confirmed in anything good or bad, by being rendered less disposed to lay it aside; his mind is consolidated by acquiring fresh motives for action.

Plenty and peace breed cowards; hardness ever
Of hardness is mother. SHAKESPEARE.

In your friendships and connections this rule is particularly useful; let your firmness and vigor preserve and invite attachments to you. CHESTERFIELD.

This subject of mineral waters would afford an ocean of matter were one to compile a solid discourse of it. HOWELL.

A copious manner of expression gives strength and weight to our ideas, which frequently makes impressions upon the mind, as iron does upon solid bodies, rather by repeated strokes than a single blow. MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF PLINY.

HARD, CALLOUS, HARDENED, OBDURATE.

HARD is here, as in the former case (v. Hard), the general term, and the rest particular: hard, in its most extensive physical sense, denotes the property of resisting the action of external force, so as not to undergo any change in its form, or separation in its parts: CALLOUS is that species of the hard, in application to the skin, which arises from its dryness, and the absence of all nervous susceptibility. Hard and callous are likewise applied in the moral sense; but hard denotes the absence of tender feeling, or the property of resisting any impression which tender objects are apt to produce; callous denotes the property of not yielding to the force of motives to action. A hard heart cannot be moved by the sight of misery, let it be presented in ever so affecting a form: a callous mind is not to be touched by any persuasions, however powerful. Hard does not designate any circumstance of its existence or origin: we may be hard from a variety of causes; but callousness arises from the indulgence of vices, passions, and the pursuit of vicious practices. When we speak of a person as hard, it simply determines what he is: if we speak of him as callous, it refers also to what he was, and from what he is become so.

Not e'en the hardest of our foes could hear,
Nor stern Ulysses tell without a tear. DRYDEN.

By degrees the sense grows callous, and loses that exquisite relish of trifles. BERKELEY.

Callous, HARDENED, and OBDURATE are all employed to designate a morally depraved character; but callousness belongs properly to the heart and conscience; hardened to both the heart and the understanding; obdurate more particularly to the will. Callousness is the first stage of hardness in moral depravity; it may exist in the infant mind, on its first tasting the poisonous pleasures of vice, without being acquainted with its remote consequences. A hardened state is the work of time; it arises from a continued course of vice, which becomes, as it were, habitual, and wholly unfits a person for admitting of any other impressions: obduracy is the last stage of moral hardness, which supposes the whole mind to be obstinately bent on vice. A child discovers himself to be callous when the entreaties, threats, or punishments of a parent cannot awaken in him a single sentiment of contrition; a youth discovers himself to be hardened when he begins to take a pride and a pleasure in a vicious career; a man shows himself to be obdurate when he betrays a settled and confirmed purpose to pursue his abandoned course, without regard to consequences.

Licentiousness had so long passed for sharpness of wit and greatness of mind, that the conscience is grown callous. L'ESTRANGE.

His hardened heart, nor prayers, nor threatenings move:

Fate and the gods had stopp'd his ears to love. DRYDEN.

Round he throws his baleful eyes,
That witness'd huge affliction and dismay,
Mix'd with obdurate pride and steadfast hate. MILTON.

HARD, HARDY, INSENSIBLE, UNFEELING.

HARD (v. Hard) may either be applied to that which makes resistance to external impressions, or that which presses with a force upon other objects. HARDY, which is only a variation of hard, is applicable only in the first case: thus, a person's skin may be hard which is not easily acted upon; but the person is said to be hardy who can withstand the elements: on the other hand, hard, when employed as an active principle, is only applied to the moral character; hence the difference between a hardy man who endures everything, and a hard man who makes others endure.

To be inaccessible, contemptuous, and hard of heart, is to revolt against our own nature.

BLAIR
Ocnus was next, who led his native train
Of hardy warriors through the watery plain.

DRYDEN.

INSENSIBLE and UNFEELING are but modes of the hard; that is, they designate the negative quality of hardness, or its incapacity to receive impression: hard, therefore, is always the strongest term of the three; and, of the two others, unfeeling is stronger than insensible. Hard and insensible are applied physically and morally; unfeeling is employed only as a moral characteristic. A horse's mouth is hard when it is insensible to the action of the bit; a man's heart is hard which is insensible to the miseries of others; a man is unfeeling who does not regard the feelings of others. The heart may be hard by nature, or rendered so by the influence of some passion; but a person is commonly unfeeling from circumstances. Shylock is depicted by Shakspeare as hard, from his strong antipathy to the Christians: people who enjoy an uninterrupted state of good health are often unfeeling in cases of sickness. As that which is hard mostly hurts or pains when it comes in contact with the soft, the term hard is peculiarly applicable to superiors, or such as have power to inflict pain: a creditor may be hard toward a debtor. As insensible signifies a want of sense, it may be sometimes necessary: a surgeon, when performing an operation, must be insensible to the present pain which he inflicts. As unfeeling signifies a want of feeling, it is always taken for a want of good feeling: where the removal of pain is required, the surgeon shows himself to be unfeeling who does not do everything in his power to lessen the pain of the sufferer.

Begone! the whip and bell in that hard hand
Are hateful ensigns of usurp'd command.

COWPER.

It is both reproachful and criminal to have an insensible heart. BLAIR.

The father too, a sordid man,
Who love nor pity knew,
Was all unfeeling as the rock
From whence his riches grew.

MALLETT.

HARD, DIFFICULT, ARDUOUS.

HARD is here taken in the improper sense of causing trouble, and requiring pains, in which sense it is a much stronger term than DIFFICULT, which, from the Latin difficilis, compounded of the privative dis and facilis, signifies merely not easy. Hard is therefore positive, and difficult negative. A difficult task cannot be got through without exertion, but a hard task requires great exertion. Difficult is applicable to all trivial matters which call for a more than usual portion either of labor or thought; hard is applicable to those which are of the highest importance, and accompanied with circumstances that call for the utmost stretch of every power. It is a difficult matter to get admittance into some circles of society; it is a hard matter to find societies that are select: it is difficult to decide between two fine paintings which is the finest; it is a hard matter to come at any conclusion on metaphysical subjects. A child mostly finds it difficult to learn his letters: there are many passages in classical writers which are hard to be understood by the learned.

Antigones, with kisses, often tried
To beg this present in his beauty's pride,
When youth and love are hard to be denied.

DRYDEN.

As Swift's years increased, his fits of giddiness and deafness grew more frequent, and his deafness made conversation difficult.

JOHNSON.

ARDUOUS, from the Latin arduus, lofty, signifying set at a distance or out of reach, expresses more than either hard or difficult. What is difficult may be conquered by labor and perseverance, without any particular degree of talent; but what is arduous cannot be effected without great mental powers and accomplishments. What is difficult is so in various degrees, according to circumstances; that which is difficult to one person may be less so to another; but that which is arduous is difficult in a high degree, and positively difficult under every circumstance.

The translation of Homer was an arduous undertaking, and the translator entered upon it with a candid confession that he was utterly incapable of doing justice to Homer.

CUMBERLAND.

Whatever melting metals can conspire,
Or breathing bellows, or the forming fire,
Is freely yours; your anxious fears remove,
And think no task is difficult to love.

DRYDEN.

HARD-HEARTED, CRUEL, UNMERCIFUL, MERCILESS.

HARD-HEARTED signifies having a hard heart, or a heart not to be moved by the pains of others (v. Hard). CRUEL, in Latin crudelis, from crudus, raw flesh, and crux, blood, that is, delighting in blood like beasts of prey, signifies ready to inflict pain: as a temper of mind, therefore, cruel expresses much more than hard-hearted; the latter denotes the want of that sensibility toward others which ought to be the property of every human heart; the former the positive inclination to inflict pain, and the pleasure from so doing. Hard-hearted is employed as an epithet of the person; cruel as an epithet to things as well as persons; as a cruel man, a cruel action. Hard-hearted respects solely the moral affections; cruelty, in its proper sense, respects the infliction of corporeal pains, but is extended in its application to whatever creates moral pains: a person may be cruel, too, in his treatment of children or brutes by beating or starving them; or he may be cruel toward those who look up to him for kindness.

Single men, though they be many times more charitable, on the other side, are more cruel and hard-hearted, because their tenderness is not so oft called upon.

BACON.

Relentless love the cruel mother led
The blood of her unhappy babes to shed.

DRYDEN.

The UNMERCIFUL and MERCILESS are both modes of characteristics of the hard-hearted. An unmerciful man is hard-hearted, inasmuch as he is unwilling to extend his compassion or mercy to one who is in his power; a merciless man, which is more than an unmerciful man, is hard-hearted, inasmuch as he is restrained by no compunctious feelings from inflicting pain on those who are in his power. Avarice makes a man hard-hearted even to those who are bound to him by the closest ties; it makes him unmerciful to those who are in his debt.

There are many merciless tyrants in domestic life, who show their disposition by their merciless treatment of their poor brutes.

I saw how unmerciful you were to your eyes in your last letter to me. TILLOTSON.

To crush a merciless and cruel victor. DRYDEN.

HARDLY, SCARCELY.

WHAT is HARD is not common, and in that respect SCARCE: hence the idea of unfrequency assimilates these terms both in signification and application. In many cases they may be used indifferently; but, where the idea of practicability predominates, hardly seems most proper; and, where the idea of frequency predominates, scarcely seems preferable. One can hardly judge of a person's features by a single and partial glance; we scarcely ever see men lay aside their vices from a thorough conviction of their enormity: but it may with equal propriety be said in general sentences, hardly one in a thousand, or scarcely one in a thousand, would form such a conclusion.

I do not expect, as long as I stay in India, to be free from a bad digestion, the "morbus literatorum," for which there is hardly any remedy but abstinence from food, literary and culinary.

SEN W. JONES.

In this assembly of princes and nobles (the Congress at the Hague), to which Europe has perhaps scarcely seen anything equal, was formed the grand alliance against Lewis. JOHNSON.

HARSH, ROUGH, SEVERE, RIGOROUS.

HARSH (v. Acrimony) and ROUGH (v. Abrupt) borrow their moral signification from the physical properties of the bodies to which they belong. The harsh and the rough both act painfully upon the taste, but the former with much more violence than the latter. An excess of the sour mingled with other unpleasant properties constitutes harshness: an excess of astringency constitutes roughness. Cheese is said to be harsh when it is dry and biting: roughness is the peculiar quality of the damascene. From this physical distinction between these terms we discover the ground of their moral application. Harshness in a person's conduct acts upon the feelings, and does violence to the affections: roughness acts only externally on the senses: we may be rough in the tone of the voice, in the mode of address, or in the manner of handling or touching an object: but we are harsh in the sentiment we convey, and according to the persons to whom it is conveyed: a stranger may be rough when he has it in his power to be so: only a friend, or one in the tenderest relation, can be harsh.

No complaint is more feelingly made than that of the harsh and rugged manners of persons with whom we have an intercourse. BLAIR.

Know, gentle youth, in Libyan lands there are A people rude in peace, and rough in war.

DRYDEN.

SEVERE, v. Austere. RIGOROUS, from the Latin rigor and rigeo, to stiffen, designates unbending, inflexible. These terms mark different modes of treating those that are in one's power, all of which are the reverse of the kind. Harsh and rough are epithets of that which is unamiable: they indicate the harshness and roughness of the humor: severity and rigor are not always to be condemned; they spring from principle, and are often resorted to by necessity. Harshness is always mingled with anger and personal feeling: severity and rigor characterize things more than the temper of persons. A harsh master renders every burden which he imposes doubly severe, by the grating manner in which he communicates his will: a severe master simply imposes the burden in a manner to enforce obedience. The one seems to indulge himself in inflicting pain: the other seems to act from a motive that is independent of the pain inflicted. A harsh man is therefore always severe, but with injustice: a severe man, however, is not always harsh. Rigor is a high degree of severity. One is severe in the punishment of offences: one is rigorous in exacting compliance and obedience. Severity is always more or less necessary in the army, or in a school, for the preservation of good order: rigor is essential in dealing with the stubborn will and unruly passions of men.

It is pride which fills the world with so much harshness and severity. We are rigorous to offences, as if we had never offended. BLAIR.

TO HASTEN, ACCELERATE, SPEED, EXPEDITE, DESPATCH.

HASTEN, in French hâter, and in the Northern languages hasten, etc., is most probably connected with the German heiss, hot, expressing what is vivid and active. ACCELERATE, from celer, quick, signifies literally to quicken for a specific purpose. SPEED, from the Greek σπουδή, signifies to carry on diligently. EXPEDITE, v. Diligent. DESPATCH, in French dépêcher, from pes, a foot, signifies putting off or clearing.

Quickness in movement and action is the common idea of all these terms, which vary in the nature of the movement and the action. To hasten expresses little more than the general idea of quickness in moving toward a point; thus, he hastens who runs to get to the end of his journey: accelerate expresses, moreover, the idea of bringing something to a point; thus, every mechanical business is accelerated by the order and distribution of its several parts. It may be employed, like the word hasten, for corporeal and familiar actions: a tailor accelerates any particular work that he has in hand by putting on additional hands; or a compositor accelerates the printing of a work by doing his part with correctness. The word speed includes not only quick but forward movement. He who goes with speed goes effectually forward, and comes to his journey's end the soonest. This idea is excluded from the term haste, which may often be a planless, unsuitable quickness. Hence the proverb, "The more haste, the worse speed."

Where with like haste, though several ways they run,
Some to undo, and some to be undone. DENHAM.

Let the aged consider well, that by every intemperate indulgence they accelerate decay.

BLAIR.

When matters are fully resolved upon, I believe then nothing is so advantageous as speed.

HOWARD.

Expedite and despatch are terms of higher import, in application to the most serious concerns in life; but to expedite expresses a process, a bringing forward toward an end: despatch implies a putting an end to, a making a clearance. We do everything in our power to expedite a business: we despatch a great deal of business within a given time. Expedition is requisite for one who executes; despatch is most important for one who determines and directs. An inferior officer must proceed with expedition to fulfil the orders or execute the purposes of his commander; a general or minister of state despatches the concerns of planning, directing, and instructing. Hence it is we speak only of expediting a thing; but we may speak of despatching a person as well as a thing.

The coachman was ordered to drive, and they hurried with the utmost expedition to Hyde Park Corner. JOHNSON.

And as, in races, it is not the large stride, or high lift, that makes the speed; so, in business, the keeping close to the matter, and not taking of it too much at once, procureth despatch.

BACON.

TO HASTEN, HURRY.

HASTEN, v. To hasten. HURRY, in French hâter, probably comes from the Hebrew charrer or harrer, to be inflamed, or be in a hurry.

To hasten and hurry both imply to move forward with quickness in any matter; but the former may proceed with some design and good order, but the latter always supposes perturbation and irregularity. We hasten in the communication of good news, when we make efforts to convey it in the shortest time possible; we hurry to get to an end, when we impatiently and inconsiderately press forward without making choice of our means. To hasten is opposed to delay, or a dilatory mode of proceeding; it is frequently indispensable to hasten in the affairs of human life: to hurry is opposed to deliberate and cautious proceeding; it must always be prejudicial and unwise to hurry; men may hasten; children hurry.

Homer, to preserve the unity of action, hastens into the midst of things, as Horace has observed.

ADDISON.

Now 'tis naught
But restless hurry through the busy air,
Beat by unnumber'd wings. THOMSON.

As epithets, hasty and hurried are both employed in the bad sense; but hasty implies merely an overquickness of motion which outstrips consideration; hurried implies a disorderly motion which springs from a distempered state of mind. Irritable people use hasty expressions; they speak before they think: deranged people walk with hurried steps; they follow the blind impulse of undirected feeling.

If you find you have a hastiness of temper, which unguardedly breaks out into indiscreet sallies, watch it narrowly. CHESTERFIELD.

The mind is hurried out of itself by a crowd of great and confused images. BURKE.

TO HATE, DETEST.

THE alliance between these terms in signification is sufficiently illustrated in the articles referred to. Their difference consists more in sense than application. To HATE (v. Antipathy) is a personal feeling directed toward the object independently of its qualities; to DETEST (v. To abhor) is a feeling independent of the person, and altogether dependent upon the nature of the thing. What one hates, one hates commonly on one's own account; what one detests, one detests on account of the object: hence it is that one hates, but not detests, the person who has done an injury to one's self; and that one detests, rather than hates, the person who has done injuries to others. Joseph's brethren hated him because he was more beloved than they; we detest a traitor to his country because of the enormity of his offence.

Spleen to mankind his envious heart possess'd,
And much he hated all, but most the best. POPE.

Who dares think one thing, and another tell,
My heart detests him as the gates of hell. POPE.

In this connection, to hate is always a bad passion: to detest always laudable; but, when both are applied to inanimate objects, to hate is bad or good according to circumstances; to detest always retains its good meaning. When men hate things because they interfere with their indulgences, as the wicked hate the light, it is a bad personal feeling, as in the former case; but, when good men are said to hate that which is bad, it is a laudable feeling, justified by the nature of the object. As this feeling is, however, so closely allied to detest, it is necessary further to observe that hate, whether rightly or wrongly applied, seeks the injury or destruction of the object: but detest is confined simply to the shunning of the object, or thinking of it with very great pain. God hates sin, and on that account punishes sinners; conscientious men detest all fraud, and therefore cautiously avoid being concerned in it.

Vain pomp and glory of the world, I hate ye. SHAKESPEARE.

I must be pardoned for this short tribute to the memory of a man who, while living, would as much detest to receive anything that wore the appearance of flattery as I should be to offer it. GOLDSMITH.

HATEFUL, ODIUS.

HATEFUL signifies literally full of that which is apt to excite hatred. ODI-OUS, from the Latin odi, to hate, has the same sense originally.

These epithets are employed in regard to such objects as produce strong aversion in the mind; but when employed, as they commonly are, upon familiar subjects, they indicate an unbecoming vehemence in the speaker. Hateful is properly applied to whatever violates general principles of morality; lying and swearing are hateful vices: odious is more commonly applied to such things as affect the interests of others, and bring odium upon the individual; a tax that bears particularly hard and unequally is termed odious, or a measure of government that is oppressive is denominated odious.

Let me be deemed the hateful cause of all,
And suffer, rather than my people fall. POPE.

Oh! restless fate of pride,
That strives to learn what Heav'n resolved to hide:
Vain is the search, presumptuous and abhorr'd,
Anxious to thee, and odious to thy lord. POPE.

HATRED, ENMITY, ILL-WILL, RANCOR.

THESE terms agree in this particular, that those who are under the influence of such feelings derive a pleasure from the misfortune of others; but HATRED (v. Aversion) expresses more than EN-MITY (v. Enemy), and this more than ILL-WILL, which signifies either an evil will or a willing of evil. Hatred is not contented with merely wishing ill to others, but derives its whole happiness from their misery or destruction; enmity, on the contrary, is limited in its operations to particular circumstances: hatred, on the other hand, is frequently confined to the feeling of the individual; but enmity consists as much in the action as the feeling. He who is possessed with hatred is happy when the object of his passion is miserable, and is miserable when he is happy; but the hater is not always instrumental in causing his misery or destroying his happiness: he who is inflamed with enmity is more active in disturbing the peace of his enemy; but oftener displays his temper in trifling than in important matters. Ill-will, as the word denotes, lies only in the mind, and is so indefinite in its signification that it admits of every conceivable degree. When the will is evilly directed toward another in ever so small a degree it constitutes ill-will. RANCOR is in Latin rancor, from ranceo, to grow stale, signifying staleness, a species of bitter, deep-rooted enmity.

Phœnician Dido rules the growing state,
Who fled from Tyre to avenge her brother's hate.
DRYDEN.

That space the evil one abstracted stood
From his own evil, and for the time remain'd
Stupidly good, of enmity disarm'd. MILTON.

For your servants, neither use them so familiarly as to lose your reverence at their hands, nor so disdainfully as to purchase yourself their ill-will. WENTWORTH.

Oh lasting rancor! oh insatiate hate,
To Phrygia's monarch, and the Phrygian state.
POPE.

HAUGHTINESS, DISDAIN, ARROGANCE.

HAUGHTINESS denotes the abstract quality of haughty, which, contracted from high-hearty, in Dutch and low German hooghart, signifies literally high-spirited. DISDAIN, v. To condemn. ARROGANCE, v. Arrogance.

Haughtiness is founded on the high opinion we entertain of ourselves; disdain, on the low opinion we have of others; arrogance is the result of both, but if anything, more of the former than the latter. Haughtiness and disdain are properly sentiments of the mind, and arrogance a mode of acting resulting from a state of mind: there may therefore be haughtiness and disdain which have not betrayed themselves by any visible action; but arrogance is always accompanied with its corresponding action: the haughty man is known by the air of superiority which he assumes; the disdainful man by the contempt which he shows to others; the arrogant man by his lofty pretensions. Haughtiness and arrogance are both vicious; they are built upon a false idea of ourselves; but disdain may be justifiable when provoked by what is infamous: a lady must treat with disdain the person who insults her honor.

The same haughtiness that prompts the act of injustice will more strongly incite its justification. JOHNSON.

Didst thou not think such vengeance must await
The wretch that, with his crimes all fresh about him,
Rushes, irreverent, unprepar'd, uncall'd,
Into his Maker's presence, throwing back
With insolent disdain his choicest gift? POPE.

Turbulent, discontented men of quality, in proportion as they are puffed up with personal pride and arrogance, generally despise their own order. BURKE.

HAUGHTY, HIGH, HIGH-MINDED.

HAUGHTY (v. Haughtiness) and HIGH, derived from the same source as haughty, characterize both the external behavior and the internal sentiment; HIGH-MINDED marks the sentiment only, or the state of the mind. With regard to the outward behavior, haughty is a stronger term than high; a haughty carriage speaks not only a high opinion of one's self, but a strong mixture of contempt for others: a high carriage denotes simply a high opinion of one's self: haughtiness is therefore always offensive, as it is burdensome to others; but height may sometimes be laudable, inasmuch as it is justice to one's self: one can never give a command in a haughty tone without making others feel their inferiority in a painful degree; we may sometimes assume a high tone in order to shelter ourselves from insult.

He deserved and earned dislike by his haughty deportment. BAKER.

Master Endymion Porter brought lately my Lord of Bristol a despatch from England of a high nature, wherein this earl is commanded to represent unto this king how much his Majesty of Great Britain hath labored to merit will of the crown. HOWELL.

With regard to the sentiment of the mind, haughty, whether it shows itself in the outward behavior, or rests in the mind, is always bad; height as an habitual temper, and still more high-mindedness, which more strongly marks the personal quality, are expressly inconsistent with Christian humility; but a man may with reason be too high or too high-minded to condescend to a mean action.

Let gifts be to the mighty queen design'd,
And mollify with prayers her haughty mind.
DRYDEN.

Who knows whether indignation may not succeed to terror, and the revival of a high sentiment, spurning away the illusion of safety purchased at the expense of glory, may not drive us to a generous despair. BURKE.

The wise will determine from the gravity of the case; the irritable, from sensibility to oppression; the high-minded, from disdain and indignation at abusive power in unworthy hands. BURKE.

TO HAVE, POSSESS.

HAVE, in Danish haver, Swedish haf-na, Saxon, etc., haebben, Latin habeo, comes from the Hebrew caph, the hollow of the hand, i. e., being in the hand, which is literally having. POSSESS, in Latin possessus, participle of posideo, compounded of pos or potis and sedeo, signifies to have the power of resting upon or keeping.

Have is the general, possess is the particular term: have designates no circumstance of the action; possess expresses a particular species of having. To have is sometimes to have in one's hand or within one's reach; but to possess is to have as one's own: a clerk has the money which he has fetched for his employer; the latter possesses the money, which he has the power of turning to his use. To have is sometimes to have the right to, to belong; to possess is to have by one and at one's command: a debtor has the property which he has surrendered to his creditor; but he cannot be said to possess it, because he has it not within his reach and at his disposal: we are not necessarily masters of that which we have; although we always are of that which we possess: to have is sometimes only temporary; to possess is mostly permanent: we have money which we are perpetually disposing of: we possess lands which we keep for a permanency: a person has the good graces of those whom he pleases; he possesses the confidence of those who put everything in his power.

That I spent, that I had;
That I gave, that I have;
That I left, that I lost.

EPITAPH ON A CHARITABLE MAN.

The various objects that compose the world were by nature formed to delight our senses; and as it is this alone that makes them desirable to an uncorrupted taste, a man may be said naturally to possess them when he possesseth those enjoyments which they are fitted by nature to yield. BERKELEY.

TO HAZARD, RISK, VENTURE.

ALL these terms denote actions performed under an uncertainty of the event: but HAZARD (v. Chance) bespeaks a want of design and choice on the part of the agent; to RISK (v. Danger) implies a choice of alternatives; to VENTURE, which is the same as adventure (v. Event), signifies a calculation and balance of probabilities: one hazards and risks under the fear of an evil; one ventures with the hope of a good. He who hazards an opinion or an assertion does it from presumptuous feelings and upon slight grounds; chances are rather against him than for him that it may prove erroneous: he who risks a battle does it often from necessity; he chooses the least of two evils; although the event is dubious, yet he fears less from a failure than from inaction: he who ventures on a mercantile speculation does it from a love of gain; he flatters himself with a favorable event, and acquires boldness from the prospect. There are but very few circumstances to justify us in hazarding; there may be several occasions which render it necessary to risk, and very many cases in which it may be advantageous to venture.

They list with women each degen'rate name
Who dares not hazard life for future fame.

DRYDEN.

If the adventurer risks honor, he risks more than the knight. HAWKSWORTH.

Socrates, in his discourse before his death, says he did not know whether his soul would remain after death, but he thought so, and had such hopes of it that he was very willing to venture his life upon these hopes. TILLOTSON.

HEALTHY, WHOLESOME, SALUBRIOUS, SALUTARY.

HEALTHY signifies not only having health, but also causing health. WHOLESOME, like the German heilzaam, signifies making whole, keeping whole or sound. SALUBRIOUS and SALUTARY, from the Latin salus, safety or health, signify likewise contributive to health or good in general.

These epithets are all applicable to such objects as have a kindly influence on the bodily constitution: healthy is the most general and indefinite; it is applied to exercise, to air, situation, climate, and most other things but food, for which whole some is commonly substituted: the life of a farmer is reckoned the most healthy; and the simplest diet is the most wholesome. Healthy and wholesome are rather negative in their sense; salubrious and salutary are positive: that is healthy and wholesome which does no injury to the health; that is salubrious which serves to improve the health; and that is salutary which serves to remove a disorder: climates are healthy or unhealthy, according to the constitution of the person; water is a wholesome beverage for those who are not dropsical; bread is a wholesome diet for man; the air and climate of southern France has been long famed for its salubrity, and has induced many invalids to repair thither for the benefit of their health; the effects have not been equally salutary in all cases.

You are relaxing yourself with the healthy and manly exercise of the field. SIR W. JONES.
Here laid his scrip with wholesome viands fill'd;
There, listening every noise, his watchful dog.

THOMSON.

If that fountain be once poisoned, you can never expect that salubrious streams will flow from it. BLAIR.

Wholesome and salutary have likewise an extended and moral application; healthy and salubrious are employed only in the proper sense: wholesome in this case seems to convey the idea of making whole again what has been unsound; but salutary retains the idea of improving the condition of those who stand in need of improvement: correction is wholesome which serves the purpose of amendment without doing any injury to the body; instruction or admonition is salutary when it serves the purpose of strengthening good principles, and awakening a sense of guilt or impropriety: laws and punishments are wholesome to the body politic, as diet is to the physical body; restrictions are salutary in checking irregularities.

False decorations, fuscuses, and pigments, deserve the imperfections that constantly attend them, being neither commodious in application, nor wholesome in their use. BACON.

A sense of the Divine presence exerts this salutary influence of promoting temperance and restraining the disorders incident to a prosperous state. BLAIR.

TO HEAP, PILE, ACCUMULATE, AMASS.

To HEAP signifies to form into a heap. To PILE is to form into a pile, which, being a variation of pole, signifies a high-raised heap. To ACCUMULATE, from the Latin cumulus, a heap, signifies to put heap upon heap. To AMASS is literally to form into a mass.

To heap is an indefinite action; it may be performed with or without order: to pile is a definite action done with design and order; thus we heap stones, or pile wood: to heap may be to make into large or small heaps: to pile is always to make something considerable in height: children may heap sticks together; men pile loads of wood together.

Within the circles arms and tripods lie,
Ingots of gold and silver heap'd on high.

DAYDEN.

This would I celebrate with annual games,
With gifts on altars pil'd, and holy flames.

DAYDEN.

To pile is used always, to heap mostly in the physical, accumulate and amass in the physical or moral acceptance. To accumulate is properly to bring or add heap to heap, which is a gradual and unfinished act; to amass is to form into a mass, which is a single complete act: a man may accumulate guineas or anything else in small quantities, but he properly amasses wealth, and in a figurative sense he amasses knowledge. To accumulate and to amass are not always the acts of conscious agents: things may accumulate or amass; water or snow accumulates by the continual accession of fresh quantities; ice amasses in rivers until they are frozen over: so in the moral acceptance, evils, abuses, and the like, accumulate: corruption amasses.

These odes are marked by glittering accumulations of ungraceful ornaments. JOHNSON.

Misers are generally characterized as men without honor or without humanity, who live only to accumulate. GOLDSMITH.

Sir Francis Bacon, by an extraordinary force of nature, compass of thought, and indefatigable study, has amassed to himself such stores of knowledge as we cannot look upon without amazement. HUGHES.

TO HEAR, HEARKEN, OVERHEAR.

To HEAR is properly the act of the ear; it is sometimes totally abstracted from the mind, when we hear and do not understand: to HEARKEN is an act of the ear and the mind in conjunction; it implies an effort to hear, a tendency of the ear: to OVERHEAR is to hear clandestinely, or unknown to the person who is heard, whether designedly or not. We hear sounds: we hearken for the sense; we overhear the words: a quick ear hears the smallest sound; a willing mind hearkens to what is said; a prying curiosity leads to overhearing.

I look'd, I listen'd, dreadful sounds I hear,
And the dire forms of hostile gods appear.

DRYDEN.

But aged Nereus hearkens to his love.

DRYDEN.

If he fail of that,
He will have other means to cut you off;
I overheard him and his practices.

SHAKESPEARE.

HEARTY, WARM. SINCERE, CORDIAL.

HEARTY, i. e., having the heart in a thing, and WARM (v. Fire) express a stronger feeling than SINCERE (v. Candid); CORDIAL, from cor, the heart, i. e., according to the heart, is a mixture of the warm and sincere. There are cases in which it may be peculiarly proper to be heartly, as when we are supporting the cause of religion and virtue; there are other cases in which it is peculiarly proper to be warm, as when our affections ought to be roused in favor of our friends; in all cases we ought to be sincere, when we express either a sentiment or a feeling; it is peculiarly happy to be on terms of cordial regard with those who stand in any close relation to us. The man himself should be heartly; his heart should be warm; professions should be sincere; a reception cordial.

Yet should some neighbor feel a pain
Just in the part where I complain,
How many a message would he send!
What heartly prayers that I should mend!

SWIFT.

Youth is the season of warm and generous emotions.

BLAIR.

We meet at last in one sincere desire;
His wish and mine both prompt me to retire.

COWPER.

With a gratitude the most cordial, a good man looks up to that Almighty Benefactor who aims at no end but the happiness of those whom he blesses.

BLAIR.

TO HEAVE, SWELL.

HEAVE is used either transitively or intransitively, as a reflexive or a neuter verb; SWELL is used only as a neuter verb. Heave implies raising, and swell implies distension: they differ therefore very widely in sense, but they sometimes agree in application. The bosom is said both to heave and to swell; because it happens that the bosom swells by heaving; the waves are likewise said to heave themselves or to swell, in which there is a similar correspondence between the actions: otherwise most things which heave do not swell, and those which swell do not heave.

He heaves for breath, he staggers to and fro,
And clouds of issuing smoke his nostrils loudly blow.

DRYDEN.

Meantime the mountain billows, to the clouds
In dreadful tumult swell! surge above surge.

THOMSON.

HEAVY, DULL, DROWSY.

HEAVY is allied to both DULL and DROWSY, but the latter have no close connection with each other.

Heavy and dull are employed as epithets both for persons and things; heavy characterizes the corporeal state of a person; dull qualifies the spirits or the understanding of the subject. A person has a heavy look whose temperament seems composed of gross and weighty materials which weigh him down and impede his movements; he has a dull countenance in whom the ordinary brightness and vivacity of the mind is wanting.

Heavy with age, Entellus stands his ground,
But with his warping body wards the wound.

DRYDEN.

O thou dull god! Why leest thou with the vile
In loathsome beds: and leav'st the kingly couch
A watch-case to a common larum bell?

SHAKESPEARE.

Heavy and drowsy are both employed in the sense of sleepy; but the former is only a particular state, the latter particular or general; all persons may be occasionally heavy or drowsy; some are habitually drowsy from disease: they likewise differ in degree, the latter being much the greater of the two; and occasionally they are applied to such things as produce sleepiness.

And drowsy tinklings lull the distant fold.

GRAY.

HEAVY, BURDENSOME, WEIGHTY, PONDEROUS.

HEAVY, from heave, signifies the causing to heave, or requiring to be lifted up with force; BURDENSOME signifies having a burden; WEIGHTY, having a weight; and PONDEROUS, from the Latin pondus, a weight, has the same original meaning.

Heavy is the natural property of some bodies; burdensome is incidental to some. In the vulgar sense, things are termed heavy which are found difficult to lift, in distinction from those which are light or easy to be lifted; but those things are burdensome which are too troublesome to be carried or borne: many things, therefore, are actually heavy that are never burdensome; and others are occasionally burdensome that are never heavy: that which is heavy is so whether lifted or not; but that which is burdensome must be burdensome to some one carrying it: hard substances are mostly heavy; but to a weak person the softest substance may sometimes be burdensome if he is obliged to bear it; things are heavy according to the difficulty with which they are lifted; but they are weighty according as they weigh other things down. The heavy is therefore indefinite; but the weighty is definite, and something positively great: what is heavy to one may be light to another; but that which is weighty exceeds the ordinary weight of other things: ponderous expresses even more than weighty, for it includes also the idea of bulk; the ponderous, therefore, is that which is so weighty and large that it cannot easily be moved.

Though philosophy teaches that no element is heavy in its own place, yet experience shows that out of its own place it proves exceeding burdensome.
SOUTH.

The sable troops along the narrow tracks
Scarce bear the weighty burden on their backs.
DRYDEN.

The diligence of an idler is rapid and impetuous, as ponderous bodies forced into velocity move with violence proportionate to their weight.
JOHNSON.

HERD, CARE, ATTENTION.

HEED (v. To attend) applies to matters of importance to one's moral conduct; CARE (v. Care, solicitude) to matters of minor import: a man is required to take heed; a child is required to take care: the former exercises his understanding in taking heed; the latter exercises his thoughts and his senses in taking care: the former looks to the remote and probable consequences of his actions, and endeavors to prevent the evil that may happen; the latter sees principally to the thing that is immediately before him. When a young man enters the world, he must take heed lest he be not ensnared by his companions into vicious practices; in a slippery path we must take care that we do not fall.

Next you, my servants, heed my strict commands;
Without the walls a ruin'd temple stands.
DRYDEN.

I believe the hiatus should be avoided with more care in poetry than in oratory. FORD.

Heed has moreover the sense of thinking on what is proposed to our notice, in which it agrees with ATTENTION (v. To attend); hence we speak of giving heed and paying attention: but the former is applied only to that which is conveyed to us by another, in the shape of a direction, a caution, or an instruction; but the latter is said of everything which we are said to perform. A good child gives heed to his parents when they caution him against any dangerous or false step; he pays attention to the lesson which is set him to learn. He who gives no heed to the counsels of others is made to repeat his folly by bitter experience; he who fails in paying attention cannot learn.

It is a way of calling a man a fool, when no heed is given to what he says. L'ESTRANGE.

He perceived nothing but silence, and signs of attention to what he would further say. BACON.

TO HEIGHTEN, RAISE, AGGRAVATE.

TO HEIGHTEN is to make higher (v. Haughty). To RAISE is to cause to rise (v. To arise). To AGGRAVATE (v. To aggravate) is to make heavy. Heighten refers more to the result of the action of making higher; raise to the mode: we heighten a house by raising the roof; where raising conveys the idea of setting up aloft, which is not included in the word heighten. On the same ground a head-dress may be said to be heightened which is made higher than it was before; and a chair or a table is raised that is set upon something else: but in speaking of a wall, we may say that it is either heightened or raised, because the operation and result must in both cases be the same. In the improper sense of these terms they preserve a similar distinction:

we heighten the value of a thing; we raise its price; we heighten the grandeur of an object; we raise a family.

Purity and virtue heighten all the powers of fruition. BLAIR.

I would have our conceptions raised by the dignity of thought and sublimity of expression, rather than by a train of robes or a plume of feathers. ADDISON.

Heighten and aggravate have connection with each other only in application to offences: the enormity of an offence is heightened, the guilt of the offender is aggravated, by particular circumstances. The horrors of a murder are heightened by being committed in the dead of the night; the guilt of the perpetrator is aggravated by the addition of ingratitude to murder.

The counsels of pusillanimity very rarely put off, while they are always sure to aggravate, the evils from which they would fly. BURKE.

HEINOUS, FLAGRANT, FLAGITIOUS, ATROCIOUS.

HEINOUS, in French haineux, Greek αινος or δεινος, terrible. FLAGRANT, in Latin flagrans, burning, is a figurative expression denoting excessive and violent in its nature. FLAGITIOUS, in Latin flagitiosus, from flagitium, signifies peculiarly infamous. ATROCIOUS, in Latin atrox, cruel, from ater, black, signifies exceedingly black in guilt.

These epithets, which are applied to crimes, seem to rise in degree. A crime is heinous which seriously offends against the laws of men; a sin is heinous which seriously offends against the will of God; an offence is flagrant which is in direct defiance of established opinions and practice: it is flagitious if a gross violation of the moral law, or coupled with any grossness: a crime is atrocious which is attended with any aggravating circumstances. Lying is a heinous sin; gaming and drunkenness are flagrant breaches of the Divine law; the murder of a whole family is in the fullest sense atrocious.

There are many authors who have shown wherein the malignity of a lie consists, and set forth in proper colors the heinousness of the offence. ADDISON.

If any flagrant deed occur to smite a man's conscience, on this he cannot avoid resting with anxiety and terror. BLAIR.

It is recorded of Sir Matthew Hale, that he for a long time concealed the consecration of himself to the stricter duties of religion, lest by some flagitious action he should bring piety into disgrace. JOHNSON.

The wickedness of a loose or profane author is more atrocious than that of the giddy libertine. JOHNSON.

TO HELP, ASSIST, AID, SUCCOR, RELIEVE.

HELP, in Saxon helpan, German helfen, Teutonic heifen, from heil, whole, is connected with the Greek αλβος, happy, and οφελω, to do good to. ASSIST, in Latin assistere, or ad and sistere, signifies to place one's self by another so as to give him our strength. AID, in Latin adjuvo, that is, the intensive syllable ad and juvo, signifies to profit toward a specific end. SUCCOR, in Latin succorro, to run to the help of any one. RELIEVE, v. To alleviate.

The idea of communicating to the advantage of another in case of need is common to all these terms. Help is the generic term; the rest specific: help may be substituted for the others, and in many cases where they would not be applicable. The first three are employed either to produce a positive good or to remove an evil; the two latter only to remove an evil. We help a person to prosecute his work, or help him out of a difficulty; we assist in order to forward a scheme, or we assist a person in the time of his embarrassment; we aid a good cause, or we aid a person to make his escape; we succor a person who is in danger; we relieve him in time of distress. To help and assist respect personal service, the former by corporeal, the latter by corporeal or mental labor: one servant helps another by taking a part in his employment; one author assists another in the composition of his work. We help up a person's load; we assist him to rise when he has fallen: we speak of a helper or a helpmate in mechanical employments, of an assistant to a professional man.

Their strength united best may help to bear.

POPE.

'Tis the first sanction nature gave to man
Each other to assist in what they can. DENHAM.

To assist and aid are used for services directly or indirectly performed; but the former is said only of individuals, the latter may be said of bodies as well as individuals. One friend assists another with his purse, with his counsel, his interest, and the like: one person aids another in carrying on a scheme; or one king, or nation, aids another with armies and subsidies. We come to the assistance of a person when he has met with an accident; we come to his aid when contending against numbers. Assistance is given, aid is sent.

She no sooner yielded to adultery, but she agreed to assist in the murder of her husband.

BROWNE.

Your private right should impious power invade,
The peers of Ithaca would rise in aid. POPE.

To succor is a species of immediate assistance, which is given on the spur of the occasion; the good Samaritan went to the succor of the man who had fallen among thieves; so in like manner we may succor one who calls us by his cries; or we may succor the poor whom we find in circumstances of distress.

My father

Flying for succor to his servant Banister,
Being distress'd, was by that wretch betray'd.

SHAKESPEARE.

So likewise one may succor a nation.

Patroclus on the shore,
Now pale and dead, shall succor Greece no more. POPE.

The word relieve has nothing in common with succor, except that they both express the removal of pain; but the latter does not necessarily imply any mode by which this is done, and therefore excludes the idea of personal interference. To help is commonly an act of good-nature or discretion; to relieve an act of humanity or generosity.

I called out my whole family to help at saving an after-growth of hay. GOLDSMITH.

Compassion prompts us to relieve the wants of our brethren. BLAIR.

All these terms, except succor, may be applied to things as well as persons; we may walk by the help of a stick, read with the assistance of glasses, learn a task quickly by the aid of a good memory, and obtain relief from medicine.

A man reads his prayers out of a book, as a means to help his understanding and direct his expressions. STILLINGFLEET.

Acquaintance with method will assist one in ranging human affairs. WATTS.

Wise, weighty counsels aid a state distress'd.

POPE.

An unbeliever feels the whole pressure of a present calamity, without being relieved by the memory of anything that is past, or the prospect of anything that is to come. ADDISON.

HERETIC, SCHISMATIC, SECTARIAN OR SECTARY, DISSENTER, NON-CONFORMIST.

A HERETIC is the maintainer of heresy (v. Heterodox); the SCHISMATIC is the author or promoter of schism; the SECTARIAN or SECTARY is the member of a sect; the DISSENTER is one who dissents from an established religion; and the NON-CONFORMIST one who does not conform to an establishment. A man is a heretic only for matters of faith and doctrine, but he is a schismatic in matters of discipline and practice. The heretic, therefore, is not always a schismatic, nor the schismatic a heretic. Whoever holds the doctrines that are common to the Roman Catholic and the reformed Churches is not a heretic in the Protestant sense of the word; although he may in many outward formalities be a schismatic. Calvinists are not heretics, but many among them are schismatics; on the other hand, there are many members of the establishment who hold, though they do not avow, heretical notions.

When a papist uses the word heretics, he generally means Protestants; when a Protestant uses the word, he generally means any person wilfully and contentiously obstinate in fundamental errors. WATTS.

The heretic is considered as such with regard to the Catholic Church or the whole body of Christians, holding the same fundamental principles; but the schismatic and sectarian are considered as such with regard to particular bodies of Christians. Schism, from the Greek σχιζω, to split, denotes an action, and the schismatic is an agent who splits for himself in his own individual capacity: the sectarian does not expressly perform a part, he merely holds a relation; he does not divide anything himself, but belongs to that which is already cut or divided. The schismatic therefore takes upon himself the whole moral responsibility of the schism; but the sectarian does not necessarily take an active part in the measures of his sect; whatever guilt attaches to schism attaches to the schismatic; he is a voluntary agent, acting from an erroneous principle, if not an unchristian temper: the sectarian is often an involuntary agent; he follows that to which he has been incidentally attached. It is possible, therefore, to be a schismatic, and not a sectarian; as also to be a sectarian, and not a schismatic. Those professed members of the establishment who affect the title of evangelical, and wish to palm upon the Church the peculiarities of the Calvinistic doctrine, and to ingraft their own modes and forms into its discipline, are schismatics, but not sectarians; on the other hand, those who by birth and education are attached to a sect are sectarians, but not always schismatics. Consequently, schismatic is a term of much greater reproach than sectarian.

The schismatic and sectarian have a reference to any established body of Christians of any country; but dissenter is a term applicable only to the inhabitants of Great Britain, and bearing relation only to the established Church of England: it includes not only those who have individually and personally renounced the doctrines of the Church, but those who are in a state of dissent or difference from it. Dissenters are not necessarily either schismatics or sectarians, for British Roman Catholics are all dissenters, although they are the reverse of what is understood by schismatic and sectarian: it is equally clear that all schismatics and sectarians are not dissenters, because every established community of Christians, all over the world, have had individuals, or smaller bodies of individuals, setting themselves up against them: the term dissenter being in a great measure technical, it may be applied individually or generally without conveying any idea of reproach; the same may be said of non-conformist, which is a more special term, including only such as do not conform to some established or national religion: consequently, all members of the Romish Church, or of the Kirk of Scotland, are excluded from the number of non-conformists; while on the other hand, all British-born subjects not adhering to these two forms, and at the same time renouncing the established form of their country, are of this number, among whom may be reckoned Independents, Presbyterians, Baptists, Quakers, Methodists, and all other such sects as have been formed since the Reformation.

The Schismatics disturb the sweet peace of our Church. HOWELL.

In the house of Sir Samuel Luke, one of Cromwell's officers, Butler observed so much of the character of the Sectarists that he is said to have written or begun his poem at this time.

JOHNSON.

Of the Dissenters, Swift did not wish to infringe the toleration, but he opposed their encroachments. JOHNSON.

Watts is at least one of the few poets with whom youth and ignorance may be safely pleased; and happy will that reader be whose mind is disposed, by his verses or his prose, to imitate him in all but his non-conformity.

JOHNSON.

TO HESITATE, FALTER, STAMMER, STUTTER.

HESITATE, v. To demur. FALTER or FAULTER seems to signify to commit a fault or blunder, or it may be a frequentative of to fall, signifying to stumble. STAMMER, in the Teutonic stammeln, comes most probably from the Hebrew salem, to obstruct. STUTTER is but a variation of stammer.

A defect in utterance is the idea which is common in the signification of all these terms: they differ either as to the cause or the mode of the action. With regard to the cause, a hesitation results from the state of the mind, and an interruption in the train of thoughts; falter arises from a perturbed state of feeling; stammer and stutter arise either from an incidental circumstance, or more commonly from a physical defect in the organs of utterance. A person who is not in the habit of public speaking, or of collecting his thoughts into a set form, will be apt to hesitate even in familiar conversation; he who first addresses a public assembly will be apt to falter. Children who first begin to read will stammer at hard words: and one who has an impediment in his speech will stutter when he attempts to speak in a hurry.

With regard to the mode or degree of the action, hesitate expresses less than faller; stammer less than stutter. The slightest difficulty in uttering words constitutes a hesitation; a pause or the repetition of a word may be termed hesitating: but to faller supposes a failure in the voice as well as the lips when they refuse to do their office. Stammering and stuttering are confined principally to the useless moving of the mouth; he who stammers brings forth sounds, but not the right sounds, without trials and efforts; he who stutters remains for some time in a state of agitation without uttering a sound.

To look with solicitude and speak with hesitation is attainable at will; but the show of wisdom is ridiculous when there is nothing to cause doubt, as that of valor, when there is nothing to be feared. JOHNSON.

And yet was every faultering tongue of man,
Almighty Father! silent in thy praise,
Thy works themselves would raise a general voice. THOMSON.

Lagoon juice
Will stamm'ring tongues and stagg'ring feet produce. DRYDEN.

HETERODOXY, HERESY.

HETERODOXY, from the Greek ερεος and δοξη, signifies another or a different doctrine. HERESY, from the Greek αρεσις, a choice, signifies an opinion adopted by individual choice.

To be of a different persuasion is heterodoxy; to have a faith of one's own is heresy; the heterodoxy characterizes the opinions formed; the heresy characterizes the individual forming the opinion: the heterodoxy exists independently and for itself; the heresy sets itself up against others. As all division supposes error either on one side or on both, the words heterodoxy and heresy are applied only to human opinions, and strictly in the sense of a false opinion, formed in distinction from that which is better founded; but the former respects any opinions, important or otherwise, the latter refers only to matters of importance: the heresy is therefore a fundamental error. There has been much heterodoxy in the Christian world at all times, and among these have been heresies denying the plainest and most serious truths which have been acknowledged by the great body of Christians since the Apostles.

All wrong notions in religion are ranked under the general name of heterodox. GOLDING.

Heterodoxies, false doctrines, yes, and heresies, may be propagated by prayer as well as preaching. BELL.

HIDEOUS, GHASTLY, GRIM, GRISLY.

HIDEOUS comes probably from hide, signifying fit only to be hidden from the view. GHASTLY signifies like a ghost. GRIM is in German grimm, fierce. GRISLY, from grizzle, signifies grizzled, or motley colored.

An unseemly exterior is characterized by these terms; but the hideous respects natural objects, and the ghastly more properly that which is supernatural, or what resembles it. A mask with monstrous grinning features looks hideous; a human form with a visage of death-like paleness is ghastly. The grim is applicable only to the countenance; dogs or wild beasts may look very grim: grisly refers to the whole form, but particularly to the color; as blackness or darkness has always something terrific in it, a grisly figure having a monstrous assemblage of dark color, is particularly calculated to strike terror. Hideous is applicable to objects of hearing also, as a hideous roar; but the rest to objects of sight only.

From the broad margin to the centre grew Shelves, rocks, and whirlpools, hideous to the view. FALCONER.

And Death
Grinn'd horribly a ghastly smile. MILTON.

Even hell's grim king Alcides' pow'r confess'd.
POPE.

All parts resound with tumults, complaints, and fears,
And grisly death in sundry shapes appears. POPE.

HIGH, TALL, LOFTY.

HIGH, in German hoch, comes from the Hebrew agag, to be high. TALL, in Welsh tal, from the Hebrew talal, to elevate. LOFTY is doubtless derived from lift, in the sense of lifted (v. To lift).

High is the term in most general use, which seems likewise in the most unqualified manner to express the idea of extension upward, which is common to them all. Whatever is tall and lofty is high, but everything is not tall or lofty which is high. Tall and lofty both designate a more than ordinary degree of height; but tall is peculiarly applicable to what shoots up or stands up in a perpendicular direction: while lofty is said of that which is extended in breadth as well as in height; that which is lifted up or raised by an accretion of matter or an expansion in the air. By this rule we say that a house is high, a chimney tall, a room lofty. With the high is associated no idea of what is striking; but the tall is coupled with the aspiring, or that which strives to out-top: the lofty is always coupled with the grand, and that which commands admiration.

High at their head he saw the chief appear,
And bold Merlon to excite their rear. Pope.
Prostrate on earth their beauteous bodies lay,
Like mountain fire, as tall and straight as they. Pope.

E'en now, O king! 'tis giv'n thee to destroy
The lofty tow'rs of wide-extended Troy. Pope.

High and lofty have a moral acceptance, but tall is taken in the natural sense only: high and lofty are applied to persons or what is personal, with the same difference in degree as before: a lofty title or lofty pretension conveys more than a high title or a high pretension. Men of high rank should have high ideas of virtue and personal dignity, and keep themselves clear from everything low and mean: a lofty ambition often soars too high to serve the purpose of its possessor, whose fall is the greater when he finds himself compelled to descend.

When you are tried in scandal's court,
Stand high in honor, wealth, or wit,
All others who inferior sit
Conceive themselves in conscience bound
To join and drag you to the ground. Swift.
Without thee, nothing lofty can I sing;
Come then, and with thyself thy genius bring. Dryden.

TO HINDER, PREVENT, IMPEDE, OBSTRUCT.

HINDER, from hind or behind, signifies to pull or cause to be behind. PREVENT, from præ and venio, to come before, signifies to hinder by coming before, or to cross another by the anticipation of his purpose. IMPEDE, from in and pedes, signifies to come between a person's feet and entangle him in his progress. OBSTRUCT, from ob and struo, signifies to set up something in his way, to block the passage.

Hinder is the most general of these terms, as it conveys little more than the idea which is common to them all, namely, that of keeping one from his purpose. To hinder is commonly said of that which is rendered impracticable only for the time being, or merely delayed; prevent is said of that which is rendered altogether impracticable. A person is hindered by the weather and his various engagements from reaching a place at the time he intended; he is prevented but not hindered by ill health from going thither at all. If a friend calls, he hinders me from finishing the letter which I was writing; if I wish to prevent my son from reading any book I keep it out of his way. To hinder is an act of the moment, it supposes no design; prevent is a premeditated act, deliberated upon, and adopted for general purposes: the former is applied only to the movements of any particular individual, the latter to events and circumstances. I hinder a person who is running, if I lay hold of his arm and make him walk: it is the object of every good government to prevent offences rather than to punish offenders. In ordinary discourse these words fall very much into one another, when the circumstances of the case do not sufficiently define whether the action in hand be altogether suspended, or only suspended for a time; but the above explanation must make it very clear that to hinder, in its proper sense and application, is but to stop in the progress, and prevent to stop in the outset.

It is much easier to keep ourselves void of resentment than to restrain it from excess when it has gained admission. To use the illustration of an excellent author, we can prevent the beginnings of some things, whose progress afterward we cannot hinder. Holland.

To impede and obstruct are a species of hindering which is said rather of things than of persons: hinder is said of both; but hinder is commonly employed in regard to trifling matters, or such as retard a person's proceedings in the smallest degree; impede and obstruct are acts of greater importance, or produce a still greater degree of delay. A person is hindered in his work, although neither impeded nor obstructed; but the quantity of artillery and baggage which is attached to an army will greatly impede it in its march; and the trees which are thrown across the roads will obstruct its march. Hinderances always suppose the agency of a person, either of the one who hinders, or the one who is hindered: but impediments and obstructions may be employed with regard to the operations of nature on inanimate objects. Cold impedes the growth of plants; a dam obstructs the course of water.

I am not gamesome; I do lack some part
Of that quick spirit that is in Anthony;
Let me not hinder, Cassius, your desires.
I'll leave you. SHAKESPEARE.

Truth was provoked to see herself thus baffled and impeded by an enemy whom she looked on with contempt. JOHNSON.

This path you say is hid in endless night,
'Tis self-conceit alone obstructs your sight.
JANNA.

TO HINDER, STOP.

HINDER (v. To hinder) refers solely to the prosecution of an object: STOP, signifying to make to stand, refers simply to the cessation of motion; we may be hindered, therefore, by being stopped; but we may also be hindered without being expressly stopped, and we may be stopped without being hindered. If the stoppage do not interfere with any other object in view, it is a stoppage, but not a hinderance; as when we are stopped by a friend while walking for pleasure: but if stopped by an idler in the midst of urgent business, so as not to be able to proceed according to our business, this is both a stoppage and a hinderance: on the other hand, if we are interrupted in the regular course of our proceeding, but not compelled to stand still or give up our business for any time, this may be a hinderance, but not a stoppage: in this manner, the conversation of others in the midst of our business may considerably retard its progress, and so far hinder, but not expressly put a stop to, the whole concern.

Is it not the height of wisdom and goodness too to hinder the consummation of those soul-wasting sins, by obliging us to withstand them in their first infancy? SOUTH.

A signal omen stopp'd the passing host,
Their martial fury in their wonder lost. POPE.

TO HINT, SUGGEST, INTIMATE, INSINUATE.

HINT, v. To allude. SUGGEST, v. To allude. To INTIMATE is to make one intimate, or specially acquainted with, to communicate one's most inward thoughts. INSINUATE, from the Latin sinus, the bosom, is to introduce gently into the mind of another.

All these terms denote indirect expressions of what passes in one's own mind. We hint at a thing from fear and uncertainty; we SUGGEST a thing from prudence and modesty; we intimate a thing from indecision; a thing is insinuated from artifice. A person who wants to get at the certain knowledge of any circumstance hints at it frequently in the presence of those who can give him the information; a man who will not offend others by an assumption of superior wisdom suggests his ideas on a subject, instead of setting them forth with confidence; when a person's mind is not made up on any future action, he only intimates what may be done; he who has anything offensive to communicate to another, will choose to insinuate it, rather than declare it in express terms. Hints are thrown out; they are frequently characterized as broken: suggestions are offered; they are frequently termed idle or ill-grounded: intimations are given, and are either slight or broad: insinuations are thrown out; they are commonly designated as slanderous, malignant, and the like.

Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike. POPE.

We must suggest to the people, in what hatred
He still hath held them. SHAKESPEARE.

'Tis Heav'n itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man. ADDISON.

He had so subtle a way of interrogating, and, under the notions of doubts, insinuating his objections, that he infused his own opinions into those from whom he pretended to learn and receive them. CLARENDON.

To hint is taken either in a bad or an indifferent sense; it is commonly resorted to by tale-bearers, mischief-makers, and all who want to talk of more than they know. To suggest is oftener used in the good than the bad sense: as to suggest doubts, queries, difficulties, or improvements in matters of opinion, is truly laudable, particularly for young persons; but to suggest anything to the disadvantage of another is even worse than to speak ill of him openly, for it bespeaks cowardice as well as ill-nature. To intimate is taken either in a good or an indifferent sense; it commonly passes between relatives or persons closely connected in the communication of their half-formed intentions or of doubtful intelligence; but to insinuate is always taken in a bad sense; it is the resource of an artful and malignant enemy to wound the reputation of another, whom he does not dare openly to accuse. A person is said to take a hint, to follow a suggestion, to receive an intimation, to disregard an insinuation.

It is a mistake to imagine that creeds were, at first, intended to teach in full and explicit terms all that should be necessary to be believed by Christians. They were designed rather for hints and minutes of the main "credoenda."

WATERLAND.

Avarice replied, that he looked upon Plenty (the first minister of his antagonist) to be a much more destructive counsellor than Poverty, for that he was perpetually suggesting pleasures.

ADDISON.

It was his saying, and it did him no good, that he was none of the reptilla, intimating that he could not creep on the ground, and that the court was not his element.

NAUNTON.

Let it not be thought that what is here said insinuates anything to the discredit of Greek and Latin criticism.

WARBURTON.

HIRELING, MERCENARY.

HIRELING, from hire, and MERCENARY, from merces, wages, are applied to any one who follows a sordid employment; but hireling may sometimes be taken in its proper and less reproachful sense, for one who is hired as a servant to perform an allotted work; but in general they are both reproachful epithets: the former having particular reference to the meanness of the employment, and the latter to the sordid character of the person. Hireling prints are those which are in the pay of a party; a mercenary principle will sometimes actuate men in the highest station.

It was not his carrying the bag which made Judas a thief and a hireling.

SOUTH.

These soldiers were not citizens, but mercenary, sordid deserters.

BURKE.

TO HOLD, KEEP, DETAIN, RETAIN.

HOLD, Saxon healden, Teutonic, etc., holden, like the Greek καλυμν, comes from the Hebrew col, to restrain. KEEP comes in all probability, like the Latin capio, to lay hold of, from the Hebrew capah, the hollow of the hand. DETAİN and RETAİN both come from the Latin teneo, to hold; the first signifies, by virtue of the particle de, to hold from another; the second, by virtue of the particle re, to hold back for one's self.

To hold is a physical act; it requires a degree of bodily strength, or at least the use of the limbs; to keep is simply to have by one at one's pleasure. The having in one's power so that it shall not go is the leading idea in the signification of hold; the durability of having is the leading idea in the word keep: we may hold a thing only for a moment; but what we keep we keep for a time. On the other hand, we may keep a thing by holding, although we may keep it by various other means: we may therefore hold without keeping, and we may keep without holding. A servant holds a thing in his hand for it to be seen, but he does not keep it; he gives it to his master, who puts it into his pocket, and consequently keeps, but does not hold it. A thing may be held in the hand, or kept in the hand; in the former case, the pressure of the hand is an essential part of the action, but in the latter case it is simply a contingent part of the action: the hand holds, but the person keeps it. What is held is fixed in position, but what is kept is left loose, or otherwise, at the will of the individual. Things are held by men in their hands, by beasts in their claws or mouths, by birds in their beaks; things are kept by people either about their persons or in their houses, according to convenience.

France, thou mayst hold a serpent by the tongue, A fasting tiger safer by the tooth,

Than keep in peace that hand which thou dost hold.

SHAKESPEARE.

Detain and retain are modes of keeping; the former signifies keeping back what belongs to another; the latter signifies keeping a long time for one's own purpose. A person may be either held, kept, detained, or retained: when he is held, he is held contrary to his will by the hand of another; as suspected persons are held by the officers of justice, that they may not make their escape: he is kept, if he stops in any place, by the desire of another; as a man is kept in prison until his innocence is proved; or a child is kept at school, until he has finished his education: he is detained if he be kept away from any place to which he is going, or from any person to whom he belongs; as the servant of another is detained to take back a letter; or one is detained by business, so as to be prevented attending to an appointment: a person is retained who is kept for a continuance in the service of another; as some servants are said to be retained, while others are dismissed.

Too late it was for satyr to be told
Or ever hope recover her again:
In vain he seeks, that having cannot hold.

SPENSER.

That I may know what keeps you here with me.

DRYDEN.

He has described the passion of Calypso, and the indecent advances she made to detain him from his country.

BROWNE.

Having the address to retain the conquest she had made, she kept possession of his love without any rival for many years.

ROBERTSON.

Things are held in the improper sense: they are kept, detained, and retained in the proper sense. A money-lender holds the property of others in pledge; the idea of a temporary and partial action is here expressed by hold, in distinction from keep, which is used to express something definite and permanent: the money-lender keeps the property as his own, if the borrower forfeits it by breach of contract. When a person purchases anything, he is expected to keep it, or pay the value of the thing ordered, if the tradesman fulfil his part of the engagement. What is detained is kept either contrary to the will, or without the consent, of the possessor: when things are suspected to be stolen, the officers have the right of detaining them until inquiry be instituted. What is retained is continued to be kept; it supposes, however, some alteration in the terms or circumstances under which it is kept: a person retains his seat in a coach, notwithstanding he finds it disagreeable: or a lady retains some of the articles of millinery, which are sent for her choice, but she returns the rest.

Assuredly it is more shame for a man to lose that which he holdeth than to fail in getting that which he never had.

HAYWARD.

This charge I keep until my appointed day
Of rendering up.

MILTON.

Haste! goddess, haste! the flying host detain,
Nor let one sail be hoisted on the main.

POPE.

Let me retain.

The name and all th' addition to a king.

SHAKESPEARE.

All are used in a moral application except detain; in this case they are marked by a similar distinction. A person is said to hold an office, by which simple possession is implied: he may hold it for a long or a short time, at the will of others, or by his own will, which are not marked: he keeps a situation, or he keeps his post, by which his continuance in the situation, or at the post, are denoted: but to say he retains his office, signifies that he might have given it up, or lost it, had he not been led to continue in it. In like manner, with regard to one's sentiments or feelings, a man is said to hold certain opinions, which are ascribed to him as a part of his creed; he keeps the opinions which no one can induce him to give up; he retains his old attachments, notwithstanding the lapse of years and change of circumstances which have intervened, and were naturally calculated to wean him from them.

It is a certain sign of a wise government, when it can hold men's hearts by hopes.

BACON.

The proof is best when men keep their authority toward their children, but not their purse.

BACON.

Ideas are retained by renovation of that impression which time is always wearing away.

JOHNSON.

TO HOLD, OCCUPY, POSSESS.

HOLD, v. To hold. OCCUPY, in Latin occupo, or oc and cipio, to hold or keep, so that it cannot be held by others, or fill a space, so that it cannot be filled by any other object. POSSESS, in Latin possideo, or potis and sedeo, signifies to sit as master of.

We hold a thing for a long or a short time; we occupy it for a permanence: we hold it for ourselves or others; we occupy it only for ourselves: we hold it for various purposes; we occupy only for the purpose of converting it to our private use. Thus a person may hold an estate, or, which is the same thing, the title-deeds to an estate, pro tempore, for another person's benefit; but he occupies an estate if he enjoys the fruit of it. On the other hand, to occupy is only to hold under a certain compact; but to possess is to hold as one's own. The tenant oc-occupies the farm when he holds it by a certain lease, and cultivates it for his subsistence: but the landlord possesses the farm, possessing the right to let it, and to receive the rent. We may hold by force, or fraud, or right; we occupy either by force or right; we possess only by right.

He (the eagle) drives them from his fort, the towering seat,
For ages, of his empire, which in peace
Unstain'd he holds. THOMSON.

If the title of occupier be good in a land unpeopled, why should it be bad accounted in a country peopled thinly? RALEIGH.

But now the feather'd youth their former bounds
Ardent disdain, and, weighing off their wings,
Demand the free possession of the sky. THOMSON.

Hence we say, figuratively, to hold a person in esteem or contempt, to occupy a person's attention or a place, or to possess one's affection.

I, as a stranger to my heart and me,
Hold thee from this forever. SHAKESPEARE.

He must assert infinite generations before that first deluge, and then the earth could not receive them, but the infinite bodies of men must occupy an infinite space. BENTLEY.

Of fortune's favor long possess'd,
He was in one fair daughter only bless'd. DRYDEN.

TO HOLD, SUPPORT, MAINTAIN.

HOLD (v. To hold, keep) is here, as in the former article, a term of very general import. SUPPORT (v. To countenance) and MAINTAIN (v. To assist, maintain) include the idea of holding with other collateral ideas in their signification.

Hold and support are employed in the proper sense, maintain in the improper sense. To hold is a term unqualified by any circumstance; we may hold a thing in any direction, hold it up or down, in a straight or oblique direction: support is a species of holding up; to hold up, however, is a personal act, or a direct effort of the individual; to support may be an indirect and a passive act; he who holds anything up keeps it in an upright posture by the exertion of his strength; he who supports a thing only bears its weight, or suffers it to rest upon himself: persons or voluntary agents can hold up; inanimate objects may support: a servant holds up a child that it may see; a pillar supports a building.

Oh who can hold a fire in his hand
By thinking on the frosty Caucasus?

SHAKESPEARE.

Man, like the gen'rous vine, supported lives,
The strength he gains is from the embrace he gives. POPE.

In the figurative application a person is said to hold power for himself, but to support the authority of another, or to have one's own mind supported by circumstances or reflections. To maintain is to hold firmly or with vigor.

The usurpation which, in order to subvert ancient institutions, has destroyed ancient principles, will hold power by arts similar to those by which it has acquired it. BURKE.

Nothing can support the minds of the guilty from drooping. SOUTH.

Who then is free? The wise, who well maintain

An empire o'er himself.

FRANCIS.

These terms are all applied to the opinions with a similar distinction. Opinions are held and maintained as one's own, they are supported when they are another's. We hold and maintain whatever we believe. We support the belief or doctrine of another, or what we ourselves have asserted and maintained at a former time. What is held is held by the act of the mind within itself, and as regards itself, without reference to others; but what is maintained and supported is openly declared to be held; it is maintained with others or against others; it is supported in an especial manner against others; it may be maintained by simple declaration or assertions; it is supported by argument.

It was a notable observation of a wise father, that those which held and persuaded pressure of consciences were commonly interested therein themselves for their own ends. BACON.

If any man of quality will maintain upon Edward Earl of Glo'ster that he is a manifold traitor, let him appear. SHAKESPEARE.

He supported the motion for the council of trade, in opposition to the court. BURNET.

What is held may be held by means of the affection, as to hold a person dear, or hold a thing in esteem; to maintain and support are applied only to speculative matters with which the understanding is engaged, as to maintain or support truth or error, to maintain or support a cause.

As Chaucer is the father of English poetry, so I hold him in the same degree of veneration as the Grecians held Homer, and the Romans Virgil. FORG.

HOLINESS, SANCTITY.

HOLINESS, which comes from the Northern languages, has altogether acquired a Christian signification; it respects the life and temper of a Christian. SANCTITY, which is derived from the Latin sanctus and sanctio, to sanction, has merely a moral signification, which it derives from the sanction of human authority.

Holiness is to the mind of a man what sanctity is to his exterior; with this difference, that holiness to a certain degree ought to belong to every man professing Christianity; but sanctity, as it lies in the manners, the outward garb, and deportment, is becoming only to certain persons, and at certain times. Holiness is a thing not to be affected; but sanctity, consisting in externals, is from its very nature exposed to falsehood. It is becoming those who fill a sacred office, but not otherwise.

Habitual preparation for the sacrament consists in a permanent habit or principle of holiness. SOUTH.

About an age ago, it was the fashion in England for every one that would be thought religious to throw as much sanctity as possible into his face. ADDISON.

HOLLOW, EMPTY.

HOLLOW, from hole, signifying like a hole, respects the body itself; the absence of its own materials produces hollowness. EMPTY (v. Empty) respects foreign bodies; their absence in another body constitutes emptiness. Hollowness is therefore a preparative to emptiness, and may exist independently of it; but emptiness presupposes the existence of hollowness: what is empty must be hollow; but what is hollow need not be empty. Hollowness is often the natural property of a body; emptiness is a contingent property: that which is hollow is destined by nature to contain; but that which is empty is deprived of its contents by a casualty: a nut is hollow for the purpose of receiving the fruit; it is empty if it contain no fruit.

They are both employed in a moral acceptance, and in a bad sense; the hollow, in this case, is applied to what ought to be solid or sound, and empty to what ought to be filled; a person is hollow whose goodness lies only at the surface, whose fair words are without meaning; a truce is hollow which is only an external cessation from hostilities: a person is empty who is without a requisite portion of understanding and knowledge; an excuse is empty which is unsupported by fact and reason; a pleasure is empty which cannot afford satisfaction.

He seem'd
For dignity compos'd, and high exploit,
But all was false and hollow. MILTON.

The creature man,
Condemn'd to sacrifice his childish years
To babbling ignorance and empty fears. PRIOR.

HOLY, PIOUS, DEVOUT, RELIGIOUS.

HOLY, v. Holiness. PIOUS, in Latin pius, which is most probably changed from dius or deus, signifies having a regard for the gods. DEVOUT, in Latin devotus, from devoveo, to engage by a vow, signifies devoted or consecrated. RELIGIOUS, in Latin religiosus, comes from religio and religo, to bind, because religion binds the mind, and produces in it a fixed principle.

A strong regard to the Supreme Being is expressed by all these epithets; but holy conveys the most comprehensive idea; pious and devout designate most fervor of mind; religious is the most general and abstract in its signification. A holy man is in all respects heavenly-minded; he is more fit for heaven than earth: holiness, to whatever degree it is possessed, abstracts the thoughts from sublunary objects, and fixes them on things that are above. Our Saviour was a perfect pattern of holiness; his apostles after him, and innumerable saints and good men, both in and out of the ministry, have striven to imitate his example, by the holiness of their life and conversation.

The holiest man, by conversing with the world, insensibly draws something of soil and taint from it. SOUTH.

Pious is a term more restricted in its signification, and consequently more extended in application than holy: piety is not a virtue peculiar to Christians, it is common to all believers in a Supreme Being; it is the homage of the heart and the affections to a superior Being: from a similarity in the relationship between a heavenly and an earthly parent, devotedness of the mind has in both cases been denominated piety. Piety toward God naturally produces piety toward parents; for the obedience of the heart, which gives rise to the virtue in the one case, seems instantly to dictate the exercise of it in the other. The difference between holiness and piety is obvious from this, that our Saviour and his apostles are characterized as holy, but not pious, because piety is swallowed up in holiness. On the other hand, Jew and Gentile, Christian and Heathen, are alike termed pious, when they cannot be called holy, because piety is not only a more practicable virtue, but because it is more universally applicable to the dependent condition of man.

In every age the practice has prevailed of substituting certain appearances of piety in the place of the great duties of humanity and mercy.

BLAIR.

Devotion is a species of piety peculiar to the worshipper; it bespeaks that devotedness of mind which displays itself in the temple, when the individual seems by his outward services solemnly to devote himself, soul and body, to the service of his Maker. Piety, therefore, lies in the heart, and need not appear externally; but devotion requires to be marked by some external observance: a man piously resigns himself to the will of God in the midst of his afflictions; he prays devoutly in the bosom of his family.

A state of temperance, sobriety, and justice, without devotion, is a lifeless, insipid condition of virtue.

ADDISON.

Religious is a term of less import than either of the other terms; it denotes little more than the simple existence of religion, or a sense of religion in the mind: the religious man is so, more in his principles than in his affections; he is religious in his sentiments, inasmuch as he directs all his views according to the will of his Maker; and he is religious in his conduct, inasmuch as he observes the outward formalities of homage that are due to his Maker.

A man should be religious, not superstitious.

ADDISON.

When applied to things, these terms preserve a similar distinction: we speak of the holy sacrament; of a pious discourse, a pious ejaculation; of a devout exercise, a devout air; a religious sentiment, a religious life, a religious education, and the like.

Devotion expresses not so much the performance of any particular duty, as the spirit which must animate all religious duties.

BLAIR.

HOLY, SACRED, DIVINE.

HOLY (v. Holiness) is here, as in the former article, a term of higher import than either SACRED, which is in Latin sacer, or DIVINE (v. Godlike). Whatever is most intimately connected with religion and religious worship, in its purest state, is holy, unhallowed by a mixture of inferior objects, and elevated in the greatest possible degree, so as to suit the nature of an infinitely perfect and exalted Being. Among the Jews, the holy of holies was that place which was intended to approach the nearest to the heavenly abode, consequently was preserved as much as possible from all contamination with that which is earthly: among the Christians, that religion or form of religion is termed holy which is esteemed purest in its doctrine, discipline, and ceremonies.

To fit us for a due access to the holy Sacrament, we must add actual preparation to habitual.

SOUTH.

Sacred is less than holy; the sacred derives its sanction from human institutions, and is connected rather with our moral than our religious duties; what is holy is altogether spiritual, and abstracted from the earthly. The laws are sacred, but not holy; a man's word should be sacred, though not holy: for neither of these things is to be revered, but both are to be kept free from injury or external violence. The holy is not so much opposed to, as it is set above, everything else; the sacred is opposed to the profane: the Scriptures are properly denominated holy, because they are the word of God, and the fruit of his Holy Spirit; but other writings may be termed sacred which appertain to religion, in distinction from the profane, which appertain only to worldly matters.

Religion properly consists in a reverential esteem of things sacred.

SOUTH.

Divine is a term of even less import than sacred; it signifies either belonging to a deity, or being like a deity; but from the looseness of its application it has lost in some respects the dignity of its meaning. The divine is often contrasted with the human: but there are many human things which are denominated divine: Milton's poem is entitled a divine poem, not merely on account of the subject, but from the exalted manner in which the poet has treated his subject: what is divine, therefore, may be so superlatively excellent as to be conceived of as having the stamp of inspiration from the Deity, which, of course, as it respects human performances, is but a hyperbolical mode of speech.

When a man resteth and assureth himself upon divine protection, he gathereth a force and faith which human nature in itself could not obtain.

BACON.

HOMAGE, FEALTY, COURT.

HOMAGE, in French homage, comes from homme, a man, signifying a man's, that is, an inferior's, act of acknowledging superiority. Homage, in the technical sense, was an oath taken, or a service performed, by the tenant to his lord, on being admitted to his land; or by inferior princes to a sovereign, whereby they acknowledged his sovereignty, and promised fidelity: in its extended and figurative sense, it comprehends any solemn mark of deference, by which the superiority of another is acknowledged. FEALTY, from the Norman feal, loyal, trusty, is a lower species of homage, consisting only of an oath; it was made formerly by tenants, who were bound thereby to personal service under the feudal system. COURT, which derives its meaning from the verb to court, woo, and seek favor, is a species of homage, complaisance, or deference, which is assumed for a specific purpose; it is not only voluntary, but depends upon the humor and convenience of the courtier.

Homage is paid or done to superior endowments; court is paid to the contingent, not the real, superiority of the individual. Fealty is figuratively employed in the sense of fidelity to one's sovereign.

Homage consists in any form of respect which is admitted in civil society; the Romans did homage to the talents of Virgil, by always rising when he entered the theatre; men do homage to the wisdom of another, when they do not venture to contradict his assertions, or call in question his opinions. Court is everything or nothing, as circumstances require; he who pays his court consults the will and humor of him to whom it is paid, while he is consulting his own interest.

We cannot avoid observing the homage which the world is constrained to pay to virtue. BLAIR.

Man disobeying,
Disloyal breaks his fealty. MILTON.

Virtue is the universal charm; even its shadow is courted. BLAIR.

HONESTY, PROBITY, UPRIGHTNESS, INTEGRITY.

HONESTY (v. Fair) is the most familiar and universal term; it is applied alike to actions and principles, to a mode of conduct or a temper of mind: a person may be honest, a principle honest, or an action honest; the other terms are applied to the person, as a person of probity, uprightness, and integrity: a man is said to be honest who, in his dealings with others, does not violate the laws; a servant is honest who does not take any of the property of his master, or suffer it to be taken; a tradesman is honest who does not sell bad articles; and people in general are denominated honest who pay what they owe, and do not adopt any methods of defrauding others.

The blunt, honest humor of the Germans sounds better in the roughness of the high Dutch, than it would in a politer tongue.

ADDISON.

Honesty is a negative virtue, all the other terms denote positive virtues and higher characteristics. PROBITY, from probus, good, and probo, to prove, signifying tried virtue or solid goodness, is applied not merely to the commercial dealings of men, but to all the concerns of life, where truth and goodness are called into exercise. Probity respects the rights of men, giving to every one his due, whether as regards his property, reputation, honor, or any other thing on which a value is set. Honesty is opposed to direct fraud, probity to any species of insincerity.

A compliment, as far as it deserves to be practised by a man of probity, is only the most civil and obliging way of saying what you mean.

ATTENBURY.

UPRIGHTNESS, from upright or up and right, signifies bearing up in a straight and undeviating course in opposition to every temptation which may offer. Uprightness, therefore, supposes an independent and positive principle which forms the rule of life. A person may be said to be upright in all situations where confidence and intelligence are required, but more particularly to a judge who scrupulously adheres to the dictates of an unbiassed conscience.

The steward, whose account is clear,
Demands his honor may appear;
His actions never shun the light;
He is, and would be, prov'd upright. GAY.

INTEGRITY, from integer, whole or sound, signifying soundness of principle, is applied, like uprightness, to cases where a particular trust is reposed; but integrity is taken absolutely, that is, without any reference to the outward circumstances which might tend to produce the contrary characteristic. He who faithfully discharges his trust, and consults the interests of others rather than his own, is justly styled a man of integrity. This virtue is to be looked for especially in those who fill any office.

He discharged all the offices he went through with great abilities and a singular reputation of integrity. CLARENDON.

HONESTY, HONOR.

THESE terms both respect the principle which actuates men in the adjustment of their rights with each other. The words are both derived from the same source, namely, the Hebrew hon, substance or wealth (v. Honesty), which, being the primitive source of esteem among men, became at length put for the measure or standard of esteem, namely, what is good. Hence HONESTY and HONOR are both founded upon what is estimable; with this difference, that honesty is confined to the first principles or laws upon which civil society is founded, and honor is an independent principle that extends to everything which by usage has been admitted as estimable or entitled to esteem. An honest action, therefore, can never reflect so much credit on the agent as an honorable action, since in the performance of the one he may be guided by motives comparatively low, whereas in the other case he is actuated solely by a fair regard for the honor or the esteem of others. To a breach of honesty is attached punishment and personal inconvenience in various forms; but to a breach of honor is annexed only disgrace or the ill opinion of others. On the other hand, since honesty is founded on the very first principles of human society, and honor on the incidental principles which have been annexed to them in the progress of time and culture; the former is positive and definite, and he who is actuated by this principle can never err; but the latter is indefinite and variable, and, as it depends upon opinion, it will easily mislead. We cannot have a false honesty, but we may have false honor. Honesty always keeps a man within the line of his duty; but a mistaken notion of what is honorable may carry a man very far from what is right, and may even lead him to run counter to common honesty.

Honesty, in the language of the Romans, as well as in French, rather signifies a composition of those qualities which generally acquire honor and esteem to those who possess them. TEMPLE.

With breathing brass to kindle fierce alarms,
And rouse to dare their fate in honorable arms. DAYDEN.

TO HONOR, REVERENCE, RESPECT.

THESE terms agree in expressing the act of an inferior toward his superior; but HONOR (v. Glory) expresses less than REVERENCE (v. To adore), and more than RESPECT (v. To esteem).

To honor is only an outward act; to reverence is either an act of the mind, or the outward expression of a sentiment; to respect is mostly an act of the mind, though it may admit of being expressed by some outward act. We honor God by adoration and worship, as well as by the performance of his will; we honor our parents by obeying them and giving them our personal service; we reverence our Maker by cherishing in our minds a dread of offending him, and making a fearful use of his holy name and word; we rev- erence our parents by holding a similar sentiment in a less degree.

This (honoring parents) is a duty in the fifth commandment required toward our prince and our parent: a respect which in the notion of it implies a mixture of love and fear, and in the object equally supposes goodness and power.

ROBERTS.

The foundation of every proper disposition toward God must be laid in reverence, that is, admiration mixed with awe.

BLAIR.

Establish your character on the respect of the wise, not on the flattery of dependents.

BLAIR.

To honor, when applied to things, is taken in the sense of holding in honor; and respect, to have respect toward, with the same distinction between them.

Of learning, as of virtue, it may be affirmed that it is at once honored and neglected.

JOHNSON.

The best gods do not love
Ungodly actions, but respect the right,
And in the works of pious men delight.

CHAPMAN.

HONOR, DIGNITY.

HONOR (v. Honor) may be taken either for that which intrinsically belongs to a person, or for that which is conferred on him. DIGNITY, from the Latin dignus, worthy, signifying worthiness, may be equally applied to what is extrinsic or intrinsic in a man.

In the first case honor has a reference to what is esteemed by others; dignity to that which is esteemed by ourselves: a sense of honor impels a man to do that which is esteemed honorable among men; a sense of dignity to do that which is consistent with the worth and greatness of his nature: the former impels a man to elevate himself as an individual; the latter to raise himself to the standard of his species: the former may lead a person astray; but the latter is an unerring guide. It is honor which makes a man draw his sword upon his friend: it is dignity which makes him despise every paltry affront from others, and apologize for every apparent affront on his own part. This distinction between the terms is kept up in their application to what is extraneous of a man: honor is that which is conferred on him by others; but dignity is the worth or value which is added to his condition: hence we always speak of honors as conferred or received; but dignities as possessed or maintained. Honors may sometimes be casual; but dignities are always permanent: an act of condescension from the sovereign is an honor; but the dignity is that which exalts the man. Hence it is that honors are mostly civil or political; dignities may also be ecclesiastical.

When a proud, aspiring man meets with honor and preferments, these are the things which are ready to lay hold of his heart and affections.

DRYDEN.

HOPE, EXPECTATION, TRUST, CONFIDENCE.

ANTICIPATION of futurity is the common idea expressed by all these words. HOPE, in Saxon hopian, Dutch hoopen, is in all probability derived from the same root as the Greek ορεω, to look at with pleasure. Hope is that which is welcome; EXPECTATION (v. To await) is either welcome or unwelcome: we hope only for that which is good; we expect the bad as well as the good. In bad weather we hope it will soon be better; but in a bad season we expect a bad harvest, and in a good season a good harvest. Hope is simply a presentiment; it may vary in degree, more according to the temper of the mind than the nature of the circumstances; some hope where there is no ground for hope, and others despair where they might hope: expectation is a conviction that excludes doubt; we expect in proportion as that conviction is positive: we hope that which may be or can possibly be; we expect that which must be or which ought to be. The young man hopes to live many years; the old man expects to die in a few years.

Regions of sorrow, doleful shades, where peace
And rest can never dwell; hope never comes,
That comes to all.

MILTON.

All these within the dungeon's depth remain,
Despairing pardon, and expecting pain.

DRYDEN.

Hope and expectation consist in looking for some good, TRUST (v. Belief) and CONFIDENCE (v. To confide) in a person or thing to bring about the good. We may, therefore, have either hope or expectation grounded on trust or confidence, or we may have them where there is no room for either trust or confidence; a person may hope that something good may turn up because the future is uncertain; we may expect that it will rain to-day; a person may trust to the skill of another, or confide in his promises. Trust and confidence denote the same sentiment, but trust is applied to objects generally, confidence to particular objects; we may trust partially, but we confide entirely; we may trust strangers, we confide in friends or those we are partial to.

I am not settled yet in any stable condition, but lie wind-bound in the cape of good hope, expecting some gentle gale to launch out into an employment. HOWELL.

Our country's gods, in whom our trust we place. DRYDEN.

So Eden was a scene of harmless sport,
Where kindness on his part who ruled the whole
Begot a tranquil confidence in all. COWPER.

Trust and confidence may both be applied to a man's self, or that which belongs to him, with a similar distinction.

They trust in armies, and their courage dies,
In wisdom, wealth, in fortune, and in lies.
But all they trust in withers, as it must,
When he commands, in whom they put no trust. COWPER.

His pride
Humbled by such rebuke, so far beneath
His confidence to equal God in pow'r. MILTON.

HOT, FIERY, BURNING, ARDENT.

THESE terms characterize either the presence of heat or the cause of heat. HOT, in German heiss, Latin æstus, from the Hebrew ash, fire, is the general term which marks simply the presence of heat; FIERY, i. e., having fire, goes further, it denotes the presence of fire which is the cause of heat; BURNING, i. e., in a state of burning, denotes the action of fire, and consequently is more expressive than the two; ARDENT (v. Fervor), which is literally the same in signification, is employed either in poetry or in application to moral objects: a room is hot; a furnace or the tail of a comet fiery; a coal burning; the sun ardent.

In the figurative application, a temper is said to be hot or fiery; rage is burning; the mind is ardent in pursuit of an object. Zeal may be hot, fiery, burning, and ardent; but in the first three cases it denotes the intemperance of the mind when heated by religion or politics; the latter is admissible so long as it is confined to a good object.

Let loose the raging elements. Breath'd hot
From all the boundless furnace of the sky,
And the wide, glittering waste of burning sand,
A suffocating wind the pilgrim smites
With instant death. THOMSON.

E'en the camel feels,
Shot through his wither'd heart, the fiery blast. THOMSON.

The royal eagle draws his vigorous young,
Strong pounc'd, and ardent with paternal fire. THOMSON.

HOWEVER, YET, NEVERTHELESS, NOTWITHSTANDING.

THESE conjunctions are in grammar termed adversative, because they join sentences together that stand more or less in opposition to each other. HOWEVER is the most general and indefinite; it serves as a conclusive deduction drawn from the whole. "The truth is, however, not yet all come out;" by this is understood that much of the truth has been told, and much yet remains to be told: so likewise in similar sentences; "I am not, however, of that opinion;" where it is implied either that many hold the opinion, or much may be said of it, but be that as it may, I am not of that opinion: "however, you may rely on my assistance to that amount;" that is, at all events, let whatever happen, you may rely on so much of my assistance: however, as is obvious from the above examples, connects not only one single proposition, but many propositions either expressed or understood. YET, NEVERTHELESS, and NOTWITHSTANDING, are mostly employed to set two specific propositions either in contrast or direct opposition to each other; the latter two are but species of the former, pointing out the opposition in a more specific manner.

There are cases in which yet is peculiarly proper; others in which nevertheless, and others in which notwithstanding is preferable. Yet bespeaks a simple contrast; "Addison was not a good speaker, yet he was an admirable writer; Johnson was a man of uncouth manners, yet he had a good heart and a sound head;" nevertheless and notwithstanding could not in these cases have been substituted. Nevertheless and notwithstanding are mostly used to imply effects or consequences opposite to what might naturally be expected to result. "He has acted an unworthy part; nevertheless I will be a friend to him as far as I can;" that is, although he has acted an unworthy part, I will be no less his friend as far as lies in my power. "Notwithstanding all I have said, he still persists in his own imprudent conduct;" that is, all I have said notwithstanding or not restraining him from it, he still persists. "He is still rich notwithstanding his loss;" that is, his loss notwithstanding, or not standing in the way of it, he is still rich. From this resolution of the terms, more than from any specific rule, we may judge of their distinct applications, and clearly perceive that in such cases as those above cited the conjunctions nevertheless and notwithstanding could not be substituted for each other, nor yet for either: in other cases, however, where the objects are less definitely pointed out, they may be used indifferently. "The Jesuits piqued themselves always upon their strict morality, and yet (notwithstanding or nevertheless) they admitted of many things not altogether consonant with moral principle. You know that these are but tales, yet (notwithstanding, nevertheless) you believe them."

However, it is but just sometimes to give the world a representation of the bright side of human nature. HUME.

He had not that reverence for the queen as might have been expected from a man of his wisdom and breeding; yet he was impudently solicitous to know what her majesty said of him in private. CLARENDON.

There will always be something that we shall wish to have finished, and be nevertheless unwilling to begin. JOHNSON.

Notwithstanding there is such infinite room between man and his Maker for the creative power to exert itself in, it is impossible that it should ever be filled up. ADDISON.

HUMAN, HUMANE.

THOUGH both derived from homo, a man, they are thus far distinguished that HUMAN is said of the genus, and HUMANE of the species. The human race or human beings are opposed to the irrational part of the creation; a humane race or a humane individual is opposed to one that is cruel and fond of inflicting pain. He who is not human is divested of the first and distinguishing characteristics of his kind; he who is not humane, of the most important and elevated characteristic that belongs to his nature.

Christianity has rescued human nature from that ignominious yoke under which in former times the one-half of mankind groaned. BLAIR.
Life, all'd with grief's distressful train,
Forever asks the tear humane. LANGENS.

HUMBLE, LOWLY, LOW.

HUMBLE (v. Humble, modest) is here compared with the other terms as it respects both persons and things. A person is said to be humble on account of the state of his mind: he is said to be LOWLY and LOW either on account of his mind or his outward circumstances. A humble person is so in his principles and in his conduct; a lowly person is so in the tone of his feelings, or in his station and walk of life; a low person is so either in his sentiments, in his actions, or in his rank and condition; but persons may sometimes be low from particular circumstances who are not low in condition. Humility should form a part of the character, as it is opposed to arrogance and assumption; it is most consistent with the fallibility of our nature. Lowliness should form a part of our temper, as it is opposed to an aspiring and lofty mind; it is most consistent with the temper of our Saviour, who was meek and lowly of mind.

Sleep is a god too proud to wait in palaces,
And yet so humble too as not to scorn
The meanest country cottages. COWLEY.

Where purple violets lurk,
With all the lowly children of the shade. THOMSON.

The humble and lowly are always taken in a good sense; but the low either in a bad or an indifferent sense. A lowly man, whether as it respects his mind or his condition, is so without any moral debasement; but a man who is low in his condition is likewise conceived to be low in his habits and his sentiments, which is being near akin to the vicious. The same distinction is preserved in applying these terms to inanimate or spiritual objects. A humble roof, a humble office, a humble station, are associated with the highest moral worth; while a low office, a low situation, a low birth, seem to exclude the idea of worth.

The example of the heavenly lark,
Thy fellow-poet, Cowley, mark;
Above the skies let thy proud music sound,
Thy humble nest build upon the ground. COWPER.

To be worst,
The lowest, most dejected thing of fortune,
Stands still in esperance. SHAKESPEARE.

HUMBLE, MODEST, SUBMISSIVE.

THESE terms designate a temper of mind the reverse of self-conceit or pride. The HUMBLE, in Latin humilis, low, from humus, the ground, signifying the lowest position, is so with regard to ourselves or others. MODESTY (v. Modest) is that which respects ourselves only: SUBMISSIVENESS, from submissus, signifying put under, is that which respects others. A man is humble from a sense of his comparative inferiority to others in point of station and outward circumstances; or he is humble from a sense of his imperfections, and a consciousness of not being what he ought to be: he is modest, inasmuch as he sets but little value on his qualifications, acquirements, and endowments. Humility is a painful sentiment; for when it respects others it is coupled with fear, when it respects our own unworthiness it is coupled with sorrow: modesty is a peaceful sentiment; it serves to keep the whole mind in due bounds. When humility and modesty show themselves in the outward conduct, the former bows itself down, the latter shrinks: a humble man gives freely to others from a sense of their desert; a modest man demands nothing for himself, from an unconsciousness of desert in himself.

In God's holy house I prostrate myself in the humblest and dearest way of genuflection I can imagine. HOWELL.

Sedition itself is modest in the dawn, and only toleration may be petitioned where nothing less than empire is designed. SOUTH.

Between humble and submissive there is this prominent feature of distinction, that the former marks a temper of mind, the latter a mode of action: the former is therefore often the cause of the latter, but not so always; we may be submissive because we are humble; but we may likewise be submissive from fear, from interested motives, from necessity, from duty, and the like: and on the other hand, we may be humble without being submissive, when we are not brought into connection with others. A man is humble in his closet when he takes a review of his sinfulness: he is submissive to a master whose displeasure he dreads.

She should be humble who would please,
And she must suffer who can love. PRIOR.

And potent rajahs, who themselves preside

SOMERVILLE.

TO HUMBLE, HUMILIATE, DEGRADE.

HUMBLE and HUMILIATE are both drawn from the same source (v. Humble, modest). DEGRADE, v. To abase.

Humble is commonly used as the act either of persons or things: a person may humble himself or he may be humbled: humiliate is employed to characterize things; a thing is humiliating or a humiliation. No man humbles himself by the acknowledgment of a fault; but it is a great humiliation for a person to be dependent on another for a living when he has it in his power to obtain it for himself.

Deep horror seizes ev'ry human breast,
Their pride is humbled, and their fear confess'd.
DRYDEN.

A long habit of humiliation does not seem a very good preparative to manly and vigorous sentiments. BURKE.

To humble is to bring down to the ground; it supposes a certain eminence, either created by the mind, or really existing in the outward circumstances; to degrade is to set down lower; it supposes steps for ascending or descending. He who is most elevated in his own esteem may be most humbled; misfortunes may humble the proudest conqueror: he who is most elevated in the esteem of others may be the most degraded; envy is ever on the alert to degrade. A lesson in the school of adversity is humbling to one who has known nothing but prosperity: terms of peace are humiliating: low vices are peculiarly degrading to a man of rank.

The mistress of the world, the seat of empire,
The nurse of heroes, the delight of gods,
That humbled the proud tyrants of the earth.
ADDISON.

Who but a tyrant (a name expressive of everything which can vitiate and degrade human nature) could think of seizing on the property of men unaccused and unheard?
BURKE.

HUMOR, TEMPER, MOOD.

HUMOR literally signifies moisture or fluid, in which sense it is used for the fluids of the human body; and as far as these humors or their particular state is connected with, or has its influence on, the animal spirits and the moral feelings, so far is humor applicable to moral agents. TEMPER (v. Disposition) is less specific in its signification; it may with equal propriety, under the changed form of temperament, be applicable to the general state of the body or the mind. MOOD, which is but a change from mode or manner, has an original signification not less indefinite than the former; it is applied, however, only to the mind. As the humors of the body are the most variable parts of the animal frame, humor in regard to the mind denotes but a partial and transitory state when compared with the temper, which is a general and habitual state. The humor is so fluctuating that it varies in the same mind perpetually; but the temper is so far confined that it always shows itself to be the same whenever it shows itself at all: the humor makes a man different from himself; the temper makes him different from others. Hence we speak of the humor of the moment; of the temper of youth or of old age: so likewise we say, to accommodate one's self to the humor of a person; to manage his temper: to put one into a certain humor; to correct or sour the temper. Humor is not less partial in its nature than in its duration; it fixes itself often on only one object, or respects only one particular direction of the feelings: temper extends to all the actions and opinions as well as feelings of a man: it gives a coloring to all he says, does, thinks, and feels. We may be in a humor for writing or reading; for what is gay or what is serious; for what is noisy or what is quiet: but our temper is discoverable in our daily conduct; we may be in a good or ill humor in company, but in domestic life and in our closest relations we show whether we are good or ill tempered. A man shows his humor in different or trifling actions; he shows his temper in the most important actions: it may be a man's humor to sit while others stand, or to go unshaven while others shave; but he shows his temper as a Christian or otherwise in forgiving injuries or harboring resentments; in living peaceably, not indulging himself in contentions.

When I am in a serious humor, I very often walk by myself in Westminster Abbey, where the gloominess of the place, and the use to which it is applied, are apt to fill the mind with a kind of melancholy. SPECTATOR.

In the great articles of life, a man's convictions ought to be very strong, and, if possible, so well-timed that worldly advantages may have no share in it (change of opinion), for mankind will be ill-natured enough to think he does not change sides out of principle, but either out of levity of temper or prospects of interest. SPECTATOR.

When applied to bodies of men, humor, as denoting a temporary or fluctuating feeling, is more commonly used than temper.

Both Houses of Parliament seemed to have no eyes but for the dangers of popery, which humor was blown up by all the arts and intrigues of the Duke of Monmouth and Lord Shaftesbury. TEMPLE.

Humor and mood agree in denoting a particular and temporary state of feeling; but they differ in the cause: the former being attributable rather to the physical state of the body; and the latter to the moral frame of the mind; the former, therefore, is independent of all external circumstances, or at all events of any that are reducible to system; the latter is guided entirely by events, or the view which the mind takes of events. Humor is therefore generally taken in a bad sense, unless actually qualified by some epithet to the contrary: mood is always taken in an indifferent sense. There is no calculating on the humor of a man; it depends upon his mood whether he performs ill or well: it is necessary to suppress humor in a child; we discover by the melancholy mood of a man that something distressing has happened to him.

He was slave to no passion, indulged no humor, unless that of regularity may be called a humor, which he observed to excess. CUMBERLAND.

Strange as it may seem, the most ludicrous lines I ever wrote have been written in the saddest mood. COWPER.

HUMOR, CAPRICE.

HUMOR (v. Humor) is general, CAPRICE (v. Fantastical) is particular: hu- mor may be good or bad; caprice is always taken in a bad sense. Humor is always independent of fixed principle; it is the feeling or impulse of the moment: caprice is always opposed to fixed principle, or rational motives of acting; it is the feeling of the individual setting at naught all rule, and defying all reason. The feeling only is perverted when the humor predominates; the judgment and will are perverted by caprice; a child shows its humor in fretfulness and impatience; a man betrays his caprice in his intercourse with others, in the management of his concerns, or in the choice of his amusements.

You'll ask me, why I rather choose to have
A weight of carrion flesh, than to receive
Three thousand ducats; I'll not answer that,
But say, it is my humor. SHAKESPEARE.

Men will submit to any rule by which they may be exempted from the tyranny of caprice and chance. JOHNSON.

Indulgence renders children and subordinate persons humorsome; prosperity or unlimited power is apt to render a man capricious: a humorsome person commonly objects to be pleased, or is easily displeased; a capricious person likes and dislikes, approves and disapproves the same thing in quick succession.

I am glad that though you are incredulous you are not humorsome too. GOODMAN.

A subject ought to suppose that there are reasons, although he be not apprised of them, otherwise he must tax his prince of capriciousness, inconstancy, or ill design. SWIFT.

HUMORSOME, HUMOROUS, CAPRICIOUS.

Humor, when applied to things, has the sense of wit, whence the distinction between humorsome and humorous: the former implying the existence of humor or perverted feeling in the person; the latter implying the existence of humor or wit in the person or thing. Caprice is improperly applied to things to designate their total irregularity and planlessness of proceeding; as, in speaking of fashion, we notice its caprice, when that which has been laid aside is again taken into use; diseases are termed capricious which act in direct opposition to all established rule.

Thy humorous vein, thy pleasing folly,
Lies all neglected, all forgot,
And pensive, wayward melancholy,
Thou dread'st and hop'st thou know'st not what. PRIOR.

Does it imply that our language is in its nature irregular and capricious? LOWTH.

HUNT, CHASE.

THE leading idea in the word HUNT is that of searching after; the leading idea in the word CHASE is that of driving away, or before one. In a strict sense, hunt denotes a search for objects not within sight; chase is a pursuit after such objects only as are within sight: we may hunt, therefore, without chasing; we may chase without hunting: a person hunts after, but does not chase that which is lost: a boy chases, but does not hunt a butterfly. When applied to field-sports, the hunt commences as soon as the huntsman begins to look for the game; the chase commences as soon as it is found: on this ground, perhaps, it is that hunt is used, in familiar discourse, to designate the specific act of taking this amusement; and chase is used only in particular cases where the peculiar idea is to be expressed: a fox-hunt, or a stag-hunt, is said to take place on a particular day; or that there has been no hunting this season, or that the hunt has been very bad: but we speak, on the other hand, of the pleasures of the chase; or that the chase lasted very long; the animal gave a long chase.

Come hither, boy! we'll hunt to-day
The bookworm, ravening beast of prey. PARNELL.

Greatness of mind and fortune too
Th' Olympic trophies show;
Both their several parts must do
In the noble chase of fame. COWLEY.

HURTFUL, PERNICIOUS, NOXIOUS, NOISOME.

BETWEEN HURTFUL, signifying full of hurt, and PERNICIOUS (v. Destructive) there is the same distinction as between hurting and destroying: that which is hurtful may hurt in various ways; but that which is pernicious necessarily tends to destruction: confinement is hurtful to the health: bad company is pernicious to the morals; or the doctrines of free-thinkers are pernicious to the well-being of society. NOXIOUS and NOISOME, from noceo, to hurt, are species of the hurtful: things may be hurtful both to body and mind; noxious and noisome only to the body: that which is noxious inflicts a direct injury; that which is noisome inflicts it indirectly: noxious insects are such as wound; noisome vapors are such as tend to create disorders.

The powers I have were given me to my cost.

HYPOCRITE, DISSEMBLER.

HYPOCRITE, in Greek υποκριτης, from υπο and κρινωμαι, signifies one appearing under a mask. DISSEMBLER, from dissemble, in Latin dissimulo or dis and similis, signifies one who makes himself appear unlike what he really is.

The hypocrite feigns to be what he is not; the dissembler conceals what he is: the former takes to himself the credit of virtues which he has not; the latter conceals the vices that he has; every hypocrite is a dissembler; but every dissembler is not a hypocrite: the hypocrite makes truth serve the purpose of falsehood; the dissembler is content with making falsehood serve his own particular purpose.

In regard to others, hypocrisy is not so pernicious as barefaced irreligion.

ADDISON.

So spake the false dissembler unperceived.

IDEA, THOUGHT, IMAGINATION.

IDEA, in Latin idea, in Greek ειδα, signifies the form or image of an object, from ειδω, to see, that is, the thing seen in the mind. THOUGHT literally signifies the thing thought. IMAGINATION signifies the thing imagined.

The idea is the simple representation of an object; the thought is the reflection; and the imagination is the combination of ideas: we have ideas of the sun, the moon, and all material objects; we have thoughts on moral subjects; we have imaginations drawn from the ideas already existing in the mind. Ideas are formed; they are the rude materials with which the thinking faculty exerts itself: thoughts arise in the mind by means of association and combination, or recur in the mind by the power of the memory; they are the materials with which the thinking faculty employs itself: imaginations are created by the mind's reaction on itself; they are the materials with which the understanding seeks to enrich itself. The term idea is used in all cases for the mental representation, abstractedly from the agent that represents them: hence ideas are either clear or distinct; ideas are attached to words; ideas are analyzed, confounded, and the like; in which cases the word thought could not be substituted. Thought belongs only to thinking and rational beings: the brutes may be said to have ideas, but not thoughts: hence thoughts are either mean, fine, grovelling, or sublime, according to the nature of the mind in which they exist: hence we say with more propriety, to indulge a thought than to indulge an idea; to express one's thoughts, rather than one's ideas, on any subject: although the latter term idea, on account of its comprehensive use, may, without violation of any express rule, be indifferently employed in general discourse for thought; but the former term does not on this account lose its characteristic meaning. Imagination is not only the fruit of thought, but of peculiar thought: the thought may be another's: the imagination is one's own: the thought occurs and recurs; it comes and it goes; it is retained or rejected at the pleasure of the thinking being: the imagination is framed by the power which we term imagination; it is cherished with the partiality of a parent for its offspring. Thoughts are busied with the surrounding objects; imaginations are employed on distant and strange objects: hence thoughts are denominated sober, chaste, and the like; imaginations, wild and extravagant.

Every one finds that many of the ideas which he desired to retain have slipped away irretrievably.

ROWE.

TEMPLE.

IDEAL, IMAGINARY.

IDEAL does not strictly adhere to the sense of its primitive idea (v. Idea): the idea is the representation of a real object in the mind; but ideal signifies belonging to the idea independently of the reality or the external object. IMAGINARY preserves the signification of its primitive imagination (v. Fancy, also v. Idea), as denoting what is created by the mind itself. The ideal is not directly opposed to, but abstracted from, the real; the imaginary, on the other hand, is directly opposed to the real; it is the unreal thing formed by the imagination. Ideal happiness is the happiness which is formed in the mind without having any direct and actual prototype in nature; but it may, nevertheless, be something possible to be realized; it may be above nature, but not in direct contradiction to it: the imaginary is that which is opposite to some positive existing reality; the pleasure which a lunatic derives from the conceit of being a king is altogether imaginary.

There is not, perhaps, in all the stores of ideal anguish, a thought more painful than the consciousness of having propagated corruption.

JOHNSON.

Superior beings know well the vanity of those imaginary perfections that swell the heart of man.

ADDISON.

IDLE, LAZY, INDOLENT.

IDLE is in German eitel, vain. LAZY, in German lässig, is connected with the Latin lassus, weary, because weariness naturally engenders laziness. INDOLENT, in Latin indolens, signifies without feeling, having apathy or unconcern.

A propensity to inaction is the common idea by which these words are connected; they differ in the cause and degree of the quality: idle expresses less than lazy, and lazy less than indolent: one is termed idle who will do nothing useful; one is lazy who will do nothing at all without great reluctance; one is indolent who does not care to do anything or set about anything. There is no direct inaction in the idler; for a child is idle who will not learn his lesson, but he is active enough in that which pleases himself: there is an aversion to corporeal action in a lazy man, but not always to mental action; he is lazy at work, lazy in walking, or lazy in sitting; but he may not object to any employment, such as reading or thinking, which leaves his body entirely at rest: an indolent man, on the contrary, fails in activity from a defect both in the mind and the body; he will not only not move, but he will not even think, if it give him trouble; and trifling exertions of any kind are sufficient, even in prospect, to deter him from attempting to move.

As pride is sometimes hid under humility, idleness is often covered by turbulence and hurry.

JOHNSON.

Wicked condemned men will ever live like rogues: and not fail to work, but he lazy and spend victuals.

BACON.

Nothing is so opposite to the true enjoyment of life as the relaxed and feeble state of an indolent mind.

BLAIR.

Lazy is figuratively applied to other objects.

The daw.

The rook, and magpie, to the gray-grown oaks,
That the calm village in their verdant arms
Sheltering embrace, direct their lazy flight.

THOMSON.

Idle is also applied to things in the sense of leisure and vanity, for which see the next articles.

IDLE, LEISURE, VACANT.

IDLE (v. Idle) is opposed here to the busy; LEISURE, otherwise spelled leisure, from lease, as in the compound release, and the Latin laxo, to make lax or loose, that is, loosed or set free, is opposed simply to the employed: he, therefore, who is idle, instead of being busy, commits a fault; which is not always the case with him who is at leisure or free from his employment. Idle is always taken in a sense more or less unfavorable; leisure in a sense perfectly indifferent: if a man says of himself that he has spent an idle hour in this or that place, in amusement, company, and the like, he means to signify he would have spent it better if anything had offered; on the other hand, he would say that he spends his leisure moments in a suitable relaxation: he who values his time will take care to have as few idle hours as possible; but since no one can always be employed in severe labor, he will occupy his leisure hours in that which best suits his taste.

Life is sustained with so little labor, that the tediousness of idle time cannot otherwise be supported (than by artificial desires). JOHNSON.

The plant that shoots from seed, a sullen tree,
At leisure grows, for late posterity. DRYDEN.

Idle and leisure are said in particular reference to the time that is employed; VACANT (v. Free) is a more general term, that simply qualifies the thing: an idle hour is one without any proper employment; a vacant hour is in general one free from the employments with which it might be filled up; a person has leisure time according to his wishes; but he may have vacant time from necessity, that is, when he is in want of employment.

Idleness dictates expedients by which life may be passed unprofitably, without the tediousness of many vacant hours. JOHNSON.

IDLE, VAIN.

THESE epithets are both opposed to the solid or substantial; but IDLE (v. Idle, lazy) has a more particular reference to what ought or ought not to engage the time or attention; VAIN, in Latin vanus, probably changed from vacans, signifying empty, seems to qualify the thing without any such reference. A pursuit may be termed either idle or vain: in the former case, it reflects immediately on the agent for not employing his time on something more serious; but in the latter case it simply characterizes the pursuit as one that will be attended with no good consequences: when we consider ourselves as beings who have but a short time to live, and that every moment of that time ought to be thoroughly well-spent, we should be careful to avoid all idle concerns; when we consider ourselves as rational beings, who are responsible for the use of those powers with which we have been invested by our Almighty Maker, we shall be careful to reject all vain concerns: an idle effort is made by one who does not care to exert himself for any useful purpose, who works only to please himself; a vain effort may be made by one who is in a state of desperation.

And let no spot of idle earth be found,
But cultivate the genius of the ground.

DRYDEN.

Deluded by vain opinions, we look to the advantages of fortune as our ultimate goods.

BLAIR.

IGNORANT, ILLITERATE, UNLEARNED, UNLETTERED.

IGNORANT, in Latin ignorans, from the privative ig or in and noro, or the Greek γινωσκω, signifies not knowing things in general, or not knowing any particular circumstance. UNLEARNED, ILLITERATE, and UNLETTERED, are compared with ignorant in the general sense.

Ignorant is a comprehensive term; it includes any degree from the highest to the lowest, and consequently includes the other terms, illiterate, unlearned, and unlettered, which express different forms of ignorance. Ignorance is not always to one's disgrace, since it is not always one's fault; the term is not, therefore, directly reproachful: the poor ignorant savage is an object of pity, rather than condemnation; but when ignorance is coupled with self-conceit and presumption, it is a perfect deformity: hence the word illiterate, which is mostly used in such cases as become a term of reproach: an ignorant man who sets up to teach others, is termed an illiterate preacher; and quacks, whether in religion or medicine, from the very nature of their calling, are altogether an illiterate race of men. The term illiterate is in all cases taken for one who is without education or even the knowledge of his letters; the words unlearned and unlettered are disengaged from any unfavorable associations. A modest man, who makes no pretensions to learning, may suitably apologize for his supposed deficiencies by saying he is an unlearned or unlettered man; the former is, however, a term of more familiar use than the latter. A man may be described either as generally unlearned, or as unlearned in particular sciences or arts; as unlearned in history; unlearned in philosophy; unlearned in the ways of the world: a poet may describe his muse as unlettered.

He said, and sent Cyllenius with command
To free the ports, and ope the Punic land
To Trojan guests; lest, ignorant of fate,
The queen might force them from her town and state. DRYDEN.

On the accession of Henry VII., emerged from the Fells of Cumberland, where he had been principally concealed for twenty-five years, Henry Lord Clifford, with the manners and education of a shepherd. He was almost illiterate, but not deficient in natural understanding.

WHITTAKER.

Because this doctrine may have appeared to the unlearned light and whimsical, I must take leave to unfold the wisdom and antiquity of my first proposition in these my essays, to wit, that "every worthless man is a dead man."

ADDISON.

Ajax, the haughty chief, the unlettered soldier, had no way of making his anger known but by gloomy sullenness. JOHNSON.

TO ILLUMINATE, ILLUMINE, ENLIGHTEN.

ILLUMINATE, in Latin illuminatus, participle of illumino, and ENLIGHTEN,
from the noun light, both denote the communication of light; the former in the natural, the latter in the moral sense.
We illuminate by means of artificial lights; the sun illuminates the world by its own light: preaching and instruction enlighten the minds of men. Illumine is but a poetic variation of illuminate; as, the Sun of Righteousness illuminated the benighted world; illuminations are employed as public demonstrations of joy: no nation is now termed enlightened but such as have received the light of the Gospel.

Reason our guide, what can she more reply,
Than that the sun illuminates the sky? PRIOR.

But if neither you nor I can gather so much from these places, they will tell us it is because we are not inwardly enlightened. SOUTH.

TO IMITATE, COPY, COUNTERFEIT.

THE idea of taking a likeness of some object is common to all these terms; but IMITATE (v. To follow) is the generic:
COPY (v. Copy), and COUNTERFEIT, from the Latin contra and facio, signifying to make in opposition to the reality, are the specific terms: to imitate is to take a general likeness; to copy, to take an exact likeness; to counterfeit, to take a false likeness: to imitate is, therefore, almost always used in a good or an indifferent sense; to copy mostly, and to counterfeit still oftener, in a bad sense:

to imitate an author's style is at all times allowable for one who cannot form a style for himself; but to copy an author's style would be a too slavish adherence even for the dullest writer.

Poetry and music have the power of imitating
the manners of men. SIR W. JONES.

I need not enlarge on this relation; it is evident from hence that the Sorbonists were the original authors, and our schismatics in England were the copiers of rebellion. DRYDEN.

To imitate is applicable to every object, for every external object is susceptible of imitation; and in man the imitative faculty displays itself alike in the highest and the lowest matters, in works of art and moral conduct: to copy is applicable only to certain objects which will admit of a minute likeness being taken;
thus, an artist may be said to copy from nature.

The mind, impressible and soft, with ease
Imbibes and copies what she hears and sees.

COWPER.

Nothing was more natural than to imitate, by the sound of the voice, the quality of the sound or noise which any external object made. BLAIR.

To counterfeit is applicable but to few objects; we may counterfeit coin, which is an unlawful act, or we may counterfeit the person, the character, the voice, or the handwriting, of any one for whom we would wish to pass, which is also an unlawful act except on the stage.

I can counterfeit the deep tragedian,
Speak and look big, and pry on every side.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO IMITATE, MIMIC, APE, MOCK.

To IMITATE (v. To follow) is here the general term: to MIMIC, from the Greek μιμος, and to APE, signifying to imitate like an ape, are both species of vicious imitation. One imitates that which is deserving of imitation, or the contrary: one mimics either that which is not an authorized subject of imitation, or which is imitated imperfectly or so as to excite laughter. A person wishes to make that his own which he imitates, but he mimics for the entertainment of others.

Because we sometimes walk on two!
I hate the imitating crew.

GAY.

Nor will it less delight th' attentive sage
 To observe that instinct which unerring guides
 The brutal race which mimics reason's love.
 SOMERVILLE.

To ape is a serious though an absurd act of imitation; to MOCK, in French mocquer, Greek μωκω, to laugh at, is an ill-natured and vulgar act of imitation. The ape imitates to please himself; the mockers mock to insult others.

A courtier any ape surpasses;
 Behold him, humbly cringing, wait
 Upon the minister of state.
 View him soon after to inferiors
Aping the conduct of superiors.
 SWIFT.

What though no friends in sable weeds appear,
 Grieve for an hour, perhaps, then mourn a year,
 And bear about the mockery of woe
 To midnight dances.
 POPE.

IMMINENT, IMPENDING, THREATENING.

IMMINENT, in Latin imminens, from maneo, to remain, signifies resting or coming upon. IMPENDING, from the Latin pendeo, to hang, signifies hanging upon or over. THREATENING, containing a threat.

All these terms are used in regard to some evil that is exceedingly near: imminent conveys no idea of duration; impending excludes the idea of what is momentary. A person may be in imminent danger of losing his life in one instant, and the danger may be over the next instant; but an impending danger is that which has been long in existence and gradually approaching; we can seldom escape imminent danger by any efforts of one's own; but we may be successfully warned to escape from an impending danger. Imminent and impending are said of dangers that are not discoverable; but a threatening evil gives intimations of its own approach; we perceive the threatening tempest in the blackness of the sky; we hear the threatening sounds of the enemy's clashing swords.

The threatening voice and fierce gestures with which these words were uttered, struck Montezuma. He saw his own danger was imminent, the necessity unavoidable.
 ROBERTSON.

There was an opinion, if we may believe the Spanish historians, almost universal among the Americans, that some dreadful calamity was impending over their heads.
 ROBERTSON.

IMMODEST, IMPUDENT, SHAMELESS.

IMMODEST signifies the want of modesty: IMPUDENT and SHAMELESS signify without shame. Immodest is less than either impudent or shameless: an immodest girl lays aside the ornament of her sex, and puts on another garb that is less becoming; but her heart need not be corrupt until she becomes impudent: she wants a good quality when she is immodest; she is possessed of a positively bad quality when she is impudent. There is always hope that an immodest woman may be sensible of her error, and amend; but of an impudent woman there is no such chance, she is radically corrupt. Impudent may characterize the person or the thing; shameless characterizes the person. A person's air, look, and words are impudent, when contrary to all modesty: the person himself is shameless who is devoid of all sense of shame.

Music diffuses a calm all around us, and makes us drop all those immodest thoughts which would be a hindrance to us in the performance of the great duty of thanksgiving.
 SPECTATOR.

I am at once equally fearful of sparing you, and of being too impudent a corrector.
 POPE.

The sole remorse his greedy heart can feel,
 Is if one life escapes his murdering steel;
Shameless by force or fraud to work his way,
 And no less prompt to flatter than betray.
 CUMBERLAND.

TO IMPAIR, INJURE.

IMPAIR comes from the Latin im and pair, pejoro or pejor, worse, signifying to make worse. INJURE, from in and jus, against right, signifies to make otherwise than it ought to be.

Impair seems to be in regard to injure as the species to the genus; what is impaired is injured, but what is injured is not necessarily impaired. To impair is a progressive mode of injuring: an injury may take place either by degrees or by an instantaneous act: straining of the eyes impairs the sight, but a blow injures rather than impairs the eye. A man's health may be impaired or injured by his vices, but his limbs are injured rather than impaired by a fall. A person's circumstances are impaired by a succession of misfortunes; they are injured by a sudden turn of fortune.

It is painful to consider that this sublime en-

Joyment of friendship may be impaired by innumerable causes.

JOHNSON.

Who lives to nature rarely can be poor,
O what a patrimony this! a being
Of such inherent strength and majesty,
Not worlds possess can raise it; worlds destroy'd can't injure.

YOUNG.

IMPERFECTION, DEFECT, FAULT, VICE.

THESE terms are applied either to persons or things. IMPERFECTION, denoting either the abstract quality of imperfect, or the thing which constitutes it imperfect, in a person arises from his want of perfection, and the infirmity of his nature; there is no one without some point of imperfection which is obvious to others, if not to himself; he may strive to diminish it, although he cannot expect to get altogether rid of it: a DEFECT (v. Bleniah) is a deviation from the general constitution of man; it is what may be natural to the man as an individual, but not natural to man as a species; in this manner we may speak of a defect in the speech, or a defect in temper. The FAULT and VICE rise in degree and character above either of the former terms; they both reflect disgrace more or less on the person possessing them; but the fault always characterizes the agent, and is said in relation to an individual; the vice characterizes the action, and may be considered abstractedly: hence we speak of a man's faults as the things we may condemn in him; but we may speak of the vices of drunkenness, lying, and the like, without any immediate reference to any one who practises these vices. When they are both employed for an individual, their distinction is obvious: the fault may lessen the amiability or excellence of the character; the vice is a stain; a single act destroys its purity; a habitual practice is a pollution.

It is a pleasant story that we, forsooth, who are the only imperfect creatures in the universe, are the only beings that will not allow of imperfection.

STEELE.

The low race of men take a secret pleasure in finding an eminent character levelled to their condition by a report of its defects, and keep themselves in countenance, though they are excelled in a thousand virtues, if they believe that they have in common with a great person any one fault.

ADDISON.

I did myself the honor this day to make a visit to a lady of quality, who is one of those that are ever railing at the vices of the age.

STEELE.

In regard to things, the distinction depends upon the preceding explanation in a great measure, for we can scarcely use these words without thinking on man as a moral agent, who was made the most perfect of all creatures, and became the most imperfect; and from our imperfection has arisen, also, a general imperfection throughout all the works of creation. The word imperfection is therefore the most unqualified term of all: there may be imperfection in regard to our Maker; or there may be imperfection in regard to what we conceive of perfection: and in this case, the term simply and generally implies whatever falls short in any degree or manner of perfection. Defect is a positive degree of imperfection; it is contrary both to our ideas of perfection, or our particular intention: thus, there may be a defect in the materials of which a thing is made; or a defect in the mode of making it: the term defect, however, whether said of persons or things, characterizes rather the object than the agent. Fault, on the other hand, when said of things, always refers to the agent: thus we may say there is a defect in the glass, or a defect in the spring; but there is a fault in the workmanship, or a fault in the putting together, and the like. Vice, with regard to things, is properly a serious or radical defect; the former lies in the constitution of the whole, the latter may lie in the parts; the former lies in essentials, the latter lies in the accidents: there may be a defect in the shape or make of a horse; but the vice is said in regard to his soundness or unsoundness, his docility or indocility.

Go, wiser than! and in thy scale of sense,
Weigh thy opinion against providence;
Call imperfection what thou fanciest such.

POPE.

And in soft whispers soon the passage try'd.

PYRAMUS AND THISBE.

BEATTIE.

Or when the latent vice is cured by fire,
Redundant humors by the pores expire.

DRYDEN.

IMPERFECTION, WEAKNESS, FRAILTY, FAILING, FOIBLE.

IMPERFECTION (v. Imperfection) has already been considered as that which, in the most extended sense, abridges the moral perfection of man; the rest are but modes of imperfection varying in degree and circumstances. WEAKNESS is a positive and strong degree of imperfection which is opposed to strength; it is what we do not so necessarily look for, and therefore distinguishes the individual who is liable to it. FRAILITY is another strong mode of imperfection which characterizes the fragility of man, but not of all men in the same degree; it differs from weakness in respect to the object. A weakness lies more in the judgment or in the sentiment; frailty lies more in the moral features of an action. It is a weakness in a man to yield to the persuasions of any one against his better judgment; it is a frailty to yield to intemperance or illicit indulgences. FAILINGS and FOIBLES are the smallest degrees of imperfection to which the human character is liable: we have all our failings in temper, and our foibles in our habits and our prepossessions; and he, as Horace observes, is the best who has the fewest.

You live in a reign of human infirmity where every one has imperfections. BLAIR.

The folly of allowing ourselves to delay what we know cannot finally be escaped, is one of the general weaknesses which, to a greater or less degree, prevail in every mind. JOHNSON.

There are circumstances which every man must know will prove the occasions of calling forth his latent frailties. BLAIR.

Never allow small failings to dwell on your attention so much as to deface the whole of an amiable character. BLAIR.

I confess my foible in regard to flattery; I am as fond of it as Voltaire can be, but with this difference, that I love it from a masterly hand. CHESTERFIELD.

IMPERIOUS, LORDLY, DOMINEERING, OVERBEARING.

ALL these epithets imply an unseemly exercise or affectation of power or superiority. IMPERIOUS, from impero, to command, characterizes either the disposition to command without adequate authority, or to convey one's commands in an offensive manner: LORDLY, signifying like a lord, characterizes the manner of acting the lord: and DOMINEERING, from dominus, a lord, denotes the manner of ruling like a lord, or rather of attempting to rule; hence a person's temper or his tone is denominated imperious; his air or deportment is lordly; his tone is domineering. A woman of an imperious temper commands in order to be obeyed: she commands with an imperious tone in order to enforce obedience. A person assumes a lordly air in order to display his own importance: he gives orders in a domineering tone in order to make others feel their inferiority. There is always something offensive in imperiousness; there is frequently something ludicrous in that which is lordly; and a mixture of the ludicrous and offensive in that which is domineering.

Thy willing victim, Carthage, bursting loose
From all that pleading nature could oppose;
From a whole city's tears, by rigid faith
Imperious call'd, and honor's dire command.

THOMSON.

Lords are lordliest in their wine. MILTON.

He who has sunk so far below himself as to have given up his assent to a domineering error is fit for nothing but to be trampled on. SOUTH.

These terms are employed for such as are invested with some sort of power, or endowed with some sort of superiority, however trifling; but OVERBEARING is employed for men in the general relations of society, whether superiors or equals. A man of an imperious temper and some talent will frequently be so overbearing in the assemblies of his equals as to awe the rest into silence, and carry every measure of his own without contradiction.

I reflected within myself how much society would suffer if such insolent, overbearing characters as Leontine were not held in restraint.

CUMBERLAND.

IMPERTINENT, RUDE, SAUCY, IMPUDENT, INSOLENT.

IMPERTINENT, in Latin in and per-tinens, not belonging to one, signifies being or wanting to do what it does not belong to one to be or do. RUDE, in Latin rudis, rude, and raudus, a ragged stone, in the Greek παῖδος, a rough stick, signifies literally unpolished; and, in an extended sense, wanting all culture. SAUCY comes from sauce, and the Latin salus, signifying literally salt; and, in an extended sense, stinging like salt. IMPUDENT, v. Assurance. INSOLENT, from the Latin in and solens, contrary to custom, signifies being or wanting to be contrary to custom.

Impertinent is allied to rude, as respects one's general relations in society, without regard to station; it is allied to saucy, impudent, and insolent, as respects the conduct of inferiors. He who does not respect the laws of civil society in his intercourse with individuals, and wants to assume to himself what belongs to another, is impertinent: if he carry this impertinence so far as to commit any violent breach of decorum in his behavior, he is rude. Impertinence seems to spring from a too high regard of one's self: rudeness from an ignorance of what is due to others. Impertinent, in comparison with the other terms, saucy, impudent, and insolent, is the most general and indefinite: whatever one does or says that is not compatible with our humble station is impertinent; saucy is a sharp kind of impertinence: impudent an unblushing kind of impertinence; insolence is an outrageous kind of impertinence, it runs counter to all established order: thus, the terms seem to rise in sense. A person may be impertinent in words or actions: he is saucy in words or looks: he is impudent or insolent in words, tones, gesture, looks, and every species of action.

It is publicly whispered as a piece of impertinent pride in me, that I have hitherto been amicably civil to everybody, as if I thought nobody good enough to quarrel with.

DRYDEN.

IMPERVIOUS, IMPASSABLE, INACCESSIBLE.

IMPERVIOUS, from the Latin in, per, and via, signifies not having a way through; IMPASSABLE, not to be passed through; INACCESSIBLE, not to be approached. A wood is impermious when the trees, branches, and leaves are entangled to such a degree as to admit of no passage at all: a river is impassable that is so deep that it cannot be forded: a rock or a mountain is inaccessible the summit of which is not to be reached by any path whatever. What is impermious is so for a permanency; what is impassable is commonly so only for a time: roads are frequently impassable in the winter that are passable in the summer, while a thicket is impermious during the whole of the year: impassable is likewise said only of that which is to be passed by living creatures, but impermious may be extended to inanimate objects; a wood may be impermious to the rays of the sun.

The monster, Cacus, more than half a beast,
This hold, impermious to the sun, possesses'd.

DRYDEN.

But lest the difficulty of passing back
Stay his return perhaps over this gulf,
Impassable, impermious, let us try Advent'rous work.

MILTON.

MILTON.

IMPLACABLE, UNRELENTING, RELENTLESS, INEXORABLE.

IMPLACABLE, unappeasable, signifies not to be allayed nor softened. UNRELENTING or RELENTLESS, from the Latin lenio, to soften, or to make pliant, signifies not rendered soft. INEXORABLE, from oro, to pray, signifies not to be turned by prayers.

Inflexibility is the idea expressed in common by these terms, but they differ in the causes and circumstance with which it is attended. Animosities are implacable when no misery which we occasion can diminish their force, and no concessions on the part of the offender can lessen the spirit of revenge: the mind or character of a man is unrelenting when it is not to be turned from its purpose by a view of the pain which it inflicts: a man is inexorable who turns a deaf ear to every solicitation or entreaty that is made to induce him to lessen the rigor of his sentence. A man's angry passions render him implacable; it is not the magnitude of the offence, but the temper of the offended that is here in question; by implacability he is rendered insensible to the misery he occasions, and to every satisfaction which the offender may offer him: fixedness of purpose renders a man unrelenting or relentless; an unrelenting temper is not less callous to the misery produced, than an implacable temper; but it is not grounded always on resentment for personal injuries, but sometimes on a certain principle of right and a sense of necessity: the inexorable man adheres to his rule, as the unrelenting man does to his purpose; the former is insensible to any workings of his heart which might shake his purpose, the latter turns a deaf ear to all the solicitations of others which would go to alter his decrees: savages are mostly implacable in their animosities; Titus Manlius Torquatus displayed an instance of unrelenting severity toward his son; Minos, Æacus, and Rhodomanthus were the inexorable judges of hell.

Implacable as the enmity of the Mexicans was, they were so unacquainted with the science of war, that they knew not how to take the proper measures for the destruction of the Spaniards.

ROBERTSON.

These are the realms of unrelenting fate.

DRYDEN.

Implacable and unrelenting are said only of animate beings in whom is wanting an ordinary portion of the tender affections: inexorable may be improperly applied to inanimate objects; justice and death are both represented as inexorable.

Aoca, 'tis past, he swims before my sight,
Inexorable death, and claims his right.

DRYDEN.

TO IMPLANT, INGRAFT, INCULCATE, INSTIL, INFUSE.

To plant is properly to fix plants in the ground; to IMPLANT is, in the improper sense, to fix principles in the mind. Graft is to make one plant grow on the stock of another; to INGRAFT is to make particular principles flourish in the mind, and form a part of the character. Calco is in Latin to tread; and INCULCATE, to stamp into the mind. Stillo, in Latin, is literally to fall dropwise: instillo, to INSTIL, is, in the improper sense, to make sentiments, as it were, drop into the mind. Fundo, in Latin, is literally to pour in a stream: infundo, to INFUSE, is, in the improper sense, to pour principles or feelings into the mind.

To implant, ingraft, and inculcate, are said of abstract opinions, or rules of right and wrong; instil and infuse of such principles as influence the heart, the affections, and the passions. It is the business of the parent in early life to implant sentiments of virtue in his child; it is the business of the teacher to ingraft them. Instil is a corresponding act with implant; we implant belief; we instil the feeling which is connected with this belief. It is not enough to have an abstract belief of a God implanted into the mind: we must likewise have a love, and a fear of him, and reverence for his holy name and Word instilled into the mind. To instil is a gradual process which is the natural work of education; to infuse is a more arbitrary and immediate act. Sentiments are instilled into the mind, not altogether by the personal efforts of any individual, but likewise by collateral endeavors; they are, however, infused at the express will and with the express endeavor of some person. Instil is applicable only to permanent sentiments; infuse may be said of any partial feeling: hence we speak of infusing a poison into the mind by means of insidious and mischievous publications; or infusing a jealousy by means of crafty insinuations, or infusing an ardor into the minds of soldiers by means of spirited addresses coupled with military successes.

With various needs of art deep in the mind

TO IMPLICATE, INVOLVE.

IMPLICATE, from plico, to fold, denotes to fold into a thing; and IN-

VOLVE, from volvo, to roll, signifies to roll into a thing: by which explanation we perceive, that to implicate marks something less entangled than to involve: for that which is folded may be folded only once, but that which is rolled is turned many times. In application, therefore, to human affairs, people are said to be implicated who have taken ever so small a share in a transaction; but they are involved only when they are deeply concerned: the former is likewise especially applied to criminal transactions, the latter to those things which are in themselves troublesome: thus a man is implicated in the guilt of robbery who should stand by and see it done, without interfering for its prevention; he who is in debt in every direction is strictly said to be involved in debt.

He is much too deeply implicated to make the presence or absence of these notes of the least consequence to him. STATE TRIALS.

Those who cultivate the memory of our Revolution will take care how they are involved with persons who, under pretext of zeal toward the Revolution and constitution, frequently wander from their true principles. BURKE.

IMPORTANCE, CONSEQUENCE, WEIGHT, MOMENT.

IMPORTANCE, from porto, to carry, signifies the carrying or bearing with, or in itself. CONSEQUENCE, from consequor, to follow, or result, signifies the following, or resulting from a thing. WEIGHT signifies the quantum that the thing weighs. MOMENT, from momentum, signifies the force that puts in motion.

Importance is what things have in themselves; they may be of more or less importance, according to the value which is set upon them: this may be real or unreal; it may be estimated by the experience of their past utility, or from the presumption of their utility for the future: the idea of importance, therefore, enters into the meaning of the other terms more or less. Consequence is the importance of a thing from its consequences. This term, therefore, is peculiarly applicable to such things, the consequences of which may be more immediately discerned either from the neglect or the attention: it is of consequence for a letter to go off on a certain day, for the affairs of an individual may be more or less affected by it; an hour's delay sometimes in the departure of a military expedition may be of such consequence as to determine the fate of a battle. The term weight implies a positively great degree of importance: it is that importance which a thing has intrinsically in itself, and which makes it weigh in the mind: it is applied, therefore, to such things as offer themselves to deliberation; hence the counsels of a nation are always weighty, because they involve the interests of so many. Moment is that importance which a thing has from the power in itself to produce effects, or to determine interests: it is applicable, therefore, only to such things as are connected with our prosperity or happiness: when used without any adjunct, it implies a great degree of importance, but may be modified in various ways, as a thing of no moment, or small moment, or great moment; but we cannot say with the same propriety, a thing of small weight, and still less a thing of great weight: it is a matter of no small moment for every one to choose that course of conduct which will stand the test of a death-bed reflection.

He that considers how soon he must close his life, will find nothing of so much importance as to close it well. JOHNSON.

The corruption of our taste is not of equal consequence with the depravation of our virtue. WATSON.

The finest works of invention are of very little weight, when put in the balance with what refines and exalts the rational mind. SPECTATOR.

Whoever shall review his life, will find that the whole tenor of his conduct has been determined by some accident of no apparent moment. JOHNSON.

TO IMPRINT, IMPRESS, ENGRAVE.

PRINT and PRESS are both derived from pressus, participle of primo, signifying in the literal sense to press, or to make a mark by pressing: to IMPRESS and IMPRINT are figuratively employed in the same sense. Things are impressed on the mind so as to produce a conviction: they are imprinted on it so as to produce recollection. If the truths of Christianity be impressed on the mind, they will show themselves in a corresponding conduct: whatever is imprinted on the mind in early life, or by any particular circumstance, is not readily forgotten. ENGRAVE, from grave and the German graben, to dig, expresses more in the proper sense than either, and the same in its moral application; for we may truly say that if the truths of Christianity be engraven in the minds of youth, they can never be eradicated.

Whence this disdain of life in ev'ry breast,
But from a notion on their minds impress'd
That all who for their country die, are blest!

TO IMPUGN, ATTACK.

THESE terms are employed synonymously only in regard to doctrines or opinions; in which case, to IMPUGN, from in and pugno, to fight against, signifies to call in question, or bring arguments against; to ATTACK (v. To attack) is to oppose with warmth. Sceptics impugn every opinion, however self-evident or well-grounded they may be: infidels make the most indecent attacks upon the Bible, and all that is held sacred by the rest of the world. He who impugns may sometimes proceed insidiously and circuitously to undermine the faith of others: he who attacks always proceeds with more or less violence. To impugn is not necessarily taken in a bad sense; we may sometimes impugn absurd doctrines by a fair train of reasoning: to attack is always objectionable, either in the mode of the action, or its object, or in both; it is a mode of proceeding oftener employed in the cause of falsehood than truth: when there are no arguments wherewith to impugn a doctrine, it is easy to attack it with ridicule and scurrility.

The creed of Athanasius, concerning that truth which Arianism did so mightily impugn, was both in the East and West churches accepted as a treasure of inestimable price.

HOOKER.

In case of renewed attacks, our present creed would be a much better defence than any new one that would be made at the time it was wanted.

HEY.

INABILITY, DISABILITY.

INABILITY denotes the absence of ability in the most general and abstract sense. DISABILITY implies the absence of ability only in particular cases: the inability lies in the nature of the thing, and is irremediable; the disability lies in the circumstances, and may sometimes be removed: weakness, whether physical or mental, will occasion an inability to perform a task; there is a total inability in an infant to walk and act like an adult: a want of knowledge or of the requisite qualifications may be a disability; in this manner minority of age or an objection to take certain oaths may be a disability for filling a public office.

It is not from inability to discover what they ought to do that men err in practice.

BLAIR.

Want of age is a legal disability to contract a marriage.

BLACKSTONE.

INACTIVE, INERT, LAZY, SLOTHFUL, SLUGGISH.

A reluctance to bodily exertion is common to all these terms. INACTIVE is the most general and unqualified term of all; it expresses simply the want of a stimulus to exertion. INERT is something more positive, from the Latin iners or sine arte, without art or mind; it denotes a specific deficiency either in body or mind. LAZY (v. Idle). SLOTHFUL, from slow, that is, full of slowness; and SLUGGISH, from slug, that is, like a slug, drowsy and heavy, all rise upon one another to denote an expressly defective temperament of the body which directly impedes action.

To be inactive is to be indisposed to action; that is, to the performance of any office, to the doing any specific business: to be inert is somewhat more; it is to be indisposed to movement: to be lazy is to move with pain to one's self: to be slothful is never to move otherwise than slowly: to be sluggish is to move in a sleepy and heavy manner. A person may be inactive from a variety of incidental causes, as timidity, ignorance, modesty, and the like, which combine to make him averse to enter upon any business, or take any serious step; a person may be inert from temporary indisposition; but laziness, slothfulness, and sluggishness are inherent physical defects: laziness is, however, not altogether independent of the mind or the will; but slothfulness and sluggishness are purely the offspring of nature, or, which is the same thing, habit superinduced upon nature. A man of a mild character is frequently inactive.

Virtue conceal'd within our breast
Is inactivity at least.

SWIFT.

Hence the term inactive is applied to matter.

What laws are these? instruct us if you can;
There's one design'd for brutes, and one for man,
Another guides inactive matter's course.

JENYNS.

Some diseases, particularly of the melancholy kind, are accompanied with a strong degree of inertness; since they seem to deprive the frame of its ordinary powers to action, and to produce a certain degree of torpor; hence the term is properly applied to matter to express the highest degree of inactivity, which will not move without an external impulse.

Informer of the planetary train,
Without whose quickening glance their cumbrous orbs
Were brute, unlovely mass, inert and dead.

THOMSON.

Lazy people move as if their bodies were a burden to themselves; they are fond of rest, and particularly averse to be put in action; but they will sometimes move quickly, and perform much when once impelled to move.

The first canto (in Thomson's "Castle of Indolence") opens a scene of lazy luxury that fills the imagination.

JOHNSON.

Slothful people never vary their pace; they have a physical impediment in themselves to quick motion: sluggish people are with difficulty brought into action; it is their nature to be in a state of stupor.

Falsely luxurious, will not man awake,
And, springing from the bed of sloth, enjoy
The cool, the fragrant, and the silent hour?

THOMSON.

Conversation would become dull and vapid, if negligence were not sometimes roused, and sluggishness quickened, by due severity of reprehension.

JOHNSON.

INADVERTENCY, INATTENTION, OVERSIGHT.

INADVERTENCY, from advert, to turn the mind to, is allied to INATTENTION (v. Attentive), when the act of the mind is signified in general terms; and to OVERSIGHT when any particular instance of inadvertency occurs. Inadvertency never designates a habit, but inat- tention does; the former term, therefore, is unqualified by the reproachful sense which attaches to the latter: any one may be guilty of inadvertencies, since the mind that is occupied with many subjects equally serious may be turned so steadily toward some that others may escape notice; but inattention, which designates a direct want of attention, is always a fault, and belongs only to the young, or such as are thoughtless by nature: since inadvertency is an occasional act, it must not be too often repeated, or it becomes inattention. An oversight is properly a species of inadvertency, which arises from looking over, or passing by, a thing: we pardon an inadvertency in another, since the consequences are never serious; we must be guarded against oversights in business, as their consequences may be serious.

Ignorance or inadvertency will admit of some extenuation.

SOUTH.

The expense of attending (the Scottish Parliament), the inattention of the age to any legal or regular system of government, but, above all, the exorbitant authority of the nobles, made this privilege of so little value as to be almost neglected.

ROBERTSON.

The ancient critics discover beauties which escape the observation of the vulgar, and very often find reasons for palliating such little slips and oversights in the writings of eminent authors.

ADDISON.

INCAPABLE, INSUFFICIENT, INCOMPETENT, INADEQUATE.

INCAPABLE, that is, not having capacity (v. Ability); INSUFFICIENT, or not sufficient, or not having what is sufficient; INCOMPETENT, or not competent (v. Competent), are employed either for persons or things: the first in a general, the last two in a specific sense: INADEQUATE, or not adequate or equalled, is applied most generally to things.

When a man is said to be incapable, it characterizes his whole mind; if he be said to have insufficiency and incompetency, it respects the particular objects to which the power is applied: he may be insufficient or incompetent for certain things; but he may have a capacity for other things: the term incapacity, therefore, implies a direct charge upon the understanding, which is not implied by insufficiency and incompetency.

It chiefly proceedeth from natural incapacity and general indisposition. BROWN.

When God withdraws his hand, and lets nature sink into its original weakness and insufficiency, all a man's delights fall him. SOUTH.

Incapable is applied sometimes, in colloquial discourse, to signify the absence of that which is bad; insufficient and incompetent always convey the idea of a deficiency in that which is, at least, desirable: it is an honor to a person to be incapable of falsehood, or incapable of doing an ungenerous action; but to be insufficient and incompetent are, at all events, qualities not to be boasted of, although they may not be expressly disgraceful. These terms are likewise applicable to things, in which they preserve a similar distinction: infidelity is incapable of affording a man any comfort; when the means are insufficient for obtaining the ends, it is madness to expect success; it is a sad condition of humanity when a man's resources are incompetent to supply him with the first necessities of life.

Were a human soul incapable of farther enlargements, I could imagine it might fall away insensibly. ADDISON.

The minister's aptness or insufficiency, otherwise than by reading, to instruct the flock, standeth as a stranger, with whom our Common Prayer has nothing to do. HOOKER.

Laymen, with equal advantages of parts, are not the most incompetent judges of sacred things. DRYDEN.

Inadequate is relative in its signification, like insufficient and incompetent; but the relation is different. A thing is insufficient which does not suffice either for the wishes, the purposes, or necessities of any one, in particular or in general cases; thus, a quantity of materials may be insufficient for a particular building: incompetency is an insufficiency for general purposes, in things of the first necessity; thus, an income may be incompetent to support a family: inadequacy is still more particular, for it denotes any deficiency which is measured by comparison with the object to which it refers; thus, the strength of an animal may be inadequate to the labor which is required, or a reward may be inadequate to the service.

We want not time, but diligence, for great performances, and squander much of our allowance, even while we think it sparing and insufficient. JOHNSON.

All the attainments possible in our present state are evidently inadequate to our capacities of enjoyment. JOHNSON.

INCESSANTLY, UNCEASINGLY, UNINTERRUPTEDLY, WITHOUT INTERMISSION.

INCESSANTLY and UNCEASINGLY are but variations from the same word, cease. UNINTERRUPTEDLY, v. To disturb. INTERMISSION, v. To subside.

Continuity, but not duration, is denoted by these terms: incessantly is the most general and indefinite of all; it signifies without ceasing, but may be applied to things which admit of certain intervals: unceasingly is definite, and signifies never ceasing; it cannot, therefore, be applied to what has any cessation. In familiar discourse, incessantly is an extravagant mode of speech, by which one means to denote the absence of those ordinary intervals which are to be expected; as when one says a person is incessantly talking; by which is understood that he does not allow himself the ordinary intervals of rest from talking: unceasingly, on the other hand, is more literally employed for a positive want of cessation; a noise is said to be unceasing which literally never ceases; or complaints are unceasing which are made without any pauses or intervals. Incessantly and unceasingly are said of things which act of themselves; uninterruptedly is said of that which depends upon other things: it rains incessantly, marks a continued operation of nature, independent of everything; but to be uninterruptedly happy, marks one's freedom from every foreign influence which is unfriendly to one's happiness. Incessantly and the other two words are employed either for persons or things; without intermission is, however, mostly employed for persons: things act and react incessantly upon one another; a man of a persevering temper goes on laboring without intermission, until he has effected his purpose.

Surfeit, misdeed, and unthrifty waste,
Vain feasts, and ydle superfluitie,

For any one to be always in a laborious, hazardous posture of defence, without intermission, must needs be intolerable. SOUTH.

INCLINATION, TENDENCY, PROPENSITY, PRONENESS.

ALL these terms are employed to designate the state of the will toward an object: INCLINATION (v. Attachment) denotes its first movement toward an object: TENDENCY (from to tend) is a continued inclination: PROPENSITY, from the Latin propensus and propendeo, to hang forward, denotes a still stronger leaning of the will; and PRONE, from the Latin pronus, downward, characterizes a habitual and fixed state of the will toward an object. The inclination expresses the leaning, but not the direction of that leaning; it may be to the right or to the left, upward or downward; consequently we may have an inclination to that which is good or bad, high or low; tendency does not specify any particular direction; but from the idea of pressing, which it conveys, it is appropriately applied to those things which degenerate or lead to what is bad; excessive strictness in the treatment of children has a tendency to damp their spirit: propensity and proneness both designate a downward direction, and consequently refer only to that which is bad and low; a person has a propensity to drinking, and a proneness to lying.

Inclination is always at the command of the understanding; it is our duty, therefore, to suppress the first risings of any inclination to extravagance, intemperance, or any irregularity: as tendency refers to the thing rather than the person, it is our business to avoid that which has a tendency to evil: the propensity will soon get the mastery of the best principles, and the firmest resolution; it is our duty, therefore, to seek all the aids which religion affords to subdue every propensity: proneness to evil is inherent in our nature, which we derive from our first parents; it is the grace of God alone which can lift us up above this grovelling part of ourselves.

Partiality is properly the understanding's judging according to the inclination of the will.

TO INCLOSE, INCLUDE.

FROM the Latin include, and its participle inclusus, are derived INCLOSE and INCLUDE: the former to express the proper, and the latter the improper signification: a yard is inclosed by a wall; particular goods are included in a reckoning: the kernel of a nut is inclosed in a shell; morality, as well as faith, is included in Christian perfection.

With whom she marched straight against her foes,
And then unawares besides the Severne did inclose. SPENCER.

The idea of being once present is included in the idea of its being past. GROVE.

INCONSISTENT, INCONGRUOUS, INCOHERENT.

INCONSISTENT, from sisto, to place, marks the unfitness of being placed together. INCONGRUOUS, from congruo, to suit, marks the unsuitableness of one thing to another. INCOHERENT, from hæreo, to stick, marks the incapacity of two things to coalesce or be united to each other.

Inconsistency attaches either to the actions or sentiments of men; incongruity attaches to the modes and qualities of things; incoherency to words or thoughts: things are made inconsistent by an act of the will; a man acts or thinks inconsistently, according to his own pleasure: incongruity depends upon the nature of the things; there is something very incongruous in blending the solemn and decent service of the church with the extravagant rant of Methodism: incoherence marks the want of coherence in that which ought to follow in a train; extemporary effusions from the pulpit are often distinguished most by their incoherence.

Every individual is so unequal to himself that man seems to be the most wavering and inconsistent being in the universe. HUGHES.

The solemn introduction of the Phoenix, in the last scene of Sampson Agonistes, is incongruous to the personage to whom it is ascribed.

JOHNSON.

Be but a person in credit with the multitude, he shall be able to make rambling incoherent stuff pass for high rhetoric. SOUTH.

TO INCONVENIENCE, ANNOY, MOLEST.

To INCONVENIENCE is to make not convenient (v. Convenient). To ANNOY, from the Latin noceo, to hurt, is to do some hurt to. To MOLEST, from the Latin moles, a mass or weight, signifies to press with a weight.

We inconvenience in small matters, or by omitting such things as might be convenient; we annoy or molest by doing that which is positively painful: we are inconvenienced by a person's absence; we are annoyed by his presence if he renders himself offensive: we are inconvenienced by what is temporary; we are annoyed by that which is either temporary or durable; we are molested by that which is weighty and oppressive; we are inconvenienced simply in regard to our circumstances; we are annoyed mostly in regard to our corporeal feelings; we are molested mostly in regard to our minds: the removal of a seat or a book may inconvenience one who is engaged in business; the buzzing of a fly, or the stinging of a gnat, may annoy; the impertinent freedom, or the rude insults of ill-disposed persons, may molest.

I have often been tempted to inquire what happiness is to be gained, or what inconvenience to be avoided, by this stated recession from the town in the summer season. JOHNSON.

Who glar'd upon me, and went surly by,
Without annoying me. SHAKESPEARE.

INCORPOREAL, UNBODIED, IMMATERIAL, SPIRITUAL.

INCORPOREAL, from corpus, a body, marks the quality of not belonging to the body, or having any properties in common with it; UNBODIED denotes the state of being without the body, or not inclosed in a body; a thing may therefore be incorporeal without being unbodied; but not vice versa: the soul of man is incorporeal, but not unbodied, during his natural life,

Of sense, whereby they hear, see, smell, touch, taste,
Tasting, concoct, digest, assimilate,
And corporeal to incorporeal turn. MILTON.

Th' unbodied spirit flies
And lodges where it lights, in man or beast.
DRYDEN.

Incorporeal is always used in regard to living things, particularly by way of comparison, with corporeal or human beings: hence we speak of incorporeal agency, or incorporeal agents, in reference to such beings as are supposed to act in this world without the help of the body; but IMMATERIAL is applied to inanimate objects; men are corporeal as men, spirits are incorporeal; the body is the material part of man, the soul his immaterial part: whatever external object acts upon the senses is material; but the action of the mind on itself, and its results, are all immaterial: the earth, sun, moon, etc., are termed material; but the impressions which they make on the mind, that is, our ideas of them, are immaterial.

Sense and perception must necessarily proceed from some incorporeal substance within us. BENTLEY.

O thou great arbiter of life and death,
Nature's immortal, immaterial sun!
Thy call I follow to the land unknown. YOUNG.

The incorporeal and immaterial have always a relative sense; the SPIRITUAL is that which is positive: God is a spiritual, not properly an incorporeal nor immaterial being: the angels are likewise designated, in general, as the spiritual inhabitants of heaven; although, when spoken of in regard to men, they may be denominated incorporeal.

Thus incorporeal spirits to smallest forms
Reduc'd their shapes immense. MILTON.

Echo is a great argument of the spiritual essence of sounds, for if it were corporeal, the repercussion should be created by like instruments with the original sound. BACON.

TO INCREASE, GROW.

INCREASE, from the Latin in and creasco, signifies to grow upon or grow to a thing, to become one with it. GROW, in Saxon growan, is very probably connected with the Latin crevi, perfect of creasco.

The idea of becoming larger is common to both these terms: but the former expresses the idea in an unqualified manner: and the latter annexes to this general idea also that of the mode or process by which this is effected. To increase is either a gradual or an instantaneous act; to grow is a gradual process: a stream increases by the addition of other waters; it may come suddenly or in course of time, by means of gentle showers or the rushing in of other streams; but if we say that the river or stream grows, it is supposed to grow by some regular and continual process of receiving fresh water, as from the running in of different rivulets or smaller streams. To increase is either a natural or an artificial process; to grow is always natural: money increases, but does not grow, because it increases by artificial means: corn may either increase or grow: in the former case we speak of it in the sense of becoming larger or increasing in bulk; in the latter case we consider the mode of its increasing, namely, by the natural process of vegetation. On this ground we say that a child grows, when we wish to denote the natural process by which his body arrives at its proper size; but we may speak of his increasing in stature, in size, and the like. For this reason likewise increase is used in a transitive as well as intransitive sense; but grow always in an intransitive sense: we can increase a thing, though not properly grow a thing, because we can make it larger by whatever means we please; but when it grows it makes itself larger.

Then, as her strength with years increas'd, began
To pierce aloft in air the soaring swan.

DRYDEN.

Some trees their birth to bounteous nature owe,
For some without the pains of planting grow.

DRYDEN.

In their improper acceptance these words preserve the same distinction: "trade increases" bespeaks the simple fact of its becoming larger; but "trade grows" implies that gradual increase which flows from the natural concurrence of circumstances. The affections which are awakened in infancy grow with one's growth; here is a natural and moral process combined. The fear of death sometimes increases as one grows old; the courage of a truly brave man increases with the sight of danger: here is a moral process which is both gradual and immediate, but in both cases produced by some foreign cause.

The strawberry grows underneath the nettle,
And wholesome berries thrive and ripen best
Neighbor'd by fruit of baser quality:
And so the prince obscur'd his contemplation
Under the veil of wildness; which no doubt
Grew, like a summer grass, fastest by night.

SHAKESPEARE.

Such innocent creatures are they, and so great strangers to the world, that they think this a likely method to increase the number of their admirers.

ADDISON.

INCREASE, ADDITION, ACCESSION, AUGMENTATION.

INCREASE is here, as in the former article, the generic term (v. To increase): there will always be increase where there is AUGMENTATION, ADDITION, and ACCESSION, though not vice versa.

Addition is to increase as the means to the end: the addition is the artificial mode of making two things into one; the increase is the result: when the value of one figure is added to another, the sum is increased; hence a man's treasures experience an increase by the addition of other parts to the main stock. Addition is an intentional mode of increasing; accession is an accidental mode: one thing is added to another, and thereby increased; but an accession takes place of itself; it is the coming or joining of one thing to another so as to increase the whole. A merchant increases his property by adding his gains in trade every year to the mass; but he receives an accession of property either by inheritance or any other contingency. In the same manner a monarch increases his dominions by adding one territory to another, or by various accessions of territory which fall to his lot. When we speak of an increase, we think of the whole and its relative magnitude at different times; when we speak of an addition, we think only of the part and the agency by which this part is joined; when we speak of an accession, we think only of the circumstance by which one thing becomes thus joined to another. Increase of happiness does not depend upon increase of wealth; the miser makes daily additions to the latter without making any to the former: sudden accessions of wealth are seldom attended with any good consequences, as they turn the thoughts too violently out of their sober channel, and bend them too strongly on present possessions and good-fortune.

At will I crop the year's increase,
My latter life is rest and peace. DRYDEN.

The ill state of health into which Tullia is fallen is a very severe addition to the many and great disquietudes that afflict my mind.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

There is nothing in my opinion more pleasing in religion than to consider that the soul is to shine forever with new accessions of glory.

ADDISON.

Augmentation is a mode of increasing not merely in quantity or number, but also in value or in the essential ingredient of a thing; it is therefore applied for the most part to the increase of a man's estate, possessions, family, income, or whatever is desirable.

He who augments his substance, although he spends little, wastes away like a medicine applied to weak eyes. Riches not employed are of no use.

SIR W. JONES'S HIEROGLYPHS.

It may also be applied to moral objects, as hopes, fears, joys, etc., with a like distinction.

Though fortune change, his constant spouse remains,
Augments his joys or mitigates his pains.

Pope.

Ambitious Turnus in the press appears,
And aggravating crimes, augments their fears.

DRYDEN.

INDEBTED, OBLIGED.

INDEBTED is more binding and positive than OBLIGED: we are indebted to whoever confers an essential service: we are obliged to him who does us any service. A man is indebted to another for the preservation of his life; he is obliged to him for an ordinary act of civility: a debt, whether of legal or moral right, must in justice be paid; an obligation which is only moral, ought in reason to be returned. We may be indebted to things; we are obliged to persons only: we are indebted to Christianity, not only for a superior faith, but also for a superior system of morality; we ought to be obliged to our friends who admonish us of our faults with a friendly temper. A nation may be indebted to an individual, but men are obliged to each other only as individuals: the English nation is indebted to Alfred for the groundwork of its constitution; the little courtesies which pass between friends in their social intercourse with each other lay them under obligations which it is equally agreeable to receive and to pay.

A grateful mind

By owing owes not, but still pays at once
Indebted and discharged.

MILTON.

We are each of us so civil and obliging, that neither thinks he is obliged.

Pope.

INDECENT, IMMODEST, INDELICATE.

INDECENT is the contrary of decent (v. Becoming), IMMODEST the contrary of modest (v. Modest), INDELICATE the contrary of delicate (v. Fine).

Indecency and immodesty violate the fundamental principles of morality: the former, however, in external matters, as dress, words, and looks; the latter in conduct and disposition. A person may be indecent for want of either knowing or thinking better; but a female cannot be immodest without radical corruption of principle. Indecency may be a partial, immodesty is a positive and entire breach of the moral law. Indecency belongs to both sexes; immodesty is peculiarly applicable to the misconduct of females.

The Dubistan contains more ingenuity and wit, more indecency and blasphemy, than I ever saw collected in one single volume. SIR W. JONES.

Immodest words admit of no defence,
For want of decency is want of sense.

ROSCOMMON.

Indecency is less than immodesty, but more than indelicacy: they both respect the outward behavior; but the former springs from illicit or uncurbed desire; indelicacy from the want of education. It is a great indecency for a man to marry again very quickly after the death of his wife; but a still greater indecency for a woman to put such an affront on her deceased husband: it is a great indelicacy in any one to break in upon the retirement of such as are in sorrow and mourning. It is indecent for females to expose their persons as many do whom we cannot call immodest women; it is indelicate for females to engage in masculine exercises.

Your papers would be chargeable with something worse than indelicacy, did you treat the detestable sin of uncleanness in the same manner as you rally self-love.

SPECTATOR.

INDIFFERENCE, INSENSIBILITY, APATHY.

INDIFFERENCE signifies no difference; that is, having no difference of feeling for one thing more than another. INSENSIBILITY, from sense and able, signifies incapable of feeling. APATHY, from the Greek privative a and παθος, feeling, implies without feeling.

Indifference is a partial state of the mind; insensibility and apathy are general states of the mind; he who has indifference is not to be awakened to feeling by some objects, though he may by others; but he who has not sensibility is incapable of feeling; and he who has apathy is without any feeling. Indifference is mostly a temporary state; insensibility is either a temporary or a permanent state; apathy is always a permanent state: indifference is either acquired or accidental; insensibility is either produced or natural; apathy is natural. A person may be in a state of indifference about a thing the value of which he is not aware of, or acquire an indifference for that which he knows to be of comparatively little value: he may be in a state of insensibility from some lethargic torpor which has seized his mind; or he may have a habitual insensibility arising either from the contractedness of his powers, or the physical bluntness of his understanding and deadness of his passions; his apathy is born with him, and forms a prominent feature in the constitution of his mind.

I could never prevail with myself to exchange joy and sorrow for a state of constant, tasteless indifference. HOADLY.

I look upon Iseus not only as the most eloquent, but the most happy of men; as I shall esteem you the most insensible if you appear to slight his acquaintance.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF FLINT.

To remain insensible of such provocations is not constancy, but apathy. SOUTH.

INDIFFERENT, UNCONCERNED, REGARDLESS.

INDIFFERENT (v. Indifference) marks the want of inclination: UNCONCERNED, that is, having no concern (v. Care), and REGARDLESS, that is, without regard (v. Care), mark the want of serious consideration. Indifferent respects only the will, unconcerned either the will or the understanding, regardless the understanding only: we are indifferent about matters of minor consideration; we are unconcerned or regardless about serious matters that have remote consequences:

an author will seldom be indifferent about the success of his work; he ought not to be unconcerned about the influence which his writings may have on the public, or regardless of the estimation in which his own character as a man may be held. To be indifferent is sometimes an act of wisdom or virtue; to be unconcerned or regardless is mostly an act of folly or a breach of duty.

As an author I am perfectly indifferent to the judgment of all except the few who are really judicious. COWPER.

Not the most cruel of our conquering foes,
So unconcern'dly can relate our woes.

DENHAM.

Regardless of my words, he no reply Returns.

DAYDEN.

INDIGNITY, INSULT.

INDIGNITY, from the Latin dignus, worthy, signifying unworthy treatment, respects the feeling and condition of the person offended; INSULT (v. Affront) respects the temper of the offending party. We measure the indignity in our own mind; it depends upon the consciousness we have of our own worth: we measure the insult by the disposition which is discovered in another to degrade us. Persons in high stations are peculiarly exposed to indignities: persons in every station may be exposed to insults. Indignities may, however, be offered to persons of all ranks; but in this case it always consists of more violence than a simple insult; it would be an indignity to a person of any rank to be compelled to do any office which belongs only to a beast of burden.

The two casiques made Montezuma's officers prisoners, and treated them with great indignity. ROBERTSON.

Narvaez having learned that Cortez was now advanced with a small body of men, considered this as a small insult which merited immediate chastisement. ROBERTSON.

INDISTINCT, CONFUSED.

INDISTINCT is negative; it marks simply the want of distinctness: CONFUSED is positive; it marks a positive degree of indistinctness. A thing may be indistinct without being confused; but it cannot be confused without being indistinct: two things may be indistinct, or not easily distinguished from each other; but many things, or parts of the same things, are confused: two letters in a word may be indistinct; but the whole of a writing or many words are confused: sounds are indistinct which reach our ears only in part; but they are confused if they come in great numbers and out of all order. We see objects indistinctly when we cannot see all the features by which they would be distinguished from other objects: we see them confusedly when every part is so blended with the other that no one feature can be distinguished; by means of great distance objects become indistinct; from a defect in sight objects become more confused.

When a volume of travels is opened, nothing is found but such general accounts as leave no distinct idea behind them. JOHNSON.

He that enters a town at night and surveys it in the morning, then hastens to another place, may please himself for a time with a hasty change of scene and a confused remembrance of palaces and churches. JOHNSON.

INDOLENT, SUPINE, LISTLESS, CARELESS.

INDOLENT, v. idle, lazy. SUPINE, in Latin supinus, from super, above, signifies lying on one's back, or with one's face upward, which, as it is the action of a lazy or idle person, has been made to represent the qualities themselves. LISTLESS, without list, in German lust, desire, signifies without desire. CARELESS signifies without care or concern.

These terms represent a diseased or unnatural state of the mind, when its desires, which are the springs of action, are in a relaxed and torpid state, so as to prevent the necessary degree of exertion. Indolence has a more comprehensive meaning than supineness, and this signifies more than listlessness, or carelessness: indolence is a general indisposition of a person to exert either his mind or his body; supineness is a similar indisposition that shows itself on particular occasions: there is a corporeal as well as a mental cause for indolence; but supineness lies principally in the mind: corpulent and large-made people are apt to be indolent; but timid and gentle dispositions are apt to be supine.

Hence reasoners more refin'd but not more wise,
Their whole existence fabulous aspect,
And truth and falsehood in a lump reject;

Too indolent to learn what may be known,
Or else too proud that ignorance to own.

JENTRA.

With what unequal tempers are we fram'd!
One day the soul, supine with ease and fulness, Revels secure. ROWE.

The indolent and supine are not, however, like the listless, expressly without desire: an indolent or supine man has desire enough to enjoy what is within his reach, although not always sufficient desire to surmount the aversion to labor in trying to obtain it; the listless man, on the contrary, is altogether without the desire, and is, in fact, in a state of moral torpor, which is, however, but a temporary or partial state arising from particular circumstances; after the mind has been wrought up to the highest pitch, it will sometimes sink into a state of relaxation in which it ceases to have apparently any active principle within itself.

Sullen, methinks, and slow the morning breaks,
As if the sun were listless to appear. DRYDEN.

Carelessness expresses less than any of the above; for though a man who is indolent, supine, and listless, is naturally careless, yet carelessness is properly applicable to such as have no such positive disease of mind or body. Carelessness is rather an error of the understanding, or of the conduct, than the will; since the careless would care, be concerned for, or interested about things, if he could be brought to reflect on their importance, or if he did not for a time forget himself.

Pert love with her by joint commission rules,
Who by false arts and popular decells,
The careless, fond, unthinking mortal cheats.

POMFRET.

INDUBITABLE, UNQUESTIONABLE, INDISPUTABLE, UNDENIABLE, INCONTROVERTIBLE, IRREFRAGABLE.

INDUBITABLE signifies admitting of no doubt (v. Doubt); UNQUESTIONABLE, admitting of no question (v. Doubt); INDISPUTABLE, admitting of no dispute (v. To controvert); UNDENIABLE, not to be denied (v. To deny, disown); INCONTROVERTIBLE, not to be controverted (v. To controvert); IRREFRAGABLE, from frango, to break, signifies not to be broken, destroyed, or done away. These terms are all opposed to uncertainty; but they do not imply absolute certainty, for they all express the strong persuasion of a person's mind rather than the absolute nature of the thing: when a fact is supported by such evidence as admits of no kind of doubt, it is termed indubitable; when the truth of an assertion rests on the authority of a man whose character for integrity stands unimpeached, it is termed unquestionable authority; when a thing is believed to exist on the evidence of every man's senses, it is termed undeniable; when a sentiment has always been held as either true or false, without dispute, it is termed indisputable; when arguments have never been controverted, they are termed incontrovertible; and when they have never been satisfactorily answered, they are termed irrefragable.

A full or a thin house will indubitably express the sense of a majority. HAWKSWORTH.

From the unquestionable documents and dictates of the law of nature, I shall evince the obligation lying upon every man to show gratitude. SOUTH.

Truth, knowing the indisputable claim she has to all that is called reason, thinks it below her to ask that upon courtesy in which she can plead a property. SOUTH.

So undeniable is the truth of this (viz., the hardness of our duty), that the scene of virtue is laid in our natural averseness to things excellent. SOUTH.

Our distinction must rest upon a steady adherence to the incontrovertible rules of virtue. BLAIR.

There is none who walks so surely, and upon such irrefragable grounds of prudence, as he who is religious. SOUTH.

INDULGENT, FOND.

INDULGENCE (v. To gratify) lies more in forbearing from the exercise of authority; FONDNESS (v. Amorous) in the outward behavior and endearments: they may both arise from an excess of kindness or love; but the former is of a less objectionable character than the latter. Indulgence may be sometimes wrong; but fondness is seldom right: an indulgent parent is seldom a prudent parent; but a fond parent does not rise above a fool: all who have the care of young people should occasionally relax from the strictness of the disciplinarian, and show an indulgence where a suitable opportunity offers; a fond mother takes away from the value of indulgences by an invariable compliance with the humors of her children.

He compares prosperity to the indulgence of a fond mother to a child, which often proves its ruin. ADDISON.

However, when applied generally or abstractedly, they are both taken in a good sense.

God then thro' all creation gives, we find,
Sufficient marks of an indulgent mind.

JENTNA.

While, for awhile, his fond paternal care
Feasts us with ev'ry joy our state can bear.

JENTNA.

INFAMOUS, SCANDALOUS.

INFAMOUS, like infamy (v. Infamy), is applied to both persons and things; SCANDALOUS, only to things: a character is infamous, or a transaction is infamous; but a transaction only is scandalous. Infamous and scandalous are both said of that which is calculated to excite great displeasure in the minds of all who hear it, and to degrade the offenders in the general estimation; but the infamous seems to be that which produces greater publicity, and more general reprehension, than the scandalous; consequently is that which is more serious in its nature, and a greater violation of good morals. Some men of daring character render themselves infamous by their violence, their rapine, and their murders; the trick which was played upon the subscribers to the South Sea Company was a scandalous fraud.

There is no crime more infamous than the violation of truth. JOHNSON.

It is a very great, though sad and scandalous truth, that rich men are esteemed and honored, while the ways by which they grow rich are abhorred. SOUTH.

INFAMY, IGNOMINY, OPPROBRIUM.

INFAMY is the opposite to good fame; it consists in an evil report. IGNOMINY, from the privative in and nomen, a name, signifies an ill name, a stained name. OPPROBRIUM, a Latin word, compounded of op or ob and probrum, signifies the highest degree of reproach or stain.

The idea of discredit or disgrace in the highest possible degree is common to all these terms: but infamy is that which attaches either to the person or to the thing; ignominy is thrown upon the person; and opprobrium is thrown upon the agent rather than the action. Infamy causes either the person or thing to be ill spoken of by all; abhorrence of both is expressed by every mouth, and the ill report spreads from mouth to mouth: ignominy causes the name and the person to be held in contempt; it becomes debased in the eyes of others: opprobrium causes the person to be spoken of in severe terms of reproach, and to be shunned as something polluted. The infamy of a traitorous proceeding is increased by the addition of ingratitude; the ignominy of a public punishment is increased by the wickedness of the offender; opprobrium sometimes falls upon the innocent, when circumstances seem to convict them of guilt.

The share of infamy that is likely to fall to the lot of each individual in public acts is small indeed. BURKE.

When they saw that they submitted to the most ignominious and cruel deaths rather than retract their testimony, or even be silent in matters which they were to publish by their Saviour's especial command, there was no reason to doubt of the veracity of those facts which they related. ADDISON.

Nor he their outward only with the skins Of beasts, but inward nakedness much more Opprobrious, with his robe of righteousness Arraying, cover'd from his father's sight.

MILTON.

INFLUENCE, AUTHORITY, ASCENDENCY, OR ASCENDANT, SWAY.

INFLUENCE, v. Credit. AUTHORITY, in Latin auctoritas, from auctor, the author or prime mover of a thing, signifies that power which is vested in the prime mover of any business. ASCENDENCY, from ascend, signifies having the upper hand. SWAY, like our word swing and the German schweben, comes from the Hebrew za, to move.

These terms imply power, under different circumstances: influence is altogether unconnected with any right to direct; authority includes the idea of right necessarily; superiority of rank, talent, or property, personal attachment, and a variety of circumstances, give influence; it commonly acts by persuasion, and employs engaging manners, so as to determine in favor of what is proposed: superior wisdom, age, office, and relation, give authority; it determines of itself, it requires no collateral aid: ascendency and sway are modes of influence, differing only in degree; they both imply an excessive and improper degree of influence over the mind, independent of reason: the former is, however, more gradual in its process, and consequently more confirmed in its nature; the latter may be only temporary, but may be more violent. A person employs many arts, and for a length of time, to gain the ascendency; but he exerts a sway by a violent stretch of power. It is of great importance for those who have influence to conduct themselves consistently with their rank and station: men are apt to regard the warnings and admonitions of a true friend as an odious assumption of authority, while they voluntarily give themselves up to the ascendency which a valet or a mistress has gained over them, who exert the most unwarrantable sway to serve their own interested and vicious purposes.

The influence of France as a republic is equal to a war. BURKE.

Without the force of authority the power of soldiers grows pernicious to their master. TEMPLE.

By the ascendant he had in his understanding, and the dexterity of his nature, he could persuade him very much. CLARENDON.

France, since her revolution, is under the sway of a sect, whose leaders, at one stroke, have demolished the whole body of jurisprudence.

BURKE.

Influence and ascendency are said likewise of things as well as persons: true religion will have an influence not only on the outward conduct of a man, but on the inward affections of his heart; and that man is truly happy in whose mind it has the ascendency over every other principle.

Religion hath so great an influence upon the felicity of man, that it ought to be upheld, not only out of dread of divine vengeance in another world, but out of regard to temporal prosperity.

TILLOTSON.

If you allow any passion, even though it be esteemed innocent, to acquire an absolute ascendant, your inward peace will be impaired. BLAIR.

TO INFORM, MAKE KNOWN, ACQUAINT, APPRISE.

THE idea of bringing to the knowledge of one or more persons is common to all these terms. INFORM, from the Latin informo, to fashion the mind, comprehends this general idea only, without the addition of any collateral idea; it is therefore the generic term, and the rest specific: to inform is to communicate what has lately happened, or the contrary; but to MAKE KNOWN is to bring to light what has long been known and purposely concealed: to inform is to communicate directly or indirectly to one or many; to make known is mostly to communicate indirectly to many: one informs the public of one's intentions, by means of an advertisement in one's own name; one makes known a fact through a circuitous channel, and without any name.

Our ruin, by thee inform'd, I learn. MILTON.

But fools, to talking ever prone,
Are sure to make their follies known. GAY.

To inform may be either a personal address or otherwise; to ACQUAINT and APPRISE are immediate and personal communications. One informs the government, or any public body, or one informs one's friends; one acquaints or apprises only one's friends, or particular individuals: one is informed of that which either concerns the informant, or the person informed; one acquaints a person with, or apprises him of, such things as peculiarly concern himself, but the latter in more specific circumstances than the former: one informs a correspondent by letter of the day on which he may expect to receive his order, or of one's own wishes with regard to an order; one acquaints a father with all the circumstances that respect his son's conduct: one apprises a friend of a bequest that has been made to him; one informs the magistrate of any irregularity that passes; one acquaints the master of a family with the misconduct of his servants: one apprises a person of the time when he will be obliged to appear.

The Journey of my daughters to town was now resolved upon, Mr. Thornhill having kindly promised to inspect their conduct himself and inform us by letter of their behavior. GOLDENITH.

If any man lives under a minister that doth not act according to the rules of the gospel, it is his own fault, in that he doth not acquaint the bishop with it. BEVERIDGE.

You know, without my telling you, with what zeal I have recommended you to Cæsar, although you may not be apprised that I have frequently written to him upon that subject.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

Inform may be applied figuratively to things; the other terms to persons only in the proper sense.

Religion informs us that misery and sin were produced together. JOHNSON.

TO INFORM, INSTRUCT, TEACH.

THE communication of knowledge in general is the common idea by which these words are connected with each other. INFORM is here, as in the preceding article (v. To inform, make known), the general term; the other two are specific terms. To inform is the act of persons in all conditions; to INSTRUCT and TEACH are the acts of superiors, either on one ground or another: one informs by virtue of an accidental superiority or priority of knowledge; one instructs by virtue of superior knowledge or superior station; one teaches by virtue of superior knowledge, rather than of station: diplomatic agents inform their governments of the political transactions in which they have been concerned; government instructs its different functionaries and officers in regard to their mode of proceeding; professors and preceptors teach those who attend public schools to learn. To inform is applicable to matters of general interest: we may inform ourselves or others on anything which is a subject of inquiry or curiosity; and the information serves either to amuse or to improve the mind: to instruct is applicable to matters of serious concern, or to that which is practically useful; a parent instructs his child in the course of conduct he should pursue: to teach respects matters of art and science; the learner depends upon the teacher for the formation of his mind, and the establishment of his principles.

While we only desire to have our ignorance informed, we are most delighted with the plainest diction. JOHNSON.

Not Thracian Orpheus should transcend my lays,
Nor Linus, crown'd with never-fading bays:
Though each his heav'nly parent should inspire,
The Muse instruct the voice, and Phœbus tune the lyre. DRYDEN.

He that teaches us anything which we knew not before is undoubtedly to be revered as a master. JOHNSON.

To inform and to teach are employed for things as well as persons; to instruct only for persons: books and reading inform the mind; history or experience teaches mankind.

The long speeches rather confounded than informed his understanding. CLARENDON.

Nature is no sufficient teacher what we should do that we may attain unto life everlasting. HOOKER.

INFORMANT, INFORMER.

THESE two epithets, from the verb to inform, have acquired by their application an important distinction. The INFORMANT being he who informs for the benefit of others, and the INFORMER to the molestation of others. What the informant communicates is for the benefit of the individual, and what the informer communicates is for the benefit of the whole. The informant is thanked for his civility in making the communication; the informer undergoes a great deal of odium, but is thanked by no one, not even by those who employ him. We may all be informants in our turn, if we know of anything of which another may be informed; but none are informers who do not inform against the transgressors of any law.

Aye (says our artist's informant), but at the same time he declared you (Hogarth) were as good a portrait-painter as Vandyke. PINKINGTON.

Every member of society feels and acknowledges the necessity of detecting crimes, yet scarce any degree of virtue or reputation is able to secure an informer from public hatred. JOHNSON.

INFORMATION, INTELLIGENCE, NOTICK, ADVICE.

INFORMATION (v. To inform) signifies the thing of which one is informed: INTELLIGENCE, from the Latin intelligo, to understand, signifies that by which one is made to understand: NOTICE, from the Latin notitia, is that which brings a circumstance to our knowledge: ADVICE (v. Advise) signifies that which is made known. These terms come very near to each other in signification, but differ in application: information is the most general and indefinite of all; the three others are but modes of information. Whatever is communicated to us is information, be it public or private, open or concealed; notice, intelligence, and advice are mostly public, but particularly the former. Information and notice may be communicated by word of mouth or by writing; intelligence is mostly communicated by writing or printing; advices are mostly sent by letter: information is mostly an informal mode of communication; notice, intelligence, and advice are mostly formal communications. A servant gives his master information, or one friend sends another information from the country; magistrates or officers give notice of such things as it concerns the public to know and to observe; spies give intelligence of all that passes under their notice; or intelligence is given in the public prints of all that passes worthy of notice: a military commander sends advice to his government of the operations which are going forward under his direction; or one merchant gives advice to another of the state of the market. Intelligence, as the first intimation of an interesting event, ought to be early; advices, as entering into details, ought to be clear and particular; official advices often arrive to contradict non-official intelligence.

There, centring in a focus round and neat,
Let all your rays of information meet.

COWPER.

My lion, whose jaws are at all hours open to intelligence, informs me that there are a few enormous weapons still in being. STEELE.

At his years

Death gives short notice.

THOMSON.

As he was dictating to his hearers with great authority, there came in a gentleman from Garraway's, who told us that there were several letters from France just come in, with advice that the king was in good health. ADDISON.

Information and intelligence, when applied as characteristics of men, have a further distinction: the man of information is so denominated only on account of his knowledge; but a man of intelligence is so denominated on account of his understanding as well as experience and information. It is not possible to be intelligent without information; but we may be well informed without being remarkable for intelligence: a man of information may be an agreeable companion, and fitted to maintain conversation; but an intelligent man will be an instructive companion, and most fitted for conducting business.

I lamented that any man possessing such a fund of information, with a benevolence of soul that comprehended all mankind, a temper most placid, and a heart most social, should suffer in the world's opinion by that obscurity, to which his ill fortune, not his disposition, had reduced him. CUMBERLAND.

If a man were pure intelligence, no ceremonies would be either necessary or proper; but when we reflect that he is composed of body and soul, and that a great part of his knowledge comes through the medium of his senses, we cannot but allow that some accommodation to this compound condition of his nature is advisable in prescribing a form for the direction of his public devotions. GRANT.

TO INFRINGE, VIOLATE, TRANSGRESS.

INFRINGE, from frango, to break, signifies to break into. VIOLATE, from the Latin vis, force, signifies to break with force. TRANSGRESS, from trans and gredior, signifies to go beyond, or farther than we ought.

Civil and moral laws and rights are infringed by those who act in opposition to them: treaties and engagements are violated by those who do not hold them sacred: the bounds which are prescribed by the moral law are transgressed by those who are guilty of any excess. It is the business of government to see that the rights and privileges of individuals or particular bodies be not infringed; policy but too frequently runs counter to equity; where the particular interests of states are more regarded than the dictates of conscience, treaties and compacts are violated: the passions, when not kept under proper control, will ever hurry on men to transgress the limits of right reason.

Women have natural and equitable claims as well as men, and those claims are not to be capriciously superseded or infringed. JOHNSON. No violated leagues with sharp remorse Shall sting the conscious victor. SOMERVILLE. Why hast thou, Satan, broke the bounds prescribed? MILTON.

INFRINGEMENT, INFRACTION.

INFRINGEMENT and INFRACTION, which are both derived from the Latin verb infringo or frango (v. To infringe), are employed according to the different senses of the verb infringe: the former being applied to the rights of individuals, either in their domestic or public capacity; and the latter rather to national transactions. Politeness, which teaches us what is due to every man in the smallest concerns, considers any unasked-for interference in the private affairs of another as an infringement. Equity, which enjoins on nations as well as individuals an attentive consideration to the interests of the whole, forbids the infraction of a treaty in any case.

We see with Orestes (or rather with Sophocles), that "it is fit that such gross infringements of the moral law (as parricide) should be punished with death." MACKENZIE.

No people can, without the infraction of the universal league of social beings, incite those practices in another dominion which they would themselves punish in their own. JOHNSON.

INGENUITY, WIT.

INGENUITY, v. Ingenious. WIT, from the German wissen, to know, signifies knowledge or understanding.

Both these terms imply acuteness of understanding, and differ mostly in its mode of displaying itself. Ingenuity comprehends invention; wit is the fruit of the imagination, which forms new and sudden conceptions of things. One is ingenious in matters either of art or science; one is witty only in matters of sentiment: things may, therefore, be ingenious, but not witty; or witty, but not ingenious; or both witty and ingenious. A mechanical invention, or any ordinary contrivance, is ingenious, but not witty: we say, an ingenious, not a witty solution of a difficulty; a flash of wit, not a flash of ingenuity: a witty humor, a witty conversation; not an ingenious humor or conversation: on the other hand, a thought is ingenious, as it displays acuteness of intellect and aptness to the subject; it is witty, inasmuch as it contains point, and strikes on the understanding of others. Ingenuity is expressed by means of words, or shows itself in the act; mechanical contrivances display ingenuity: wit can be only expressed by words; some men are happy in the display of their wit in conversation.

The people of Trapani are esteemed the most ingenious of the island; they are the authors of many useful and ornamental inventions.

BYRDONE.

Wit consists chiefly in joining things by distant and fanciful relations, which surprise us because they are unexpected. KAMER.

Sometimes the word wit is applied to the operations of the intellect generally, which brings it still nearer in sense to ingenuity, but in this case it always implies a quick and sharp intellect as compared with ingenuity, which may be the result of long thought, or be employed on graver matters.

The more ingenious men are, the more apt they are to trouble themselves. TEMPLE.

When I broke loose from that great body of writers, who have employed their wit and parts in propagating vice and irreligion, I did not question but I should be treated as an odd kind of fellow. ADDISON.

INGENUOUS, INGENIOUS.

It would not have been necessary to point out the distinction between these two words, if they had not been confounded in writing, as well as in speaking. INGENUOUS, in Latin ingenuus, and INGENIOUS, in Latin ingeniosus, are, either immediately or remotely, both derived from ingigno, to be inborn; but the former respects the freedom of the station and consequent nobleness of the character which is inborn: the latter respects the genius or mental powers which are inborn. Truth is coupled with freedom or nobility of birth; the ingenuous, therefore, bespeaks the inborn freedom, by asserting the noblest right, and following the noblest impulse, of human nature, namely, that of speaking the truth; genius is altogether a natural endowment, that is, born with us, independent of external circumstances: the ingenious man, therefore, displays his powers as occasion may offer. We love the ingenuous character on account of the qualities of his heart; we admire the ingenious man on account of the endowments of his mind. One is ingenuous as a man, or ingenious as an author: a man confesses an action ingenuously; he defends it ingeniously.

Compare the ingenuous pliability to virtuous counsels which is in youth, to the confirmed obstinacy in an old sinner. SOUTH.

Ingenious to their ruin, every age
Improves the arts and instruments of rage. WALLER.

INHERENT, INBRED, INBORN, INNATE.

THE INHERENT, from hæreo, to stick, denotes a permanent quality or property, as opposed to that which is adventitious and transitory. INBRED denotes that which is derived principally from habit or by a gradual process, as opposed to what is acquired by actual efforts. INBORN denotes that which is purely natural, in opposition to the artificial. Inherent is the most general in its sense; for what is inbred and inborn is naturally inherent; but all is not inbred and inborn which is inherent. Inanimate objects have inherent properties; but the inbred and inborn exist only in that which receives life; solidity is an inherent, but not an inbred or inborn, property of matter: a love of truth is an innate property of the human mind; it is consequently inherent, inasmuch as nothing can totally destroy it. That which is inbred is bred or nurtured in us from our birth; that which is inborn is simply born in us: a property may be inborn, but not inbred; it cannot, however, be inbred and not inborn. Habits, which are ingrafted into the natural disposition, are properly inbred. Propensities, on the other hand, which are totally independent of education or external circumstances, are properly inborn, as an inborn love of freedom; hence, likewise, the properties of animals are inbred in them, inasmuch as they are derived through the medium of the breed of which the parent partakes.

When my new mind had no infusion known,
Thou gav'st so deep a tincture of thine own,
That ever since I vainly try
To wash away th' inherent dye. COWLEY.

But he, my inbred enemy,
Forth issu'd, brandishing his fatal dart,
Made to destroy; I fled, and cried out death!
MILTON.

Inborn and INNATE, from the Latin natus, born, are precisely the same in meaning, yet they differ somewhat in application. Poetry and the grave style have adopted inborn; philosophy has adopted innate: genius is inborn in some men; nobleness is inborn in others: there is an inborn talent in some men to command, and an inborn fitness in others to obey. Mr. Locke and his followers are pleased to say there is no such thing as innate ideas: and if they only mean that there are no sensible impressions on the soul, until it is acted upon by external objects, they may be right: but if they mean to say that there are no inborn characters or powers in the soul, which predispose it for the reception of certain impressions, they contradict the experience of the learned and the unlearned in all ages, who believe, and that from close observation on themselves and others, that man has, from his birth, not only the general character which belongs to him in common with his species, but also those peculiar characteristics which distinguish individuals from their earliest infancy: all these characters or characteristics are, therefore, not supposed to be produced, but elicited, by circumstances; and ideas, which are but the sensible forms that the soul assumes in its connection with the body, are, on that account, in vulgar language termed innate.

Despair, and secret shame, and conscious thought
Of inborn worth, his lab'ring soul oppress'd.

DRYDEN.

Grant these inventions of the crafty priest,
Yet such inventions never could subsist,
Unless some glimmerings of a future state
Were with the mind coeval and innate.

JENTING.

INJURY, DAMAGE, HURT, HARM, MISCHIEF.

ALL these terms are employed to denote what is done to the disadvantage of any person or thing.

The term INJURY (v. Disadvantage) sometimes includes the idea of violence, or of an act done contrary to law or right, as to inflict or receive an injury, to redress injuries, etc.

It would be wronging him and you to condemn him without examination; if there be injury, there shall be redress.

GOLDSMITH.

Injury is often taken in the general sense of what makes a thing otherwise than it ought to be: the other terms are taken in that sense only, and denote modes of injury. DAMAGE, from damnum, loss, is that injury to a thing which occasions loss to a person or a diminution of value to a thing. HURT (v. Disadvantage) is the injury which destroys the soundness or integrity of things: the HARM (v. Evil) is the smallest kind of injury, which may simply produce inconvenience or trouble: the MISCHIEF (v. Evil) is a great injury, which more or less disturbs the order and consistency of things. Injury is applicable to all bodies indiscriminately, physical and moral; damage to physical bodies only; hurt to physical bodies properly, and to moral objects figuratively. Trade may suffer an injury, or a building may suffer an injury, from time or a variety of other causes: a building, merchandise, and other things may suffer a damage if they are exposed to violence.

These rich and elaborate rooms deserve a far more lasting monument to preserve them from the injury of time.

HOWELL.

There be sundry sorts of trusts, but that of a secret is one of the greatest: I trusted T. P. with a weighty one, conjuring him that it should not take air and go abroad, which was not done according to the rules of friendship, but it went out of him the very next day. Though the inconvenience may be mine, yet the reproach is his, nor would I exchange my damage for his disgrace.

HOWELL.

Hurt is applied to the animal body; a sprain, a cut, or bruise, are little hurts.

These arrows of yours, though they have hit me, they have not hurt me; they had no killing quality.

HOWELL.

It may be figuratively applied to other bodies which may suffer in a similar manner, as a hurt to one's good name.

No plough shall hurt the glebe, no pruning-hook the vine.

DRYDEN.

Harm and mischief are as general in their application as injury, and comprehend what is physically as well as morally bad, but they are more particularly applicable to what is done intentionally by the person: whence ready to do harm or mischief is a characteristic of the individual.

My son is as innocent as a child, I am sure he is, and never did harm to man.

GOLDSMITH.

But furious Dido, with dark thoughts involv'd,
Shook at the mighty mischief she resolv'd.

DRYDEN.

As applied to things, harm and mischief are that which naturally results from the object, when a thing is said to do harm or mischief, that implies that it is its property.

With harmless play amidst the bowls he pass'd.

DRYDEN.

There were two persons, of the profession of the law, by whose several and distinct constitutions the errors and mischiefs of the Star-chamber were introduced.

CLARENDON.

INJUSTICE, INJURY, WRONG.

INJUSTICE (v. Justice), INJURY (v. Disadvantage), and WRONG, signifying the thing that is wrong, are all opposed to the right; but the injustice lies in the principle, the injury in the action that injures. There may, therefore, be injustice where there is no specific injury; and, on the other hand, there may be injury where there is no injustice. When we think worse of a person than we ought to think, we do him an act of injustice; but we do not, in the strict sense of the word, do him an injury: on the other hand, if we say anything to the discredit of another, it will be an injury to his reputation if it be believed; but it may not be an injustice, if it be strictly conformable to truth, and that which one is compelled to say.

The violation of justice, or a breach of the rule of right, constitutes the injustice; but the quantum of ill which falls on the person constitutes the injury. Sometimes a person is dispossessed of his property by fraud or violence; this is an act of injustice; but it is not an injury, if, in consequence of this act, he obtains friends who make it good to him beyond what he has lost: on the other hand, a person suffers very much through the inadvertency of another, which to him is a serious injury, although the offender has not been guilty of injustice.

A lie is properly a species of injustice, and a violation of the right of that person to whom the false speech is directed.

SOUTH.

Lawsuits I'd shun with as much studious care
As I would dens where hungry lions are;
And rather put up injuries than be
A plague to him who'd be a plague to me.

POMFRET.

A wrong partakes both of injustice and injury; it is, in fact, an injury done by one person to another in express violation of justice. The man who seduces a woman from the path of virtue does her the greatest of all wrongs. One repents of injustice, repairs injuries, and redresses wrongs.

The humble man, when he receives a wrong,
Refers revenge to whom it doth belong.

WALLER.

INSIDE, INTERIOR.

THE term INSIDE may be applied to bodies of any magnitude, small or large; INTERIOR is peculiarly appropriate to bodies of great magnitude. We may speak of the inside of a nutshell, but not of its interior: on the other hand, we speak of the interior of St. Paul's, or the interior of a palace. This difference of application is not altogether arbitrary: for inside literally signifies the side that is inward; but interior signifies the space which is more inward than the rest, which is enclosed in an enclosure: consequently cannot be applied to anything but a large space that is enclosed.

As for the inside of their nest, none but themselves were concerned in it, according to the inviolable laws established among those animals (the ants).
ADDISON.

The gates are drawn back, and the interior of the fane is discovered.
CUMBERLAND.

INSIDIOUS, TREACHEROUS.

INSIDIOUS, in Latin insidiosus, from insidia, stratagem or ambush, from insideo, to lie in wait or ambush, signifies as much as lying in wait. TREACHEROUS is changed from traitorous, and derived from trado, to betray, signifying in general the disposition to betray.

The insidious man is not so active as the treacherous man; the former only lies in wait to ensnare us when we are off our guard; the latter throws us off our guard by lulling us into a state of security, in order the more effectually to get us into his power: an enemy may be denominated insidious, but a friend is treacherous. He who is afraid of avowing his real sentiments on religion makes insidious attacks either on its ministers, its doctrines, or its ceremonies: he who is most in the confidence of another is capable of being the most treacherous toward him.

Freethinkers recommend themselves to warm and ingenuous minds by lively strokes of wit, and by arguments really strong against superstition, enthusiasm, and priestcraft: but at the same time they insidiously throw the colors of these upon the fair face of true religion.

LORD LITTLETON.

The world must think him in the wrong,
Would say he made a treach'rous use
Of wit, to flatter and seduce.

SWIFT.

INSIGHT, INSPECTION.

THE INSIGHT into a thing is what we receive: the INSPECTION is what we give: one gets a view into a thing by an insight; one takes a view over a thing by an inspection. An insight serves to increase our own knowledge; inspection enables us to instruct or direct others. An inquisitive traveller tries to get an insight into the manners, customs, laws, and government of the countries which he visits; by inspection a master discovers the errors which are committed by his scholars, and sets them right.

Angels, both good and bad, have a full insight into the activity and force of natural causes.

SOUTH.

Something no doubt is designed; but what that is, I will not presume to determine from an inspection of men's hearts.

SOUTH.

TO INSINUATE, INGRATIATE.

INSINUATE (v. To hint), and INGRATIATE, from gratus, grateful or acceptable, are employed to express an endeavor to gain favor; but they differ in the circumstances of the action. A person who insinuates adopts every art to steal into the good-will of another; but he who ingratiates adopts unartificial means to conciliate good-will. A person of insinuating manners wins upon another imperceptibly, even so as to convert dislike into attachment; a person with ingratiating manners procures good-will by a permanent intercourse. Insinuate and ingratiates differ in the motive, as well as the mode, of the action: the motive is, in both cases, self-interest; but the former is unlawful, and the latter allowable. In proportion as the object to be attained by another's favor is base, so is it necessary to have recourse to insinuation; while the object to be attained is that which may be avowed, ingratiating will serve the purpose. Low persons insinuate themselves into the favor of their superiors, in order to obtain an influence over them: it is commendable in a young person to wish to ingratiates himself with those who are entitled to his esteem and respect.

At the Isle of Rhé he insinuated himself into the very good grace of the Duke of Buckingham.

CLARENDON.

My resolution was now to ingratiates myself with men whose reputation was established.

JOHNSON.

Insinuate may be used in the improper sense for unconscious agents; ingratiates is always the act of a conscious agent. Water will insinuate itself into every body that is in the smallest degree porous; there are few persons of so much apathy that it may not be possible, one way or another, to ingratiates one's self into their favor.

The same character of despotism insinuated itself into every court of Europe.

BURKE.

INSINUATION, REFLECTION.

THESE both imply personal remarks, or such remarks as are directed toward an individual; but the former is less direct and more covert than the latter. An INSINUATION always deals in half words; a REFLECTION is commonly open. They are both levelled at the individual with no good intent; but the insinuation is general, and may be employed to convey any unfavorable sentiment; the reflection is particular, and commonly passes between intimates and persons in close connection. The insinuation respects the honor, the moral character, or the intellectual endowments, of the person: the reflection respects his particular conduct or feelings toward another. Envious people throw out insinuations to the disparagement of those whose merits they dare not openly question; when friends quarrel, they deal largely in reflections on the past.

The prejudiced admirers of the ancients are very angry at the least insinuation that they had any idea of our barbarous tragedy.

TWINKING.

The ill-natured man gives utterance to reflections which a good-natured man stifles.

ADDISON.

INSIPID, DULL, FLAT.

INSIPID, in Latin insipidus, from in and sapio, to taste, signifies without savor. DULL, v. Dull. FLAT, v. Flat.

A want of spirit in the moral sense is designated by these epithets, which borrow their figurative meaning from different properties in nature: the taste is referred to in the word insipid; the properties of colors are considered under the word dull; the property of surface is referred to by the word flat. As the want of flavor in any meat constitutes it insipid, and renders it worthless, so does the want of mind or character in a man render him equally insipid, and devoid of the distinguishing characteristic of his nature: as the beauty and perfection of colors consist in their brightness, the absence of this essential property, which constitutes dulness, renders them uninteresting objects to the eye; so the want of spirit in a moral composition, which constitutes its dulness, deprives it at the same time of that ingredient which should awaken attention: as in the natural world objects are either elevated or flat, so in the moral world the spirits are either raised or depressed, and such moral representations as are calculated to raise the spirits are termed spirited, while those which fail in this object are termed flat. An insipid writer is without sentiment of any kind or degree; a dull writer fails in vivacity and vigor of sentiment; a flat performance is wanting in the property of provoking mirth, which should be its peculiar ingredient.

To a covetous man all other things but wealth are insipid. SOUTH.

But yet beware of councils when too full,
Number makes long disputes and graveness dull.
DENHAM.

The senses are disgusted with their old entertainments, and existence turns flat and insipid.
GROVE.

TO INSIST, PERSIST.

BOTH these terms being derived from the Latin sisto, to stand, express the idea of resting or keeping to a thing; but INSIST signifies to rest on a point, and PERSIST, from per, through or by, and sisto (v. To continue), signifies to keep on with a thing, to carry it through. We insist on a matter by maintaining it; we persist in a thing by continuing to do it: we insist by the force of authority or argument; we persist by the mere act of the will. A person insists on that which he conceives to be his right: or he insists on that which he conceives to be right: but he persistent in that which he has no will to give up. To insist is, therefore, an act of discretion; to persist is mostly an act of folly or caprice: the former is always taken in a good or indifferent sense; the latter mostly in a bad sense. A parent ought to insist on all matters that are of essential importance to his children; a spoiled child persistent in its follies from perversity of humor.

This natural tendency of despotic power to ignorance and barbarity, though not insisted upon by others, is, I think, an inconsiderable argument against that form of government. ADDISON.

So easy it is for every man living to err, and so hard to wrest from any man's mouth the plain acknowledgment of error that what hath once been inconsiderately defended, the same is commonly perpetrated in as long as wit, by whetting itself, is able to find out any shift, be it never so slight, whereby to escape out of the hands of a present contradiction. HOOKER.

TO INSNARE, ENTRAP, ENTANGLE, INVEIGLE.

THE idea of getting any object artfully into one's power is common to all these terms: to INSNARE is to take in, or by means of a snares; to ENTRAP is to take in a trap, or by means of a trap; to ENTANGLE is to take in a tangle, or by means of tangled thread; to INVEIGLE is to take by means of making blind, from the French aveugle, blind.

Insure and entangle are used either in the natural or moral sense; entrap mostly in the natural, sometimes in the figurative, inveigle only in the moral sense. In the natural sense birds are insured by means of bird-lime, nooses, or whatever else may deprive them of their liberty: men and beasts are entrapped in whatever serves as a trap or an enclosure; they may be entrapped by being lured into a house or any place of confinement; all creatures are entangled by nets, or that which confines the limbs and prevents them from moving forward.

This lion (the literary lion) has a particular way of imitating the sound of the creature he would insure. ADDISON.

As one who long in thickets and in brakes
Entangled, winds now this way and now that,
His devious course uncertain, seeking home,
So I, designing other themes, and called
To adorn the Sofa with eulogium due,
Have rambled wide. COWPER.

Though the new-dawning year in its advance
With hope's gay promise may entrap the mind,
Let memory give one retrospective glance.
CUMBERLAND.

In the moral sense, men are said to be insured by their own passions and the allurements of pleasure into a course of vice which deprives them of the use of their faculties, and makes them virtually captives; they are entangled by their errors and imprudencies in difficulties which interfere with their moral freedom, and prevent them from acting. They are inveigled by the artifices of others, when the consequences of their own actions are shut out from their view, and they are made to walk like blind men.

ADDISON.

INSOLVENCY, FAILURE, BANKRUPTCY.

INSOLVENCY, from insolvo, not to pay, signifies the state of not paying, or not being able to pay. FAILURE, v. Failure. BANKRUPTCY, from the two words banka rupta, signifies a broken bank.

All these terms are in particular use in the mercantile world, but are not excluded also from general application. Insolvency is a state; failure, an act flowing out of that state; and bankruptcy an effect of that act. Insolvency is a condition of not being able to pay one's debts; failure is a cessation of business, from the want of means to carry it on; and bankruptcy is a legal surrender of all one's remaining goods into the hands of one's creditors, in consequence of a real or supposed insolvency. These terms are seldom confined to one person, or description of persons. As an incapacity to pay debts is very frequent among others besides men of business, insolvency is said of any such persons; a gentleman may die in a state of insolvency who does not leave effects sufficient to cover all demands. Although failure is here specifically taken for a failure in business, yet there may be a failure in one particular undertaking without any direct insolvency: a failure may likewise only imply a temporary failure in payment, or it may imply an entire failure of the concern. As a bankruptcy is a legal transaction, which entirely dissolves the firm under which any business is conducted, it necessarily implies a failure in the full extent of the term; yet it does not necessarily imply an insolvency; for some men may, in consequence of a temporary failure, be led to commit an act of bankruptcy, who are afterward enabled to give a full dividend to all their creditors.

By an act of insolvency all persons who are in too low a way of dealing to be bankrupts, or not in a mercantile state of life, are discharged from all suits and imprisonments, by delivering up all their estate and effects.

BLACKSTONE.

The greater the whole quantity of trade, the greater of course must be the positive number of failures, while the aggregate success is still in the same proportion.

BURKE.

That bankruptcy, the very apprehension of which is one of the causes assigned for the fall of the monarchy, was the capital on which the French republic opened her traffic with the world.

BURKE.

INSPECTION, SUPERINTENDENCY, OVERSIGHT.

THE office of looking into the conduct of others is expressed by the first two terms; but INSPECTION comprehends little more than the preservation of good order; SUPERINTENDENCE includes the arrangement of the whole. The monitor of a school has the inspection of the conduct of his school-fellows, but the master has the superintendence of the school. The officers of an army inspect the men, to see that they observe all the rules that have been laid down to them; a general or superior officer has the superintendence of any military operation. Fidelity is peculiarly wanted in an inspector, judgment and experience in a superintendent. Inspection is said of things as well as persons; OVERSIGHT only of persons: one has the inspection of books in order to ascertain their accuracy; one has the oversight of persons to prevent irregularity: there is an inspector of the customs, and an overseer of the poor.

This author proposes that there should be examiners appointed to inspect the genius of every particular boy.

BURDELL.

When female minds are embittered by age or solitude, their malignity is generally exerted in a spiteful superintendence of trifles.

JOHNSON.

So great was his care, that he trusted no man without his immediate oversight; yet he acted all things with common council and consent, such was his wariness and prudence.

CLARENDON.

INSTANT, MOMENT.

INSTANT, from insto, to stand over, signifies the point of time that stands over us, or, as it were, over our heads. MOMENT, from the Latin momentum, signifies properly movement, but is here taken for the small particle of time in which any movement is made.

Instant is always taken for the time present; moment is taken generally for either past, present, or future. A dutiful child comes the instant he is called; a prudent person embraces the favorable moment. When they are both taken for the present time, instant expresses a much shorter space than moment; when we desire a person to do a thing this instant, it requires haste: if we desire him to do it this moment, it only admits of no delay. Instantaneous relief is necessary on some occasions to preserve life; a moment's thought will furnish a ready wit with a suitable reply.

Some circumstances of misery are so powerfully ridiculous, that neither kindness nor duty can withstand them; they force the friend, the dependent, or the child, to give way to instantaneous motions of merriment. JOHNSON.

I can easily overlook any present momentary sorrow, when I reflect that it is in my power to be happy a thousand years hence. BERKELEY.

TO INSTITUTE, ESTABLISH, FOUND, ERECT.

To INSTITUTE, in Latin institutus, participle of instituo, from in and statuo, to place or appoint, signifying to dispose or fix for a specific end, is to form according to a certain plan; to ESTABLISH (v. To fix) is to fix in a certain position what has been formed; to FOUND (v. To found) is to lay the foundation of anything; to ERECT (v. To build) is to make erect. Laws, communities, and particular orders, are instituted; schools, colleges, and various societies, are established: in the former case something new is supposed to be framed; in the latter case it is supposed only to have a certain situation assigned to it. The order of the Jesuits was instituted by Ignatius de Loyola; schools were established by Alfred the Great, in various parts of his dominions. The act of instituting comprehends design and method; that of establishing includes the idea of authority. The Inquisition was instituted in the time of Ferdinand; the Church of England is established by authority. To institute is always the immediate act of some agent; to establish is sometimes the effect of circumstances. Men of public spirit institute that which is for the public good; a communication or trade between certain places becomes established in course of time. An institution is properly of a public nature, but establishments are as often private: there are charitable and literary institutions, but domestic establishments.

The leap-years were fixed to their due times according to Julius Caesar's institution.

FRIDEAUX.

The French have outdone us in these particulars by the establishment of a society for the invention of proper inscriptions (for their medals). ADDISON.

To found is a species of instituting which borrows its figurative meaning from the nature of buildings, and is applicable to that which is formed after the manner of a building; a public school is founded when its pecuniary resources are formed into a fund or foundation. To erect is a species of founding, for it expresses, in fact, a leading particular in the act of founding: nothing can be founded without being erected; although some things may be erected without being expressly founded in the natural sense; a house is both founded and erected; a monument is erected but not founded; so in the figurative sense, a college is founded and consequently erected: but a tribunal is erected, not founded.

After the flood which depopulated Attica, it is generally supposed no king reigned over it till the time of Cecrops, the founder of Athens.

CUMBERLAND.

Princes as well as private persons have erected colleges, and assigned liberal endowments to students and professors. BERKELEY.

INSTRUMENT, TOOL.

INSTRUMENT, in Latin instrumentum, from instruo, signifies the thing by which an effect is produced. TOOL comes probably from toil, signifying the thing with which one toils. These terms are both employed to express the means of producing an end; they differ principally in this, that the former is used mostly in a good sense, the latter only in a bad sense, for persons. Individuals in high stations are often the instruments in bringing about great changes in nations; spies and informers are the worthless tools of government.

Devotion has often been found a powerful instrument in humanizing the manners of men.

BLAIR.

Poor York! the harmless tool of others' hate, He sues for pardon, and repents too late. SWIFT.

INSURRECTION, SEDITION, REBELLION, REVOLT.

INSURRECTION, from surgo, to rise up, signifies rising up against any power that is. SEDITION, in Latin seditio, compounded of se and itio, signifies a going apart, that is, the people going apart from the government. REBELLION, in Latin rebellio, from rebello, signifies turning upon or against, in a hostile manner, that to which one has been before bound. REVOLT, in French révolter, is most probably compounded of re and voller, from volvo, to roll, signifying to roll or turn back from, to turn against that to which one has been bound.

The term insurrection is general; it is used in a good or bad sense, according to the nature of the power against which one rises up: sedition and rebellion are more specific; they are always taken in the bad sense of unallowed opposition to lawful authority. There may be an insurrection against usurped power, which is always justifiable; but sedition and rebellion are levelled against power universally acknowledged to be legitimate. Insurrection is always open; it is a rising up of many in a mass; but it does not imply any concerted, or any specifically active measure: a united spirit of opposition, as the moving cause, is all that is comprehended in the meaning of the term: sedition is either secret or open, according to circumstances; in popular governments it will be open and determined; in monarchical governments it is secretly organized: rebellion is the consummation of sedition; the scheme of opposition which has been digested in secrecy breaks out into open hostilities, and becomes rebellion. Insurrections may be made by nations against a foreign dominion, or by subjects against their government: sedition and rebellion are carried on by subjects only against their government.

Elizabeth enjoyed a wonderful calm (excepting some short gusts of insurrection at the beginning) for near upon forty-five years together.

HOWELL.

When the Roman people began to bring in plebeians to the office of chiefest power and dignity, then began those seditions which so long distempered, and at length ruined the State.

TEMPLE.

If that rebellion
Came like itself, in base and abject routs,
You, reverend father, and these noble lords,
Had not been here to dress the ugly forms
Of base and bloody insurrection. SHAKESPEARE.

Revolt, like rebellion, signifies originally a warring or turning against the power to which one has been subject; but revolt is mostly taken either in an indifferent or a good sense for resisting a foreign dominion which has been imposed by force of arms.

He was greatly strengthened, and the enemy as much enfeebled by daily revolts. RALEIGH.

Rebel and revolt may be figuratively applied to the powers of the mind when opposed to each other: the will rebels against the reason.

Our self-love is ever ready to revolt from our better judgment, and join the enemy within.

STEELE.

Thus conscience pleads her cause within the breast,

Though long rebelled against, not yet suppress'd.

COWPER.

INTELLECT, GENIUS, TALENT.

INTELLECT, in Latin intellectus, from intelligo, to understand, signifies the gift of understanding, as opposed to mere instinct or impulse. GENIUS, in Latin genius, from gigno, to be born, signifies that which is peculiarly born with us. TALENT, v. Faculty.

Intellect is here the generic term, and includes in its meaning that of the two other terms; there cannot be genius and talent without intellect, but there may be intellect without any express genius or talent. Intellect is the intellectual power improved and exalted by cultivation and exercise; in this sense we speak of a man of intellect, or a work that displays great intellect; genius is the particular bent of the intellect which is born with a man, as a genius for poetry, painting, music, etc.; talent is a particular mode of intellect which qualifies its possessor to do some things better than others, as a talent for learning languages, a talent for the stage, etc.

There was a select set, supposed to be distinguished by superiority of intellects, who always passed the evening together.

JOHNSON.

Thomson thinks in a peculiar train, and always thinks as a man of genius.

JOHNSON.

It is commonly thought that the sagacity of these fathers (the Jesuits) in discovering the talent of a young student has not a little contributed to the figure which their order has made in the world. BUDOKL.

INTENT, INTENSE.

INTENT and INTENSE are both derived from the verb to intend, signifying to stretch toward a point, or to a great degree: the former is said only of the person or mind; the latter qualifies things in general: a person is intent when his mind is on the stretch toward an object; his application is intense when his mind is for a continuance closely fixed on certain objects; cold is intense when it seems to be wound up to its highest pitch.

There is an evil spirit continually active and intent to seduce. SOUTH.

Mutual favors naturally beget an intense affection in generous minds. SPECTATOR.

TO INTERCEDE, INTERPOSE, MEDIATE, INTERFERE, INTERMEDDLE.

INTERCEDE signifies literally going between; INTERPOSE, placing one's self between; MEDIATE, coming in the middle; INTERFERE, setting one's self between; and INTERMEDDLE, meddling or mixing among.

One intercedes between parties that are unequal; one interposes between parties that are equal: one intercedes in favor of that party which is threatened with punishment; one interposes between parties that threaten each other with evil: we intercede with the parent in favor of the child who has offended, in order to obtain pardon for him; one interposes between two friends who are disputing, to prevent them from going to extremities. One intercedes by means of persuasion; it is an act of courtesy or kindness in the interceded party to comply; one interposes by an exercise of authority; it is a matter of propriety or necessity in the parties to conform. The favorite of a monarch intercedes in behalf of some criminal, that his punishment may be mitigated; the magistrates interpose with their authority to prevent the broils of the disorderly from coming to serious acts of violence.

Virgil recovered his estate by Mæcenas's intercession. DAYDEN.

Those few you see escap'd the storm, and fear,
Unless you interpose, a shipwreck here.

DAYDEN.

To intercede and interpose are employed on the highest and lowest occasions; to mediate is never employed but in matters of the greatest moment. As earthly offenders, we require the intercession of a fellow-mortal; as offenders against the God of heaven, we require the intercession of a Divine Being: without the timely interposition of a superior, trifling disputes may grow into bloody quarrels; without the interposition of Divine Providence, we cannot conceive of anything important as taking place: to settle the affairs of nations, mediators may afford a salutary assistance; to bring about the redemption of a lost world, the Son of God condescended to be Mediator.

It is generally better (in negotiating) to deal by speech than by letter, and by the mediation of a third than by a man's self. BACON.

All these acts are performed for the good of others; but interferes and intermeddles are of a different description: one may interfere for the good of others, or to gratify one's self; one never intermeddles but for selfish purposes: the first three terms are therefore always used in a good sense; the fourth in a good or bad sense, according to circumstances; the last always in a bad sense.

Religion interferes not with any rational pleasure. SOUTH.

The sight intermeddles not with that which affects the smell. SOUTH.

INTERCHANGE, EXCHANGE, RECIPROCITY.

INTERCHANGE is a frequent and mutual exchange (v. Change); EXCHANGE consists of one act only; an interchange consists of many acts: an interchange is used only in the moral sense; exchange is used mostly in the proper sense: an interchange of civilities keeps alive goodwill; an exchange of commodities is a convenient mode of trade.

Kindness is preserved by a constant interchange of pleasures. JOHNSON.

The whole course of nature is a great exchange. SOUTH.

Interchange is an act; RECIPROCITY is an abstract property: by an interchange of sentiment, friendships are engendered; the reciprocity of good services is what renders them doubly acceptable to those who do them, and to those who receive them.

That is the happiest conversation where there is no competition, no vanity, but a calm, quiet interchange of sentiment. JOHNSON.

The services of the poor, and the protection of the rich, become reciprocally necessary. BLAIR.

INTERCOURSE, COMMUNICATION, CONNECTION, COMMERCE.

INTERCOURSE, in Latin intercursus, signifies literally a running between. COMMUNICATION, v. To communicate. CONNECTION, v. To connect. COMMERCE, from com and merces, merchandise, signifies literally an exchange of merchandise, and generally an interchange.

Intercourse and commerce subsist only between persons; communication and connection between persons and things. An intercourse with persons may be carried on in various forms; either by an interchange of civilities, which is a friendly intercourse; an exchange of commodities, which is a commercial intercourse; or an exchange of words, which is a verbal and partial intercourse: a communication, in this sense, is a species of intercourse; namely, that which consists in the communication of one's thoughts to another, which may subsist between man and man, or between man and his Maker.

The world is maintained by intercourse.

SOURIN.

How happy is an intellectual being, who, by prayer and meditation, opens this communication between God and his own soul! ADDISON.

A connection consists of a permanent intercourse; since one who has a regular intercourse for purposes of trade with another is said to have a connection with him, or to stand in connection with him. There may therefore be a partial intercourse or communication where there is no connection, nothing to bind or link the parties to each other: but there cannot be a connection which is not kept up by continual intercourse.

A very material part of our happiness or misery arises from the connections we have with those around us. BLAIR.

The commerce is a species of general but close intercourse; it may consist either of frequent meeting and regular co-operation, or in cohabitation: in this sense we speak of the commerce of men one with another, or the commerce of man and wife, of parents and children, and the like.

I should venture to call politeness benevolence in trifles, or the preference of others to ourselves, in little, daily, and hourly occurrences in the commerce of life. CHATHAM.

As it respects things, communication is said of places in the proper sense; connection is used for things in the proper or improper sense: there is said to be a communication between two rooms when there is a passage open from one to the other; one house has a connection with another when there is a common passage or thoroughfare to them: a communication is kept up between two countries by means of regular or irregular conveyances; a connection subsists between two towns when the inhabitants trade with each other, intermarry, and the like.

I suggested the probability of a subterraneous communication between this and the flume Freddo. BYRDONE.

Providence, in its economy, regards the whole system of time and things together, so that we cannot discover the beautiful connections between incidents which lie widely separated in time. ADDISON.

INTEREST, CONCERN.

THE INTEREST (from the Latin interesse, to be among, or have a part or a share in a thing) is more comprehensive than CONCERN (v. Affair). We have an interest in whatever touches or comes near to our feelings or our external circumstances; we have a concern in that which demands our attention. Interest is that which is agreeable; it consists of either profit, advantage, gain, or amusement; it binds us to an object, and makes us think of it: concern, on the other hand, is something involuntary or painful; we have a concern in that which we are obliged to look to, which we are bound to from the fear of losing or of suffering. It is the interest of every man to cultivate a religious temper; it is the concern of all to be on their guard against temptation.

Their interest no priest nor sorcerer Forgets.

DEKHAM.

And could the marble rocks but know,
They'd strive to find some secret way unknown,
Mangle the senseless nature of the stone,
Their pity and concern to show.

POMFREY.

INTERMEDIATE, INTERVENING.

INTERMEDIATE signifies being in the midst, between two objects; INTERVENING signifies coming between: the former is applicable to space and time; the latter either to time or circumstances. The intermediate time between the commencement and the termination of a truce is occupied with preparations for the renewal of hostilities; intervening circumstances sometimes change the views of the belligerent parties, and dispose their minds to peace.

A right opinion is that which connects truth by the shortest train of intermediate propositions.

JOHNSON.

Hardly would any transient gleam of intervening joy be able to force its way through the clouds, if the successive scenes of distress through which we are to pass were laid before our view.

BLAIR.

INTERVAL, RESPITE.

INTERVAL, in Latin intervallum, signifies literally the space between the stakes which formed a Roman intrenchment; and, by an extended application, it signifies any space. RESPITE is probably contracted from respirat, a breathing again.

Every respite requires an interval; but there are many intervals where there is no respite. The term interval respects time only; respite includes the idea of ceasing from action for a time; intervals of ease are a respite to one who is oppressed with labor; the interval which is sometimes granted to a criminal before his execution is in the properest sense a respite.

Any uncommon exertion of strength, or perseverance in labor, is succeeded by a long interval of languor.

JOHNSON.

Give me leave to allow myself no respite from labor.

SPECTATOR.

INTERVENTION, INTERPOSITION.

THE INTERVENTION, from inter, between, and venio, to come, is said of inanimate objects; the INTERPOSITION, from inter, between, and pono, to place, is said only of rational agents. The light of the moon is obstructed by the intervention of the clouds; the life of an individual is preserved by the interposition of a superior: human life is so full of contingencies, that when we have formed our projects we can never say what may intervene to prevent their execution; when a man is engaged in an unequal combat, he has no chance of escaping but by the timely interposition of one who is able to rescue him.

Reflect also on the calamitous intervention of picture-cleaners (to originals).

BARRY.

Death ready stands to interpose his dart.

MILTON.

INTOXICATION, DRUNKENNESS, INFATUATION.

INTOXICATION, from the Latin toxicon, a poison, signifies the state of being imbued with a poison. DRUNKENNESS signifies the state of having drunk overmuch. INFATUATION, from fatuus, foolish, signifies making foolish, or the state of being made foolish.

Intoxication and drunkenness are used either in the proper or the improper sense; infatuation in the improper sense only; intoxication is a general state; drunkenness a particular state: intoxication may be produced by various causes; drunkenness is produced only by an immoderate indulgence in some intoxicating liquor: a person may be intoxicated by the smell of strong liquors, or by vapors which produce a similar effect; he becomes drunken by the drinking of wine or other spirits. In the improper sense, a deprivation of one's reasoning faculties is the common idea in the signification of all these terms: intoxication and drunkenness spring from the intemperate state of the feelings; infatuation springs from the ascendancy of the passions over the reasoning powers: a person is intoxicated with success, drunk with joy, and infatuated by an excess of vanity, or an impetuosity of character.

This plan of empire was not taken up in the first intoxication of unexpected success.

BURKE.

Passion is the drunkenness of the mind.

SOUTH.

A sure destruction impends over those infatuated princes who, in the conflict with this new and unheard-of power, proceed as if they were engaged in a war that bore a resemblance to their former contests.

BURKE.

INTRINSIC, REAL, GENUINE, NATIVE.

INTRINSIC, in Latin intrinsecus, signifies on the inside, that is, lying in the thing itself. REAL, from the Latin res, signifies belonging to the very thing. GENUINE, in Latin genuinus, from geno or gigno, to bring forth, signifies actually brought forth, or springing out of a thing. NATIVE, in Latin nativus, and natus, born, signifies actually born, or arising from a thing.

The value of a thing is either intrinsic or real: but the intrinsic value is said in regard to its extrinsic value; the real value in regard to the artificial: the intrinsic value of a book is that which it will fetch when sold in a regular way, in opposition to the extrinsic value, as being the gift of a friend, a particular edition, or a particular type: the real value of a book, in the proper sense, lies in the fineness of the paper, and the costliness of its binding; and, in the improper sense, it lies in the excellence of its contents, in opposition to the artificial value which it acquires in the minds of bibliomaniacs from being a scarce edition.

Men, however distinguished by external accidents or intrinsic qualities, have all the same wants, the same pains, and, as far as the senses are consulted, the same pleasures. JOHNSON.

You have settled, by an economy as perverted as the policy, two establishments of government, one real, the other fictitious. BURKE.

The worth of a man is either genuine or native: the genuine worth of a man lies in the excellence of his moral character, as opposed to his adventitious worth, which he acquires from the possession of wealth, power, and dignity: his native worth is that which is inborn in him, and natural, in opposition to the meretricious and borrowed worth which he may derive from his situation, his talent, or his efforts to please.

His genuine and less gulfy wealth t' explore,
Search not his bottom, but survey his shore. DENHAM.

How lovely does the human mind appear in its native purity. EARL OF CHATHAM.

TO INTRODUCE, PRESENT.

To INTRODUCE, from the Latin introduco, signifies literally to bring within or into any place; to PRESENT (v. To give) signifies to bring into the presence of. As they respect persons, the former passes between equals, the latter only among persons of rank and power: one literary man is introduced to another by means of a common friend; he is presented at court by means of a nobleman.

On each side of the gate was a lesser entrance, through which the persons either of gods or men were introduced. POTTER.

The good old man leaped from his throne, and after he had embraced him, presented him to his daughter, which caused a general acclamation. ADDISON.

As these terms respect things, we say that subjects are introduced in the course of conversation; men's particular views upon certain subjects are presented to the notice of others through the medium of publication.

The endeavors of freethinkers tend only to introduce slavery and error among men. BERKELEY.

Now every leaf, and every moving breath,
Presents a foe, and every foe a death. DENHAM.

TO INTRUDE, OBTRUDE.

To INTRUDE is to thrust one's self into a place; to OBTRUDE is to thrust one's self in the way. It is intrusion to go into any society unasked and undesired; it is obtruding to put one's self in the way of another by joining the company and taking a part in the conversation without invitation or consent.

An intruder is unwelcome because his company is not at all desired, but an obtruder may be no further unwelcome than as he occasions an interruption or disturbance.

Where mouldering abbey walls overhang the glade,
And oaks coeval spread a mournful shade,
The screaming nations, hovering in mid-air,
Loudly resent the stranger's freedom there;
And seem to warn him never to repeat
His bold intrusion on their dark retreat. COWPER.

Artists are sometimes ready to talk to an incidental inquirer as they do to one another, and to make their knowledge ridiculous by injudicious obtrusion. JOHNSON.

In the moral application they preserve the same distinction. Thoughts intrude sometimes on the mind which we wish to banish; unpleasant thoughts obtrude themselves to the exclusion or interruption of those we wish to retain.

The intrusion of scruples, and the recollection of better notions, will not suffer some to live contented with their own conduct. JOHNSON.

You gain at least, what is no small advantage, security from those troublesome and wearisome discontents which are always obtruding themselves upon a mind vacant, unemployed, and undetermined. JOHNSON.

INTRUDER, INTERLOPER.

AN INTRUDER (v. To intrude) thrusts himself in: an INTERLOPER, from the German laufen, to run, runs in between and takes his station. The intruder, therefore, is only for a short space of time, and in an unimportant degree; but the interloper abridges another of his essential rights and for a permanency. A man is an intruder who is an unbidden guest at the table of another; he is an interloper when he joins any society in such manner as to obtain its privileges, without sharing its burdens. Intruders are always offensive in the domestic circle: interlopers in trade are always regarded with an evil eye.

I would not have you to offer it to the doctor, as eminent physicians do not love intruders. JOHNSON.

Some proposed to vest the trade to America in exclusive companies, which interest would render the most vigilant guardians of the Spanish commerce, against the encroachments of interlopers. ROBERTSON.

INVALID, PATIENT.

INVALID, in Latin invalidus, signifies literally one not strong or in good health; PATIENT, from the Latin patiens, suffering, signifies one suffering under disease. Invalid is a general, and patient a particular term; a person may be an invalid without being a patient: he may be a patient without being an invalid. An invalid is so denominated from his wanting his ordinary share of health and strength; but the patient is one who is laboring under some bodily suffering. Old soldiers are called invalids who are no longer able to bear the fatigues of warfare: but they are not necessarily patients. He who is under the surgeon's hands for any wound is a patient, but not necessarily an invalid.

INVASION, INCURSION, IRRUPTION, INROAD.

THE idea of making a forcible entrance into a foreign territory is common to all these terms. INVASION, from vado, to go, expresses merely this general idea, without any particular qualification: INCURSION, from curro, to run, signifies a hasty and sudden invasion: IRRUPTION, from riumpo, to break, signifies a particularly violent invasion; INROAD, from in and road, signifying the making a road or way for one's self, implies the going farther into a country and making a longer stay than by an incursion. Invasion is said of that which passes in distant lands; Alexander invaded India; Hannibal crossed the Alps, and made an invasion into Italy: incursion is said of neighboring States; the borderers on each side the Tweed used to make frequent incursions into England or Scotland.

Xerxes invaded their territory (as some say) with seventeen hundred thousand men. POTTER.

They, frequently made incursions into countries which they spoiled and depopulated, and if their force was great enough, drove out the inhabitants and compelled them to seek new seats. POTTER.

Invasion is the act of a regular army; it is a systematic military movement: irruption and inroad are the irregular movements of bodies of men; the former is applied particularly to uncultivated nations, and the latter, like incursion, to neighboring states: the Goths and Vandals made irruptions into Europe; the Scotch and English used to make inroads upon each other.

The nations of the Ausonian shore
Shall hear the dreadful rumor from afar
Of arm'd invasion, and embrace the war.

DRYDEN.

The study of ancient literature was interrupted in Europe by the irruption of the Northern nations. JOHNSON.

From Scotland we have had, in former times, some alarms and inroads into the northern parts of this kingdom. BACON.

These words preserve the same distinction in their figurative application. Invade signifies a hostile attack, and may be applied to physical objects.

Far off we hear the waves, which surly sound,
Inroads the rocks; the rocks their groans rebound. DRYDEN.

TO INVENT, FEIGN, FRAME, FABRICATE, FORGE.

ALL these terms are employed to express the production of something out of the mind, by means of its own efforts. To INVENT (v. To contrive) is the general term; the other terms imply modes of invention under different circumstances. To invent, as distinguished from the rest, is busied in creating new forms, either by means of the imagination or the reflective powers; it forms combinations either purely spiritual, or those which are mechanical and physical: the poet invents imagery; the philosopher invents mathematical problems or mechanical instruments.

Pythagoras invented the forty-seventh proposition of the first book of Euclid. BARTELET.

Invent is used for the production of new forms to real objects, or for the creation of unreal objects; to FEIGN (v. To feign) is used for the creation of unreal objects, or such as have no existence but in the mind: a play or a story is invented from what passes in the world; Mohammed's religion consists of nothing but inventions: the heathen poets feigned all the tales and fables which constitute the mythology or history of their deities. To FRAME, that is, to make according to a frame, is a species of invention which consists in the disposition as well as the combination of objects. Thespis was the inventor of tragedy: Psalmanazar framed an entirely new language, which he pretended to be spoken on the Island of Formosa; Solon framed a new set of laws for the city of Athens.

If acrimony, slander, and abuse
Give it a charge to blacken and traduce,
Though Butler's wit, Pope's numbers, Prior's essays,
With all that fancy can invent to please,
Adorn the polish'd periods as they fall,
One madrigal of theirs is worth them all. COWPER.

Their savage eyes turn'd to a modest gaze
By the sweet power of music: therefore the poet Did feign that Orpheus drew trees, stones, and floods. SHAKESPEARE.

Nature hath fram'd strange fellows in her time. SHAKESPEARE.

To invent, feign, and frame are all occasionally employed in the ordinary concerns of life, and in a bad sense; fabricate is seldom and forge never used any otherwise. Invent is employed as to that which is the fruit of one's own mind, and mostly contrary to the truth; to feign is employed as to that which is unreal; to frame is employed as to that which requires deliberation and arrangement; to fabricate and forge are employed as to that which is absolutely false, and requiring more or less exercise of the inventive power. A person invents a lie, and feigns sorrow; invents an excuse, and feigns an attachment. A story is invented, inasmuch as it is new, and not before conceived by others, or occasioned by the suggestions of others; it is framed, inasmuch as it required to be duly disposed in all its parts, so as to be consistent; it is fabricated, inasmuch as it runs in direct opposition to actual circumstances, and therefore has required the skill and labor of a workman; it is forged, inasmuch as it seems by its utter falsehood and extravagance to have caused as much severe action in the brain as what is produced by the fire in a furnace or forge.

None can be supposed so utterly regardless of their own happiness as to expire in torment, and hazard their eternity, to support any fables and inventions of their own, or any forgeries of their predecessors who had presided in the same church. ADDISON.

Not more affronted by avowed neglect
Than by the mere dissembler's feigned respect. COWPER.

I cannot deny but that it would be easy for an impostor who was fabricating a letter in the name of St. Paul, to collect these articles into one view. PALEY

TO INVEST, ENDUE, OR ENDOW.

To INVEST, from vestio, signifies to clothe in anything. ENDUE or ENDOW, from the Latin induo, signifies to put on anything. One is invested with that which is external: one is endued with that which is internal. We invest a person with an office or a dignity: a person is endued with good qualities. To invest is a real external action; but to endue may be merely fictitious or mental. The king is invested with supreme authority; a lover endues his mistress with every earthly perfection. Endow is but a variation of endue, and yet it seems to have acquired a distinct office: we may say that a person is endued or endowed with a good understanding; but as an act of the imagination endow is not to be substituted for endue: for we do not say that it endows but endues things with properties.

INVIDIOUS, ENVIOUS.

INVIDIOUS, in Latin invidiosus, from invidia and invideo, not to look at, signifies looking at with an evil eye: ENVIOUS is literally only a variation of invidious. Invidious, in its common acceptation, signifies causing ill-will; envious signifies having ill-will. A task is invidious that puts one in the way of giving offence; a look is envious that is full of envy. Invidious qualifies the thing; envious qualifies the temper of the mind. It is invidious for one author to be judge against another who has written on the same subject: a man is envious when the prospect of another's happiness gives him pain.

For I must speak what wisdom would conceal,
And truths invidious to the great reveal.

FORZ.

They that desire to excel in too many matters

INVINCIBLE, UNCONQUERABLE, INSUPERABLE, INSURMOUNTABLE.

INVINCIBLE signifies not to be vanquished (v. To conquer): UNCONQUERABLE, not to be conquered: INSUPERABLE, not to be overcome: INSURMOUNTABLE, not to be surmounted. Persons or things are in the strict sense invincible which can withstand all force; but as in this sense nothing created can be termed invincible, the term is employed to express strongly whatever can withstand human force in general: on this ground the Spaniards termed their Armada invincible. The qualities of the mind are termed unconquerable when they are not to be gained over or brought under the control of one's own reason, or the judgment of another: hence obstinacy is with propriety denominated unconquerable which will yield to no foreign influence. The particular disposition of the mind or turn of thinking is termed insuperable, inasmuch as it baffles our resolution or wishes to have it altered; an aversion is insuperable which no reasoning or endeavor on our own part can overcome. Things are denominated insurmountable, inasmuch as they baffle one's skill or efforts to get over them, or put them out of one's way: an obstacle is insurmountable which in the nature of things is irremovable. Some people have an insuperable antipathy to certain animals; some persons are of so modest and timid a character, that the necessity of addressing strangers is with them an insuperable objection to using any endeavors for their own advancement; the difficulties which Columbus had to encounter in his discovery of the New World, would have appeared insurmountable to any mind less determined and persevering.

The Americans believed at first, that while cherished by the parental beams of the sun, the Spaniards were invincible.

INWARD, INTERNAL, INNER, INTERIOR.

INWARD signifies toward the inside, that is, not absolutely within: INTERNAL signifies positively within: INNER, as the comparative of inward, signifies more inward; and INTERIOR, as the comparative of internal, signifies more internal. Inward is employed more frequently to express a state than to qualify an object; internal to qualify the objects: a thing is said to be turned inward which forms a part of the inside: it is said to be internal as one of its characteristics; inward, as denoting the position, is indefinite; anything that is in the smallest degree is inward; thus what we take in the mouth is inward in distinction from that which may be applied to the lips: but that is properly internal which lies in the very frame and system of the body; inner, which rises in degree on inward, is applicable to such bodies as admit of specific degrees of enclosure: thus the inner shell of a nut is that which is enclosed in the inward: so likewise interior is applicable to that which is capacious, and has many involutions, as the interior coat of the intestines.

If we accurately observe the inward movings and actings of the heart, we shall find that temptation wins upon it by very small gradations.

IRRATIONAL, FOOLISH, ABSURD, PREPOSTEROUS.

IRRATIONAL, compounded of ir, or in and ratio, signifies contrary to reason, and is employed to express the want of the faculty itself, or a deficiency in the exercise of this faculty. FOOLISH (v. Folly) signifies the perversion of this faculty. ABSURD, from surdus, deaf, signifies that to which one would turn a deaf ear. PREPOSTEROUS, from præ, before, and posi, behind, signifies literally that side foremost which ought to be behind, which is unnatural and contrary to common-sense.

Irrational is not so strong a term as foolish: it is applicable more frequently to the thing than to the person, to the principle than to the practice; foolish, on the contrary, is commonly applicable to the person as well as the thing; to the practice rather than the principle. Scepticism is the most irrational thing that exists; the human mind is formed to believe but not to doubt: he is of all men most foolish who stakes his eternal salvation on his own fancied superiority of intelligence and illumination. Foolish, absurd, and preposterous rise in degree: a violation of common-sense is implied by them all, but they vary according to the degree of violence which is done to the understanding: foolish is applied to anything, however trivial, which in the smallest degree offends our understandings: the conduct of children is therefore often foolish, but not absurd and preposterous, which are said only of serious things that are opposed to our judgments: it is absurd for a man to persuade another to do that which he in like circumstances would object to do himself; it is preposterous for a man to expose himself to the ridicule of others, and then be angry with those who will not treat him respectfully.

The schemes of freethinkers are altogether irrational, and require the most extravagant credulity to embrace them.

ADDISON.

IRREGULAR, DISORDERLY, INORDINATE, INTEMPERATE.

IRREGULAR, that is literally not regular, marks merely the absence of a good quality; DISORDERLY, that is literally out of order, marks the presence of a positively bad quality. What is irregular may be so from the nature of the thing; what is disorderly is rendered so by some external circumstance. Things are planted irregularly for want of design: the best troops are apt to be disorderly in a long march. Irregular and disorderly are taken in a moral as well as a natural sense: INORDINATE, which signifies also put out of order, is employed only in the moral sense. What is irregular is contrary to the rule that is established, or ought to be; what is disorderly is contrary to the order that has existed; what is inordinate is contrary to the order that is prescribed; what is INTEMPERATE is contrary to the temper or spirit that ought to be encouraged. Our habits will be irregular which are not conformable to the laws of social society; our practices will be disorderly when we follow the blind impulse of passion; our desires will be inordinate when they are not under the control of reason guided by religion; our indulgences will be intemperate when we consult nothing but our appetites. Young people are apt to contract irregular habits if not placed under the care of discreet and sober people, and made to conform to the regulations of domestic life: children are naturally prone to become disorderly, if not perpetually under the eye of a master: it is the lot of human beings in all ages and stations to have inordinate desires, which require a constant check so as to prevent intemperate conduct of any kind.

In youth there is a certain irregularity and agitation by no means unbecoming.

IRRELIGIOUS, PROFANE, IMPIOUS.

As epithets to designate the character of the person, they seem to rise in degree: IRRELIGIOUS is negative; PROFANE and IMPIOUS are positive; the latter being much stronger than the former. All men who are not positively actuated by principles of religion are irreligious; profanity and impiety are, however, of a still more heinous nature; they consist not in the mere absence of regard for religion, but in a positive contempt of it and open outrage against its laws; the profane man treats what is sacred as if it were profane; what a believer holds in reverence, and utters with awe, is pronounced with an air of indifference or levity, and as a matter of common discourse, by a profane man; he knows no difference between sacred and profane, but as the former may be converted into a source of scandal toward others; the impious man is directly opposed to the pious man; the former is filled with defiance and rebellion against his Maker, as the latter is with love and fear.

An officer of the army in Roman Catholic countries would be afraid to pass for an irreligious man if he should be seen to go to bed without offering up his devotions.

ADDISON.

Fly, ye profane; if not, draw near with awe.

YOUNG.

When applied to things, the term irreligious seems to be somewhat more positively opposed to religion: an irreligious book is not merely one in which there is no religion, but that also which is detrimental to religion, such as sceptical or licentious writings: the epithet profane in this case is not always a term of reproach, but is employed to distinguish what is temporal from that which is expressly spiritual in its nature; the history of nations is profane, as distinguished from the sacred history contained in the Bible: the writings of the heathens are altogether profane as distinguished from the moral writings of Christians, or the believers in Divine Revelation. On the other hand, when we speak of a profane sentiment, or a profane joke, profane lips, and the like, the sense is personal and reproachful; impious is never applied but to what is personal, and in the very worst sense; an impious thought, an impious wish, or an impious vow are the fruits of an impious mind.

In his reasonings for the most part he is silly and false, in his political writings factious, in what he calls his philosophical ones, irreligious and sceptical in the highest degree.

TO JANGLE, JAR, WRANGLE.

A VERBAL contention is expressed by all these terms, but with various modifications: JANGLE seems to be an onomatopœia, for it conveys by its own discordant sound an idea of the discordance which accompanies this kind of war of words; JAR and war are, in all probability, but variations of each other, as also jangle and WRANGLE. There is in jangling more of cross-questions and perverse replies than direct differences of opinion; those jangle who are out of humor with each other; there is more of discordant feeling and opposition of opinion in jarring: those who have no good-will to each other will be sure to jar when they come in collision; and those who indulge themselves in jarring will soon convert affection into ill-will. Married people may destroy the good-humor of the company by jangling, but they destroy their domestic peace and felicity by jarring. To wrangle is technically what to jangle is morally: those who dispute by a verbal opposition only are said to wrangle; and the disputers who engage in this scholastic exercise are termed wrangles; most disputations amount to little more than wrangling.

Where the judicatories of the Church were near an equality of the men on both sides, there were perpetual jangleings on both sides. BURKE.

JEALOUSY, ENVY, SUSPICION.

JEALOUSY, in French jalousie, Latin zelotypia, Greek ζηλοτυπια, compounded of ζηλος and τυπω, to strike or fill, signifies properly filled with a burning desire. ENVY, in French envie, Latin invidia, from invideo, compounded of in, privative, and video, to see, signifies not looking at, or looking at in a contrary direction.

We are jealous of what is our own; we are envious of what is another's. Jealousy fears to lose what it has; envy is pained at seeing another have that which it wants for itself. Princes are jealous of their authority; subjects are jealous of their rights: courtiers are envious of those in favor; women are envious of superior beauty.

Every man is more jealous of his natural than his moral qualities. HAWKSWORTH.

A woman does not envy a man for fighting courage, nor a man a woman for beauty. COLLIER.

The jealous man has an object of desire, something to get and something to retain; he does not look beyond the object that interferes with his enjoyment; a jealous husband may therefore be appeased by the declaration of his wife's animosity against the object of his jealousy. The envious man sickens at the sight of enjoyment; he is easy only in the misery of others: all endeavors, therefore, to satisfy an envious man are fruitless. Jealousy is a noble or an ignoble passion, according to the object; in the former case it is emulation sharpened by fear; in the latter case it is greediness stimulated by fear; envy is always a base passion, having the worst passions in its train.

'Tis doing wrong creates such doubts as these,
Renders us jealous, and destroys our peace. WALLER.

The envious man is in pain upon all occasions which should give him pleasure. ADDISON.

Jealous is applicable to bodies of men as well as individuals; envious to the individuals only. Nations are jealous of any interference on the part of any other power in their commerce, government, or territory; individuals are envious of the rank, wealth, and honors of each other.

While the people are so jealous of the clergy's ambition, I do not see any other method left them to reform the world, than by using all honest arts to make themselves acceptable to the laity. HOOKER.

SUSPICION, from sub or sub, under; and specio, to look, i. e., to look from under one's eyelids out of fear of being seen to look, denotes an apprehension of injury, and, like jealousy, implies a fear of another's intentions; but suspicion has more of distrust in it than jealousy: the jealous man doubts neither the integrity nor sincerity of his opponent; the suspicious man is altogether fearful of the intentions of another: the jealous man is jealous only of him who he thinks wishes for the same thing as he does, and may rob him of it: the suspicious man is suspicious or fearful that he may suffer something from another. Jealousy properly exists between equals or those who have a common object of desire; but suspicion is directed toward any one who has the power as well as the will to hurt; rival lovers are jealous of each other, but one person is suspicious of another's honesty, or parties entering into a treaty may be suspicious of each other's good faith. Jealousy cannot subsist between a king and his people in any other than in the anomalous and unhappy case of power being the object sought for on both sides; a king may then be jealous of his prerogative when he fears that it will be infringed by his people; and the people will be jealous of their rights when they fear that they will be invaded by the crown. According to this distinction, jealousy is erroneously substituted in the place of suspicion.

The obstinacy in Essex, in refusing to treat with the king, proceeded only from his jealousy (suspicion), that when the king had got him into his hands he would take revenge upon him.

CLARENDON.

Jealousy is alone concerned in not losing what one wishes for; suspicion is afraid of suffering some positive evil.

Though wisdom wake, suspicion sleeps

TO JEST, JOKE, MAKE GAME, SPORT.

JEST is in all probability abridged from gesticulate, because the ancient mimics used much gesticulation in breaking their jests on the company. JOKE, in Latin jocus, comes in all probability from the Hebrew tschek, to laugh. To MAKE GAME signifies here to make the subject of game or play (v. Play). To SPORT signifies here to sport with, or convert into a subject of amusement.

One jests in order to make others laugh; one jokes in order to please one's self. The jest is directed at the object; the joke is practised with the person or on the person. One attempts to make a thing laughable or ridiculous by jesting about it, or treating it in a jesting manner; one attempts to excite good-humor in others, or indulge it in one's self by joking with them. Jests are therefore seldom harmless: jokes are frequently allowable. The most serious subject may be degraded by being turned into a jest; but melancholy or dejection of the mind may be conveniently dispelled by a joke. Court fools and buffoons used formerly to break their jests upon every subject by which they thought to entertain their employers: those who know how to joke with good-nature and discretion may contribute to the mirth of the company: to make game of is applicable only to persons: to make a sport of or sport with, is applied to objects in general, whether persons or things; both are employed, like jest, in the bad sense of treating a thing more lightly than it deserves.

But those who aim at ridicule,
Should fix upon some certain rule,
Which fairly hints they are in jest. SWIFT.

JOURNEY, TRAVEL, VOYAGE.

JOURNEY, from the French journée, a day's work, and Latin diurnus, daily, signifies the course that is taken in the space of a day, or in general any comparatively short passage from one place to another. TRAVEL, from the French travailler, to labor, signifies such a course or passage as requires labor, and causes fatigue; in general any long course. VOYAGE is most probably changed from the Latin via, a way, and originally signified any course or passage to a distance, but is now confined to passages by sea.

We take journeys in different counties in England; we make a voyage to the Indies, and travel over the continent. Journeys are taken for domestic business; travels are made for amusement or information: voyages are made by captains or merchants for purposes of commerce. We estimate journeys by the day, as one or two days' journey: we estimate travels and voyages by the months and years that are employed. The Israelites are said to have journeyed in the wilderness forty years, because they went but short distances at a time. It is a part of polite education for young men of fortune to travel into those countries of Europe which comprehend the grand tour, as it is termed. A voyage round the world, which was at first a formidable undertaking, is now become familiar to the mind by its frequency.

JOY, GLADNESS, MIRTH.

THE happy condition of the soul is designated by all these terms; but JOY, from the Latin jocundus, pleasant, and GLADNESS (v. Glad) lie more internally; MIRTH (v. Festivity) is the more immediate result of external circumstances. What creates joy and gladness is of a permanent nature; that which creates mirth is temporary: joy is the most vivid sensation in the soul; gladness is the same in quality, but inferior in degree: joy is awakened in the mind by the most important events in life; gladness springs up in the mind on ordinary occasions: the return of the prodigal son awakened joy in the heart of his father; a man feels gladness at being relieved from some distress or trouble: public events of a gratifying nature produce universal joy; relief from either sickness or want brings gladness to an oppressed heart; he who is absorbed in his private distresses is ill prepared to partake of the mirth with which he is surrounded at the festive board. Joy is depicted on the countenance, or expresses itself by various demonstrations: gladness is a more tranquil feeling, which is enjoyed in secret, and seeks no outward expression: mirth displays itself in laughter, singing, and noise.

His thoughts triumphant, heav'n alone employs,

JUDGE, UMPIRE, ARBITER, ARBITRATOR.

JUDGE, in Latin judico and judex, from jus, right, signifies one pronouncing the law, or determining right. UMPIRE is most probably a corruption from empire, signifying one who has authority. ARBITER and ARBITRATOR, from arbitror, to think, signify one who decides.

Judge is the generic term, the others are only species of the judge. The judge determines in all matters disputed or undisputed; he pronounces what is law now as well as what will be law for the future; the umpire and arbitrer are only judges in particular cases that admit of dispute: there may be judges in literature, in arts, and civil matters; umpires and arbiters are only judges in private matters. The judge pronounces, in matters of dispute, according to a written law or a prescribed rule; the umpire decides in all matters of contest; and the arbitrer or arbitrator in all matters of litigation, according to his own judgment. The judge acts under the appointment of government; the umpire and arbitrator are appointed by individuals: the former is chosen for his skill; he adjudges the palm to the victor according to the merits of the case: the latter is chosen for his impartiality; he consults the interests of both by equalizing their claims. The office of judge is one of the most honorable; an umpire is of use in deciding contested merits, as the umpire at the games of the Greeks; in poetry and the grave style, the term may be applied to higher objects.

Falsimon shall be judge how ill you rhyme.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF PLAIN,

The office of an arbiter, although not so elevated as a judge in its literal sense, has often the important duty of a Christian peace-maker; and as the determinations of an arbiter are controlled by no external circumstances, the term is applied to monarchs, and even to the Creator as the sovereign Arbiter of the world.

You once have known me,
Twixt warring monarchs and contending states,
The glorious arbiter. LEWIS.

JUDGMENT, DISCRETION, PRUDENCE.

THESE terms are all employed to express the various modes of practical wisdom, which serve to regulate the conduct of men in ordinary life. JUDGMENT is that faculty which enables a person to distinguish right and wrong in general: DISCRETION and PRUDENCE serve the same purpose in particular cases. Judgment is conclusive; it decides by positive inference; it enables a person to discover the truth: discretion is intuitive (v. Discernment); it discerns or perceives what is in all probability right. Judgment acts by a fixed rule; it admits of no question or variation; discretion acts according to circumstances, and is its own rule. Judgment determines in the choice of what is good: discretion sometimes only guards against error or direct mistakes; it chooses what is nearest to the truth. Judgment requires knowledge and actual experience; discretion requires reflection and consideration: a general exercises his judgment in the disposition of his army, and in the mode of attack; while he is following the rules of military art he exercises his discretion in the choice of officers for different posts, in the treatment of his men, in his negotiations with the enemy, and various other measures which depend upon contingencies.

If a man have that penetration of judgment as he can discern what things are to be laid open, and what to be secreted, to him a habit of dissimulation is a hindrance and a poorness. BACON.

Discretion be your tutor. Suit the action
To the words. SHAKESPEARE.

Discretion looks to the present; prudence, which is the same as providence or foresight, calculates on the future: discretion takes a wide survey of the case that offers; it looks to the moral fitness of things, as well as the consequences which may follow from them; it determines according to the real propriety of anything, as well as the ultimate advantages which it may produce: prudence looks only to the good or evil which may result from things; it is, therefore, but a mode or accompaniment of discretion: we must have prudence when we have discretion, but we may have prudence where there is no occasion for discretion. Those who have the conduct or direction of others require discretion; those who have the management of their own concerns require prudence. For want of discretion the master of a school, or the general of an army, may lose his authority: for want of prudence the merchant may involve himself in ruin; or the man of fortune may be brought to beggary.

As to forms of human institution, they were added by the bishops and governors of the Church according to their wisdom and discretion.

BINGHAM.

The ignorance in which we are left concerning good and evil is not such as to supersede prudence in conduct. BLAIR.

As epithets, judicious is applied to things oftener than to persons; discreet is applied to persons rather than to things; prudent is applied to both: a remark, or a military movement is judicious; it displays the judgment of the individual from whom they emanate; a matron is discreet who, by dint of years, experience, and long reflection, is enabled to determine on what is befitting the case; a person is prudent who does not inconsiderately expose himself to danger; a measure is prudent that guards against the chances of evil. Counsels will be judicious which are given by those who are ignorant of the subject: it is dangerous to intrust a secret to one who is in-discreet: the impetuosity of youth naturally impels them to be imprudent; an imprudent marriage is seldom followed by prudent conduct in the parties that have involved themselves in it.

So bold, yet so judiciously you dare,
That your least praise is to be regular.

DEYDEN.

To elder years, to be discreet and grave;
Then to old age maturely she gave. DENHAM.

The monarch rose preventing all reply,
Prudent, lest from his resolution rais'd

JUSTICE, EQUITY.

JUSTICE, from jus, right, is founded on the laws of society: EQUITY, from aequitas, fairness, rightness, and equality, is founded on the laws of nature. Justice is a written or prescribed law, to which one is bound to conform and make it the rule of one's decisions: equity is a law in our hearts; it conforms to no rule but to circumstances, and decides by the consciousness of right and wrong. The proper object of justice is to secure property; the proper object of equity is to secure the rights of humanity. Justice is exclusive, it assigns to every one his own; it preserves the subsisting inequality between men: equity is communicative; it seeks to equalize the condition of men by a fair distribution. Justice forbids us doing wrong to any one; and requires us to repair the wrongs we have done to others: equity forbids us doing to others what we would not have them do to us; it requires us to do to others what in similar circumstances we would expect from them.

They who supplicate for mercy from others can never hope for justice through themselves.

BURKE.

Every rule of equity demands
That vice and virtue from the Almighty's hands
Should due rewards and punishments receive.

JENYNS.

JUSTNESS, CORRECTNESS.

JUSTNESS, from jus, law (v. Justice), is the conformity to established principle: CORRECTNESS, from rectus, right or straight (v. Correct), is the conformity to a certain mark or line: the former is used in the moral or improper sense only; the latter is used in the proper or improper sense. We estimate the value of remarks by their justness, that is, their accordance to certain admitted principles. Correctness of outline is of the first importance in drawing; correctness of dates enhances the value of a history. It has been justly observed by the moralists of antiquity that money is the root of all evil; partisans seldom state correctly what they see and hear.

Few men, possessed of the most perfect sight, can describe visual objects with more spirit and justness than Mr. Blacklock, the poet born blind.

BURKE.

I do not mean the popular eloquence which cannot be tolerated at the bar, but that correctness of style and elegance of method which at once pleases and persuades the hearer.

TO KEEP, PRESERVE, SAVE.

THE idea of having in one's possession is common to all these terms; which is, however, the simple meaning of KEEP (v. To hold, keep): to PRESERVE, from pre and servo, to keep, that is, to keep from mischief, signifies to keep with care, and free from all injury; to SAVE, from safe, is to keep laid up in a safe place, and free from destruction. Things are kept at all times, and under all circumstances; they are preserved in circumstances of peculiar difficulty and danger; they are saved in the moment in which they are threatened with destruction: things are kept at pleasure; they are preserved by an exertion of power; they are saved by the use of extraordinary means: the shepherd keeps his flock by simply watching over them; children are sometimes wonderfully preserved in the midst of the greatest dangers; things are frequently saved in the midst of fire, by the exertions of those present.

We are resolved to keep an established church, an established monarchy, an established aristocracy, and an established democracy, each in the degree in which it exists, and no greater.

BURKE.

A war to preserve national independence, property, and liberty, from certain, universal havoc, is a war just and necessary.

BURKE.

Sav'd from the general fate, but two remain,
And ah! those hapless two were sav'd in vain.

FORGE.

TO KEEP, OBSERVE, FULFIL.

THESE terms are synonymous in the moral sense of abiding by, and carrying into execution what is prescribed or set before one for his rule of conduct: to KEEP (v. To hold, keep) is simply to have by one in such manner that it shall not depart; to OBSERVE, in Latin obseruo, compounded of ob and servo, signifying to keep in one's view, to fix one's attention, is to keep with a steady attention; to FULFIL (v. To accomplish) is to keep to the end or to the full intent. A day is either kept or observed: yet the former is not only a more familiar term, but it likewise implies a much less solemn act than the latter; one must add, therefore, the mode in which it is kept, by saying that it is kept holy, kept sacred, or kept as a day of pleasure; the term observe, however, implies always that it is kept religiously: we may keep, but we do not observe a birthday; we keep or observe the Sabbath.

Wednesdays and Fridays were the days kept in the Greek Church for more solemn fasts.

WHEATLEY.

The Apostles and primitive Christians continued to observe the same hours of prayer with the Jews.

WHEATLEY.

To keep marks simply a perseverance or continuance in a thing; a man keeps his word if he do not depart from it: to observe marks fidelity and consideration; we observe a rule when we are careful to be guided by it: to fulfil marks the perfection and consummation of that which one has kept; we fulfil a promise by acting in strict conformity to it.

It is a great sin to swear unto a sin,
But greater sin to keep a sinful oath.

SHAKESPEARE.

He was so strict in the observation of his word and promise as a commander, that he could not be persuaded to stay in the West when he found it not in his power to perform the agreement he had made with Dorchester.

CLARENDON.

You might have seen this poor child arrived at an age to fulfil all your hopes, and then you might have lost him.

GRAY.

KEEPING, CUSTODY.

KEEPING (v. To keep, hold) is, as before, the general term. CUSTODY, in Latin custodia and custos, in all probability from cura, care, because care is particularly required in keeping: the first of these terms is, as before, the most general in its signification; the latter is more frequent in its use. The keeping amounts to little more than having purposely in one's possession; but custody is a particular kind of keeping, for the purpose of preventing an escape: inanimate objects may be in one's keeping; but a prisoner, or that which is in danger of getting away, is placed in custody: a person has in his keeping that which he values as the property of an absent friend; the officers of justice get into their custody those who have offended against the laws, or such property as has been stolen.

Life and all its enjoyments would be scarce worth the keeping, if we were under a perpetual dread of losing them.

JOHNSON.

TO KILL, MURDER, ASSASSINATE, SLAY, OR SLAUGHTER.

KILL, in Saxon cydan, Dutch kelan, is probably connected with the Low German killen, to torment, the Icelandic quella, to stifle, and our quell. MURDER, in German mord, etc., is connected with the Latin mors, death. ASSASSINATE signifies to kill after the manner of an assassin; which word probably comes from the Levant, where a prince of the Arsacides or assassins, who was called the old man of the mountains, lived in a castle between Antioch and Damascus, and brought up young men to lie in wait for passengers. SLAY or SLAUGHTER, in German schlagen, etc., comes probably from liegen, to lie, signifying to lay low.

To kill is the general and indefinite term, signifying simply to take away life; to murder is to kill with open violence and injustice; to assassinate is to murder by surprise, or by means of lying in wait; to slay is to kill in battle: to kill is applicable to men, animals, and also vegetables; to murder and assassinate to men only; to slay mostly to men, but sometimes to animals; to slaughter only to animals in the proper sense, but it may be applied to men in the improper sense, when they are killed like brutes, either as to the numbers or to the manner of killing them.

The fierce young hero who had overcome the Curiatil, being upbraided by his sister for having slain her lover, in the height of his resentment kills her.

ADDISON.

JENNIE.

KIND, SPECIES, SORT.

KIND, like the German kind, a child, comes from the Gothic keinan, Saxon cennan, to beget, which answers to the Latin gigno, whence genus, and the Greek yevo, a kind. SPECIES, in Latin species, from specio, to behold, signifies literally the form or appearance, and in an extended sense that which comes under a particular form. SORT, in Latin sorte, a lot, signifies that which constitutes a particular lot or parcel.

Kind and species are both employed in their proper sense; sort has been diverted from its original meaning by colloquial use: kind is properly employed for animate objects, particularly for mankind, and improperly for moral objects; species is a term used by philosophers, classing things according to their external or internal properties. Kind, as a term in vulgar use, has a less definite meaning than species, which serves to form the groundwork of science: we discriminate things in a loose or general manner by saying that they are of the animal or vegetable kind; of the canine or feline kind; but we discriminate them precisely if we say that they are a species of the arbutus, of the pomegranate, of the dog, the horse, and the like. By the same rule we may speak of a species of madness, a species of fever, and the like; because diseases have been brought under a systematic arrangement: but on the other hand, we should speak of a kind of language, a kind of feeling, a kind of influence; and in similar cases where a general resemblance is to be expressed.

An ungrateful person is a kind of thoroughfare or common sewer for the good things of the world to pass into.

SOUTH.

If the French should succeed in what they propose, and establish a democracy in a country circumstanced like France, they will establish a very bad government, a very bad species of tyranny.

BURKE.

Sort may be used for either kind or species; it does not necessarily imply any affinity, or common property in the objects, but simple assemblage, produced, as it were, by sorte, chance: hence we speak of such sort of folks or people; such sort of practices; different sorts of grain; the various sorts of merchandises: and in similar cases where things are sort- ed or brought together, rather at the option of the person, than according to the nature of the thing.

The French made and recorded a sort of institute, and digest of anarchy, called the rights of man.

BURKE.

KINDRED, RELATIONSHIP, AFFINITY, CONSANGUINITY.

THE idea of a state in which persons are placed with regard to each other is common to all these terms, which differ principally in the nature of this state. KINDRED signifies that of being of the same kin or kind (v. Kind). RELATIONSHIP signifies that of holding a nearer relation than others (v. To connect). AFFINITY (v. Affinity) signifies that of being affined or coming close to each other's boundaries. CONSANGUINITY, from sanguis, the blood, signifies that of having the same blood.

The kindred is the most general state here expressed: it may embrace all mankind, or refer to particular families or communities; it depends upon possessing the common property of humanity: the philanthropist claims kindred with all who are unfortunate, when it is in his power to relieve them. Relationship is a state less general than kindred, but more extended than either affinity or consanguinity; it applies to particular families only, but it applies to all of the same family, whether remotely or distantly related. Affinity denotes a close relationship, whether of an artificial or a natural kind: there is an affinity between the husband and the wife in consequence of the marriage tie; and there is an affinity between those who descend from the same parents or relations in a direct line. Consanguinity is, strictly speaking, this latter species of descent; and the term is mostly employed in all questions of law respecting descent and inheritance.

Though separated from my kindred by little more than half a century of miles, I know as little of their concerns as if oceans and continents were between us.

COWPER.

BLACKSTONE.

Consanguinity, or relation by blood, and affinity, or relation by marriage, are canonical disabilities (to contract a marriage).

TO KNOW, BE ACQUAINTED WITH.

To KNOW is a general term; to BE ACQUAINTED WITH is particular (v. Acquaintance). We may know things or persons in various ways; we may know them by name only; or we may know their internal properties or characters; or we may simply know their figure; we may know them by report; or we may know them by a direct intercourse: one is acquainted with either a person or a thing, only in a direct manner, and by an immediate intercourse in one's own person. We know a man to be good or bad, virtuous or vicious, by being a witness to his actions; we become acquainted with him by frequently being in his company.

Is there no temp'rate region can be known,
Between their frigid and our torrid zone?
Could we not wake from that lethargic dream,
But to be restless in a worse extreme?

DENHAM.

But how shall I express my anguish for my little boy, who became acquainted with sorrow as soon as he was capable of reflection.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

KNOWLEDGE, SCIENCE, LEARNING, ERUDITION.

KNOWLEDGE signifies the thing h. own. SCIENCE, in Latin scientia, from scio, to know, has the same original meaning. LEARNING, from learn, signifies the thing learned. ERUDITION, in Latin eruditio, comes from erudio, to bring out of a state of rudeness or ignorance, that is, the bringing into a state of perfection.

Knowledge is a general term which simply implies the thing known: science, learning, and erudition are modes of knowledge qualified by some collateral idea: science is a systematic species of knowledge which consists of rule and order; learning is that species of knowledge which one derives from schools, or through the medium of personal instruction; erudition is scholastic knowledge obtained by profound research: knowledge admits of every possible degree, and is expressly opposed to ignorance; science, learning, and erudition are positively high degrees of knowledge.

The attainment of knowledge is of itself a pleasure independent of the many extrinsic advantages which it brings to every individual, according to the station of life in which he is placed; the pursuits of science have a peculiar interest for men of a peculiar turn. Learning is less dependent on the genius than on the will of the individual; men of moderate talents have overcome the deficiencies of nature, by labor and perseverance, and have acquired such stores of learning as have raised them to a respectable station in the republic of letters. Profound erudition is obtained but by few; a retentive memory, a patient industry, and deep penetration, are requisites for one who aspires to the title of an erudite man. Knowledge, in the unqualified and universal sense, is not always a good; we may have a knowledge of evil as well as good: science is good as far as it is founded upon experience; learning is more generally and practically useful to the morals of men than science: erudition is always good, as it is a profound knowledge of what is worth knowing.

Can knowledge have no bound, but must advance

So far, to make us wish for ignorance?

L.

TO LABOR, TAKE PAINS OR TROUBLE, USE ENDEAVOR.

LABOR, in Latin labor, comes, in all probability, from labo, to falter or faint, because labor causes faintness. To TAKE PAINS is to expose one's self to pains; and to TAKE the TROUBLE is to impose trouble on one's self. ENDEAVOR (v. To endeavor).

The first three terms suppose the necessity for a painful exertion; but to labor expresses more than to take pains, and this more than to trouble; to use endeavor excludes every idea of pain or inconvenience: great difficulties must be conquered; great perfection or correctness requires pains; a concern to please will give trouble; but we use endeavors wherever any object is to be obtained or any duty to be performed. To labor is either a corporeal or a mental action; to take pains is principally an effort of the mind or the attention: to take trouble is an effort either of the body or mind: a faithful minister of the Gospel labors to instil Christian principles into the minds of his audience, and to heal all the breaches which the angry passions make between them: when a child is properly sensible of the value of improvement, he will take the utmost pains to profit by the instruction of the master: he who is too indolent to take the trouble to make his wishes known to those who would comply with them, cannot expect others to trouble themselves with inquiring into his necessities: a good name is of such value to every man that he ought to use his best endeavors to preserve it unblemished.

They (the Jews) were fain to take pains to rid themselves of their happiness; and it cost them labor and violence to become miserable.

SOUTH.

A good conscience hath always enough to reward itself, though the success fall not out according to the merit of the endeavor. HOWELL.

LABYRINTH, MAZE.

INTRICACY is common to both the objects expressed by these terms; but the term LABYRINTH has it to a much greater extent than MAZE: the labyrinth, from the Greek λαβύρινθος, was a work of antiquity which surpassed the maze in the same proportion as the ancients surpassed the moderns in all other works of art; it was constructed on so prodigious a scale, and with so many windings, that when a person was once entered, he could not find his way out without the assistance of a clue or thread. Maze, probably from the Saxon mas, a gulf, is a modern term for a similar structure on a smaller scale, which is frequently made by way of ornament in large gardens. From the proper meaning of the two words we may easily see the ground of their metaphorical application: political and polemical discussions are compared to a labyrinth; because the mind that is once entangled in them is unable to extricate itself by any efforts of its own: on the other hand, that perplexity and confusion into which the mind is thrown by unexpected or inexplicable events, is termed a mass; because, for the time, it is bereft of its power to pursue its ordinary functions of recollection and combination.

From the slow mistress of the school, Experience,
And her assistant, passing, pale Distrust,
Purchase a dear-bought clue to lead his youth
Through serpentine obliquities of human life,
And the dark labyrinth of human hearts.

YOUNG.

To measur'd notes while they advance,
He in wild mass shall lead the dance.

CUMBERLAND.

LAND, COUNTRY.

LAND, in German land, etc., connected with lean and line, signifies an open, even space, and refers strictly to the earth. COUNTRY, in French contrée, from con and terra, signifies lands adjoining so as to form one portion. The term land, therefore, in its proper sense, excludes the idea of habitation; the term country excludes that of the earth, or the parts of which it is composed: hence we speak of the land, as rich or poor, according to what it yields: of a country, as rich or poor, according to what its inhabitants possess: so, in like manner, we say, the land is ploughed or prepared for receiving the grain; or a man's land, for the ground which he possesses or occupies: but the country is cultivated; the country is under a good government; or a man's country is dear to him.

Rous'd by the prince of air, the whirlwinds sweep
The surge, and plunge his father in the deep,
Then full against the Cornish lands they roar,
And two rich shipwrecks bless the lucky shore.

POPE.

We love our country as the seat of religion,
Liberty, and laws.

BLAIR.

In an extended application, however, these words may be put for one another: the word land may sometimes be put for any portion of land that is under a government, as the land of liberty; and country may be put for any spot of earth or line of country, together with that which is upon it; as a rich country.

You are still in the land of the living, and have all the means that can be desired, whereby to prevent your falling into condemnation.

BEVERIDGE.

The rich country from thence to Portici, covered with noble houses and gardens, appearing only a continuation of the city.

BARDONE.

LANGUAGE, TONGUE, SPEECH, IDIOM, DIALECT.

LANGUAGE, from the Latin lingua, a TONGUE, signifies, like the word tongue, that which is spoken by the tongue. SPEECH is the act of speaking, or the word spoken. IDIOM, in Latin idioma, Greek ιδίωμα, from ιδιος, proprius, proper, or peculiar, signifies a peculiar mode of speaking. DIALECT, in Latin dialectica, Greek διαλεκτική, from διαλεγομαι, to speak in a distinct manner, signifies a distinct mode of speech.

All these terms mark the manner of expressing our thoughts, but under different circumstances. Language is the most general term in its meaning and application; it conveys the general idea without any modification, and is applied to other modes of expression, besides that of words, and to other objects besides persons; the language of the eyes frequently supplies the place of that of the tongue; the deaf and dumb use the language of signs; birds and beasts are supposed to have their peculiar language: tongue, speech, and the other terms, are applicable only to human beings. Language is either written or spoken; but a tongue is conceived of mostly as something to be spoken: whence we speak of one's mother tongue.

Nor do they trust their tongue alone,
But speak a language of their own. SWIFT.

What if we could discourse with people of all the nations upon the earth in their own mother tongues? Unless we know Jesus Christ, also, we should be lost forever.

BEVERIDGE.

Speech is an abstract term, implying either the power of uttering articulate sounds; as when we speak of the gift of speech, which is denied to those who are dumb; or the words themselves which are spoken; as when we speak of the parts of speech: or the particular mode of expressing one's self; as that a man is known by his speech. Idiom and dialect are not properly a language, but the properties of language: idiom is the peculiar construction and turn of a language, which distinguishes it altogether from others; it is that which enters into the composition of the language, and cannot be separated from it.

When speech is employed only as the vehicle of falsehood, every man must disunite himself from others.

JOHNSON.

The language of this great poet is sometimes obscured by old words, transpositions, and foreign idions.

ADDISON.

A dialect is that which is engrafted on a language by the inhabitants of particular parts of a country, and admitted by its writers and learned men to form an incidental part of the language; as the dialects which originated with the Ionians, the Athenians, the Æolians, and were afterward amalgamated into the Greek tongue. Whence the word dialect may be extended in its application to denote any peculiar manner of speech adopted by any community.

Every art has its dialect, uncouth and ungrateful to all whom custom has not reconciled to its sound.

JOHNSON.

LARGE, WIDE, BROAD.

LARGE (v. Great) is applied in a general way to express every dimension; it implies not only abundance in solid matter, but also freedom in the space, or extent of a plane superficies. WIDE, in German weit, is most probably connected with the French vide and the Latin viduus, empty, signifying properly an empty or open space unencumbered by any obstructions. BROAD, in German breit, probably comes from the noun bret, a board; because it is the peculiar property of a board, that is to say, it is the width of what is particularly long. Many things are large, but not wide; as a large town, a large circle, a large ball, a large nut: other things are both large and wide; as a large field, or a wide field: a large house, or a wide house: but the field is said to be large from the quantity of ground it contains; it is said to be wide both from its figure and the extent of its space in the cross directions; in like manner, a house is large from its extent in all directions; it is said to be wide from the extent which it runs in front: some things are said to be wide which are not denominated large; that is, either such things as have less bulk and quantity than extent of plane surface; as ell-wide cloth, a wide opening, a wide entrance, and the like; or such as have an extent of space only one way; as a wide road, a wide path, a wide passage, and the like. What is broad is in sense, and mostly in application, wide, but not vice versa: a ribbon is broad; a ledge is broad; a ditch is broad; a plank is broad; the brim of a hat is broad; or the border of anything is broad: on the other hand, a mouth is wide, but not broad; apertures in general are wide, but not broad. Large is opposed to small; wide to close; broad to narrow. In the moral application, we speak of largeness in regard to liberality; wide and broad only in the figurative sense of space or size: as a wide difference; or a broad line of distinction.

Shall grief contract the largeness of that heart,
In which nor fear nor anger has a part?

WALLER.

Wide was the wound
But suddenly with flesh fill'd up and heal'd.

MILTON.

The wider a man's comforts extend, the *broad*er is the mark which he spreads to the arrows of misfortune.

BLAIR.

LARGELY, COPIOUSLY, FULLY.

LARGELY (v. Great) is here taken in the moral sense, and, if the derivation given of it be true, in the most proper sense. COPIOUSLY comes from the Latin copia, plenty, signifying in a plentiful degree. FULLY signifies in a full degree; to the full extent, as far as it can reach.

Quantity is the idea expressed in common by all these terms; but largely has always a reference to the freedom of the will in the agent; copiously qualifies actions that are done by inanimate objects; fully qualifies the actions of a rational agent, but it denotes a degree or extent which cannot be surpassed. A person deals largely in things, or he drinks large draughts; rivers are copiously supplied in rainy seasons; a person is fully satisfied, or fully prepared. A bountiful Providence has distributed his gifts largely among his creatures: blood flows copiously from a deep wound when it is first made: when a man is not fully convinced of his own insufficiency, he is not prepared to listen to the counsel of others.

There is one very faulty method of drawing up the laws, that is, when the case is largely set forth in the preamble.

BACON.

The youths with wine the copious goblets
crown'd,
And pleas'd dispense the flowing bowls around.

POPE.

Every word (in the Bible) is so weighty that it ought to be carefully considered by all that desire fully to understand the sense.

BEVERIDGE.

LAST, LATEST, FINAL, ULTIMATE.

LAST and LATEST, both from late, in German letzte, is connected with the Greek λοισθος and λειπω, to leave, signifying left or remaining. FINAL, v. Final. ULTIMATE comes from ultimus, the last.

Last and ultimate respect the order of succession: latest respects the order of time; final respects the completion of an object. What is last or ultimate is succeeded by nothing else: what is latest is succeeded at no great interval of time; what is final requires to be succeeded by nothing else. The last is opposed to the first; the ultimate is distinguished from that which immediately precedes it; the latest is opposed to the earliest; the final is opposed to the introductory or beginning. A person's last words are those by which one is guided; his ultimate object is sometimes remote or concealed from the view; a conscientious man remains firm to his principles to his latest breath; the final determination of difficult matters requires caution. Jealous people strive not to be the last in anything; the latest intelligence which a man gets of his country is acceptable to one who is in distant quarters of the globe; it requires resolution to take a final leave of those whom one holds near and dear.

The supreme Author of our being has so formed the soul of man that nothing but himself can be its last, adequate, and proper happiness.

ADDISON.

Our first parent transgressed the gracious law which was given him as the condition of life, and thereby involved himself and all his children to the latest generations in guilt, misery, and ruin.

BIDDULPH.

Final causes lie more bare and open to our observation, as there are often a greater variety that belong to the same effect.

ADDISON.

The ultimate end of man is the enjoyment of God, beyond which he cannot form a wish.

GROVE.

LASTLY, AT LAST, AT LENGTH.

LASTLY, like last (v. Last), respects the order of succession: AT LAST or AT LENGTH refer to what has preceded. When a sermon is divided into many heads, the term lastly comprehends the last division. When an affair is settled after much difficulty, it is said to be at last settled; and if it be settled after a protracted continuance, it is said to be settled at length.

Lastly, opportunities do sometimes offer in which a man may wickedly make his fortune without fear of temporal damage. In such cases what restraint do they lie under who have no regard beyond the grave? ADDISON.

At last being satisfied they had nothing to fear, they brought out all their corn every day. ADDISON.

A neighboring king had made war upon this female republic several years with various success, and at length overthrew them in a very great battle. ADDISON.

LAUDABLE, PRAISEWORTHY, COMMENDABLE.

LAUDABLE, from the Latin laudo, to praise, is in sense literally PRAISEWORTHY, that is, worthy of praise, or to be praised (v. To praise). COMMENDABLE signifies entitled to commendation.

Laudable is used in a general application; praiseworthy and commendable are applied to individuals: things are laudable in themselves; they are praiseworthy or commendable in this or that person. That which is laudable is entitled to encouragement and general approbation; an honest endeavor to be useful to one's family or one's self is at all times laudable, and will insure the support of all good people. What is praiseworthy obtains the respect of all men: as all have temptations to do that which is wrong, the performance of one's duty is in all cases praiseworthy; but particularly so in those cases where it opposes one's interests and interferes with one's pleasures. What is commendable is not equally important with the former two; it entitles a person only to a temporary or partial expression of good-will and approbation; the performance of those minor and particular duties which belong to children and subordinate persons is in the proper sense commendable.

Nothing is more laudable than an inquiry after truth. ADDISON.

Ridicule is generally made use of to laugh men out of virtue and good-sense, by attacking everything praiseworthy in human life. ADDISON.

Edmund Waller was born to a very fair estate by the parsimony or frugality of a wise father and mother, and he thought it so commendable an advantage that he resolved to improve it with his utmost care. CLARENDON.

TO LAUGH AT, RIDICULE.

LAUGH, through the medium of the Saxon hlahan, old German lahan, Greek γέλω, comes from the Hebrew lahak, with no variation in the meaning. RIDICULE, from the Latin rideo, has the same original meaning.

Both these verbs are used here in the improper sense for laughter, blended with more or less of contempt: but the former displays itself by the natural expression of laughter: the latter shows itself by a verbal expression: the former is produced by a feeling of mirth, on observing the real or supposed weakness of another; the latter is produced by a strong sense of the absurd or irrational in another: the former is more immediately directed to the person who has excited the feeling; the latter is more commonly produced by things than by persons. We laugh at a person to his face; but we ridicule his notions by writing or in the course of conversation: we laugh at the individual; we ridicule that which is maintained by him.

Men laugh at one another's cost. SWIFT.

It is easy for a man who sits idle at home, and has nobody to please but himself, to ridicule or censure the common practices of mankind. JENTNA.

LAUGHABLE, LUDICROUS, RIDICULOUS, COMICAL, OR COMIC, DROLL.

LAUGHABLE signifies exciting, or fit to excite laughter. LUDICROUS, in Latin ludicr or ludicrus, from ludus, a game, signifies belonging to a game or sport. RIDICULOUS, exciting, or fit to excite ridicule.

Either the direct action of laughter or a corresponding sentiment is included in the signification of all these terms: they differ principally in the cause which produces the feeling; the laughable consists of objects in general, whether personal or otherwise; the ludicrous and ridicu- lous have reference more or less to that which is personal. What is laughable may excite simple merriment independently of all personal reference, unless we admit what Mr. Hobbes, and after him Addison, have maintained of all laughter, that it springs from pride. But without entering into this nice question, I am inclined to distinguish between the laughable which arises from the reflection of what is to our own advantage or pleasure, and that which arises from reflecting on what is to the disadvantage of another. The tricks of a monkey, or the humorous stories of wit, are laughable from the nature of the things themselves, without any apparent allusion, however remote, to any individual but the one whose senses or mind is gratified. The ludicrous and ridiculous are, however, species of the laughable which arise altogether from reflecting on that which is to the disadvantage of another; but the ludicrous has in it less to the disadvantage of another than the ridiculous. It is possible, therefore, for a person to be in a ludicrous situation without any kind of moral demerit, or the slightest depreciation of his moral character; since that which renders his situation ludicrous is altogether independent of himself; or it becomes ludicrous only in the eyes of incompetent judges. "Let an ambassador," says Mr. Pope, "speak the best sense in the world, and deport himself in the most graceful manner before a prince, yet if the tail of his shirt happen, as I have known it happen to a very wise man, to hang out behind, more people will laugh at that than attend to the other." This is the ludicrous. The same can seldom be said of the ridiculous; for as this springs from positive moral causes, it reflects on the person to whom it attaches in a less questionable shape, and produces positive disgrace. Persons very rarely appear ridiculous without being really so; and he who is really ridiculous justly excites contempt.

They'll not show their teeth in way of smile,
Though Nestor swear the jest be laughable.

SHAKESPEARE.

The action of the theatre, though modern states esteem it but ludicrous unless it be satirical and biting, was carefully watched by the ancients that it might improve mankind in virtue. BACON.

Infelix paupertas has nothing in it more intolerable than this, that it renders men ridiculous. SOUTH.

DROLL and COMICAL are in the proper sense applied to things which cause laughter, as when we speak of a droll story, or a comical incident, or a COMIC song. They may be applied to the person; but not so as to reflect disadvantageously on the individual, as in the former terms.

A comic subject loves a humble verse,
Thyestes scorns a low and comic style.

ROSCOMMON.

In the Augustine age itself, notwithstanding the censure of Horace, they preferred the low buffoonery and drollery of Plautus to the delicacy of Terence. WATSON.

LAWFUL, LEGAL, LEGITIMATE, LICIT.

LAWFUL, from law, LEGAL or LEGITIMATE, from the Latin lex, all signify, in the proper sense, belonging to law. They differ, therefore, according to the sense of the word law; lawful respects the law in general, defined or undefined; legal respects only the law of the land which is defined; and legitimate respects the laws or rules of science as well as civil matters in general. LICIT, from the Latin licet, to be allowed, is used only to characterize the moral quality of actions; the lawful properly implies conformable to or enjoined by law; the legal what is in the form or after the manner of law, or binding by law: it is not lawful to coin money with the king's stamp; a marriage was formerly not legal in England which was not solemnized according to the rites of the Established Church: men's passions impel them to do many things which are unlawful or illicit; their ignorance leads them into many things which are illegal or illegitimate. As a good citizen and a true Christian, every man will be anxious to avoid everything which is unlawful: it is the business of the lawyer to define what is legal or illegal: it is the business of the critic to define what is legitimate verse in poetry; it is the business of the linguist to define the legitimate use of words: it is the business of the moralist to point out what is illicit.

According to this spiritual doctor of politics, if his majesty does not owe his crown to the choice of his people, he is no lawful king. BURKE.

Swift's mental powers declined till (1741) it was found necessary that legal guardians should be appointed to his person and fortune. JOHNSON.

Upon the whole, I have sent this my offspring into the world in as decent a dress as I was able; a legitimate one I am sure it is. MOORE.

The King of Prussia charged some of the officers, his prisoners, with maintaining an illicit correspondence. SMOLLETT.

TO LAY OR TAKE HOLD OF, CATCH, SEIZE, SNATCH, GRASP, GRIPE.

To LAY or TAKE HOLD OF is here the generic expression; it denotes simply getting into one's possession, which is the common idea in the signification of all these terms, which differ in regard to the motion in which the action is performed. To CATCH is to lay hold of with an effort. To SEIZE is to lay hold of with violence. To SNATCH is to lay hold of by a sudden effort. One is said to lay hold of that on which one places his hand; he takes hold of that which he secures in his hand. We lay hold of anything when we see it falling; we take hold of anything when we wish to lift it up; we catch what attempts to escape; we seize it when it makes resistance; we snatch that which we are particularly afraid of not getting otherwise. A person who is fainting lays hold of the first thing which comes in his way; a sick person or one that wants support takes hold of another's arm in walking; various artifices are employed to catch animals; the wild beasts of the forest seize their prey the moment they come within their reach; it is the rude sport of a school-boy to snatch out of the hand of another that which he is not willing to let go.

Sometimes it happens that a corn slips out of their paws, when they (the ants) are climbing up; they take hold of it again when they can find it, otherwise they look for another. ADDISON.

One great genius often catches the flame from another. ADDISON.

Furious he said, and tow'rd the Grecian crew, (Seiz'd by the crest) th' unhappy warrior drew. POPE.

The hungry harpies fly,
They snatch the meat, defiling all they find. DRYDEN.

To lay hold of is to get in the possession. To GRASP and to GRIPE signify to have or keep in the possession; an eagerness to keep or not to let go is expressed by that of grasping; a fearful anxiety of losing and an earnest desire of keeping is expressed by the act of gripping. When a famished man lays hold of food he grasps it, from a convulsive kind of fear lest it should leave him: when a miser lays hold of money, he gripes it from the love he bears to it, and the fear he has that it will be taken from him.

Like a miser midst his store,
Who grasps and grasps till he can hold no more. DRYDEN.

They gripe their oaks; and every panting breast
Is rais'd by turns with hope, by turns with fear depress'd. DRYDEN.

TO LEAD, CONDUCT, GUIDE.

LEAD, in Saxon leden, Low German leiden, is connected with the old German leit, a way, signifying to put in the way, or help in one's way. CONDUCT, Lat. in conductus, participle of conduco or con or cum with, and duco, to lead, signifies to bring with one. GUIDE, in French guider, Saxon witan or wisan, German, etc., weisen, to show, signifies to show the way.

All these terms are employed to denote the influence which a person has over the movements or actions of some person. To lead is an unqualified action: one leads by helping a person onward in any manner, as to lead a child by the hand, or to lead a person through a wood by going before him. To conduct and guide are different modes of leading, the former by virtue of one's office or authority, the latter by one's knowledge or power; as to conduct an army, or to conduct a person into the presence of another; to guide a traveller in an unknown country. These words may therefore be applied to the same objects: a general leads an army, inasmuch as he goes before it into the field; he conducts an army, inasmuch as he directs its operations; the stable-boy leads the horses to water; the coachman guides the horses in a carriage.

The shepherd's going before the sheep, and leading them to pure waters and verdant pastures, is a very striking and beautiful representation of God's preventing grace and continual help. SHEPHERD.

We waited some time in expectation of the next worthy who came in with a great retinue of historians whose names I could not learn, most of them being natives of Carthage. The person thus conducted, who was Hannibal, seemed much disturbed. ADDISON.

His guide, as faithful from that day
As Hesperus, that leads the sun his way.

FAIRFAX.

Conduct and guide may also be applied in this sense to inanimate objects; as the pilot conducts the vessel into the port, the steersman guides a vessel by the help of the rudder.

When smooth old ocean and each storm's asleep,
Then ignorance may plough the watery deep,
But when the demon of the tempest rave,
Skill must conduct the vessel through the wave.

GRAINGER.

No more—but hasten to thy tasks at home,
There guide the spindle and direct the loom.

POPE.

In the moral application of these terms, persons may lead or guide other persons, but they conduct things; as to lead a person into a course of life; to guide him in a course of reading or study; to conduct a lawsuit, or any particular business. To lead being a matter of purely personal influence, may be either for the benefit or injury of the person led.

Can knowledge have no bound, but must advance
So far to make us wish for ignorance?
And rather in the dark to grope our way
Than led by a false guide to err by day.

DENHAM.

To conduct, supposing judgment and management, and to guide, supposing superior intelligence, are always taken in the good sense, unless otherwise qualified.

He so conducted the affairs of the kingdom, that he made the reign of a very weak prince most happy to the English.

LOAD LYTTELTON.

Imoinda. Oh! this separation
Has made you dearer, if it can be so,
Than you were ever to me; you appear
Like a kind star to my benighted step
To guide me on my way to happiness.

SOUTHERN.

Things as well as persons may lead, conduct, and guide, with a similar distinction. Whatever serves as a motive of action, or as a course and passage to a place or an object, leads.

Our schemes of thought in infancy are lost in those of youth; these too take a different turn in manhood, till old age often leads us back into our former infancy.

SPECTATOR.

Whatever influences our conduct rightly, conducts.

She imbibed in childhood those principles which in middle life preserved her untainted from the profligacy of one husband and the fanaticism of another; and after her deliverance from both, conducted her to the close of a long life in the uniform exercise of every virtue which became her sex, her rank, her Christian profession.

WHITAKER.

Whatever serves as a rule or guide, guides.

The brutes are guided by instinct, and know no sorrow.

STEELE.

As persons may sometimes be false guides, so things may furnish a false rule.

He now entirely disposed of all the graces of the king, in conferring all the favors and all the offices of three kingdoms without a rival: in the dispensing whereof he was guided more by the rules of appetite than of judgment.

CLARENDON.

LEAN, MEAGRE.

LEAN is in all probability connected with line, lank, and long, signifying that which is simply long without any other dimension. MEAGRE, in Latin macer, Greek μικρος, small.

Lean denotes want of fat; meagre want of flesh: what is lean is not always meagre; but nothing can be meagre without being lean. Brutes as well as men are lean, but men only are said to be meagre: leanness is frequently connected with the temperament; meagreness is the consequence of starvation and disease. There are some animals by nature inclined to be lean; a meagre, pale visage is to be seen perpetually in the haunts of vice and poverty.

The sixth age shifts
Into the lean and slipped pantaloons,
With spectacles on nose and pouch on side.

SHAKESPEARE.

So thin, so ghastly meagre, and so wan,
So bare of flesh, he scarce resembled man.

DRYDEN.

TO LEAN, INCLINE, BEND.

LEAN, in Saxon hlymian, Danish, etc., lâne, is derived from the same root as the Latin clino, or the Greek κλινω, and are connected with the word lie, lay. INCLINE is immediately derived from the Latin. BEND, v. To bend.

In the proper sense, lean and incline are both said of the position of bodies; bend is said of the shape of bodies: that which leans rests on one side, or in a side-ward direction; that which inclines, leans or turns only in a slight degree: that which bends forms a curvature; it does not all lean the same way: a house leans when the foundation gives way; a tree may grow so as to incline to the right or the left, or a road may incline this or that way; a tree or a road bends when it turns out of the straight course. In the improper sense, the judgment leans, the will inclines, the will or conduct bends, in consequence of some outward action. A person leans to this or that side of a question which he favors; he inclines, or is inclined, to this or that mode of conduct; he bends to the will of another. It is the duty of a judge to lean to the side of mercy as far as is consistent with justice: whoever inclines too readily to listen to the tales of distress which are continually told to excite compassion will find himself in general deceived; an unbending temper is the bane of domestic felicity.

Like you a courtier born and bred,
Kings lean'd their ear to what I said. GAY.

Say what you want; the Latins you shall find,
Not forc'd to goodness, but by will inclin'd. DRYDEN.

And as on corn when western gusts descend,
Before the blast the lofty harvest bend. POPE.

TO LEAVE, QUIT, RELINQUISH.

LEAVE, in Saxon leafve, in old German laube, Latin linguo, Greek λεπω, signifies either to leave or be wanting, because one is wanting in the place which one leaves. QUIT, in French quitter, from the Latin quietus, rest, signifies to rest or remain, to give up the hold of. RELINQUISH, v. To abandon.

We leave that to which we may intend to return; we quit that to which we return no more: we may leave a place voluntarily or otherwise; but we relinquish it unwillingly. We leave persons or things; we quit and relinquish things only. I leave one person in order to speak to another; I leave my house for a short time; I quit it not to return to it.

Leave and quit may be used in the improper as well as the proper sense. It is the privilege of the true Christian to be able to leave all the enjoyments of this life, not only with composure, but with satisfaction; dogs have sometimes evinced their fidelity, even to the remains of their masters, by not quitting the spot where they are laid; prejudices, particularly in matters of religion, acquire so deep a root in the mind that they cannot be made to relinquish their hold by the most persuasive eloquence and forcible reasoning.

Why leave we not the fatal Trojan shore,
And measure back the seas we cross'd before? POPE.

The sacred wrestler, till a blessing giv'n,
Quits not his hold, but, halting, conquers heav'n. WALLER.

To descend voluntarily from the supreme to a subordinate station, and to relinquish the possession of power, in order to attain the enjoyment of happiness, seems to be an effort too great for the human mind. ROBERTSON.

TO LEAVE, TAKE LEAVE, BID FAREWELL, OR ADIEU.

LEAVE is here general as before (v. To leave); it expresses simply the idea of separating one's self from an object, whether for a time or otherwise; to TAKE LEAVE and BID FAREWELL imply a separation for a perpetuity.

To leave is an unqualified action; it is applied to objects of indifference, or otherwise, but supposes in general no exercise of one's feelings. We leave persons as convenience requires; we leave them on the road, in the field, in the house, or wherever circumstances direct; we leave them with or without speaking; but to take leave is a parting ceremony between friends, on their parting for a considerable time; to bid farewell, or ADIEU, is a still more solemn ceremony, when the parting is expected to be final. When applied to things, we leave such as we do not wish to meddle with; we take leave of those things which were agreeable to us, but which we find it prudent to give up; and we bid farewell to those for which we still retain a great attachment. It is better to leave a question undecided, than to attempt to decide it by altercation or violence; it is greater virtue in a man to take leave of his vices, than to let them take leave of him; when a man engages in schemes of ambition, he must bid adieu to all the enjoyments of domestic life.

Self alone, in nature rooted fast, Attends us first and leaves us last. SWIFT.

Now I am to take leave of my readers, I am under greater anxiety than I have known for the work of any day since I undertook this province. STEELE.

Anticipate the awful moment of your bidding
the world an eternal farewell. BLAIR.

LEAVE, LIBERTY, PERMISSION, LICENSE.

LEAVE has here the sense of freedom granted, because what is left to itself is left free. LIBERTY is also taken for liberty granted. PERMISSION signifies the act of permitting (v. To allow), or the thing permitted. LICENSE, in Latin licentia, from licet, to be lawful, signifies the state of being permitted by law or authority.

Leave and liberty may sometimes be taken as well as given; permission and license is never to be taken, but must always be granted, and that in an especial manner—the former by express words, the latter by some acknowledged and mostly legal form. Leave is employed only on familiar occasions; liberty is given in more important matters: the master gives leave to his servant to go out for his pleasure; a gentleman gives his friends the liberty of shooting on his grounds: leave is taken in indifferent matters, particularly as it respects leave of absence; liberty is taken by a greater, and in general an unauthorized, stretch of one's powers, and is, therefore, an infringement on the rights of another. What is done without the leave may be done without the knowledge, though not contrary to the will of another; but liberties which are taken without offering an apology are always calculated to give offence. Leave respects only particular and private matters; liberty respects general or particular matters, public or private; as liberty of speech, liberty of the press, and the like.

I must have leave to be grateful to any one who serves me, let him be ever so obnoxious to any party. POPE.

I am for the full liberty of diversion (for children) as much as you can be. LOCKE.

Leave and permission are both the acts of private individuals in special cases. The permission is a more formal and less familiar act than leave; the permission is often an act of courtesy passing between equals and friends; the leave is properly said of what passes from superiors to inferiors: a person obtains leave of absence. The license is always general, or resting on some general authority; as the licenses given by government, and poetic licenses. Whenever applied to individuals it carries with it the idea of a special authority; as a license given by a landlord to the tenant to assign his lease.

And that they know well
That gave me public leave to speak of him.
SHAKESPEARE.

The repeated permissions you give me of dealing freely with you, will, I hope, excuse what I have done. POPE.

Leaving the wits the spacious air,
With licenses to build castles there. SWIFT.

LEAVINGS, REMAINS.

LEAVINGS are the consequence of a voluntary act: they signify what is left: REMAINS are what follow in the course of things; they are what remains; the former is therefore taken in the bad sense to signify what has been left as worthless; the latter is never taken in this bad sense. When many persons of good taste have the liberty of choosing, it is fair to expect that the leavings will be worth little or nothing, after all have made their choice. By the remains of beauty which are discoverable in the face of a female, we may be enabled to estimate what her personal gifts were.

Scale, fins, and bones, the leavings of the feast.
SOMERVILLE.

So midnight tapers waste their last remains.
SOMERVILLE.

TO LET, LEAVE, SUFFER.

THE removal of hinderance or constraint on the actions of others, is implied by all these terms; but LET, like the German lassen, to leave, connected with the Latin laxus, and our word loose, is a less formal action than LEAVE (v. To leave), and this than SUFFER, from the Latin suffero, to bear with, signifying not to put a stop to. I let a person pass in the road by getting out of his way: I leave a person to decide on a matter according to his own discretion, by declining to interfere; I suffer a person to go his own way, over whom I am expected to exercise a control. It is in general most prudent to let things take their own course: in the education of youth, the greatest art lies in leaving them to follow the natural bent of their minds and turn of the disposition, and at the same time not suffering them to do anything prejudicial to their character or future interests.

Then to invoke
The goddess, and let in the fatal horse,
We all consent. DENHAM.

This crime I could not leave unpunished. DENHAM.

If Pope had suffered his heart to be alienated from her, he could have found nothing that might fill her place. JOHNSON.

LETTER, EPISTLE.

ACCORDING to the origin of these words, LETTER, in Latin litera, signifies any document composed of written letters; and EPISTLE, in Greek επιστολη, from επιστελλω, to send, signifies a letter sent or addressed to any one; consequently the former is the generic, the latter the specific term. Letter is a term altogether familiar; it may be used for whatever is written by one friend to another in domestic life, or for the public documents of this description, which have emanated from the pen of writers, as the letters of Madame de Sévigné, the letters of Pope or of Swift; and even those which were written by the ancients, as the letters of Cicero, Pliny, and Seneca; but in strict propriety those are entitled epistles, as a term most adapted to whatever has received the sanction of ages, and by the same rule, likewise, whatever is peculiarly solemn in its contents has acquired the same epithet, as the epistles of St. Paul, St. Peter, St. John, St. Jude; and by an analogous rule, whatever poetry is written in the epistolary form is denominated an epistle rather than a letter, whether of ancient or modern date, as the epistles of Horace, or the epistles of Boileau; and, finally, whatever is addressed by way of dedication is denominated a dedicatory epistle. Ease and a friendly familiarity should characterize the letter: sentiment and instruction are always conveyed by an epistle.

Epistles or (according to the word in use) familiar letters may be called the larum-bells of love; I hope this will prove so to you, and have the power to awaken you out of that silence wherein you have slept so long. HOWELL.

LETTERS, LITERATURE, LEARNING.

LETTERS and LITERATURE signify knowledge, derived through the medium of written letters or books, that is, information: LEARNING (v. Knowledge) is confined to that which is communicated, that is, scholastic knowledge. The term men of letters, or the republic of letters, comprehends all who devote themselves to the cultivation of their minds: literary societies have for their object the diffusion of general information: learned societies propose to themselves the higher object of extending the bounds of science, and increasing the sum of human knowledge. Men of letters have a passport for admittance into the highest circles; literary men can always find resources for themselves in their own society: learned men, or men of learning, are more the objects of respect and admiration than of imitation.

To the greater part of mankind the duties of life are inconsistent with much study; and the hours which they would spend upon letters must be stolen from their occupations and families.

JOHNSON.

He that recalls the attention of mankind to any part of learning which time has left behind it, may be truly said to advance the literature of his own age. JOHNSON.

TO LIE, LAY.

By a vulgar error these verbs have been so confounded as to deserve some notice. To LIE is neuter, and designates a state: to LAY is active, and denotes an action on an object; it is properly to cause to lie: a thing lies on the table; some one lays it on the table; he lies with his fathers; they laid him with his fathers. In the same manner, when used idiomatically, we say, a thing lies by us until we bring it into use; we lay it by for some future purpose: we lie down in order to repose ourselves; we lay money down by way of deposit: the disorder lies in the constitution; we lay a burden upon our friends.

Ants bite off all the buds before they lay it up, and therefore the corn that has lain in their nests will produce nothing. ADDISON.

The Church admits none to holy orders without laying upon them the highest obligations imaginable. BEVERIDGE.

LIFELESS, DEAD, INANIMATE.

LIFELESS and DEAD suppose the absence of life where it has once been; INANIMATE supposes its absence where it has never been; a person is said to be lifeless or dead from whom life has departed; the material world consists of objects which are by nature inanimate. Lifeless is negative: it signifies simply without life, or the vital spark: dead is positive; it denotes an actual and perfect change in the object. We may speak of a lifeless corpse, when speaking of a body which sinks from a state of animation into that of inanimation; we speak of dead bodies to designate such as have undergone an entire change. A person, therefore, in whom animation is suspended, is, for the time being, lifeless, in appearance at least, although we should not say dead.

Nor can his lifeless nostril please
With the once ravishing smell. COWLEY.
How dead the vegetable kingdom lies! THOMSON.

We may in some sort be said to have a society even with the inanimate world. BURKE.

In the moral acceptation, lifeless and inanimate denote the want of that life or animation which is requisite or proper; dead implies the total want of moral feeling which ought to exist.

He was a lifeless preacher. BURNET.

And are you sure that old age will come with all those circumstances inviting repentance. It may be, and is very likely to be, to life, what winter is to the year, a time of chillness and numbness, and of deadness of the faculties for repentance. BEVERIDGE.

TO LIFT, HEAVE, HOIST.

LIFT, in German lüften, Swedish, etc., lyften, to raise in the air, from luft, in Scotch lift, air. HEAVE, in Saxon heavian, German heben, etc., comes from the absolute particle ha, signifying high, because to heave is to set up on high. HOIST, in French hausser, low German hiesen, is a variation from the same source as heave.

The idea of making high is common to all these words, but they differ in the objects and the circumstances of the action; we lift with or without an effort: we heave and hoist always with an effort; we lift a child up to let him see anything more distinctly; workmen heave the stones or beams which are used in a building; sailors hoist the long-boat into the water. To lift and hoist are transitive verbs; they require an agent and an object: heave is intransitive, it may have an inanimate object for an agent: a person lifts his hand to his head; when whales are killed, they are hoisted into vessels: the bosom heaves when it is oppressed with sorrow, the waves of the sea heave when they are agitated by the wind.

What god so daring in your aid to move,
Or lift his hand against the force of Jove? POPE.
Murm'ring they move, as when Old Ocean roars,
And heaves huge surges to the trembling shores.
POPE.

The reef enwrapt, th' inserted knittles tied,
To hoist the shorten'd sail again they tried.
FALCONER.

TO LIFT, RAISE, ERECT, ELEVATE, EXALT.

THE idea of making a thing higher than it was before is common to these verbs. To LIFT (v. To lift) is to take up from a given spot by a direct application of force. To RAISE, that is to cause to rise; to ERECT, from the Latin erectum, supine of erigo, and the Greek ortyeu, to extend; to ELEVATE, from elevatus, participle of elevo, or e, above, and levo, to lift or raise, signify to make higher by a variety of means, but not necessarily by moving the object from the spot where it rests. We lift a stool with our hands, we raise a stool by giving it longer legs; we erect a monument by heaping one stone upon another; a mountain is elevated so many feet above the surface of the sea. Whatever is to be carried is lifted; whatever is to be situated higher is to be raised; whatever is to be constructed above other objects is to be erected; and when the perpendicular height is to be described, it is said to be elevated. A ladder is lifted upon the shoulders: a standard ladder is raised against a wall; a scaffolding is erected; a pillar is elevated above the houses.

Now rosy morn ascends the court of Jove,
Lifts up her light, and opens day above. POPE.

The great crater of Etna itself is raised to an enormous height above the lower regions of the mountain. BRYDENE.

From their assistance, happier walls expect,
Which, wand'ring long, at last thou shalt erect.
DRYDEN.

We took notice of several of those meteors, called falling stars, which still appeared to be as much elevated above us as when we see from the plain. BRYDENE.

Lift and raise may sometimes be applied to the same objects: a stone may either be lifted or raised, but lift is the more ordinary term; so when raise and erect are applied to the same objects, raise is the more familiar expression. Elevate is most usual in scientific language. All these terms, except erect, have likewise a moral application; EXALT, from altus, high, has no other. In this case lift is seldom used in a good sense; to raise is used in a good or an indifferent sense; to elevate is mostly, and exalt always, used in the best sense. A person is seldom lifted up for any good purpose, or from any merit in himself; it is commonly to suit the ends of party that people are lifted into notice, or lifted into office; a person may be raised for his merits, or raise himself by his industry, in both which cases he is entitled to esteem; so likewise one may be lifted up by pride, or raised in one's mind or estimation; one is elevated by circumstances, but still more so by one's character and moral qualities; one is rarely exalted but by means of superior endowments.

Our successes have been great, and our hearts have been much lifted up by them, so that we have reason to humble ourselves. ATTERBURY.
Rais'd in his mind the Trojan hero stood,
 And long'd to break from out his ambient cloud. DRYDEN.

Prudence operates on life in the same manner as rules on composition; it produces vigilance rather than elevation. JOHNSON.

A creature of a more exalted kind
 Was wanting yet, and then was man design'd. DRYDEN.

LIGHTNESS, LEVITY, FLIGHTINESS, VOLATILITY, GIDDINESS.

LIGHTNESS, from light, signifies the abstract quality. LEVITY, in Latin levitas, from levis, light, signifies the same. VOLATILITY, in Latin volatilitas, from volo, to fly, signifies flitting, or ready to fly swiftly on. FLIGHTINESS, from flighty and fly, signifies a readiness to fly. GIDDINESS is from giddy, in Saxon gidig.

Lightness and giddiness are taken either in the natural or metaphorical sense; the rest only in the moral sense; lightness is said of the outward carriage, or the inward temper; levity is said only of the outward carriage: a light-minded man treats everything lightly, be it ever so serious; the lightness of his mind is evident by the lightness of his motions. Lightness is common to both sexes; levity is peculiarly striking in females; and in respect to them, they are both exceptionable qualities in the highest degree: when a woman has lightness of mind, she verges very near toward direct vice; when there is levity in her conduct, she exposes herself to the imputation of criminality. Volatility, flightiness, and giddiness are degrees of lightness which rise in signification on one another; volatility being more than lightness, and the others more than volatility: lightness and volatility are defects as they relate to age; those only who ought to be serious or grave are said to be light or volatile. When we treat that as light which is weighty, when we suffer nothing to sink into the mind, or make any impression, this is a defective lightness of character; when the spirits are of a buoyant nature, and the thoughts fly from one object to another, without resting on any for a moment, this lightness becomes volatility: a light-minded person sets care at a distance; a volatile person catches pleasure from every passing object. Flightiness and giddiness are the defects of youth; they bespeak that entire want of command over the feelings and animal spirits which is inseparable from a state of childhood; a flighty child, however, only fails from a want of attention; but a giddy child, like one whose head is in the natural sense giddy, is unable to collect itself so as to have any consciousness of what passes; a flighty person makes mistakes; a giddy person commits extravagances.

Innocence gives a lightness to the spirits, ill imitated and ill supplied by that forced levity of the vicious. BLAIR.

If we see people dancing, even in wooden shoes, and a fiddle always at their heels, we are soon convinced of the volatile spirits of those merry slaves. SOMERVILLE.

Remembering many flightinesses in her writing, I know not how to behave myself to her. RICHARDSON.

The giddy vulgar, as their fancies guide,
 With noise, say nothing, and in parts divide. DRYDEN.

LIKENESS, RESEMBLANCE, SIMILARITY, OR SIMILITUDE.

LIKENESS denotes the quality of being alike (v. Equal). RESEMBLANCE, from resemble, compounded of re and semble, in French sembler, Latin simulo, signifies putting on the form of another thing. SIMILARITY, in Latin similaritas, from similis, in Greek ομοιος, like, from the Hebrew semel, an image, denotes the abstract property of likeness.

Likeness is the most general, and at the same time the most familiar, term of the three; it respects either external or internal properties: resemblance respects only the external properties: similarity respects the circumstances or properties: we speak of a likeness between two persons; of a resemblance in the cast of the eye, a resemblance in the form or figure; of a similarity in age and disposition. Likeness is said only of that which is actual; resemblance may be said of that which is apparent: a likeness consists of something specific; a resemblance may be only partial and contingent. A thing is said to be, but not to appear, like another; it may, however, have the shadow of a resemblance: whatever things are alike are alike in their essential properties; but they may resemble each other in a partial degree, or in certain particulars, but are otherwise essentially different. We are most like the Divine Being in the act of doing good; there is nothing existing in nature which has not certain points of resemblance with something else.

With friendly hand I hold the glass,
To all promiscuous as they pass;
Should folly there her likeness view,
I fret not that the mirror's true.

MOORE.

So, faint resemblance! on the marble tomb
The well-dissembled lover stooping stands,
Forever silent, and forever sad.

THOMSON.

Similarity, or SIMILITUDE, which is a higher term, is in the moral application, in regard to likeness, what resemblance is in the physical sense; what is alike has the same nature; what is similar has certain features of similarity: in this sense feelings are alike, sentiments are alike, persons are alike; but cases are similar, circumstances are similar, conditions are similar. Likeness excludes the idea of difference; similarity includes only the idea of casual likeness.

Rochefoucault frequently makes use of the antithesis—a mode of speaking the most tiresome of any, by the similarity of the periods.

WATSON.

As it addeth deformity to an ape to be so like a man, so the similitude of superstition to religion makes it the more deformed.

BACON.

LIKENESS, PICTURE, IMAGE, EFFIGY.

In the former article LIKENESS is considered as an abstract term, but in connection with the words picture and image it signifies the representation of likeness. PICTURE, in Latin pictura, from pingo, to paint, signifies the thing painted. IMAGE, in Latin imago, contracted from inaitago, comes from imitor, to imitate, signifying an imitation. EFFIGY, in Latin effigies, from effingo, signifies that which is formed after another thing.

Likeness and picture, as terms of art, are both applied to painting; but the term likeness refers us to the object of the art, namely, to get the likeness; and the picture to the mode of the art, namely, by painting; whence in familiar language an artist is said to take likenesses, who takes or paints the portraits of persons; or in general terms an artist may be said to be happy in taking a likeness, who can represent on paper the likeness of any object, but particularly that of persons. In other connections the word picture is most usually employed in regard to works of art, as to sketch a picture, to finish a picture, and the like.

Hayley, whose love for me seems to be truly that of a brother, has given me his picture drawn by Romney about fifteen years ago—an admirable likeness.

COWPER.

As a likeness may be given by other means besides that of painting, it may be taken for any likeness conveyed; as parents may be said to stamp or impress a likeness on their children. Picture may be figuratively taken for whatever serves as a picture, as a picture of happiness. Image, as appears from its derivation, signifies nothing more than likeness, but has been usually applied to such likenesses as are taken, or intended to represent spiritual objects, whether on paper or in wood or stone, such as the graven images which were the objects of idolatrous worship: it has, however, been extended in its application to any likeness of one object represented by another; as children are sometimes the image of their parents,

God, Moses first, then David, did inspire
To compose anthems for his heavenly quire;
To th' one the style of friend he did impart,
On th' other stamp'd the likeness of his heart.

DENHAM.

A likeness and a picture contain actual likenesses of the things which they are intended to represent; but an effigy may be only an arbitrary likeness, as where a human figure is made to stand for the figure of any particular man without any likeness of the individual. This term is applied to the rude or fictitious pictures of persons in books, and also to the figures of persons on tombstones or on coins, which contain but few traces of likeness.

I have read somewhere that one of the popes refused to accept an edition of a saint's works, which were presented to him, because the saint, in his effigies before the book, was drawn without a beard.

ADDISON.

Or to the still ruder representations of individuals who are held up to public odium by the populace.

The people of Turvey have burned him in effigy.

COWPER.

LIMIT, EXTENT.

LIMIT is a more specific and definite term than EXTENT: by the former we are directed to the point where anything ends; by the latter we are led to no particular point, but to the whole space included: limits are in their nature something finite; extent is either finite or infinite: we therefore speak of that which exceeds the limits, or comes within the limits; and of that which comprehends the extent, or is according to the extent: a plenipotentiary or minister must not exceed the limits of his instruction; when we think of the immense extent of this globe, and that it is among the smallest of an infinite number of worlds, the mind is lost in admiration and amazement: it does not fall within the limits of a periodical work to enter into historical details; a complete history of any country is a work of great extent.

JOHNSON.

TO LINGER, TARRY, LOITER, LAG, SAUNTER.

LINGER, from longer, signifies to make the time long in doing a thing. TARRY, from tardus, slow, is to be slow. LOITER may probably come from lentus, slow. LAG, from lie, signifies to lie back. SAUNTER, from sanda terra, the Holy Land; because, in the time of the Crusades, many idle persons were going backward and forward: hence idle, planless going comes to be so denominated.

Suspension of action or slow movement enters into the meaning of all these terms: to linger is to stop altogether, or to move but slowly forward; to tarry is properly to suspend one's movement: the former proceeds from reluctance to leave the spot on which we stand; the latter from motives of discretion: he will naturally linger who is going to leave the place of his nativity for an indefinite period; those who have much business to transact will be led to tarry long in a place: to loiter is to move slowly and reluctantly; but, from a bad cause, a child loiters who is unwilling to go to school: to lag is to move slower than others, to stop while they are going on; this is seldom done for a good purpose; those who lag have generally some sinister and private end to answer: to saunter is altogether the act of an idler; those who have no object in moving either backward or forward will saunter if they move at all.

'Tis long since I, for my celestial wife,

LIQUID, LIQUOR, JUICE, HUMOR.

LIQUID (v. Fluid) is the generic term: LIQUOR, which is but a variation from the same Latin verb, liquesco, whence liquid is derived, is a liquid which is made to be drunk: JUICE, in French jus, is a liquid that issues from bodies: and HUMOR, in Latin humor, probably from the Greek pepsa and peu, to flow or pour out, is a species of liquid which flows in bodies, and forms a constituent part of them. All natural bodies consist of liquids or solids, or a combination of both: liquor serves to quench the thirst as food satisfies the hunger; the juices of bodies are frequently their richest parts; and the humors are commonly the most important parts; the former of these two belong peculiarly to vegetable, and the latter to animal bodies: water is the simplest of all liquids; wine is the most inviting of all liquors; the orange produces the most agreeable juice; the humors of both men and brutes are most liable to corruption.

LIST, ROLL, CATALOGUE, REGISTER.

LIST, in French liste, and German liste, comes from the German leiste, a last, signifying in general any long and narrow body. ROLL signifies in general anything rolled up, particularly paper with its written contents. CATALOGUE, in Latin catalogus, Greek καταλογος, from καταλειω, to write down, signifies a written enumeration. REGISTER, from the verb rego, to govern, signifies what is done or inserted by order of government, or for the purposes of order.

A collection of objects brought into some kind of order is the common idea included in the signification of these terms. The contents and disposition of a list is the most simple; it consists of little more than names arranged under one another in a long narrow line, as a list of words, a list of plants and flowers, a list of voters, a list of visits, a list of deaths, of births, of marriages: roll, which is figuratively put for the contents of a roll, is a list rolled up for convenience, as a long roll of saints: catalogue involves more details than a simple list; it specifies not only names, but dates, qualities, and circumstances. A list of books contains their titles; a catalogue of books contains an enumeration of their size, price, number of volumes, edition, etc.: a roll of saints simply specifies their names; a catalogue of saints enters into particulars of their ages, deaths, etc.: a register contains more than either; for it contains events, with dates, actors, etc., in all matters of public interest.

After I had read over the list of the persons elected into the Tiers Etat, nothing which they afterward did could appear astonishing. BURKE.

ADDISON.

LITTLE, SMALL, DIMINUTIVE.

LITTLE, in Dutch littel, connected with light, etc., is a general term both in its sense and application. SMALL, in German smahl, narrow, and DIMINUTIVE, from minus, less, signifying made less, are particular terms conveying some collateral idea. What is little is so in the ordinary sense in respect to size; it is properly opposed to great: the small is that which is less than others in point of bulk; it is opposed to the large: the diminutive is that which is less than it ought to be; as a person is said to be diminutive in stature who is below the ordinary stature.

While the promis'd fruit

LIVELIHOOD, LIVING, SUBSISTENCE, MAINTENANCE, SUPPORT, SUSTENANCE.

THE means of living or supporting life is the idea common to all these terms, which vary according to the circumstances of the individual and the nature of the object which constitutes the means: a LIVELIHOOD is that which is sought after by the day; a laborer earns a livelihood by the sweat of his brow: a SUBSISTENCE is obtained by irregular efforts of various descriptions; beggars meet with so much that they obtain something better than a precarious and scanty subsistence: LIVING is obtained by more respectable and less severe efforts than the former two; tradesmen obtain a good living by keeping shops; artists procure a living by the exercise of their talents: MAINTENANCE, SUPPORT, and SUSTENANCE differ from the other three, inasmuch as they do not comprehend what one gains by one's own efforts, but by the efforts of others: maintenance is that which is permanent: it supplies the place of living: support may be casual, and vary in degree: the object of most public charities is to afford a maintenance to such as cannot obtain a livelihood or living for themselves; it is the business of the parish to give support, in time of sickness and distress, to all who are legal parishioners. Maintenance and support are always granted; but sustenance is that which is taken or received: the former comprehends the means of obtaining food; sustenance comprehends that which sustains the body and supplies the place of food.

A man may as easily know where to find one to teach to debauch, whore, game, and blasphemy, as to teach him to write or cast accounts: 'tis the very profession and livelihood of such people, getting their living by those practices for which they deserve to forfeit their lives.

COWPER.

LIVELY, SPRIGHTLY, VIVACIOUS, SPORTIVE, MERRY, JOCUND.

THE activity of the heart when it beats high with a sentiment of gayety is strongly depicted by all these terms: the LIVELY is the most general and literal in its signification; life, as a moving or active principle, is supposed to be inherent in spiritual as well as material bodies; the feeling, as well as the body which has within a power of moving arbitrarily of itself, is said to have life; and in whatever object this is wanting, this object is said to be dead: in like manner, according to the degree or circumstances under which this moving principle displays itself, the object is denominated lively, that is, having life. SPRIGHTLY, that is, sprightly or spirited, full of spirits, and VIVACIOUS, in Latin vivax, from vivo, to live, that is, the same as lively. Liveliness is the property of childhood, youth, or even maturer age; sprightliness is the peculiar property of youth; vivacity is a quality compatible with the sobriety of years: an infant shows itself to be lively or otherwise in a few months after its birth; a female, particularly in her early years, affords often a pleasing picture of sprightliness; a vivacious companion recommends himself wherever he goes. SPORTIVENESS, that is, fondness of or readiness for sport, is an accompaniment of liveliness or sprightliness:

a sprightly child will show its sprightliness by its sportive humor: MIRTH, i. e., merriness (v. Cheerful), and JOCUNDITY, from jocundus or jucundus, and juvo, to delight or please, signifying the state of being delighted, are the forms of liveliness which display themselves in social life; the former is a familiar quality, more frequently to be discovered in vulgar than in polished society: jocundity is a form of liveliness which poets have ascribed to nymphs and goddesses, and other aerial creatures of the imagination.

The terms preserve the same sense when applied to the characteristics or actions of persons as when applied to the persons themselves: imagination, wit, conception, representation, and the like, are lively; a person's air, manner, look, tune, dance, are sprightly; a conversation, a turn of mind, a society, is vivacious; the muse, the pen, the imagination, is sportive: the meeting, the laugh, the song, the conceit, is merry: the train, the dance is jocund.

One study is inconsistent with a lively imagination, another with a solid judgment. JOHNSON.

By every victory over appetite or passion, the mind gains new strength to refuse those solicitations by which the young and vivacious are hourly assaulted. JOHNSON.

Thus jocund fleets with them the winter night.
THOMSON.

Warn'd by the streaming light and merry lark,

LIVING, BENEFICE.

LIVING signifies literally the pecuniary resource by which one lives. BENEFICE, from benefacio, signifies whatever one obtains as a benefit: the former is applicable to any situation of life, but particularly to that resource which a parish affords to the clergyman; the latter is applicable to no other object: we speak of a living as a resource immediately derived from the parish, in distinction from a curacy, which is derived from an individual; we speak of a benefice in respect to the terms by which it is held, according to the ecclesiastical law: there are many livings which are not benefices, although not vice versa.

In consequence of the Pope's interference, the best livings were filled by Italian, and other foreign, clergy. BLACKSTONE.

Estates held by feudal tenure, being originally gratuitous donations, were at that time denominated beneficia; their very name, as well as constitution, was borrowed, and the care of the souls of a parish thence came to be denominated a benefice. BLACKSTONE.

LODGINGS, APARTMENTS.

A LODGING, or a place to lodge or dwell in, comprehends single rooms, or many rooms, or in fact any place which can be made to serve the purpose; APARTMENTS respect only suits of rooms: apartments, therefore, are, in the strict sense, lodgings; but all lodgings are not apartments: on the other hand, the word lodgings is mostly used for rooms that are let out to hire, or that serve a temporary purpose; but the word apartments may be applied to the suits of rooms in any large house: hence the word lodging becomes on one ground restricted in its use, and apartments on the other: all apartments to let out for hire are lodgings: but apartments not to let out for hire are not lodgings.

LOOK, GLANCE.

LOOK (v. Air) is the generic, and GLANCE (v. To glance at) the specific term; that is to say, a casual or momentary look: a look may be characterized as severe or mild, fierce or gentle, angry or kind; a glance as hasty or sudden, imperfect or slight: so likewise we speak of taking a look, or catching a glance.

Here the soft flocks, with the same harmless look
They wore alive. THOMSON.

The tiger, darting fierce
Impetuous on his prey, the glance has doom'd.
THOMSON.

TO LOOK, SEE, BEHOLD, VIEW, EYE.

LOOK, in Saxon locan, upper German lügen, comes from the same source as lux, light, and the Greek law, to see. SEE is in Saxon seon, Swedish se, Æolic Greek σεαιν, Hebrew sheeah, to see. BEHOLD, compounded of the intensive be and hold, signifies to hold or fix the eye on an object. VIEW, from the French voir, and the Latin video, signifies simply to see. To EYE, from the noun eye, naturally signifies to fathom with the eye.

We look voluntarily; we see involuntarily: the eye sees; the person looks: absent people often see things before they are fully conscious that they are at hand: we may look without seeing, and we may see without looking: near-sighted people often look at that which is too distant to strike the visual organ. To behold is to look at for a continuance; to view is to look at in all directions; to eye is to look at earnestly, and by side glances; that which is seen may disappear in an instant; it may strike the eye and be gone; but what is looked at must make some stay; consequently lightning, and things equally fugitive and rapid in their flight, may be seen, but cannot be looked at. To look at is the familiar as well as the general term, in regard to the others; we look at things in general, which we wish to see, that is, to see clearly, fully, and in all their parts; but we behold that which excites a moral or intellectual interest; we view that which demands intellectual attention; we eye that which gratifies any particular passion: an inquisitive child looks at things which are new to it, but does not behold them; we look at plants, or finery, or whatever gratifies the senses, but we do not behold them: on the other hand, we behold any spectacle which excites our admiration, our astonishment, our pity, or our love: we look at objects in order to observe their external properties; but we view them in order to find out their component parts, their internal properties, their powers of motion and action, etc.: we look at things to gratify the curiosity of the moment, or for mere amusement; but the jealous man eyes his rival, in order to mark his movements, his designs, and his successes; the envious man eyes him who is in prosperity, with a malignant desire to see him humbled.

They climb the next ascent, and, looking down,

TO LOOK, APPEAR.

LOOK is here taken in the neuter and improper sense: in the preceding article (v. To look) it denotes the action of persons striving to see; in the present case it denotes the action of things figuratively striving to be seen. APPEAR, from the Latin appareo or pareo, Greek παρῆμι, signifies to be present or at hand, within sight.

The look of a thing respects the impressions which it makes on the senses, that is, the manner in which it looks; its appearance implies the simple act of its coming into sight: the look of anything is therefore characterized as good or bad, mean or handsome, ugly or beautiful; the appearance is characterized as early or late, sudden or unexpected: there is something very unseemly in the look of a clergyman affecting the airs of a fine gentleman; the appearance of the stars in an evening presents an interesting view even to the ordinary beholder. As what appears must appear in some form, the signification of the term has been extended to the manner of the appearance, and brought still nearer to look in its application; in this case the term look is rather more familiar than that of appearance: we may speak either of regarding the look or the appearance of a thing, as far as it may impress others; but the latter is less colloquial than the former: a man's conduct is said to look rather than to appear ill; but on the other hand, we say a thing assumes an appearance, or has a certain appearance.

Distressful nature pants;
The very streams look languid from afar.

THOMSON.

Never does liberty appear more amiable than under the government of a pious and good prince.

ADDISON.

Look is always employed for what is real; what a thing looks is that which it really is: appear, however, sometimes refers not only to what is external, but to what is superficial. If we say a person looks ill, it supposes some positive and unequivocal evidence of illness: if we say he appears to be ill, it is a less positive assertion than the former; it leaves room for doubt, and allows the possibility of a mistake. We are at liberty to judge of things by their looks, without being chargeable with want of judgment; but as appearances are said to be deceitful, it becomes necessary to admit them with caution as the rule of our judgment. Look is employed mostly in regard to objects of sense; appearance respects natural and moral objects indifferently: the sky looks lowering; an object appears through a microscope greater than it really is; a person's conduct appears in a more culpable light when seen through the representation of an enemy.

Then Nature all
Wears to the lover's eye a look of love.

THOMSON.

LOOKER-ON, SPECTATOR, BEHOLDER, OBSERVER.

THE LOOKER-ON and the SPECTATOR are both opposed to the agents or actors in any scene; but the former is still more abstracted from the objects he sees than the latter.

A looker-on (v. To look at) is careless; he has no part, and takes no part, in what he sees; he looks on, because the thing is before him, and he has nothing else to do: a spectator may likewise be unconcerned, but in general he derives amusement, if nothing else, from what he sees. A clown may be a looker-on, who with open mouth gapes at all that is before him, without understanding any part of it; but he who looks on to draw a moral lesson from the whole is in the moral sense not an uninterested spectator. The BEHOLDER has a nearer interest than the spectator; and the OBSERVER has an interest not less near than that of the beholder, but somewhat different: the beholder has his affections roused by what he sees; the observer has his understanding employed in that which passes before him: the beholder indulges himself in contemplation; the observer is busy in making it subservient to some proposed object: every beholder of our Saviour's sufferings and patience was struck with the conviction of his Divine character, not excepting even some of those who were his most prejudiced adversaries; every calm observer of our Saviour's words and actions was convinced of his Divine mission.

Lookers-on many times see more than gamblers.

JOHNSON.

LOOSE, VAGUE, LAX, DISSOLUTE, LICENTIOUS.

LOOSE is in German los, etc., Latin laxus, Greek αλασσειν, and Hebrew chalatz, to make free. VAGUE, in Latin vagus, signifies wandering. LAX, in Latin laxus, has a similar origin with loose. DISSOLUTE, in Latin dissolutus, participle of dissolvo, signifies dissolved or set free. LICENTIOUS signifies having the license or power to do as one pleases (v. Leave, liberty).

Loose is the generic, the rest are specific terms; they are all opposed to that which is bound or adheres closely: loose is employed either for physical, moral, or intellectual objects; vague only for intellectual objects: lax sometimes for what is intellectual, but oftener for the moral; dissolute and licentious only for moral matters: whatever wants a proper connection, or linking together of the parts, is loose; whatever is scattered and remotely separated is vague: a style is loose where the words and sentences are not made to coalesce, so as to form a regularly connected series; assertions are vague which have but a remote connection with the subject referred to: by the same rule, loose hints thrown out at random may give rise to speculation and conjecture, but cannot serve as the ground of any conclusion; ignorant people are apt to credit every vague rumor, and to communicate it as a certainty. Opinions are loose, either inasmuch as they want logical precision, or as they fail in moral strictness; suggestions and surmises are in their nature vague, as they spring from a very remote channel, or are produced by the wanderings of the imagination; opinions are lax, inasmuch as they have a tendency to lessen the moral obligation, or to loosen moral ties. A loose man injures himself, but a lax man injures society at large. Dissoluteness is the excess of looseness; licentiousness is the consequence of laziness, or the freedom from external constraint. Looseness of character, if indulged, soon sinks into dissoluteness of morals; and laziness of discipline is quickly followed by licentiousness of manners.

The most voluptuous and loose person breathing, were he but tied to follow his dice and his courtships every day, would find it the greatest torment that could befall him. SOUTH.

That action which is vague and indeterminate will at last settle into habit, and habitual peculiarities are quickly ridiculous. JOHNSON.

In this general depravity of manners and laziness of principles, pure religion is nowhere more strongly inculcated (than in our universities). JOHNSON.

As the life of Petronius Arbiter was altogether dissolute, the indifference which he showed at the close of it is to be looked upon as a piece of natural carelessness rather than fortitude. ADDISON.

Moral philosophy is very agreeable to the paradoxical and licentious spirit of the age. BEATTIE.

LORD'S-SUPPER, EUCHARIST, COMMUNION, SACRAMENT.

THE LORD'S-SUPPER is a term of familiar and general use among Christians, as designating in literal terms the supper of our Lord; that is, either the last solemn supper which he took with his disciples previous to his crucifixion, or the commemoration of that event which conformably to his commands has been observed by the professors of Christianity. EUCHARIST is a term of peculiar use among the Roman Catholics, from the Greek ευχαριστω, to give thanks, because personal adoration, by way of returning thanks, constitutes in their estimation the chief part of the ceremony. As the social affections are kept alive mostly by the common participation of meals, so is brotherly love, the essence of Christian fellowship, cherished and warmed in the highest degree by the common participation in this holy festival: hence, by distinction, it has been denominated the COMMUNION. As the vows which are made at the altar of our Lord are the most solemn which a Christian can make, comprehending in them the entire devotion of himself to Christ, the general term SACRAMENT, signifying an oath, has been employed by way of distinction for this ordinance. The Roman Catholics have employed the same term for six other ordinances; but the Protestants, who attach a similar degree of sacredness to no other than baptism, annex this appellation only to these two.

To the worthy participation of the Lord's-Supper, there is indispensably required a suitable preparation. SOUTH.

This ceremony of feasting belongs most properly both to marriage and to the eucharist, as both of them have the nature of a covenant. SOUTH.

One woman he could not bring to the communion, and when he reproved or exhorted her, she only answered that she was no scholar. JOHNSON.

I could not have the consent of the physician to go to church yesterday; I therefore received the holy sacrament at home. JOHNSON.

TO LOSE, MISS.

LOSE, in all probability, is but a variation of loose, because what gets loose or away from a person is lost to him. To MISS, probably from the participle mis, wrong, signifies to put wrong.

What is lost is supposed to be entirely and irrecoverably gone; but what is missed may be only out of sight or not at hand at the time when it is wanted; health or property may be lost; one misses a coach, or one misses what has been mislaid. Things may be lost in a variety of ways independent of the person losing; but missing is mostly by the instrumentality of the person who misses. We lose an opportunity which it is not in our power to use; we miss an opportunity when we suffer it to pass without using.

Some ants are so unfortunate as to fall down with their load when they almost come home; when this happens, they seldom lose their corn, but carry it up again. ADDISON.

By hope and faith secure of future bliss,
Gladly the joys of present life we miss. LEWIS.

LOSS, DAMAGE, DETRIMENT.

LOSS signifies the act of losing or the thing lost. DAMAGE, in French dommage, Latin damnum, from demo, to take away, signifies the thing taken away. DETRIMENT, v. Disadvantageous.

Loss is here the generic term; damage and detriment are species or modes of loss. The person sustains the loss, the thing suffers the damage or detriment. Whatever is gone from us which we wish to retain is a loss; hence we may sustain a loss in our property, in our reputation, in our influence, in our intellect, and every other object of possession: whatever renders an object less serviceable or valuable, by any external violence, is a damage; as a vessel suffers a damage in a storm: whatever is calculated to cross a man's purpose is a detriment; the bare want of a good name may be a detriment to a young tradesman; the want of prudence is always a great detriment to the prosperity of a family.

What trader would purchase such airy satisfaction (as the charms of conversation) by the loss of solid gain. JOHNSON.

The ants were still troubled with the rain, and the next day they took a world of pains to repair the damage. ADDISON.

The expenditure should be with the least possible detriment to the morals of those who expend. BURKE.

LOUD, NOISY, HIGH-SOUNDING, CLAMOROUS.

LOUD, in German, etc., laut, is connected with laut, a sound, lauschen, to listen, and the Greek κλυω, to hear, because sounds are the object of hearing. NOISY, having a noise, like noisome and noxious, comes from the Latin nocuo, to hurt, signifying in general offensive, and in this case offensive to the sense of hearing. HIGH-SOUNDING signifies the same as pitched upon an elevated key, so as to make a great noise, to be heard at a distance. CLAMOROUS, from the Latin clamo, to cry, signifies crying with a loud voice.

Loud is here the generic term, since it signifies a great sound, which is the idea common to them all. As an epithet for persons, loud is mostly taken in an indifferent sense; all the others are taken for being loud beyond measure: noisy is to be lawlessly and unseasonably loud; high-sounding is only to be loud from the bigness of one's words; clamorous is to be disagreeably and painfully loud. We must speak loudly to a deaf person in order to make ourselves heard: children will be noisy at all times if not kept under control: flatterers are always high-sounding in their eulogiums of princes: children will be clamorous for what they want, if they expect to get it by dint of noise; they will be turbulent in case of refusal, if not under proper discipline. In the improper application, loud is taken in as bad a sense as the rest; the loudest praises are the least to be regarded: the applause of a mob is always noisy; high-sounding titles serve only to excite contempt where there is not some corresponding quality: it is the business of a party to be clamorous, as that serves the purpose of exciting the ignorant.

The clowns, a boist'rous, rude, ungovern'd crew,

LOVE, FRIENDSHIP.

LOVE (v. Affection) is a term of very extensive import; it may be either taken in the most general sense for every strong and passionate attachment, or only for such as subsist between the sexes; in either of which cases it has features by which it is easily distinguished from FRIENDSHIP.

Love subsists between members of the same family; it springs out of their natural relationship, and is kept alive by their close intercourse and constant interchange of kindnesses: friendship excludes the idea of any tender and natural relationship; nor is it, like love, to be found in children, but is confined to maturer years; it is formed by time, by circumstances, by congruity of character, and sympathy of sentiment. Love always operates with ardor; friendship is remarkable for firmness and constancy. Love is peculiar to no station; it is to be found equally among the high and the low, the learned and the unlearned: friendship is of nobler growth; it finds admittance only into minds of a loftier make: it cannot be felt by men of an ordinary stamp. Both love and friendship are gratified by seeking the good of the object; but love is more selfish in its nature than friendship; in indulging another it seeks its own gratification, and when this is not to be obtained, it will change into the contrary passion of hatred; friendship, on the other hand, is altogether disinterested, it makes sacrifices of every description, and knows no limits to its sacrifice.

So every passion but fond love,
Unto its own redress does move. WALLER.

For natural affection soon doth cease,
And quenched is with Cupid's greater flame,
But faithful friendship doth them both suppress,
And them with mastering discipline doth tame. SPENSER.

LOVER, SUITOR, WOOPER.

LOVER signifies literally one who loves, and is applicable to any object; there are lovers of money, and lovers of wine, lovers of things individually, and things collectively, that is, lovers of particular women in the good sense, or lovers of women in the bad sense. The SUITOR is one who sues and strives after a thing; it is equally undefined as to the object, but may be employed for such as sue for favors from their superiors, or sue for the affections and person of a female. The WOOPER is only a species of lover, who woos or solicits the kind regards of a female. When applied to the same object, namely, the female sex, the term lover is employed for persons of all ranks, who are equally alive to the tender passion of love: sutor is a title adapted to that class of life where all the genuine affections of human nature are adulterated by a false refinement, or entirely lost in other passions of a guilty nature. Wooper is a tender and passionate title, which is adapted to that class of beings that live only in poetry and romance. There is most sincerity in the lover, he simply proffers his love; there is most ceremony in the sutor, he prefers his suit; there is most ardor in the wooper, he makes his vows.

It is very natural for a young friend and a young lover to think the persons they love have nothing to do but to please them. POPE.

What pleasure can it be to be thronged with petitioners, and those perhaps suitors for the same thing? SOUTH.

I am glad this parcel of woopers are so reasonable, for there is not one of them but I dote on his very absence. SHAKESPEARE.

LOW, MEAN, ABJECT.

LOW, v. Humble. MEAN, in German gemicn, etc., comes from the same source as the Latin communis, common (v. Common). ABJECT, in French abject, Latin abjectus, participle of abjicio, to cast down, signifies literally cast down or brought very low.

Low is a much stronger term than mean; for what is low stands more directly opposed to what is high, but what is mean is intermediate: the low is applied only to a certain number or description; but mean, like common, is applicable to the great bulk of mankind. A man of low extraction falls below the ordinary level; he is opposed to a noble man: a man of mean birth does not rise above the ordinary level; he is upon a level with the majority. Abject expresses more than either of the others, for it denotes the lowest depression in a person's outward condition or position, as abject poverty.

Had I been born a servant, my low life
Had steady stood from all these miseries. RANDOLPH.

For 'tis the mind that makes the body rich;
And as the sun breaks through the darkest clouds,
So honor 'pearth in the meanest habit. SHAKESPEARE.

Or in this abject posture have ye sworn T'adore the conqueror? MILTON.

When employed to designate character, they preserve the same distinction; the low is that which is positively sunk in itself; but the mean is that which is comparatively low, in regard to the outward circumstances and relative condition of the individual. Swearing and drunkenness are low vices; boxing, cudgelling, and wrestling are low games; a misplaced economy in people of property is mean; a condescension to those who are beneath us for our own petty advantages is meanness. A man is commonly low by birth, education, or habits; but meanness is a defect of nature which sinks a person in spite of every external advantage. Abject, as a characteristic, is applied particularly to the spirit. Slavery is most apt to produce an abject spirit by depriving a man of the use of those faculties which elevate him above the brutes; poverty, fear, or any base passion, may have the same effect.

Yet sometimes nations will decline so low
From virtue. MILTON.

We fast not to please men, nor to promote any mean worldly interest. SMALRIDGE.

There needs no more be said to extol the excellence and power of his wit, than that it was of magnitude enough to cover a world of very great faults, that is, a narrowness in his nature to the lowest degree, an abjectness and want of courage, an insinuating and servile flattering. CLARENDON.

MADNESS, PHRENSY, RAGE, FURY.

MADNESS, vide Derangement. PHRENSY, in Latin phrenesis, Greek φρενις, from φρην, the mind, signifies a disordered mind. RAGE is in French rage, Latin rabies, madness. FURY, in Latin furor, comes in all probability from feror, to be carried, because fury carries a person away.

Madness and phrensy are used in the physical and moral sense; rage and fury only in the moral sense: in the first case, madness is a confirmed derangement in the organ of thought; phrensy is only a temporary derangement from the violence of any disease or other cause: the former lies in the system, and is, in general, incurable; the latter is only occasional, and yields to the power of medicine. In the moral sense of these terms the cause is put for the effect, that is, madness and phrensy are put for that excessive violence of passion by which they are caused; and as rage and fury are species of this passion, namely, the angry passion, they are, therefore, to madness and phrensy sometimes as the cause is to the effect: the former, however, are so much more violent than the latter, as they altogether destroy the reasoning faculty, which is not expressly implied in the signification of the latter terms. Moral madness differs both in degree and duration from phrensy: if it spring from the extravagance of rage, it bursts out into every conceivable extravagance, but is only transitory; if it spring from disappointed love, or any other disappointed passion, it is as permanent as direct physical madness; phrensy is always temporary, but even more impetuous than madness; in the phrensy of despair men commit acts of suicide; in the phrensy of distress and grief, people are hurried into many actions fatal to themselves or others.

'Twas no false heraldry when madness drew
Her pedigree from those who too much knew.

DENHAM.

What phrensy, shepherd, has thy soul possess'd?
DRYDEN.

Rage refers more immediately to the agitation that exists within the mind; fury refers to that which shows itself outwardly: a person contains or stifles his rage; but his fury breaks out into some external mark of violence: rage will subside of itself; fury spends itself; a person may be choked with rage; but his fury finds a vent: an enraged man may be pacified; a furios one is deaf to every remonstrance. Rage, when applied to persons, commonly signifies highly inflamed anger; but it may be employed for inflamed passion toward any object which is specified; as a rage for music, a rage for theatrical performances, a fashionable rage for any whim of the day. Fury, though commonly signifying rage bursting out, yet it may be any impetuous feeling displaying itself in extravagant action; as the divine fury supposed to be produced upon the priestess of Apollo by the inspiration of the god, and the Bacchanalian fury, which expression depicts the influence of wine upon the body and mind. In the improper application, to inanimate objects, the words rage and fury preserve a similar distinction: the rage of the heat denotes the excessive height to which it is risen; the fury of the winds indicates their violent commotion and turbulence: so in like manner the raging of the tempest characterizes figuratively its burning anger; and the fury of the flames marks their impetuous movements, their wild and rapid spread.

MAGISTERIAL, MAJESTIC, STATELY, POMPOUS, AUGUST, DIGNIFIED.

MAGISTERIAL, from magister, a master, and MAJESTIC, from majestas, are both derived from magis, more, or major, greater, that is, more or greater than others; but they differ in this respect, that the magisterial is something assumed, and is therefore often false; the majestic is natural, and consequently always real: an upstart, or an intruder into any high station or office, may put on a magisterial air, in order to impose on the multitude; but it will not be in his power to be majestic, which never shows itself in a borrowed shape; none but those who have a superiority of character, of birth, or outward station, can be majestic.

Government being the noblest and most mysterious of all arts, is very unfit for those to talk magisterially of who never bore any share in it. SOUTH.

Then Aristides lifts his honest front,
In pure majestic poverty rever'd. THOMSON.

STATELY and POMPOUS are most nearly allied to magisterial; AUGUST and DIGNIFIED to majestic: the former being merely extrinsic and assumed, the latter intrinsic and inherent. Magisterial respects the authority which is assumed; stately regards splendor and rank; pompous regards personal importance, with all the appendages of greatness and power: a person is magisterial in the exercise of his office, and the distribution of his commands; he is stately in his ordinary intercourse with his inferiors and equals; he is pompous on particular occasions of appearing in public: a person demands silence in a magisterial tone; he marches forward with a stately air; he comes forward in a pompous manner, so as to strike others with a sense of his importance.

Such seems thy gentle height, made only proud

DENHAM.

There is for the most part as much real enjoyment under the meanest cottage, as within the walls of the stately palace. SOUTH.

Majestic is an epithet that characterizes the exterior of an object; august is that which marks an essential characteristic in the object; dignified serves to characterize a person's action as tending to give dignity: the form of a female is termed majestic, when it has something imposing in it, suited to the condition of majesty, or the most elevated station in society; a monarch is entitled august in order to describe the extent of his empire; a public assembly is denominated august to bespeak its high character, and its weighty influence in the scale of society; a reply is termed dignified when it upholds the individual and personal character of a man as well as his relative character in the community to which he belongs: the former two of these terms are associated only with grandeur of outward circumstances: the last is applicable to men of all stations, who have each in his sphere a dignity to maintain which belongs to man as an independent moral agent.

How complicate, how wonderful, is man. YOUNG.

MAGNIFICENCE, SPLENDOR, POMP.

MAGNIFICENCE, from magnus and facio, signifies doing largely, or on a large scale. SPLENDOR, in Latin splendor, from splendo, to shine, signifies brightness in the external. POMP, in Latin pompa, Greek πομπή, a procession, from πημν, to send, signifies in general formality and ceremony.

Magnificence lies not only in the number and extent of the objects presented, but in their degree of richness as to their coloring and quality; splendor is but a characteristic of magnificence, attached to such objects as dazzle the eye by the quantity of light, or the beauty and strength of coloring; the entertainments of the Eastern monarchs and princes are remarkable for their magnificence, from the immense number of their attendants, the crowd of equipages, the size of their palaces, the multitude of costly utensils, and the profusion of viands which constitute the arrangements for the banquet; the entertainments of Europeans present much splendor, from the richness, the variety, and the brilliancy of dress, of furniture, and all the apparatus of a feast, which the refinements of art have brought to perfection. Magnificence is seldom accompanied with splendor than splendor with magnificence; since quantity, as well as quality, is essential to the one; but quality more than quantity is an essential to the other: a large army drawn up in battle array is a magnificent spectacle, from the immensity of their numbers and the order of their disposition; it will in all probability be a splendid scene if there be much richness in the dresses; the pomp will here consist in such large bodies of men acting by one impulse, and directed by one will: hence military pomp; it is the appendage of power, when displayed to public view: on particular occasions a monarch seated on his throne, surrounded by his courtiers and attended by his guards, is said to appear with pomp.

TO MAKE, FORM, PRODUCE, CREATE.

THE idea of giving birth to a thing is common to all these terms, which vary in the circumstances of the action: to MAKE (v. To act) is the most general and unqualified term; to FORM (v. To form) signifies to give a form to a thing, that is, to make it after a given form; to PRODUCE (v. To afford) is to bring forth into the light, to call into existence; to CREATE (v. To cause) is to bring into existence by an absolute exercise of power: to make is the simplest action of all, and comprehends a simple combination by the smallest efforts; to form requires care and attention, and greater efforts; to produce requires time and also labor: whatever is put together, so as to become another thing, is made; a chair or a table is made: whatever is put into any distinct form is formed; the potter forms the clay into an earthen vessel: whatever emanates from a thing, so as to become a distinct object, is produced; fire is often produced by the violent friction of two pieces of wood with each other. The process of making is always performed by some conscious agent, who employs either mechanical means, or the simple exercise of power: a bird makes its nest; man makes various things, by the exercise of his understanding and his limbs; the Almighty Maker has made everything by his word. The process of forming does not always require a conscious agent; things are formed of themselves; or they are formed by the active operations of other bodies; melted lead, when thrown into water, will form itself into various little bodies; hard substances are formed in the human body, which give rise to the disease termed the gravel. What is produced is oftener produced by the process of nature, than by any express design; the earth produces all kinds of vegetables from seed; animals, by a similar process, produce their young. Create, in this natural sense of the term, is employed as the act of an intelligent being, and that of the Supreme Being only; it is the act of making by a simple effort of power, without the use of materials, and without any process. Hence it has been extended in its application to the making of anything by an immediate exercise of power. The creative power of the human mind is a faint image of that power which brought everything into existence out of nothing.

King Edward the Sixth's Common Prayer Book was made with the advice of the foreign and even the Presbyterian Protestants. SECKER.

Dire Scylla here, a scene of horror forms,

POPE.

It is strange, you will say, that nature should make use of the same agent to create as to destroy, and that what has been looked upon as the consumer of countries is, in fact, the very power that produces them. BAYDENE.

A wondrous hieroglyphic robe she wore,
In which all colors and all figures were,
That nature or that fancy can create. COWLEY.

They are all employed in the moral sense, and with a similar distinction: make is indefinite; we may make a thing that is difficult or easy, simple or complex; we may make a letter, or make a poem; we may make a word, or make a sentence. To form is the work either of intelligence or of circumstances: education has much to do in forming the habits; but nature has more to do in forming the disposition and the mind altogether; sentiments are frequently formed by young people before they have sufficient maturity of thought and knowledge to justify them in coming to any decision. To produce is the effect of great mental exertion; or it is the natural operation of things: no industry could ever produce a poem or a work of the imagination: but a history or a work of science may be produced by the force of mere labor. All things, both in the moral and intellectual world, are linked together upon the same principle of cause and effect, by which one thing is the producer, and the other the thing produced: quarrels produce hatred, and kindness produces love; as heat produces inflammation and fever, or disease produces death. What is created is not made by any natural process, but is called into existence by the creating power; small matters create jealousies in jealous minds.

Though he could not agree to the making a king as things stood, yet, if he found one made, he would be more faithful to him than those that made him could be according to their own principles. BURNET.

Homer's and Virgil's heroes do not form a resolution without the conduct and direction of some deity. ADDISON.

A supernatural effect is that which is above any natural power that we know of to produce. TILLOTSON.

By this means alone their greatest obstacles will vanish, and what usually creates their dislike will become their satisfaction. POPE.

MALEDICTION, CURSE, IMPRECATION, EXECRATION, ANATHEMA.

MALEDICTION, from male and dico, signifies a saying ill, that is, declaring an evil wish against a person. CURSE, in Saxon kursian, comes, in all probability, from the same root as the Greek kypow, to sanction or ratify, signifying a bad wish declared upon oath, or in a solemn manner. IMPRECATION, from im and precor, signifies a praying down evil upon a person. EXECRATION, from the Latin execror, that is, è sacris excludere, signifies the same as to excommunicate, with every form of solemn imprecation. ANATHEMA, in Greek anathema, signifies a setting out, that is, a putting out of a religious community as a penance.

The malediction is the most indefinite and general term, signifying simply the declaration of evil; curse is a solemn denunciation of evil: the former is employed mostly by men; the latter by some superior being as well as by men: the rest are species of the curse pronounced only by men. The malediction is caused by simple anger; the curse is occasioned by some grievous offence: men, in the heat of their passions, will utter maledictions against any object that offends them; God pronounced a curse upon Adam, and all his posterity, after the fall.

With many praises of his good play, and many maledictions on the power of chance, he took up the cards and threw them in the fire.

MACKENZIE.

But know, that ere your promise'd walls you build,
My *curse*s shall severely be fulfill'd. DRYDEN.

The term curse differs in the degree of evil pronounced or wished; imprecation and execration always imply some positive great evil, and, in fact, as much evil as can be conceived by man in his anger; the anathema respects the evil which is pronounced according to the canon law, by which a man is not only put out of the Church, but held up as an object of offence. The malediction is altogether an unallowed expression of private resentment; the curse was admitted, in some cases, according to the Mosaic law; and that, as well as the anathema, at one time formed a part of the ecclesiastical discipline of the Christian Church; the imprecation formed a part of the heathenish ceremony of religion; but the execration is always the informal expression of the most violent personal anger.

Thus either host their imprecations join'd.

POPE.

I have seen in Bedlam a man that has held up his face in a posture of adoration toward heaven to utter execrations and blasphemies. STEELE.

The bare anathemas of the Church fall like so many bruta fulmina upon the obstinate and schismatical. SOUTH.

MALEVOLENT, MALICIOUS, MALIGNANT.

THESE words have all their derivation from malus, bad; that is, MALEVOLENT, wishing ill; MALICIOUS (v. Malice), having malice; and MALIGNANT, having an evil tendency.

Malevolence has a deep root in the heart, and is a settled part of the character; we denominate the person malevolent, to designate the ruling temper of his mind: maliciousness may be applied as an epithet to particular parts of a man's character or conduct; one may have a malicious joy or pleasure in seeing the distresses of another: malignty is not so often employed to characterize the person as the thing; the malignty of a design is estimated by the degree of mischief which was intended to be done.

I have often known very lasting malevolence excited by unlucky censures. JOHNSON.

Greatness, the earnest of malitious Fate
For future woe, was never meant a good.

SOUTHERN.

Still horror reigns, a dreary twilight round,
Of struggling night and day malignant mix'd.
THOMSON.

MALICE, RANCOR, SPITE, GRUDGE, PIQUE.

MALICE, in Latin malitia, from malus, bad, signifies the very essence of badness lying in the heart; RANCOR (v. Hatred) is only continued hatred; the former requires no external cause to provoke it, it is inherent in the mind; the latter must be caused by some personal offence. Malice is properly the love of evil for evil's sake, and is, therefore, confined to no number or quality of objects, and limited by no circumstance; rancor, as it depends upon external objects for its existence, so it is confined to such objects only as are liable to cause displeasure or anger; malice will impel a man to do mischief to those who have not injured him, and are perhaps strangers to him; rancor can subsist only between those who have had sufficient connection to be at variance.

If any chance has hither brought the name
Of Palamedes, not unknown to fame,
Who suffer'd from the malices of the times.

DRYDEN.

Party-spirit fills a nation with spleen and rancor. ADDISON.

SPITE, from the Italian dispetto and the French despit, from spit, a pointed instrument, denotes a petty kind of malice, or disposition to offend another in trifling matters; it may be in the temper of the person, or it may have its source in some external provocation: children often show their spite to each other.

Can heav'nly minds such high resentment show,
Or exercise their spite in human woe? DRYDEN.

GRUDGE, connected with grumble and groul, and PIQUE, from pike, denoting the prick of a pointed instrument, are employed for that particular state of rancorous or spiteful feeling which is occasioned by personal offences: the grudge is that which has long existed; the pique is that which is of recent date; a person is said to owe another a grudge for having done him a disservice; or he is said to have a pique toward another, who has shown him an affront.

The god of wit, to show his grudge,
Clapp'd asses' ears upon the Judge. SWIFT.

You may be sure the ladies are not wanting, on their side, in cherishing and improving these important piques, which divide the town almost into as many parties as there are families.

LADY M. W. MONTAGUE.

MANLY, MANFUL.

MANLY, or like a man, is opposed to juvenile, and of course applied properly to youths; but MANFUL, or full of manhood, is opposed to effeminate, and is applicable more properly to grown persons: a premature manliness in young persons is hardly less unseemly than a want of manfulness in one who is called upon to display his courage.

I love a manly freedom as much as any of the band of cashiers of kings. BURKE.

I opposed his whim manfully, which I think you will approve of. CUMBERLAND.

MANNERS, MORALS.

MANNERS (v. Air, Manner) respect the minor forms of acting with others and toward others; MORALS include the important duties of life: manners have therefore been denominated minor morals. By an attention to good manners we render ourselves good companions; by an observance of good morals we become good members of society: the former gains the good-will of others, the latter their esteem. The manners of a child are of more or less importance, according to his station in life; his morals cannot be attended to too early, let his station be what it may.

In the present corrupted state of human manners, always to assent and to comply is the very worst maxim we can adopt. It is impossible to support the purity and dignity of Christian morals, without opposing the world on various occasions. BLAIR.

MARITIME, MARINE, NAVAL, NAUTICAL.

MARITIME and MARINE, from the Latin mare, a sea, signifies belonging to the sea; NAVAL, from navis, a ship, signifies belonging to a ship; and NAUTICAL, from nauta, a sailor, signifies belonging to a sailor, or to navigation. Countries and places are denominated maritime from their proximity to the sea, or their great intercourse by sea; hence England is called the most maritime nation in Europe. Marine is a technical term, employed by persons in office, to denote that which is officially transacted with regard to the sea in distinction from what passes on land; hence we speak of the marines as a species of soldiers acting by sea, of the marine society, or marine stores. Naval is another term of art as opposed to military, and used in regard to the arrangements of government or commerce: hence we speak of naval affairs, naval officers, naval tactics, and the like. Nautical is a scientific term, connected with the science of navigation or the management of vessels: hence we talk of nautical instruction, of nautical calculations. The maritime laws of England are essential for the preservation of the naval power which it has so justly acquired. The marines of England is one of its glories. The naval administration is one of the most important branches of our government in the time of war. Nautical tables and a nautical almanac have been expressly formed for the benefit of all who apply themselves to nautical subjects.

Octavianus reduced Lepidus to a necessity to beg his life, and be content to lead the remainder of it in a mean condition at Circeii, a small maritime town among the Latins. PRIDEAUX.

A man of a very grave aspect required notice to be given of his intention to set out on a certain day on a submarine voyage. JOHNSON.

Sextus Pompey having together such a naval force as made up 350 ships, seized Sicily. PRIDEAUX.

He elegantly showed by whom he was drawn, which depicted the nautical compass with ant Magnes, ant Magna. CAMDEN.

MARK, PRINT, IMPRESSION, STAMP.

MARK is the same in the Northern languages, and in the Persian marz. PRINT and IMPRESSION, both from the Latin premo, to press, signify the visible effect produced by printing or pressing. STAMP signifies the effect produced by stamping.

The word mark is the most general in sense: whatever alters the external face of an object is a mark; a print is some specific mark, or a figure drawn upon the surface of an object; an impression is the mark pressed either upon or into a body; a stamp is the mark that is stamped in or upon the body. The mark is confined to no size, shape, or form; the print is a mark that represents an object: the mark may consist of a spot, a line, a stain, or a smear; but a print describes a given object, as a house, a man, etc. A mark is either a protuberance or a depression; an impression is always a sinking in of the object: a hillock or a hole are both marks; but the latter is properly the impression: the stamp is an impression made in a specific manner and for a specific object, as the stamp of a seal on wax. The mark is occasioned by every sort of action, gentle or violent, artificial or natural; by the voluntary act of a person, or the unconscious act of inanimate bodies, by means of compression or friction, by a touch or a blow, and the like: all the others are occasioned by one or more of these modes. The print is occasioned by artificial means of compression, as when the print of letters or pictures is made on paper; or by accidental and natural compression, as when the print of the hand is made on the wall, or the print of the foot is made on the ground. The impression is made by means more or less violent, as when an impression is made upon wood by the axe or hammer; or by gradual and natural means, as by the dripping of water on stone. The stamp is made by means of direct pressure with an artificial instrument.

De La Chambre asserts positively that from the marks on the body the configuration of the planets at a nativity may be gathered. WALSH.

From hence Astrea took her flight, and here The prints of her departing steps appear.

DEYDEN.

The hammered gold coins which were made in the reigns of the several kings and queens from Edward the First inclusively till the beginning of the reign of Charles the Second, are almost totally vanished, either to make vessels or utensils, or to convert into gold coin of more modern stamps. LOWNDEN.

Every piece is brought to the press, which is called the mill, and there receives the impression which makes it milled money. LOWNDEN.

Mark is of such universal application, that it is confined to no objects whatever, either in the natural or moral world; print is mostly applied to material objects, the face of which undergoes a lasting change, as the printing made on paper or wood; impression is more commonly applied to such natural objects as are particularly solid; stamp is generally applied to paper, or still softer and more yielding bodies. Impression and stamp have both a moral application: events or speeches make an impression on the mind: things bear a certain stamp which bespeaks their origin. Where the passions have obtained an ascendancy, the occasional good impressions which are produced by religious observances but too frequently die away; the Christian religion carries with itself the stamp of truth.

When a man thinks of anything in the darkness of the night, whatever deep impressions it may make in his mind, they are apt to vanish as soon as the day breaks about him. ADDISON.

Strange that the gods should give those laws Bearing no stamp of honor, nor design'd With provident thought. POTTER.

MARK, SIGN, NOTE, SYMPTOM, TOKEN, INDICATION.

MARK, v. Mark, impression. SIGN, in Latin signum, Greek σημα, from σίζω, to punctuate, signifies the thing that points out. SYMPTOM, in Latin symptoma, Greek συμπτωμα, from συμπίπτω, to fall out in accordance, signifies what presents itself to confirm one's opinion. TOKEN, v. To betoken. INDICATION, in Latin indicatio, from indico, and the Greek ειδικω, to point out, signifies the thing which points out.

The idea of an external object, which serves to direct the observer, is common to all these terms; the difference consists in the objects that are employed. Anything may serve as a mark, a stroke, a dot, a stick set up, and the like; it serves simply to guide the senses; the sign is something more complex; it consists of a figure or representation of some object, as the twelve signs of the zodiac, or the signs which are affixed to houses of entertainment, or to shops. Marks are arbitrary; every one chooses his mark at pleasure: signs have commonly a connection with the object that is to be observed: a house, a tree, a letter, or any external object, may be chosen as a mark: but a tobacconist chooses the sign of a black man; the innkeeper chooses the head of the reigning prince. Marks serve in general simply to aid the memory in distinguishing the situation of objects, or the particular circumstances of persons or things, as the marks which are set up in a garden to distinguish the ground that is occupied; they may, therefore, be private, and known only to the individual that makes them, as the private marks by which a tradesman distinguishes his prices: they may likewise be changeable and fluctuating, according to the humor and convenience of the maker, as the private marks which are employed by the military on guard. Signs, on the contrary, serve to direct the understanding; they have either a natural or an artificial resemblance to the object to be represented; they are consequently chosen, not by the will of one, but by the universal consent of a body; they are not chosen for the moment, but for a permanency, as in the case of language, either oral or written, in the case of the zodiacal signs, or the sign of the cross, the algebraical signs, and the like. It is clear, therefore, that many objects may be both a mark and a sign, according to the above illustration: the cross which is employed in books, by way of reference to notes, is a mark only, because it serves merely to guide the eye or assist the memory; but the figure of the cross, when employed in reference to the cross of our Saviour, is a sign, inasmuch as it conveys a distinct idea of something else to the mind; so likewise little strokes over letters, or even letters themselves, may merely be marks, while they only point out a difference between this or that letter, this or that object; but this same stroke becomes a sign if, as in the first declension of Latin nouns, it points out the ablative case, it is a sign of the ablative case; and a single letter affixed to different parcels is merely a mark so long as it simply serves this purpose; but the same letter, suppose it were a word, is a sign when it is used as a sign. A mark may be something accidental, and mean nothing; but a sign is that to which a meaning is always given: there may be marks on a wall occasioned by the elements or otherwise, but a sign is always the sign of something: a mark, if it consist of a sensible object, is only visible, but signs may be the object of hearing, smell, or any other sense; many things, therefore, may be signs which are not marks; when words are spoken and not written, they are signs and not marks; and, in like manner, the cross made on the forehead of a child in baptism is a sign, but not a mark.

It was an ancient custom to cull out of the flocks the goodliest of the cattle, and put certain marks upon them whereby they might be distinguished from the rest. POTTER.

Now part in peace secure thy prayer is sped,
Witness the sacred honors of our head,
The nod that ratifies the will divine,
The faithful, fix'd, irrevocable sign. POPE.

When mark and sign are both taken to denote something by which one forms a judgment, the former serves either to denote that which has been or which is, the latter to designate that which is or will be, as persons bear the marks of age, or the marks of violence; or we may judge by the marks of a person's foot that some one has been walking in a particular place; hoarseness is a sign that a person has a cold; when mariners meet with certain birds at sea, they consider them as a sign that land is near at hand.

Hannibal bore the marks in his visage of hard campaigns. GOLDSMITH.
So plain the signs, such prophets are the skies. DRYDEN.

So likewise in application to moral objects or matters of a purely intellectual nature; as a mark of honor, or a mark of distinction; an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace.

The ceremonial laws of Moses were the marks to distinguish the people of God from the Gentiles. BACON.

The sacring of the kings of France (as Loyseau says) is the sign of their sovereign priesthood. TEMPLE.

So likewise in application to objects which serve as characteristics of the person, the mark illustrates the spring of the action; the sign shows the state of the mind or sentiments; it is a mark of folly or weakness in a man to yield himself implicitly to the guidance of an interested friend; tears are not always a sign of repentance.

These institutions and precepts were considered by the neighboring powers rather as marks of cowardice than wisdom. GOLDSMITH.

It's but a bad sign of humility to declaim against pride. COLLIER.

Note is rather a sign than a mark; but it is properly the sign which consists of marks, as a note of admiration (!); or, in the moral sense, the sign by which the object is known; as persons of note, that is, which have a note upon them, or that by which they are known.

They who appertain to the visible Church have all the notes of external profession. HOOKER.

Symptom is rather a mark than a sign; it explains the cause or origin of complaints by the appearances they assume, and is employed as a technical term only in the science of medicine: as a foaming at the mouth and an abhorrence of drink are symptoms of canine madness; motion and respiration are signs of life; but it may likewise be used figuratively in application to moral objects.

This fall of the French monarchy was far from being preceded by any exterior symptoms of decline. BURKE.

Token is a species of mark in the moral sense, indication a species of sign: a mark shows what is, a token serves to keep in mind what has been: a gift to a friend is a mark of one's affection and esteem: if it be permanent in its nature it becomes a token; friends who are in close intercourse have perpetual opportunities of showing each other marks of their regard by reciprocal acts of courtesy and kindness; when they separate for any length of time, they commonly leave some token of their tender sentiments in each other's hands, as a pledge of what shall be, as well as an evidence of what has been.

He came thither to the prince as he was taking coach, and was received by him with all the marks of affection and esteem. BURNETT.

The famous bull-feasts are an evident token of the Quixotism and romantic taste of the Spaniards. SOMERVILLE.

Sign, as it respects indication, is said in abstract and general propositions: indication itself is only employed for the sign given by any individual; it bespeaks the act of the persons: but the sign is only the face or appearance of the thing. When a man does not live consistently with the profession which he holds, it is a sign that his religion is built on a wrong foundation; parents are gratified when they observe the slightest indications of genius or goodness in their children.

At the same time the king was pleased to discharge forever to him and his heirs a feu duty that had been formerly payable to the exchequer out of the barony of Cadzou, a sign of the prevalence of his interest at that prince's court.

CRATFORD.

It is certain Virgil's parents gave him a good education, to which they were inclined by the early indications he gave of a sweet disposition and excellent wit.

WALSH.

MARK, TRACE, VESTIGE, FOOTSTEP, TRACE.

THE word MARK has already been considered at large in the preceding article, but it will admit of further illustration when taken in the sense of that which is visible, and serves to show the existing state of things; mark is here, as before, the most general and unqualified term; the other terms varying in the circumstances or manner of the mark. TRACE, in Italian treccia, Greek τρεχων, to run, and Hebrew darek, way, signifies any continued mark. VESTIGE, in Latin vestigium, not improbably contracted from pedis, and stigma or stigma, from στίζω, to imprint, signifies a print of the foot. FOOTSTEP is taken for the place in which the foot has stepped, or the mark made by that step. TRACK, derived from the same as trace, signifies the way run, or the mark produced by that running.

The mark is said of a fresh and uninterrupted line; the trace is said of that which is broken by time; a carriage in driving along the sand leaves marks of the wheels, but in a short time all traces of its having been there will be lost; a mark is produced by the action of bodies on one another in every possible form; the spilling of a liquid may leave a mark on the floor; the blow of a stick leaves a mark on the body; but the trace is a mark produced only by bodies making a progress or proceeding in a continued course: the ship that cuts the waves, and the bird that cuts the air, leaves no trace of their course behind; so men pass their lives, and after death leave no traces that they ever were. The vestige is a species of mark or trace caused by the feet of men, or, which is the same thing, by the works of active industry; as the vestiges of buildings: there are traces of the Roman roads still visible in England; there are many vestiges of Roman temples in Italy.

I have served him

In this old body; yet the marks remain
Of many wounds.

OTWAY.

The greatest favors to an ungrateful man are but like the motion of a ship upon the waves: they leave no trace, no sign behind them.

SOUTH.

Both Britain and Ireland had temples for the worship of the gods, the vestiges of which are now remaining.

PARSONS.

In an extended and moral application they are similarly distinguished. The mark serves to denote as well that which is as that which has been; as marks of desolation, or marks of antiquity: trace and vestige show the remains of something that has been; the former in reference to matters of intellectual research generally, the latter in reference to that which has been built up or pulled down, as there are traces of a universal affinity in all known languages; there are vestiges of ancient customs in different parts of England.

He tells us these Philisians had a very holy temple, in which there was no image either openly to be seen or kept in secret. This is certainly a mark of great antiquity.

BISHOP CUMBERLAND.

He could not certainly expect to find traces of his family in his Arundell marbles.

HOWARD'S ANECDOTES.

Her unexpensive though magnificent habits, and above all her own personal inspection, enabled her, in a short time, to remove every vestige of devastation which the civil wars had left.

WHITAKER.

Footstep is employed only for the steps of an individual: the track is made by the steps of many; it is the line which has been beaten out or made by stamping: the footstep is now commonly and properly employed only for men or brutes; but the track is applied to inanimate objects, as the wheel of a carriage. When Cacus took away the oxen of Hercules, he dragged them backward that they might not be traced by their footsteps: a track of blood from the body of a murdered man may sometimes lead to the detection of the murderer.

Muse, first of Arden tell, whose footsteps yet are found
In her rough woodlands more than any other ground.
DEATTON.

Stanley, having dispersed the right wing, now pursued their track.
HALL.

In the metaphorical application they do not signify a mark, but a course of conduct; the former respects one's moral feelings or mode of dealing; the latter one's mechanical and habitual manner of acting: the former is the consequence of having the same principles; the latter proceeds from imitation or constant repetition. A good son will walk in the footsteps of a good father. In the management of business, it is rarely wise in a young man to leave the track which has been marked out for him by his superiors in age and experience.

Virtue alone ennobles humankind,
And power should on her glorious footsteps wait.
WYNN.

Though all seems lost, 'tis impious to despair,
The tracks of Providence, like rivers, wind.
HIGGONS.

MARK, BADGE, STIGMA.

MARK (v. Mark, print) is still the general, and the two others specific terms; they are employed for whatever serves to characterize persons externally, or betoken any part either of their character or circumstances: mark is employed either in a good, bad, or indifferent sense; BADGE in an indifferent one; STIGMA in a bad sense: a thing may either be a mark of honor, of disgrace, or of simple distinction: a badge is a mark simply of distinction; the stigma is a mark of disgrace. The mark is that which is conferred upon a person for his merits, as medals, stars, and ribbons are bestowed by princes upon meritorious officers and soldiers; or the mark attaches to a person, or is affixed to him, in consequence of his demerits; as a low situation in his class is a mark of disgrace to a scholar; or a fool's-cap is a mark of ignominy affixed to idlers and dunces; or a brand in the forehead is a mark of ignominy for criminals: the badge is that which is voluntarily assumed by one's self according to established custom; it consists of dress, by which the office, station, and even religion of a particular community is distinguished: as the gown and wig is the badge of gentlemen in the law; the gown and surplice that of clerical men; the uniform of charity children is the badge of their condition; the peculiar habit of the Quakers and Methodists is the badge of their religion: the stigma consists not so much in what is openly imposed upon a person as what falls upon him in the judgment of others; it is the black mark which is set upon a person by the public, and is consequently the strongest of all marks, and one which every one most dreads, and every good man seeks least to deserve.

In these revolutionary meetings, every counsel, in proportion as it is daring and violent and perfidious, is taken for the mark of superior genius.
BURKE.

The people of England look upon hereditary succession as a security for their liberty, not as a badge of servitude.
BURKE.

The cross which our Saviour's enemies thought was to stigmatize him with infamy, became the ensign of his renown.

MARK, BUTT.

AFTER all that has been said upon the word MARK (v. Mark, print), it has this additional meaning in common with the word BUTT, that it implies an object aimed at: the mark is literally a mark that is said to be shot at by the marksman with a gun or a bow.

A fluttering dove upon the top they tie,
The living mark at which their arrows fly.
DAYDEN.

It is also metaphorically employed for the man who by his peculiar characteristics makes himself the object of notice; he is the mark at which every one's looks and thoughts are directed: the butt, from the French bout, the end, is a species of mark in this metaphorical sense; but the former only calls forth general observation, the latter provokes the laughter and jokes of every one. Whoever renders himself conspicuous by his eccentricities, either in his opinions or his actions, must not complain if he become a mark for the derision of the public: it is a man's misfortune rather than his fault if he become the butt of a company who are rude and unfeeling enough to draw their pleasures from another's pain.

I mean those honest gentlemen that are pelted by men, women, and children, by friends and foes, and, in a word, stand as butts in conversation.

ADDISON.

TO MARK, NOTE, NOTICE.

MARK is here taken in the intellectual sense, fixing as it were a mark (v. Mark) upon a thing so as to keep it in mind, which is in fact to fix one's attention upon it in such a manner as to be able to distinguish it by its characteristic qualities: to mark is therefore altogether an intellectual act: to NOTE has the same end as that of marking; namely, to aid the memory, but one notes a thing by making a written note of it; this is therefore a mechanical act: to NOTICE, on the other hand, is a sensible operation, from notitia, knowledge, signifying to bring to one's knowledge, perception, or understanding by the use of our senses. We mark and note that which particularly interests us: the former is that which serves a present purpose; notice that which may be of use in future. The impatient lover marks the hours until the time arrives for meeting his mistress: travellers note whatever strikes them of importance to be remembered when they return home: notice, which is a species of noting in small matters, may serve either for the present or the future; we may notice things merely by way of amusement; as a child will notice the actions of animals, or we may notice a thing for the sake of bearing it in mind, as a person notices a particular road when he wishes to return by the same way.

Many who mark with such accuracy the course of time appear to have little sensibility of the decline of life.

JOHNSON.

O treacherous conscience! while she seems to sleep,

Unnoted, notes each moment misapplied.

YOUNG.

An Englishman's notices of the weather is the natural consequence of changeable skies and uncertain seasons.

MARRIAGE, WEDDING, NUPTIALS.

MARRIAGE, from to marry, denotes the act of marrying; WEDDING and NUPTIALS denote the ceremony of being married. To marry, in French marier.

and Latin marito, to be joined to a male; hence marriage comprehends the act of choosing and being legally bound to a man or a woman; wedding, from wed, and the Teutonic wetten, to promise or betroth, implies the ceremony of marrying, inasmuch as it is binding upon the parties. Nuptials comes from the Latin nubo, to veil, because the Roman ladies were veiled at the time of marriage: hence it has been put for the whole ceremony itself. Marriage is an institution which, by those who have been blessed with the light of Divine Revelation, has always been considered as sacred: with some persons, particularly among the lower orders of society, the day of their wedding is converted into a day of riot and intemperance: among the Roman Catholics in England it has been the practice to have their nuptials solemnized by a priest of their own persuasion as well as by the Protestant clergyman.

O fatal maid! thy marriage is endow'd
With Phrygian, Latian, and Rutulian blood.

DRYDEN.

MARRIAGE, MATRIMONY, WEDLOCK.

MARRIAGE (v. Marriage) is oftener an act than a state: MATRIMONY and WEDLOCK both describe states.

Marriage is taken in the sense of an act, when we speak of the laws of marriage, the day of one's marriage, the congratulations upon one's marriage, a happy or unhappy marriage, the fruits of one's marriage, and the like; it is taken in the sense of a state, when we speak of the pleasures or pains of marriage; but in this latter case matrimony, which signifies a married life abstractedly from all agents or acting persons, is preferable; so likewise, to think of matrimony, and to enter into the holy state of matrimony, are expressions founded upon the signification of the term. As matrimony is derived from mater, a mother, because married women are in general mothers, it has particular reference to the domestic state of the two parties; broils are but too frequently the fruits of matrimony, yet there are few cases in which they might not be obviated by the good-sense of those who are engaged in them. Hasty marriages cannot be expected to produce happiness; young people who are eager for matrimony before they are fully aware of its consequences will purchase their experience at the expense of their peace. Wedlock is the old English word for matrimony, and is in consequence admitted in law, when one speaks of children born in wedlock; agreeably to its derivation, it has a reference to the bond of union which follows the marriage: hence one speaks of living happily in a state of wedlock, of being joined in holy wedlock.

Marriage is rewarded with some honorable distinctions which celliacy is forbidden to usurp.

MARTIAL, WARLIKE, MILITARY, SOLDIER-LIKE.

MARTIAL, from Mars, the god of war, is the Latin term for belonging to war: WARLIKE signifies literally like war, having the image of war. In sense these terms approach so near to each other, that they may be easily admitted to supply each other's place; but custom, the lawgiver of language, has assigned an office to each that makes it not altogether indifferent how they are used. Martial is both a technical and a more comprehensive term than warlike; on the other hand, warlike designates the temper of the individual more than martial: we speak of martial array, martial preparations, martial law, a court martial; but of a warlike nation, meaning a nation who is fond of war; a warlike spirit or temper, also a warlike appearance, inasmuch as the temper is visible in the air and carriage of a man. MILITARY, from miles, signifies belonging to a soldier, and SOLDIER-LIKE, like a soldier. Military, in comparison with martial, is a term of particular import, martial having always a reference to war in general; and military to the proceedings consequent upon that: hence we speak of military in distinction from naval, as military expeditions, military movements, and the like; but in characterizing the men, we should say that they had a martial appearance; but of a particular place, that it had a military appearance, if there were many soldiers. Military, compared with soldier-like, is used for the body, and the latter for the individual. The whole army is termed the military: the conduct of an individual is soldier-like or otherwise.

MATTER, MATERIALS, SUBJECT.

MATTER and MATERIALS are both derived from the same source, namely, the Latin materia, which comes in all probability from mater, a mother, because matter, from which everything is made, acts in the production of bodies like a mother. SUBJECT, in Latin subjectum, participle of subjicio, to lie, signifies the thing lying under and forming the foundation.

Matter, in the physical application, is taken for all that composes the sensible world, in distinction from that which is spiritual, or discernible only by the thinking faculty; hence matter is always opposed to mind. In regard to materials, it is taken in an indivisible as well as a general sense; the whole universe is said to be composed of matter, though not of materials: on the other hand, materials consist of those particular parts of matter which serve for the artificial production of objects; and matter is said of those things which are the natural parts of the universe: a house, a table, and a chair, consist of materials, because they are works of art; but a plant, a tree, an animal body, consist of matter, because they are the productions of nature.

The motion of the planets round him (the sun) is performed in the same time, of consequence his quantity of matter still continues the same.

BRYDNE.

The materials of that building very fortunately ranged themselves into that delicate order that it must be very great chance that parts them.

TILLOTSON.

The distinction of these terms in their moral application is very similar; the matter which composes a moral discourse is what emanates from the author; but the materials are those with which one is furnished by others. The style of some writers is so indifferent that they disgrace the matter by the manner; periodical writers are furnished with materials for their productions out of the daily occurrences in the political and moral world. Writers of dictionaries endeavor to compress as much matter as possible into a small space; they draw their materials from every other writer.

Whence tumbled headlong from the height of life,

They furnish matter for the tragic muse.

THOMSON.

The principal materials of our comfort or uneasiness lie within ourselves.

BLAIR.

Matter seems to bear the same relation to subject as the whole does to any particular part, as it respects moral objects: the subject is the groundwork of the matter; the matter is that which flows out of the subject: the matter is that which we get by the force of invention; the subject is that which offers itself to notice: many persons may therefore have a subject who have no matter, that is, nothing in their own minds which they can offer by way of illustrating this subject: but it is not possible to have matter without a subject: hence the word matter is taken for the substance, and for that which is substantial; the subject is taken for that which engages the attention: we speak of a subject of conversation and matter for deliberation; a subject of inquiry, a matter of curiosity. Nations in a barbarous state afford but little matter worthy to be recorded in history; people who live a secluded life and in a contracted sphere have but few subjects to occupy their attention.

MAXIM, PRECEPT, RULE, LAW.

MAXIM (v. Axiom) is a moral truth that carries its own weight with itself. PRECEPT (v. Command), RULE (v. Guide), and LAW, from lex and lego, signifying the thing specifically chosen or marked out, all borrow their weight from some external circumstance: the precept derives its authority from the individual delivering it; in this manner the precepts of our Saviour have a weight which gives them a decided superiority over everything else: the rule acquires a worth from its fitness for guiding us in our proceeding: the law, which is a species of rule, derives its weight from the sanction of power. Maxims are often precepts, inasmuch as they are communicated to us by our parents; they are rules, inasmuch as they serve as a rule for our conduct; they are laws, inasmuch as they have the sanction of conscience. We respect the maxims of antiquity as containing the essence of human wisdom; we reverence the precepts of religion as the foundation of all happiness; we regard the rules of prudence as preserving us from errors and misfortunes; we respect the laws as they are the support of civil society.

I think I may lay it down as a maxim, that every man of good common-sense may, if he pleases, most certainly be rich.

MEAN, PITIFUL, SORDID.

THE moral application of these terms to the characters of men, in their transactions with each other, is what constitutes their common signification. Whatever a man does in common with those below him is MEAN; it evinces a temper that is prone to sink rather than to rise in the scale of society: whatever makes him an object of pity, and consequently of contempt for his sunken character, makes him PITIFUL: whatever makes him grovel and crawl in the dust, licking up the dross and filth of the earth, is SORDID, from the Latin sordeo, to be filthy and nasty. Meanness is in many cases only relatively bad as it respects the disposal of our property: for instance, what is meanness in one, might be generosity or prudence in another: the due estimate of circumstances is allowable in all, but it is meanness for any one to attempt to save, at the expense of others, that which he can conveniently afford either to give or pay: hence an undue spirit of seeking gain or advantage for one's self to the detriment of others, is denominated a mean temper: it is mean for a gentleman to do that for himself which according to his circumstances he might get another to do for him. Pitifulness goes farther than meanness: it is not merely that which degrades, but unmans the person; it is that which is bad as well as low: when the fear of evil or the love of gain prompts a man to sacrifice his character and forfeit his veracity he becomes truly pitiful; Blisil in Tom Jones is the character whom all pronounce to be pitiful. Sordidness is peculiarly applicable to one's love of gain; although of a more corrupt, yet it is not of so degrading a nature as the two former: the sordid man does not deal in trifles like the mean man; and has nothing so low and vicious in him as the pitiful man. A continual habit of getting money will engender a sordid love of it in the human mind; but nothing short of a radically wicked character leads a man to be pitiful. We think lightly of a mean man: we hold a pitiful man in profound contempt: we hate a sordid man. Meanness descends to that which is insignificant and worthless: pitifulness sinks into that which is despicable: sordidness contaminates the mind with what is foul.

Nature, I thought, perform'd too mean a part,
Forming her movements to the rules of art.

DENHAM.

MEAN, MEDIUM.

MEAN is but a contraction of MEDIUM, which signifies in Latin the middle path. The term mean is used abstractedly in all speculative matters: there is a mean in opinions between the two extremes: this mean is doubtless the point nearest to truth. Medium is employed in practical matters; computations are often erroneous from being too high or too low; the medium is in this case the one most to be preferred. The moralist will always recommend the mean in all opinions that widely differ from each other: our passions always recommend to us some extravagant conduct either of insolent resistance or mean compliance; but discretion recommends the medium or middle course in such matters.

The man within the golden mean,
Who can his boldest wish contain,
Securely views the ruin'd cell
Where sordid want and sorrow dwell. FRANCH.

He who looks upon the soul through its outward actions, often sees it through a deceitful medium. ADDISON.

MEETING, INTERVIEW.

MEETING, from to meet, is the act of meeting or coming into the company of any one: INTERVIEW, compounded of inter, between, and view, to view, is a personal view of each other. A meeting is an ordinary concern, and its purpose familiar; meetings are daily taking place between friends: an interview is extraordinary and formal; its object is commonly business; an interview sometimes takes place between princes, or commanders of armies.

I have not joy'd an hour since you departed,
For public miseries and private fears,
But this bless'd meeting has o'erpaid them all.

DAYDEN.

His fears were, that the interview between England and France might, through their amities, Breed him some prejudice. SHAKESPEARE.

MELODY, HARMONY, ACCORDANCE.

MELODY, in Latin melodus, from melos, in Greek μελος, a verse, and the Hebrew mela, a word or a verse. HARMONY, in Latin harmonia, Greek ἁρμονία, concord, from ἄνω, ἀπλό, to fit or suit, signifies the agreement of sounds. ACCORDANCE denotes the act or state of according (v. To agree).

Melody signifies any measured or modulated sounds measured after the manner of verse into distinct members or parts; harmony signifies the suiting or adapting different modulated sounds to each other; melody is therefore to harmony as a part to the whole: we must first produce melody by the rules of art; the harmony which follows must be regulated by the ear: there may be melody without harmony, but there cannot be harmony without melody: we speak of simple melody where the modes of music are not very much diversified; but we cannot speak of harmony unless there be a variety of notes to fall in with each other. A voice is melodious, inasmuch as it is capable of producing a regularly modulated note; it is harmonious, inasmuch as it strikes agreeably on the ear, and produces no discordant sounds. The song of a bird is melodious or has melody in it, inasmuch as there is a concatenation of sounds in it which are admitted to be regular, and consequently agreeable to the musical ear; there is harmony in a concert of voices and instruments. Accordance is, strictly speaking, the property on which both melody and harmony is founded; for the whole of music depends on an accordance of sounds. The same distinction marks accordance and harmony in the moral application. There may be occasional accordance of opinion or feeling; but harmony is an entire accordance in every point.

Lend me your song, ye nightingales! Oh pour
The mazy-running soul of melody
Into my varied verse. THOMSON.

Now the distemper'd mind
Has lost that concord of harmonious powers
Which forms the soul of happiness. THOMSON.

The music
Of man's fair composition best accords
When 'tis in concert. SHAKESPEARE.

MEMBER, LIMB.

MEMBER, in Latin membrum, probably from the Greek μερος, a part, because a member is properly a part. LIMB is connected with the word lame.

Member is a general term applied either to the animal body or to other bodies, as a member of a family, or a member of a community: limb is applicable to animal bodies; limb is therefore a species of member; for every limb is a member, but every member is not a limb. The members of the body comprehend every part which is capable of performing a distinct office; but the limbs are those jointed members that are distinguished from the head and the body: the nose and the eyes are members, but not limbs; the arms and legs are properly denominated limbs.

A man's limbs (by which for the present we only understand those members, the loss of which alone amounts to mayhem by the common law) are the gift of the wise Creator, to enable him to protect himself from external injuries.

BLACKSTONE.

MEMORY, REMEMBRANCE, RECOLLECTION, REMINISCENCE.

MEMORY, in Latin memoria or memor, Greek μνημων and μνασμαι, comes, in all probability, from μενος, the mind, or intellectual power, because memory is one of the principal faculties of the mind. REMEMBRANCE, from the verb remember, contracted from re and memoro, to bring back to the mind, comes from memor, as before. RECOLLECTION, from recollect, compounded of re and collect, signifies collecting again. REMINISCENCE, in Latin reminiscentia, from reminiscor and memor, as before, signifies bringing back to the mind what was there before.

Memory is the power of recalling images once made on the mind; remembrance, recollection, and reminiscence are operations or exertions of this power, which vary in their mode. The memory is a power which exerts itself either independently of the will, or in conformity with the will; but all the other terms express the acts of conscious agents, and consequently are more or less connected with the will. In dreams the memory exerts itself, but we do not say that we have any remembrance or recollection of objects. Remembrance is the exercise of memory in a conscious agent; it may be the effect of repetition or habit, as in the case of a child who remembers his lesson after having learned it several times; or of a horse who remembers the road which he has been continually passing; or it may be the effect of association and circumstances, by which images are casually brought back to the mind, as happens to intelligent beings continually as they exercise their thinking faculties. In these cases remembrance is an involuntary act; for things return to the mind before one is aware of it, as in the case of one who hears a particular name, and remembers that he has to call on a person of the same name; or of one who, on seeing a particular tree, remembers all the circumstances of his youth which were connected with a similar tree. Remembrance is, however, likewise a voluntary act, and the consequence of a direct determination, as in the case of a child who strives to remember what it has been told by its parent; or of a friend who remembers the hour of meeting another friend in consequence of the interest which it has excited in his mind: nay, indeed, experience teaches us that scarcely anything in ordinary cases is more under the subservience of the will than the memory; for it is now become almost a maxim to say, that one may remember whatever one wishes.

Remember thee!

Ah, thou poor ghost, while memory holds a seat
In this distracted globe. SHAKESPEARE.

The power of memory, and the simple exercise of that power in the act of remembering, are possessed in common, though in different degrees, by man and brute; but recollection and reminiscence are exercises of the memory that are connected with the higher faculties of man, his judgment and understanding. To remember is to call to mind that which has once been presented to the mind; but to recollect is to remember afresh, to remember what has been remembered before, to recall with an effort what may have been forgotten. Remembrance busies itself with objects that are at hand; recollection carries us back to distant periods: simple remembrance is engaged in things that have but just left the mind, which are more or less easily to be recalled, and more or less faithfully to be represented; but recollection tries to retrace the faint images of things that have been so long unthought of as to be almost obliterated from the memory. In this manner we are said to remember in one half-hour what was told us in the preceding half-hour, or to remember what passes from one day to another; but we recollect the incidents of childhood; we recollect what happened in our native place after many years' absence from it. Remembrance is that homely, every-day exercise of the memory which renders it of essential service in the acquirement of knowledge, or in the performance of one's duties; recollection is that exalted exercise of the memory which affords us the purest of enjoyments and serves the noblest of purposes; the recollection of all the minute incidents of childhood is a more sincere pleasure than any which the present moment can afford.

Forgetfulness is necessary to remembrance.

JOHNSON.

Memory may be assisted by method, and the decays of knowledge repaired by stated times of recollection. JOHNSON.

Reminiscence is altogether an abstract exercise of the memory, which is employed on purely intellectual ideas in distinction from those which are awakened by sensible objects: the mathematician makes use of reminiscence in deducing unknown truths from those which he already knows. Reminiscence among the disciples of Socrates was the remembrance of things purely intellectual, or of that natural knowledge which the souls had had before their union with the body; while the memory was exercised upon sensible things, or that knowledge which was acquired through the medium of the senses. Reminiscence, in its familiar application, signifies any event or circumstance long passed which is brought, or comes to the mind, particularly if it be of a pleasurable nature.

The encouragement and kindness I have received will form one of the most pleasing reminiscences of my life. WILSON.

The Latins said that reminiscence belonged exclusively to man because it was purely intellectual, but that memory was common to all animals because it was merely the depot of the senses. That divine, though pagan philosopher, the high-winged Plato, fancied that our souls were at the first infusion abracadabra, and that all our future knowledge was but a reminiscence.

Reminiscences is the retrieving a thing at present forgot, or confusedly remembered, by setting the mind to hunt over all its notions. SCOTT.

MENTAL, INTELLECTUAL, INTELLIGENT.

THERE is the same difference between MENTAL and INTELLECTUAL as between mind and intellect: the mind comprehends the thinking faculty in general, with all its operations; the intellect includes only that part of it which consists in understanding and judgment: mental is therefore opposed to corporeal; intellectual is opposed to sensual or physical: mental exertions are not to be expected from all; intellectual enjoyments fall to the lot of comparatively few. Objects, pleasures, pains, operations, gifts, etc., are denominated mental; subjects, conversation, pursuits, and the like, are entitled intellectual. It is not always easy to distinguish our mental pleasures from those corporeal pleasures which we enjoy in common with the brutes; the latter are, however, greatly heightened by the former in whatever degree they are blended: in a society of well-informed persons, the conversation will turn principally on intellectual subjects.

To collect and deposit the various forms of things is far the most pleasing part of mental occupation. JOHNSON.

Man's more divine, the master of all these,
Lord of the wide world, and wide wat'ry seas,
Endued with intellectual sense and soul.

SHAKESPEARE.

INTELLIGENT, from intelligens, understanding or knowing, is a characteristic of the person: an intelligent being or an intelligence denotes a being purely spiritual, or abstracted from matter.

Can He delight in the production of such abortive intelligences, such short-lived reasonable beings? SPECTATOR.

When applied to individuals, it denotes having a quick understanding of things, as an intelligent child.

MERCANTILE, COMMERCIAL.

MERCANTILE, from merchandise, respects the actual transaction of business, or a transfer of merchandise by sale or purchase; COMMERCIAL comprehends the theory and practice of commerce: hence we speak in a peculiar manner of a mercantile house, a mercantile town, a mercantile situation, and the like; but of a commercial education, a commercial people, commercial speculations, and the like.

Such is the happiness, the hope of which seduced me from the duties and pleasures of a mercantile life. JOHNSON.

The commercial world is very frequently put into confusion by the bankruptcy of merchants. JOHNSON.

MESSAGE, ERRAND.

MESSAGE, from the Latin missus, participle of mitto, to send, signifies the thing sent. ERRAND, from erro, to wander or to go to a distance, signifies the thing for which one goes to a distance.

The message is properly any communication which is conveyed; the errand sent from one person to another is that which causes one to go: servants are the bearers of messages, and are sent on various errands. A message may be either verbal or written; an errand is limited to no form, and to no circumstance: one delivers the message, and goes the errand. Sometimes the message may be the errand, and the errand may include the message: when that which is sent consists of a notice or intimation to another, it is a message; and if that causes any one to go to a place, it is an errand: thus it is that the greater part of errands consists of sending messages from one person to another.

Sometimes from her eyes
I did receive fair speechless messages.

SHAKESPEARE.

The scenes where ancient bards th' inspiring breath
Ecstatic felt, and, from this world retir'd,
Convers'd with angels and immortal forms,
On glorious errands bent. THOMSON.

MINDFUL, REGARDFUL, OBSERVANT.

MINDFUL (v. To attend to) respects that which we wish from others; REGARDFUL (v. To regard) respects that which in itself demands regard or serious thought, particularly what regards the interests and feelings of others; OBSERVANT respects both that which is communicated by others, or that which carries its own obligations with itself: a child should always be mindful of its parents' instructions; they should never be forgotten: every one should be regardful of his several duties and obligations; they ought never to be neglected: one ought to be observant of the religious duties which one's profession enjoins upon him; they cannot with propriety be passed over. By being mindful of what one hears from the wise and good, one learns to be wise and good; by being regardful of what is due to one's self, and to society at large, one learns to pass through the world with satisfaction to one's own mind and esteem from others; by being observant of all rule and order, we afford to others a salutary example for their imitation.

Be mindful, when thou hast entomb'd the shoot,
With store of earth around to feed the root.

DRYDEN.

MINISTER, AGENT.

MINISTER comes from minus, less, as magister comes from magis, more; the one being less, and the other more, than others: the minister, therefore, is literally one that acts in a subordinate capacity; and the AGENT (from ago, to act) is the one that takes the acting part: they both perform the will of another, but the minister performs a higher part than the agent: the minister gives his counsel, and exerts his intellectual powers in the service of another; but the agent executes the orders or commissions given him: a minister is employed by government in political affairs; an agent is employed by individuals in commercial and pecuniary affairs, or by government in subordinate matters: a minister is received at court, and serves as a representative for his government; an agent generally acts under the directions of the minister: ambassadors or plenipotentiaries, or the first officers of the State, are ministers; but those who regulate the affairs respecting prisoners, the police, and the like, are termed agents. A minister always holds a public character, and is in the service of the State; the agent may be only acting for another individual, as a commercial agent.

BLACKMORE.

They had not the wit to send to them, in any

BACON.

TO MINISTER, ADMINISTER, CONTRIBUTE.

To MINISTER, from the noun minister, in the sense of a servant (v. Minister), signifies to act in subservience to another, and may be taken either in a good, bad, or indifferent sense, as to minister to the spiritual wants or to minister to the caprices and indulgences of another when we encourage them unnecessarily.

ADMINISTER, that is, to minister for a specific purpose, is taken in the good sense of serving another to his advantage: thus the good Samaritan administered to the comfort of the man who had fallen among thieves. CONTRIBUTE (v. To conduce) is taken in either a good or bad sense; we may contribute to the relief of the indigent, or we may contribute to the follies and vices of others. Princes are sometimes placed in the unfortunate situation, that those who should direct them in early life only minister to their vices by every means in their power: it is the part of the Christian to administer comfort to those who are in want, consolation to the afflicted, advice to those who ask for it, and require it; help to those who are feeble, and support to those who cannot uphold themselves: it is the part of all who are in high stations to contribute to the dissemination of religion and morality among their dependents; but there are, on the contrary, many who contribute to the spread of immorality, and a contempt of all sacred things, by the most pernicious example of irreligion in themselves.

Those good men who take such pleasure in relieving the miserable for Christ's sake would not have been less forward to minister unto Christ himself.

ATTENBURY.

By the universal administration of grace, begun by our blessed Saviour, enlarged by his Apostles, carried on by their immediate successors, and to be completed by the rest to the world's end, all types that darkened this faith are enlightened.

SPRATT.

Parents owe their children not only material subsistence for their body, but much more spiritual contribution for their mind.

DIGBY.

As expressing the acts of unconscious agents, they bear a similar distinction.

He flings the pregnant ashes through the air,
And speaks a mighty prayer,
Both which the ministering winds around all Egypt bear.

COWLEY.

Thus do our eyes, as do all common mirrors,
Successively reflect succeeding images;
Not what they would, but must! a star or toad,
Just as the hand of chance administers.

CONGREVE.

May from my bones a new Achilles rise,
That shall infect the Trojan colonies
With fire, and sword, and famine, when, at length,
Time to our great attempts contributes strength.

MIRTH, MERRIMENT, JOVIALITY, JOLLITY, HILARITY.

THESE terms all express that species of gayety or joy which belongs to company, or to men in their social intercourse. MIRTH refers to the feeling displayed in the outward conduct: MERRIMENT, and the other terms, refer rather to the external expressions of the feeling, or the causes of the feeling, than to the feeling itself: mirth shows itself in laughter, in dancing, singing, and noise; merriment consists of such things as are apt to excite mirth: the more we are disposed to laugh, the greater is our mirth; the more there is to create laughter, the greater is the merriment: the tricks of Punch and his wife, or the jokes of a clown, cause much mirth among the gaping crowd of rustics; the amusements with the swing, or the roundabout, afford much merriment to the visitants of a fair. Mirth is confined to no age or station; but merriment belongs more particularly to young people, or those of the lower station; mirth may be provoked wherever any number of persons is assembled; merriment cannot go forward anywhere so properly as at fairs, or common and public places. JOVIALITY or JOLLITY, and HILARITY, are species of merriment which belong to the convivial board, or to less refined indulgences: joyiality or jollity is the unrefined, unlicensed indulgence in the pleasures of the table, or any social entertainments; hilarity is the same thing qualified by the cultivation and good-sense of the company; we may expect to find much joyiality and jollity at a public dinner of mechanics, watermen, or laborers; we may expect to find hilarity at a public dinner of noblemen: eating, drinking, and noise, constitute the joyiality; the conversation, the songs, the toasts, and the public spirit of the company contribute to hilarity.

The highest gratification we receive here from company is mirth, which at the best is but a fluttering quiet motion.

POPE.

He who best knows our natures by such afflictions recalls our wandering thoughts from idle merriment.

GRAY.

Now swarms the village o'er the joyial mead.

THOMSON.

With branches we the fanes adorn, and waste
In jollity the day ordain'd to be the last.

DRYDEN.

He that contributes to the hilarity of the vacant hour will be welcomed with ardor.

JOHNSON.

TO MISCONSTRUE, MISINTERPRET.

MISCONSTRUE and MISINTERPRET signify to explain in a wrong way; but the former respects the sense of one's words or the application of one's actions: those who indulge themselves in a light mode of speech toward children are liable to be misconstrued; a too great tenderness to the criminal may be easily misinterpreted into favor of the crime. These words may likewise be employed in speaking of language in general; but the former respects the literal transmission of foreign ideas into our native language; the latter respects the general sense which one affixes to any set of words, either in a native or foreign language: the learners of a language will unavoidably misconstrue it at times; in all languages there are ambiguous expressions, which are liable to misinterpretation. Misconstruing is the consequence of ignorance; misinterpretation of particular words are oftener the consequence of prejudice and voluntary blindness, particularly in the explanation of the law or of the Scriptures.

In ev'ry act and turn of life he feels Public calamities or household ills;
The Judge corrupt, the long depending cause,
And doubtful issue of misconstrued laws.

PRIOR.

Some purposely misrepresent or put a wrong interpretation on the virtues of others.

ADDISON.

TO MIX, MINGLE, BLEND, CONFOUND.

MIX is in German mischen, Latin misceo, Greek μυρω, Hebrew mazeg. MINGLE, in Greek μυρμι, is but a variation of mix. BLEND, in German blenden, to dazzle, comes from blind, signifying to see confusedly, or confused objects in a general way. CONFOUND, v. Confound.

Mix is here a general and indefinite term, signifying simply to put together: but we may mix two or several things; we minge several objects: things are mixed so as to lose all distinction; but they may be mingled and yet retain a disinction: liquids miz so as to become one, and individuals miz in a crowd so as to be lost; things are mingled together of different sizes if they lie in the same spot, but they may still be distinguished. To blend is only partially to miz, as colors blend which fall into each other: to confound is to miz in a wrong way, as objects of sight are confounded when they are erroneously taken to be joined. To miz and mingle are mostly applied to material objects, except in poetry; to blend and confound are mental operations, and principally employed on spiritual subjects: thus, events and circumstances are blended together in a narrative; the ideas of the ignorant are confounded in most cases, but particularly when they attempt to think for themselves.

Can imagination boast,
Amid its gay creation, hues like hers,
Or can it miz them with that matchless skill,
And lose them in each other? THOMSON.

There, as I pass'd with careless steps and slow,
The mingling notes came softened from below.
GOLDSMITH.

But happy they! the happiest of their kind,
Whom gentler stars unite, and in one fate
Their hearts, their fortunes, and their beings blend. THOMSON.

And long the gods, we know,
Have grudg'd thee, Cæsar, to the world below,
Where fraud and rapine, right and wrong confound. DRYDEN.

MIXTURE, MEDLEY, MISCELLANY.

MIXTURE is the thing mized (v. To miz). MEDLEY, from meddle or middle, signifies what comes between another. MISCELLANY, in Latin miscellaneous, from misceo, to miz, signifies also a mixture.

The term mixture is general; whatever objects can be mized will form a mixture: a medley is a mixture of things not fit to be mized: and a miscellany is a mixture of many different things. Flour, water, and eggs may form a mixture in the proper sense; but if to these were added all sorts of spices, it would form a medley. Miscellany is a species applicable only to intellectual subjects: the miscellaneous is opposed to that which is systematically arranged; essays are miscellaneous in distinction from works on one particular subject.

In great villanies, there is often such a mixture of the fool, as quite spoils the whole project of the knave. SOUTH.

More oft in fools' and madmen's hands than sages,
She seems a medley of all ages. SWIFT.

A writer, whose design is so comprehensive and miscellaneous as that of an essayist, may accommodate himself with a topic from every scene of life. JOHNSON.

MODERATION, MEDIOCRITY.

MODERATION (v. Modesty) is the characteristic of persons; MEDIOCRITY (that is, the mean or medium) characterizes their condition: moderation is a virtue of no small importance for beings who find excess in everything to be an evil; mediocrity in external circumstances is exempt from all the evils which attend either poverty or riches.

Such moderation with thy bounty join,
That thou may'st nothing give that is not thine. DENHAM.

Mediocrity only of enjoyment is allowed to man. BLAIR.

MODEST, BASHFUL, DIFFIDENT.

MODEST, in Latin modestus, from modus, a measure, signifies setting measure to one's estimate of one's self. BASHFUL signifies ready to be abashed. DIFFIDENT, v. Distrustful.

Modesty is a habit or principle of the mind; bashfulness is a state of feeling: modesty is at all times becoming; bashfulness is only becoming in females, or very young persons, in the presence of their superiors: modesty discovers itself in the absence of everything assuming, whether in look, word, or action; bashfulness betrays itself by a downcast look and a timid air: a modest deportment is always commendable; a bashful temper is not desirable.

Her face, as in a nymph display'd
A fair fierce boy, or in a boy betray'd
The blushing beauties of a modest maid. DRYDEN.

Mere bashfulness, without merit, is awkwardness. ADDISON.

Modesty is a proper distrust of ourselves; diffidence is a culpable distrust. Modesty, though opposed to assurance, is not incompatible with a confidence in ourselves; diffidence altogether unmans a person, and disqualifies him for his duty: a person is generally modest in the display of his talents to others; but a diffident man cannot turn his talents to his own use.

A man truly modest is as much so when he is alone as in company. — BUDGE.ELL.

Diffidence and presumption both arise from the want of knowing, or rather endeavoring to know ourselves. STEELE.

MODESTY, MODERATION, TEMPERANCE, SOBRIETY.

MODESTY, in French modestie, Latin modestia, and MODERATION, in Latin moderatio and moderor, both come from modus, a measure, limit, or boundary; that is, forming a measure or rule. TEMPERANCE, in Latin temperantia, from tempus, time, signifies fixing a time (v. Abstemius). SOBRIETY, v. Abstemius.

Modesty lies in the mind, and in the tone of feeling; moderation respects the desires: modesty is a principle that acts discretionally; moderation is a rule or line that acts as a restraint on the views and the outward conduct: he who thinks modestly of his own acquirements, his own performances, and his own merits, will be moderate in his expectations of praise, reward, and recompense; he, on the other hand, who overrates his own abilities and qualifications, will equally overrate the use he makes of them, and consequently be immoderate in the price which he sets upon his services: in such cases, therefore, modesty and moderation are to each other as cause and effect; but there may be modesty without moderation, and moderation without modesty. Modesty is a sentiment confined to one's self as the object, and consisting solely of one's judgment of what one is and what one does; but moderation, as is evident from the above, extends to objects that are external of ourselves: modestly, rather than moderation, belongs to an author; moderation, rather than modesty, belongs to a tradesman, or a man who has gains to make and purposes to answer.

I may modestly conclude that whatever errors there may be in this play, there are not those which have been objected to it. DRYDEN.

Equally inur'd,
By moderation, either state to bear,
Prosperous or adverse. MILTON.

Modesty shields a man from mortifications and disappointments, which assail the self-conceited man in every direction: a modest man conciliates the esteem even of an enemy and a rival. Moderation protects a man equally from injustice on the one hand, and imposition on the other: he who is moderate himself makes others so.

There's proud modesty in merit! DRYDEN.

Few harangues from the pulpit, except in the days of your league in France, or in the days of our solemn league and covenant in England, have ever breathed less of the spirit of moderation than this lecture in the Old Jewry. BURKE.

Moderation is the measure of one's desires, one's habits, one's actions, and one's words; temperance is the adaptation of the time or season for particular feelings, actions, or words: a man is said to be moderate in his principles who adopts the medium or middle course of thinking; it rather qualifies the thing than the person: he is said to be temperate in his anger, if he do not suffer it to break out into any excesses; temperance characterizes the person rather than the thing. A moderate man in politics endeavors to steer clear of all party spirit, and is consequently so temperate in his language as to provoke no animosity. Moderation in the enjoyment of everything is essential in order to obtain the purest pleasure: temperance in one's indulgences is always attended with the happiest effects to the constitution; as, on the contrary, any deviation from temperance, even in a single instance, is always punished with bodily pain and sickness.

These are the tenets which the moderatist of the Romauists will not venture to affirm.

SMALRIDGE.

She's not forward, but modest as the dove;
She's not hot, but temperate as the morn.

SHAKESPEARE.

Temperance and sobriety have already been considered in their proper application (v. Abstemius), which will serve to illustrate their improper application. Temperance is an action; it is the tempering of our words and actions to the circumstances: sobriety is a state in which one is exempt from every stimulus to deviate from the right course; as a man who is intoxicated with wine runs into excesses, and loses that power of guiding himself which he has when he is sober or free from all intoxication, so is he who is intoxicated with any passion, in like manner, hurried away into irregularities which a man in his right senses will not be guilty of: sobriety is, therefore, the state of being in one's right or sobor senses; and sobriety is, with regard to temperance, as a cause to the effect; sobriety of mind will not only produce moderation and temperance, but extend its influence to the whole conduct of a man in every relation and circumstance, to his internal sentiments and his external behavior: hence we speak of sobriety in one's mien or deportment, sobriety in one dress and manners, sobriety in one's religious opinions and observances.

Temperate mirth is not extinguished by old age. BLAIR.

Another, who had a great genius for tragedy, following the fury of his natural temper, made every man and woman in his plays stark raging mad, there was not a sobor person to be had. DRYDEN.

Sobor may also be applied figuratively.

Spread thy close curtains, love-performing night,
Thou sobor-salted matron, all in black.

SHAKESPEARE.

MOISTURE, HUMIDITY, DAMPNESS.

MOISTURE, from the French moite, moist, is probably contracted from the Latin humidus, from which HUMIDITY is immediately derived. DAMPNESS comes from the same root as the German dampf, a vapor.

Moisture is used in general to express any small degree of infusion of a liquid into a body; humidity is employed scientifically to describe the state of having any portion of such liquid: hence we speak of the moisture of a table, the moisture of paper, or the moisture of a floor that has been wetted; but of the humidity of the air, or of a wall that has contracted moisture of itself. Dampness is that species of moisture that arises from the gradual contraction of a liquid in bodies capable of retaining it; in this manner a cellar is damp, or linen that has lain long by may become damp.

The plummy people streak their wings with oil,
To throw the lucid moisture trickling off.

THOMSON.

It enables the animal to keep the principal part of the surface of the eye under cover, and to preserve it in a due state of humidity. PALLET.

Now from the town
Buried in smoke, and sleep, and noisome damps,
Oft let me wander. THOMSON.

MONEY, CASH.

MONEY comes from the Latin moneta, which signified stamped coin, from monere, to advise, to inform of its value, by means of an inscription or stamp. CASH, from the French caisse, a chest, signifies that which is put in a chest.

Money is applied to everything which serves as a circulating medium; cash is, in a strict sense, put for coin only: bank-notes are money; guineas and shillings are cash; all cash is therefore money, but all money is not cash. The only money the Chinese have are square bits of metal, with a hole through the centre, by which they are strung upon a string: travellers on the Continent must always be provided with letters of credit, which may be turned into cash, as convenience requires.

Little success is like to be found in managing a dispute against covetousness, which aways and carries all before it in the strength of that queen regent of the world, money. SPECTATOR.

At the new Exchange they are eloquent for want of cash, but in the City they ought with cash to supply the want of eloquence. SPECTATOR.

MONUMENT, MEMORIAL, REMEMBRANCER.

MONUMENT, in Latin monumentum or monimentum, from monere, to advise or remind, signifies that which puts us in mind of something. MEMORIAL, from memory, signifies the thing that helps the memory; and REMEMBRANCER, from remember (v. Memory), the thing that causes to remember.

From the above it is clear that these terms have, in their original derivation, precisely the same signification, and differ in their collateral acceptations: monument is applied to that which is purposely set up to keep a thing in mind; memorials and remembrancers are any things which are calculated to call a thing to mind: a monument is used to preserve a public object of notice from being forgotten; a memorial serves to keep an individual in mind: the monument is commonly understood to be a species of building; as a tomb which preserves the memory of the dead, or a pillar which preserves the memory of some public event: the memorial always consists of something which was the property, or in the possession, of another; as his picture, his handwriting, his hair, and the like. The Monument at London was built to commemorate the dreadful fire of the city in the year 1666: friends who are at a distance are happy to have some token of each other's regard, which they likewise keep as a memorial of their former intercourse.

On your father's old monument
Hang mournful epitaphs.

SHAKESPEARE.

The monument, in its proper sense, is always made of wood or stone for some specific purpose; but, in the improper sense, anything may be termed a monument when it serves the purpose of reminding the public of any circumstance: thus, the pyramids are monuments of antiquity; the actions of a good prince are more lasting monuments than either brass or marble. Memorials are mostly of a private nature, and at the same time such as remind us naturally of the object to which they have belonged; this object is generally some person.

Any memorial of your good-nature and friendship is most welcome to me.

Pope.

If (in the Isle of Skye) the remembrance of papal superstition is obliterated, the monuments of papal piety are likewise effaced.

JOHNSON.

But it may likewise refer to some thing, if it be of a personal nature, or that by which persons are individually affected: our Saviour instituted the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper as a memorial of his death.

All churches have had their names, some as memorials of peace, some of wisdom, some in memory of the Trinity itself, some of Christ under sundry titles.

HOOKE.

A monument and memorial is said of that which concerns numbers: the remembrancer is said of that which directly concerns a man's self; the memorial calls another person to one's mind, the remembrancer calls that to a man's own mind in which he is personally interested: a gift is the best memorial we can give of ourselves to another; a sermon is often a good remembrancer of the duties which we have neglected to perform.

Medals are so many monuments consigned over to eternity, that may last when all other memorials of the same age are worn out or lost.

ADDISON.

When God is forgotten, his judgments are his remembrancers.

COWPER.

MOTION, MOVEMENT.

THESE are both abstract terms to denote the act of moving, but MOTION is taken generally and abstractedly from the thing that moves; MOVEMENT, on the other hand, is taken in connection with the agent or thing that moves: hence we speak of a state of motion as opposed to a state of rest, of perpetual motion, the laws of motion, and the like; on the other hand, we say, to make a movement when speaking of an army, a general movement when speaking of an assembly.

It is not easy to a mind accustomed to the inroads of troublesome thoughts to expel them immediately by putting better images into motion.

JOHNSON.

Nature I thought perform'd too mean a part,
Forming her movements to the rules of art.

PRIOR.

When motion is qualified by the thing that moves, it denotes continued motion; but movement implies only a particular motion: hence we say, the motion of the heavenly bodies; the motion of the earth; a person is in continual motion, or an army is in motion; but a person makes a movement who rises or sits down, or goes from one chair to another; the different movements of the springs and wheels of any instrument.

At this rate of travelling, it would go round the earth's orbit in less than a week, which makes, I think, considerably more than sixty millions of miles in a day; a motion that vastly surpasses all human comprehension.

BRADDOCK.

The women, terrified by these movements, run tumultuously from their houses to the temples.

HOOKE.

MOURNFUL, SAD.

MOURNFUL signifies full of what causes mourning; SAD (v. Dull) signifies either a painful sentiment, or what causes this painful sentiment. The difference in the sentiment is what constitutes the difference between these epithets: the mournful awakens tender and sympathetic feelings: the sad oppresses the spirits, and makes one heavy at heart; a mournful tale contains an account of others' distresses; a sad story contains an account of one's own distress; a mournful event befalls our friends and relatives; a sad misfortune befalls ourselves. Selfish people find nothing mournful, but many things sad: tender-hearted people are always affected by what is mournful, and are less troubled about what is sad.

Narcissa follows ere his tomb is closed,
Her death invades his mournful right, and claims
The grief that started from my lids for him.

YOUNG.

How sad a sight is human happiness
To those whose thoughts can pierce beyond an hour!

YOUNG.

MOVING, AFFECTING, PATHETIC.

THE MOVING is in general whatever moves the affections or the passions; the AFFECTING and PATHETIC are what move the affections in different degrees. The good or bad feelings may be moved; the tender feelings only are affected. A field of battle is a moving spectacle: the death of a friend is an affecting spectacle. The affecting acts by means of the senses as well as the understanding; the pathetic applies only to what is addressed to the heart: hence, a sight or a description is affecting; but an address is pathetic.

There is something so moving in the very image of weeping beauty.

STEELE.

I do not remember to have seen any ancient or modern story more affecting than a letter of Ann of Bouleayne.

ADDISON.

What think you of the bard's enchanting art,
Which, whether he attempts to warm the heart
With fabled scenes, or charm the ear with rhyme,
Breathes all pathetic, lovely, and sublime?

JENTYS.

MULTITUDE, CROWD, THRONG, SWARM.

THE idea of many is common to all these terms, and peculiar to that of MULTITUDE, from the Latin multus; CROWD, from the verb to crowd, signifies the many that crowd together; and THRONG, like the German drängen, to press, signifies the many that press together; and SWARM, like the German schwärmen, to fly about, signifies running together in numbers. These terms vary, either in regard to the object or the circumstance: multitude is applicable to any object; crowd, throng, and swarm are in the proper sense applicable only to animate objects: the two first in regard to persons; the latter to animals in general, but particularly brutes. A multitude may be either in a stagnant or a moving state; all the rest denote a multitude in a moving state: a crowd is always pressing, generally eager and tumultuous; a throng may be busy and active, but not always pressing or incommodious: it is always inconvenient, sometimes dangerous, to go into a crowd; it is amusing to see the throng that is perpetually passing in the streets of the city: the swarm is more active than either of the two others; it is commonly applied to bees which fly together in numbers, but sometimes to human beings, to denote their very great numbers when scattered about; thus the children of the poor in low neighborhoods swarm in the streets.

A multitude is incapable of framing orders.

TEMPLE.

The crowd shall Caesar's Indian war behold.

DEYDEN.

I shone amid the heav'nly throng.

MASON.

Numberless nations, stretching far and wide,
Shall (I foresee it) soon, with Gothic swarms,
come forth,

From ignorance's universal North.

TO MUTILATE, MAIM, MANGLE.

MUTILATE, in Latin mutilatus, from mutilo and mutilus, Greek μυτιλος, without horns, signifies to take off any necessary part. MAIM and MANGLE are connected with the Latin mancus, which comes from manus, signifying to deprive of a hand or to wound in general.

Mutilate has the most extended meaning; it implies the abridging of any limb: mangle is applied to irregular wounds in any part of the body: maim is confined to wounds in the limbs, particularly the hands. Men are exposed to be mutilated by means of cannon-balls; they are in danger of being mangled when attacked promiscuously with the sword; they frequently get maimed when boarding vessels or storming places.

When a man is in danger of the mutilation of an arm, a leg, and the like, it is lawful to prevent the loss of either by the death of the assailant.

SOURIN.

By the ancient law of England, he that maimed any man whereby he lost any part of his body, was sentenced to lose the like part.

BLACKSTONE.

What have they (the French nobility) done that they should be hunted about, mangled, and tortured?

BURKE.

Mutilate and mangle are applicable to moral objects; maim is employed in the natural or figurative sense. In this case mangle is a much stronger term than mutilate; the latter signifies to lop off an essential part; to mangle is to mutilate a thing to such a degree as to render it useless or worthless. Every sect of Christians is fond of mutilating the Bible by setting aside such parts as do not favor its own scheme; and among them all the sacred Scriptures become literally mangled, and stripped of all its most important doctrines.

How Hales would have borne the mutilations which his Plea of the Crown has suffered from the editor, they who know his character will easily conceive. JOHNSON.

I have shown the evil of matrimony and splitting religion. BLAIR.

MUTUAL, RECIPROCAL.

MUTUAL, in Latin mutuus, from muto, to change, signifies exchanged so as to be equal, or the same, on both sides. RECIPROCAL, in Latin reciprocus, from recipio, to take back, signifies giving backward and forward by way of return. Mutual supposes a sameness in condition at the same time: reciprocal supposes an alternation or succession of returns. Exchange is free and voluntary; we give in exchange, and this action is mutual: return is made either according to law or equity; it is obligatory, and when equally obligatory on each in turn it is reciprocal. Voluntary disinterested services rendered to each other are mutual: imposed or merited services, returned from one to the other, are reciprocal: friends render one another mutual services; the services between servants and masters are reciprocal. The husband and wife pledge their faith to each other mutually; they are reciprocally bound to keep their vow of fidelity. The sentiment is mutual, the tie is reciprocal.

Faults in the life breed errors in the brain,
And these, reciprocally, those again
The mind and conduct mutually imprint,
And stamp their image in each other's mint.

COWPER.

Mutual applies mostly to matters of will and opinion: a mutual affection, a mutual inclination to oblige, a mutual interest for each other's comfort, a mutual concern to avoid that which will displease the other—these are the sentiments which render the marriage state happy: reciprocal ties, reciprocal bonds, reciprocal rights, reciprocal duties—these are what every one ought to bear in mind as a member of society, that he may expect of no man more than what in equity he is disposed to return.

The soul and spirit that animates and keeps up society is mutual trust. SOUTH.

Life cannot subsist in society but by reciprocal concessions. JOHNSON.

Mutual applies to nothing but what is personal; reciprocal is applied to things remote from the idea of personality, as reciprocal verbs, reciprocal terms, reciprocal relations, and the like.

MYSTERIOUS, MYSTIC.

MYSTERIOUS (v. Dark) and MYSTIC are but variations of the same original; the former, however, is more commonly applied to that which is supernatural, or veiled in an impenetrable obscurity; the latter to that which is natural, but concealed by an artificial or fantastical veil; hence we speak of the mysterious plans of Providence: mystic schemes of theology, or mystic principles.

As soon as that mysterious veil, which now covers futurity, was (should be) lifted up, all the gayety of life would disappear. BLAIR.

And ye five other wand'ring fires, that move
In mystic dance not without song,
Resound his praise. MILTON.

N.

TO NAME, CALL.

NAME, which comes, through the medium of the Northern languages, from the Hebrew nam, is properly to pronounce a word, but is now employed for distinguishing or addressing one by name. To CALL (v. To call) signifies properly to address one loudly, consequently we may name without calling, when we only mention a name in conversation; and we may call without naming.

Some haughty Greek, who lives thy tears to see,
Embitters all thy woes, by naming me. POPE.
And oft the nightly necromancer boasts,
With these to call from tombs the stalking ghosts. DRYDEN.

The terms may, however, be employed in the sense of assigning a name. In this case a person is named by his name, whether proper, patronymic, or whatever is usual; he is called according to the characteristics by which he is distinguished. The Emperor Tiberius was named Tiberius; he was called a monster. William the First of England is named William; he is called the Conqueror.

I lay the deep foundations of a wall,
And Ænos, nam'd from me, the city call.

DRYDEN.

I'll call thee Hamlet,
King, father, royal Dane; oh answer me.

SHAKESPEARE.

NAME, APPELLATION, TITLE, DENOMINATION.

NAME, v. To name. APPELLATION, in French appellation, Latin appellatio, from appello, to call, signifies that by which a person is called. TITLE, in French titre, Latin titulus, from the Greek τιω, to honor, signifies that appellation which is assigned to any one for the purpose of honor. DENOMINATION signifies that which denominates or distinguishes.

Name is a generic term, the rest are specific. Whatever word is employed to distinguish one thing from another is a name; therefore, an appellation and a title is a name, but not vice versa. A name is either common or proper; an appellation is generally a common name given for some specific purpose as characteristic. Several kings of France had the names of Charles, Louis, Philip; but one was distinguished by the appellation of Stammerer, another by that of the Simple, and a third by that of the Hardy, arising from particular characters or circumstances. A title is a species of appellation, not drawn from anything personal, but conferred as a ground of political distinction. An appellation may be often a term of reproach; but a title is always a mark of honor. An appellation is given to all objects, animate or inanimate; a title is given mostly to persons, sometimes to things. A particular house may have the appellation of "the Cottage," or "the Hall," as a particular person may have the title of Duke, Lord, or Marquis.

Then on your name shall wretched mortals call,
And offer'd victims at your altars fall. DRYDEN.

The names derived from the profession of the ministry, in the language of the present age, are made but the appellatives of scorn. SOUTH.

ADDISON.

Denomination is to particular bodies, what appellation is to an individual; namely, a term of distinction, drawn from their peculiar characters and circumstances. The Christian world is split into a number of different bodies or communities, under the denominations of Catholics, Protestants, Calvinists, Presbyterians, etc., which have their origin in the peculiar form of faith and discipline adopted by these bodies.

It has cost me much care and thought to marshal and fix the people under their proper denominations.

ADDISON.

TO NAME, DENOMINATE, STYLE, ENTITLE, DESIGNATE, CHARACTERIZE.

To NAME (v. To name, call) signifies simply to give a name to, or to address or specify by the given name; to DENOMINATE is to give a specific name upon specific ground, to distinguish by the name; to STYLE, from the noun style or manner (v. Diction, style), signifies to address by a specific name; to ENTITLE is to give the specific or appropriate title. Adam named everything; we denominate the man who drinks excessively, "a drunkard;" subjects style their monarch "His Majesty;" books are entitled according to the judgment of the author.

NAME, REPUTATION, REPUTE, CREDIT.

NAME is here taken in the improper sense for a name acquired in public by any peculiarity or quality in an object. REPUTATION and REPUTE, from reputo, or re and puto, to think back, or in reference to some immediate object, signifies the thinking of or the state of being thought of by the public, or held in public estimation. CREDIT (v. Credit) signifies the state of being believed or trusted in general.

Name implies something more specific than the reputation; and reputation something more substantial than name; a name may be acquired by some casualty or by some quality that has more show than worth; reputation is acquired only by time, and built only on merit: a name may be arbitrarily given, simply by way of distinction; reputation is not given, but acquired, or follows as a consequence of one's honorable exertions. A physician sometimes gets a name by a single instance of professional skill, which by a combination of favorable circumstances he may convert to his own advantage in forming an extensive practice; but unless he have a commensurate degree of talent, this name will never ripen into a solid reputation.

Who fears not to do ill, yet fears the name,
And free from conscience, is a slave to fame.

DENHAM.

Splendor of reputation is not to be counted among the necessities of life.

JOHNSON.

Name and reputation are of a more extended nature than repute and credit. The name and reputation are given by the public at large; the repute and credit are acquired within a narrow circle. Strangers and distant countries hear of the name and the reputation of anything; but only neighbors and those who have the means of personal observation can take a part in its repute and credit. It is possible, therefore, to have a name and reputation without having repute and credit, and vice versa, for the objects which constitute the former are sometimes different from those which produce the latter. A manufacturer has a name for the excellence of a particular article of his own manufacture; a book has a name among wiflings and pretenders to literature: a good writer, however, seeks to establish his reputation for genius, learning, industry, or some praiseworthy characteristic: a preacher is in high repute among those who attend him: a master gains great credit from the good performances of his scholars. There is also this distinction between reputation and repute, that reputation signifies the act of reputing or the state of being reputed, repute signifies only the state of being reputed.

What men of name resort to him. SHAKESPEARE.

Name and repute are taken either in a good or bad sense; reputation mostly, and credit always, is taken in the good sense only: a person or thing may get a good or an ill name; a person or thing may be in good or ill repute; reputation may rise to different degrees of height, or it may sink again into nothing; credit may likewise be high or low, but both reputation and credit, absolutely taken, imply that which is good.

The terms may, however, be employed in the sense of assigning a name. In this case a person is named by his name, whether proper, patronymic, or whatever is usual; he is called according to the characteristics by which he is distinguished. The Emperor Tiberius was named Tiberius; he was called a monster. William the First of England is named William; he is called the Conqueror.

I lay the deep foundations of a wall,

SHAKESPEARE.

NAME, APPELLATION, TITLE, DENOMINATION.

NAME, v. To name. APPELLATION, in French appellation, Latin appellatio, from appello, to call, signifies that by which a person is called. TITLE, in French titre, Latin titulus, from the Greek τιω, to honor, signifies that appellation which is assigned to any one for the purpose of honor. DENOMINATION signifies that which denominates or distinguishes.

Name is a generic term, the rest are specific. Whatever word is employed to distinguish one thing from another is a name; therefore, an appellation and a title is a name, but not vice versa. A name is either common or proper; an appellation is generally a common name given for some specific purpose as characteristic. Several kings of France had the names of Charles, Louis, Philip; but one was distinguished by the appellation of Stammerer, another by that of the Simple, and a third by that of the Hardy, arising from particular characters or circumstances. A title is a species of appellation, not drawn from anything personal, but conferred as a ground of political distinction. An appellation may be often a term of reproach; but a title is always a mark of honor. An appellation is given to all objects, animate or inanimate; a title is given mostly to persons, sometimes to things. A particular house may have the appellation of "the Cottage," or "the Hall," as a particular person may have the title of Duke, Lord, or Marquis.

Then on your names shall wretched mortals call,

NATAL, NATIVE, INDIGENOUS.

NATAL, in Latin natalis, from natus, signifies belonging to one's birth, or the act of one's being born; but NATIVE, in Latin nativus, likewise from natus, signifies having the origin or beginning. INDIGENOUS, in Latin indigena, from inde and genitus, signifies sprung from that place.

The epithet natal is applied only to the circumstance of a man's birth, as his natal day; his natal hour; a natal song; a natal star. Native has a more extensive meaning, as it comprehends the idea of one's relationship by origin to an object; as one's native country, one's native soil, native village, or native place, native language, and the like.

Safe in the hand of one disposing pow'r,
Or in the natal, or the mortal hour. POPE.

Nor can the grov'ling mind

Indigenous is a particular term used to denote the country where races of men are supposed to have first existed.

Negroes were all originally transported from Africa, and not indigenous or proper natives of America. BROWN.

It is also applied to plants in the same sense.

The other indigenous productions of this class are plantains, capavi, and sweet-potatoes. EDWARDS.

NATIVE, NATURAL.

NATIVE (v. Natal) is to NATURAL as a species to the genus: everything native is, according to its strict signification, natural; but many things are natural which are not native. Of a person we may say that his worth is native, to designate that it is some valuable property which is born with him, not foreign to him, or ingrafted upon his character; but we say of his disposition, that it is natural, as opposed to that which is acquired or otherwise. The former is mostly employed in a good sense, in opposition to what is artful, assumed, and unreal; the other is used in an indifferent sense, as opposed to whatever is the effect of habit or circumstances. When children display themselves with all their native simplicity, they are interesting objects of notice: when they display their natural turn of mind, it is not always that which tends to raise human nature in our esteem.

Music awakes
The native voice of undissembled joy. THOMSON.

He had a good natural understanding. WHITAKER.

NATURALLY, IN COURSE, CONSEQUENTLY, OF COURSE.

THE connection between events, actions, and things is expressed by all these terms. NATURALLY signifies according to the nature of things, and applies therefore to the connection which subsists between events according to the original constitution or inherent properties of things: IN COURSE signifies in the course of things, that is, in the regular order that things ought to follow: CONSEQUENTLY signifies by a consequence, that is, by a necessary law of dependence, which makes one thing follow another: OF COURSE signifies on account of the course which things most commonly or even necessarily take. Whatever happens naturally, happens as it should do; whatever happens in course, happens as we approve of it: whatever follows consequently, follows as we judge it right; whatever follows of course, follows as we expect it. Children naturally imitate their parents: people naturally fall into the habits of those they associate with: both these circumstances result from the nature of things: whoever is made a peer of the realm, takes his seat in the upper house in course: he requires no other qualification to entitle him to this privilege, he goes thither according to the established course of things; consequently, as a peer, he is admitted without question; this is a decision of the judgment by which the question is at once determined: of course none are admitted who are not peers; this flows necessarily out of the constituted law of the land.

Egotists are generally the vain and shallow part of mankind; people being naturally full of themselves when they have nothing else in them. ADDISON.

What do trust and confidence signify in a matter of course and formality? STILLINGFLEET.

Our Lord foresaw that all the Mosaic orders would cease in course upon his death. BEVERIDGE.

NECESSARY, EXPEDIENT, ESSENTIAL, REQUISITE.

NECESSARY (v. Necessity), from the Latin neceſſe and ne cedo, signifies not to be departed from. EXPEDIENT signifies belonging to, or forming a part of, expedition or despatch: ESSENTIAL, containing that essence or property which cannot be omitted. REQUISITE signifies literally required (v. To demand).

Necessary is a general and indefinite term; things may be necessary in the course of nature; it is necessary for all men once to die; or they may be necessary according to the circumstances of the case, or our views of necessity; in this manner we conceive it necessary to call upon another. Expedient, essential, and requisite are modes of relative necessity: the expediency of a thing is a matter of discretion and calculation, and therefore not so self-evidently necessary as many things which we so denominate: it may be expedient for a person to consult another, or it may not, according as circumstances may present themselves. The requisite and the essential are more obviously necessary than the expedient; but the former is less so than the latter: what is requisite may be requisite only in part or entirely; it may be requisite to complete a thing when begun, but not to begin it; the essential, on the contrary, is that which constitutes the essence, and without which a thing cannot exist. It is requisite for one who will have a good library to select only the best authors; exercise is essential for the preservation of good health. In all matters of dispute it is expedient to be guided by some impartial judge; it is requisite for every member of the community to contribute his share to the public expenditure as far as he is able: it is essential to a teacher, particularly a spiritual teacher, to know more than those he teaches.

One tells me he thinks it absolutely necessary for women to have true notions of right and equity. ADDISON.

It is highly expedient that men should, by some settled scheme of duties, be rescued from the tyranny of caprice. JOHNSON.

The English do not consider their Church establishment as convenient, but as essential to their State. BURKE.

It is not enough to say that faith and piety, joined with active virtue, constitute the requisite preparation for heaven: they in truth begin the enjoyment of heaven. BLAIR.

NECESSITIES, NECESSARIES.

NECESSITY, in Latin neceſſitas, and NECESSARY, in Latin neceſſarius, from neceſſe, or ne and cedo, signify not to be yielded or given up. Necessity is the mode or state of circumstances, or the thing which circumstances render necessary; the necessary is that which is absolutely and unconditionally necessary. Art has ever been busy in inventing things to supply the various necessities of our nature, and yet there are always numbers who want even the first necessaries of life. Habit and desire create necessities; nature only requires necessaries: a voluptuary has necessities which are unknown to a temperate man; the poor have in general little more than necessaries.

Those whose condition has always restrained them to the contemplation of their own necessities will scarcely understand why nights and days should be spent in study. JOHNSON.

To make a man happy, virtue must be accompanied with at least a moderate provision of all the necessaries of life, and not disturbed by bodily pains. BUDGELL.

NECESSITY, NEED.

NECESSITY, v. Necessary. NEED, in Saxon nead, neod, Icelandic nöd, German noth, is probably connected with near, and the German genau, exact, close, as also the Greek ανάγκη, which denotes contraction.

Necessity respects the thing wanted; need the condition of the person wanting. There would be no necessity for punishments, if there were not evil-doers; he is peculiarly fortunate who finds a friend in time of need. Necessity is more pressing than need: the former places in a positive state of compulsion to act; it is said to have no law, it prescribes the law for itself; the latter yields to circumstances, and leaves in a state of deprivation. We are frequently under the necessity of going without that of which we stand most in need.

Where necessity ends, curiosity begins. JOHNSON.

One of the many advantages of friendship, is that one can say to one's friend the things that stand in need of pardon. POPE.

From these two nouns arise two epithets for each, which are worthy of observation, namely, necessary and needful, necessitous and needy. Necessary and needful are both applicable to the thing wanted; necessitous and needy to the person wanting: NECESSARY is applied to every object indiscriminately; NEEDFUL only to such objects as supply temporary or partial wants. Exercise is necessary to preserve the health of the body; restraint is necessary to preserve that of the mind; assistance is needful for one who has not sufficient resources in himself: it is necessary to go by water to the Continent: money is needful for one who is travelling. The dissemination of knowledge is necessary to dispel the ignorance which would otherwise prevail in the world; it is needful for a young person to attend to the instructions of his teacher, if he will improve.

It seems to me most strange that men should fear,
Seeing that death, a necessary end,
Will come, when it will come. SHAKESPEARE.

Time, long expected, eas'd us of our load,
And brought the needful presence of a god. DRYDEN.

Necessitous and needy are both applied to persons in want of something important; but necessitous may be employed to denote an occasional want, as to be in a necessitous condition in a foreign country for want of remittances from home; needy denotes a permanent state of want, as to be needy either from extravagance or misfortune.

Steele's imprudence of generosity, or vanity of profusion, kept him always incurably necessitous. JOHNSON.

Charity is the work of Heaven, which is always laying itself out on the needy and the impotent. SOUTH.

TO NEGLECT, OMIT.

NEGLECT, v. To disregard. OMIT, in Latin omitto, or ob and mitto, signifies to put aside.

The idea of letting pass or slip, or of not using, is comprehended in the signification of both these terms; the former is, however, a culpable, the latter an indifferent, action. What we neglect ought not to be neglected: but what we omit may by omitted or otherwise, as convenience requires.

It is the great excellence of learning, that it borrows very little from time or place; but this quality which constitutes much of its value is one occasion of neglect. What may be done at all times with equal propriety is deferred from day to day, till the mind is gradually reconciled to the omission. JOHNSON.

These terms differ likewise in the objects to which they are applied; that is neglected which is practicable or serves for action; that is omitted which serves for intellectual purposes: we neglect an opportunity, we neglect the means, the time, the use, and the like; we omit a word, a sentence, a figure, a stroke, a circumstance, and the like.

In heaven,
Where honor due, and reverence none neglect. MILTON.

These personal comparisons I omit, because I would say nothing that may savor of flattery. BACON.

NEGLECT, REMISS, CARELESS, THOUGHTLESS, HEEDLESS, INATTENTIVE.

NEGLECT (v. To disregard) and REMISSNESS respect the outward action: CARELESS, HEEDLESS, THOUGHTLESS, and INATTENTIVE respect the state of the mind.

Negligence and remissness consist in not doing what ought to be done; carelessness and the other mental defects may show themselves in doing wrong, as well as in not doing at all; negligence and remissness are, therefore, to carelessness and the others, as the effect to the cause; for no one is so apt to be negligent and remiss as he who is careless, although at the same time negligence and remissness arise from other causes, and carelessness, thoughtlessness, etc., produce likewise other effects. Negligent is a stronger term than remiss: one is negligent in neglecting the thing that is expressly before one's eyes; one is remiss in forgetting that which was enjoined some time previously: the want of will renders a person negligent; the want of interest renders a person remiss: one is negligent in regard to business, and the performance of bodily labor; one is remiss in duty, or in such things as respect mental exertion. Servants are commonly negligent in what concerns their master's interest; teachers are remiss in not correcting the faults of their pupils. Negligence is therefore the fault of persons of all descriptions, but particularly those in low condition; remissness is a fault peculiar to those in a more elevated station: a clerk in an office is negligent in not making proper memorandums; a magistrate, or the head of an institution, is remiss in the exercise of his authority to check irregularities.

The two classes most apt to be negligent of this duty (religious retirement) are the men of pleasure and the men of business. BLAIR.

My generous brother is of gentle kind,
He seems remiss, but bears a valiant mind.

POPE.

Careless denotes the want of care (v. Care) in the manner of doing things; thoughtless denotes the want of thought or reflection about things; heedless denotes the want of heeding (v. To attend) or regarding things; inattentive denotes the want of attention to things (v. To attend to). One is careless only in trivial matters of behavior; one is thoughtless in matters of greater moment, in what respects the conduct. Carelessness leads children to make mistakes in their mechanical exercises, in whatever they commit to memory or to paper; thoughtlessness leads many who are not children into serious errors of conduct, when they do not think of, or bear in mind, the consequences of their actions. Thoughtless is applied to things past, present, or to come; careless to things present or to come.

If the parts of time were not variously colored, we should never discern their departure and succession, but should live thoughtless of the past, and careless of the future. JOHNSON.

Careless is applied to such things as require permanent care; thoughtless to such as require permanent thought; heedless and inattentive are applied to passing objects that engage the senses or the thoughts of the moment. One is careless in business, thoughtless in conduct, heedless in walking or running, inattentive in listening: heedless children are unfit to go by themselves; inattentive children are unfit to be led by others.

There in the ruin, Aedless of the dead,
The shelter-seeking peasant builds his shed.

GOLDSMITH.

In the midst of his glory the Almighty is not inattentive to the meanest of his subjects.

BLAIR.

TO NEGOTIATE, TREAT FOR OR ABOUT, TRANSACT.

THE idea of conducting business with others is included in the signification of all these terms; but they differ in the mode of conducting it, and the nature of the business to be conducted. NEGOTIATE, in the Latin negotiatius, participle of negotior, from negotium, is applied in the original mostly to merchandise or traffic, but it is more commonly employed in the complicated concerns of governments and nations. TREAT, from the Latin tracto, frequentative of traho, to draw, signifies to turn over and over or set forth in all ways: these two verbs, therefore, suppose deliberation; but TRANSACT, from transactus, participle of transago, to carry forward or bring to an end, supposes more direct agency than consultation or deliberation; this latter is therefore adapted to the more ordinary and less entangled concerns of commerce. A congress carries on negotiations for the establishment of good order among different states; individual states treat with each other, to settle their particular differences. To negotiate mostly respects political concerns, except in the case of negotiating bills: to treat, as well as transact, is said of domestic and private concerns: we treat with a person about the purchase of a house; and transact our business with him by making good the purchase and paying down the money.

That weighty business to negotiate
They must find one of special weight and trust.

DRAYTON.

To treat the peace a hundred senators
Shall be commissioned.

DRYDEN.

It cannot be expected that they should mention particulars which were transacted among some few of the disciples only, as the transfiguration and the agony.

ADDISON.

As nouns, negotiation expresses rather the act of deliberating than the thing deliberated: treaty includes the ideas of the terms proposed, and the arrangement of those terms: transaction expresses the idea of something actually done and finished. Negotiations are sometimes very long pending before the preliminary terms are even proposed, or any basis is defined; treaties of commerce are entered into by all civilized countries, in order to obviate misunderstandings, and enable them to preserve an amicable intercourse; the transactions which daily pass in a great metropolis, like that of London, are of so multifarious a nature, and so infinitely numerous, that the bare contemplation of them fills the mind with astonishment. Negotiations are long or short; treaties are advantageous or the contrary; transactions are honorable or dishonorable.

I do not love to mingle speech with any about news or worldly negotiations in God's holy house.

HOWELL.

You have a great work in hand, for you write to me that you are upon a treaty of marriage.

HOWELL.

It is not to the purpose of this history to set down the particular transactions of this treaty.

CLARENDON.

NEIGHBORHOOD, VICINITY.

NEIGHBORHOOD, from nigh, signifies the place which is nigh, that is, nigh to one's habitation. VICINITY, from vicus, a village, signifies the place which does not exceed in distance the extent of a village.

Neighborhood, which is of Saxon origin, is employed in reference to the inhabitants, or in regard to inhabited places, to denote nearness of persons to each other or to objects in general: but vicinity, which in Latin bears the same acceptation as neighborhood, is employed in English to denote nearness of one object to another, whether person or thing; hence the propriety of saying, a populous neighborhood, a quiet neighborhood, a respectable neighborhood, a pleasant neighborhood, and to be in the neighborhood, either as it respects the people or the country; to live in the vicinity of a manufactory, to be in the vicinity of the metropolis or of the sea.

He feared the dangerous neighborhood of so powerful, aspiring, and fortunate a prince.

TEMPLE.

The Dutch, by the vicinity of their settlements to the coast of Caraccas, gradually engrossed the greatest part of the cocoa trade.

ROBERTSON.

NEW, NOVEL, MODERN, FRESH, RECENT.

NEW is in German neu, Latin novus, and Greek νεος; NOVEL is more immediately derived from the Latin novus; MODERN, in low Latin modernus, is probably changed from hodiernus, i. e., being of to-day; FRESH, in German frisch, probably from frieren, to freeze, because cold is the predominant idea in its application to the air; RECENT, in Latin recens, from re and candeo, to whiten, i. e., to brighten or make appear like new.

All these epithets are applied to what has not long existed; new expresses this idea simply without any qualification; novel is something strange or unexpected; the modern is the thing of to-day, as distinguished from that which existed in fore times; the fresh is that which is so new as not to be the worse for use, or that which has not been before used or employed; the recent is that which is so new as to appear as if it were just made or done. Agreeably to this distinction, new is most aptly applied to such things as may be permanent or durable, as new houses, new buildings, new clothes, and the like; in such cases it is properly opposed to the old; the term may, however, be applied generally to whatever arises or comes first into existence or notice, as new scenes, new sights, new sounds.

'Tis on some evening sunny, grateful, mild,
When sought but balm is beaming through the woods,

With yellow lustre bright, that the new tribes
Visit the spacious heav'ns.

THOMSON.

Novel may be applied to whatever is either never or but rarely seen; the freezing of the river Thames is a novelty; but the frost in every winter is something new when it first comes.

As the liturgy, so the ceremonies used and enjoined in the Church of England, were not the private and novel inventions of any late bishops, but they were of very ancient choice and primitive use in the Church of Christ.

GAUDEN.

Modern is applied to that which is new, or springs up in the day or age in which we live; as modern books, modern writers, modern science; a book is new which is just formed into a book and has not been used; it is modern at the time when it is first published; so likewise principles are new which have never been broached before; they are modern if they have been published lately, or within a given period: the modern is opposed to the ancient.

Some of the ancient, and likewise divers of the modern writers that have labored in natural magic, have noted a sympathy between the sun and certain herbs. BACON.

Do not all men complain how little we know, and how much is still unknown? : And can we ever know more unless something new be discovered? BURNET.

Fresh is said of that which may lose its color, vigor, or other perfection; as a fresh flower, the freshness of youth, etc.

Lo! great Aeneas rushes to the fight,
Sprung from a god, and more than mortal bold,
He fresh in youth, and I in arms grown old. DRYDEN.

So pleasures or passions are fresh which have not lost their power by satiety; they are new if they are but just sprung into activity.

That love which first was set will first decay,
Mine of a fresher date will longer stay. DAYDEN.
Seasons but change new pleasures to produce,
And elements contend to serve our use. JENYNS.

Recent is applied to those events or circumstances which have just happened, as a recent transaction, or an occurrence of recent date.

He was far from deficient in natural understanding: and, what strongly marks an ingenuous mind in a state of recent elevation, depressed by a consciousness of his own deficiencies. WHITAKER.

NEWS, TIDINGS.

NEWS implies anything new that is related or circulated; but TIDINGS, from tide, signifies that which flows in periodically like the tide. News is unexpected; it serves to gratify idle curiosity: tidings are expected; they serve to allay anxiety. In time of war the public are eager after news; and they who have relatives in the army are anxious to have tidings of them.

I wonder that in the present situation of affairs you can take pleasure in writing anything but news. SPECTATOR.

Too soon some demon to my father bore
The tidings that his heart with anguish tore. FALCONER.

NIGHTLY, NOCTURNAL.

NIGHTLY, immediately from the word night, and NOCTURNAL, from nox, night, signify belonging to the night, or the night season; the former is therefore more familiar than the latter: we speak of nightly depredations to express what passes every night, or nightly disturbances, nocturnal dreams, nocturnal visits.

Yet not alone, while thou
Visit'st my slumbers nightly, or when morn
Purples the east. MILTON.

Or save the sun his labor, and that swift
Nocturnal and diurnal rhomb suppos'd
Invisible else above all stars the wheel
Of day and night. MILTON.

NOBLE, GRAND.

NOBLE, in Latin nobilis, from nosco, to know, signifying knowable, or worth knowing, is a term of general import; it simply implies the quality by which a thing is distinguished for excellence above other things: the GRAND (v. Grandeur) is, properly speaking, one of those qualities by which an object acquires the name of noble; but there are many noble objects which are not denominated grand. A building may be denominated noble for its beauty as well as its size; but a grand building is rather so called for the expense which is displayed upon it in the style of building. A family may be either noble or grand; but it is noble by birth; it is grand by wealth, and an expensive style of living. Nobleness of acting or thinking comprehends all moral excellence that rises to a high pitch; but grandeur of mind is peculiarly applicable to such actions or traits as denote an elevation of character, rising above all that is common.

What then worlds
In a far thinner element sustain'd,
And acting the same part with greater skill,
More rapid movement, and for noblest ends. YOUNG.

More obvious ends to pass, are not these stars,
The seats majestic, proud imperial thrones,
On which angelic delegates of Heav'n
Discharge high trusts of vengeance or of love,
To clothe in outward grandeur grand designs? YOUNG.

NOISE, CRY, OUTCRY, CLAMOR.

NOISE is any loud sound; CRY, OUTCRY, and CLAMOR, are particular kinds of noises, differing either in the cause or the nature of the sounds. A noise proceeds either from animate or inanimate objects; the cry proceeds only from animate objects. The report of a cannon, or the loud sounds occasioned by a high wind, are noises, but not cries; cries issue from birds, beasts, and men. A noise is produced often by accident; a cry is always occasioned by some particular circumstance: when many horses and carriages are going together they make a great noise; hunger and pain cause cries to proceed both from animals and human beings. Noise, when compared with cry, is sometimes only an audible sound; the cry is a very loud noise: whatever disturbs silence, as the falling of a pin in a perfectly still assembly, is denominated a noise; but a cry is that which may often drown other noises, as the cries of people selling things about the streets.

Nor was his ear less peal'd
With noises loud and ruinous. MILTON.
From either host, the mingled shouts and cries
Of Trojans and Rutillians rend the skies.

DRYDEN.

A cry is in general a regular sound, but outcry and clamor are irregular sounds; the former may proceed from one or many, the latter from many in conjunction. A cry after a thief becomes an outcry when set up by many at a time; it becomes a clamor, if accompanied with shouting, bawling, and noises of a mixed and tumultuous nature.

And now great deeds
Had been achiev'd, whereof all hell had rung,
Had not the snaky sorceress, that sat
Fast by hell gate, and kept the fatal key,
Ris'n, and with hideous outcry rush'd between.

MILTON.

Their darts with clamor at a distance drive,
And only keep the languish'd war alive.

DRYDEN.

These terms may all be taken in an improper as well as a proper sense. Whatever is obtruded upon the public notice, so as to become the universal subject of conversation and writing, is said to make a noise; in this manner a new and good performer at the theatre makes a noise on his first appearance.

Socrates lived in Athens during the great plague, which has made so much noise through all ages, and never caught the infection.

ADDISON.

A noise may be either for or against; but a cry, outcry, and clamor, are always against the object, varying in the degree and manner in which they display themselves: cry implies less than outcry, and this is less than clamor. When the public voice is raised in an audible manner against any particular matter, it is a cry; if it be mingled with intemperate language, it is an outcry; if it be vehement and exceedingly noisy, it is a clamor: partisans raise a cry in order to form a body in their favor; the discontented are ever ready to set up an outcry against men in power; a clamor for peace in the time of war is easily raised by those who wish to thwart the government.

What noises have we had about transplantation of diseases and transfusion of blood! BAKER.
Amazement seizes all; the general cry
Proclaims Læocoon justly doom'd to die.

DRYDEN.

These outcries the magistrates there shun,
Since they are hearkened unto here. SPENSER.

The people grew then exorbitant in their clamors for justice. CLARENDON.

TO NOMINATE, NAME.

NOMINATE comes immediately from the Latin nominatus, participle of nominare; NAME comes from the Teutonic name, etc. (v. To name). To nominate and to name are both to mention by name: but the former is to mention for a specific purpose; the latter is to mention for general purpose: persons only are nominated; things as well as persons are named: one nominates a person in order to propose him, or appoint him, to an office; but one names a person casually, in the course of conversation, or one names him in order to make some inquiry respecting him. To be nominated is a public act; to be named is generally private: one is nominated before an assembly; one is named in any place: to be nominated is always an honor; to be named is either honorable, or the contrary, according to the circumstances under which it is mentioned: a person is nominated as member of Parliament; he is named whenever he is spoken of.

Elizabeth nominated her commissioners to hear both parties. ROBERTSON.

Then Calchas (by Ulysses first inspir'd)
Was urg'd to name whom th' angry gods requir'd.

DENHAM.

NOTED, NOTORIOUS.

NOTED (v. Distinguished) may be employed either in a good or a bad sense; NOTORIOUS is never used but in a bad sense: men may be noted for their talents or their eccentricities; they are notorious for their vices: noted characters excite many and divers remarks from their friends and their enemies; notorious characters are universally shunned.

An engineer of noted skill

GAY.

What principles of ordinary prudence can warrant a man to trust a notorious cheat? SOUTH.

TO NOTICE, REMARK, OBSERVE.

To NOTICE (v. To attend to) is either to take or to give notice: to REMARK, compounded of re and mark (v. Mark), signifies to reflect or bring back any mark to our own mind, or communicate the same to another; to mark is to mark a thing once, but to remark is to mark it again. OBSERVE (v. Looker-on) signifies either to keep a thing present before one's own view, or to communicate our view to another.

In the first sense of these words, as the action respects ourselves, to notice and remark require simple attention, to observe requires examination. To notice is a more cursory action than to remark: we may notice a thing by a single glance, or on merely turning one's head; but to remark supposes a reaction of the mind on an object; we notice a person passing at any time; but we remark that he goes past every day at the same hour: we notice that the sun sets this evening under a cloud, and we remark that it has done so for several evenings successively: we notice the state of a person's health or his manners in company; we remark his habits and peculiarities in domestic life. What is noticed and remarked strikes on the senses, and awakens the mind; what is observed is looked after and sought for: the former are often involuntary acts; we see, hear, and think because the objects obtrude themselves uncalled for; but the latter is intentional as well as voluntary; we see, hear, and think on that which we have watched. We remark things as matters of fact; we observe them in order to judge of, or draw conclusions from, them: we remark that the wind lies for a long time in a certain quarter; we observe that whenever it lies in a certain quarter it brings rain with it. People who have no particular curiosity may be sometimes attracted to notice the stars or planets, when they are particularly bright; those who look frequently will remark that the same star does not rise exactly in the same place for two successive nights; but the astronomer goes farther, and observes all the motions of the heavenly bodies, in order to discover the scheme of the universe.

The depravity of mankind is so easily discoverable, that nothing but the desert or cell can exclude it from notice. JOHNSON.

The glass that magnifies its object contracts the sight to a point, and the mind must be fixed upon a single character to remark its minute peculiarities. JOHNSON.

The course of time is so visibly marked, that it is observed even by the birds of passage. JOHNSON.

In the latter sense of these verbs, as respects the communications to others of what passes in our own minds, to notice is to make known our sentiments by various ways; to remark and observe are to make them known only by means of words: to notice is a personal act toward an individual, in which we direct our attention to him, as may happen either by a bow, a nod, a word, or even a look; but to remark and observe are said only of the thoughts which pass in our own minds, and are expressed to others: friends notice each other when they meet; they remark to others the impression which passing objects make upon their minds: the observations which intelligent people make are always entitled to notice from young persons.

As some do perceive, yes, and like it well, they should be so noticed. HOWARD.

He cannot distinguish difficult and noble speculations from trifling and vulgar remarks. COLLIER.

Wherever I have found her notes to be wholly another's, which is the case in some hundreds, I have barely quoted the true proprietor, without observing upon it. POPE.

TO NOURISH, NURTURE, CHERISH.

To NOURISH and NURTURE are but variations from the same verb nutrio, CHERISH, v. Foster. Things nourish, persons nurture and cherish: to nourish is to afford bodily strength, to supply the physical necessities of the body; to nurture is to extend one's care to the supply of all its physical necessities, to preserve life, occasion growth, and increase vigor: the breast of the mother nourishes; the fostering care and attention of the mother nurtures. To nurture is a physical act; to cherish is a mental as well as a physical act: a mother nurtures her infant while it is entirely dependent upon her; she cherishes her child in her bosom and protects it from every misfortune, or affords consolation in the midst of all its troubles, when it is no longer an infant.

Air, and ye elements, the eldest birth,
Of nature's womb, that in quaternion run
Perpetual circle, multiform; and mix
And nourish all things. MILTON.

They suppose mother earth to be a great animal, and to have nurtured up her young offspring with conscious tenderness. BENTLEY.

Of thy superfluous brood, she'll cherish kind
The alien offspring. SOMERVILLE.

NUMB, BENUMBED, TORPID.

NUMB and BENUMBED come from the Hebrew num, to sleep; the former denoting the quality, and the latter the state: there are but few things numb by nature; but there may be many things which may be benumbed. TORPID, in Latin torpidus, from torpeo, to languish, is most commonly employed to express the permanent state of being benumbed, as in the case of some animals, which lie in a torpid state all the winter; or, in the moral sense, to depict the benumbed state of the thinking faculty; in this manner we speak of the torpor of persons who are benumbed by any strong affection, or by any strong external action.

The night, with its silence and darkness, shows the winter in which all the powers of vegetation are benumbed. JOHNSON.

There must be a grand spectacle to rouse the imagination, grown torpid with the lazy enjoyment of sixty years' security. BURKE.

NUMERAL, NUMERICAL.

NUMERAL, or belonging to number, is applied to a class of words in grammar, as a numeral adjective or a numeral noun: NUMERICAL, or containing number, is applied to whatever other objects respect number; as a numerical difference, where the difference consists between any two numbers, or is expressed by numbers.

God has declared that he will, and therefore can, raise the same numerical body at the last day. SOUTH.

O.

OBEDIENT, SUBMISSIVE, OBSEQUIOUS.

OBEDIENT, v. Dutiful. SUBMISSIVE denotes the disposition to submit (v. To yield). OBSEQUIOUS, in Latin obsequius, from obsequor, or the intensive ob and sequor, to follow, signifies following diligently, or with intensity of mind.

One is obedient to command, submissive to power or the will, obsequious to persons. Obedience is always taken in a good sense; one ought always to be obedient where obedience is due: submission is relatively good; it may, however, be indifferent or bad: one may be submissive from interested motives, or meanness of spirit, which is a base kind of submission; but to be submissive for conscience' sake is the bounden duty of a Christian: obsequiousness is never good; it is an excessive concern about the will of another which has always interest for its end. Obedience is a course of conduct conformable either to some specific rule, or the express will of another; submission is often a personal act, immediately directed to the individual. We show our obedience to the law by avoiding the breach of it; we show our obedience to the will of God, or of our parent, by making that will the rule of our life: on the other hand, we show submission to the person of the magistrate; we adopt a submissive deportment by a downcast look and a bent body. Obedience is founded upon principle, and cannot be feigned; submission is a partial bending to another, which is easily affected in our outward behavior: the understanding and the heart produce obedience; but force, or the necessity of circumstances, give rise to submission.

The obedientes of men is to imitate the obedientes of angels, and rational beings on earth are to live unto God as rational beings in heaven live unto him. LAW.

Her at his feet, submissive in distress,
He thus with peaceful words uprais'd. MILTON.

Obedience and submission suppose a restraint on one's own will, in order to bring it into accordance with that of another; but obsequiousness is the consulting the will or pleasure of another: we are obedient from a sense of right; we are submissive from a sense of necessity;

we are obsequious from a desire of gaining favor: a love of God is followed by obedience to his will; they are coincident sentiments that reciprocally act on each other, so as to serve the cause of virtue: a submissive conduct is at the worst an involuntary sacrifice of our independence to our fears or necessities, the evil of which is confined principally to the individual who makes the sacrifice; obsequiousness is a voluntary sacrifice of ourselves to others for interested purposes.

What gen'rous Greek, obedient to thy word,
Shall form an ambush, or shall lift the sword?
POPE.

In all submission and humility
York doth present himself unto your highness.
SHAKESPEARE.

Adore not so the rising son that you forget the father who raised you to this height, nor be you so obsequious to the father, that you give just cause to the son to suspect that you neglect him.
BACON.

OBJECT, SUBJECT.

OBJECT, in Latin objectus, participle of objicio, to lie in the way, signifies the thing that lies in one's way. SUBJECT, in Latin subjectus, participle of subjicio, to lie under, signifies the thing forming the groundwork.

The object puts itself forward; the subject is in the background: we notice the object; we observe or reflect on the subject: objects are sensible; the subject is altogether intellectual: the eye, the ear, and all the senses, are occupied with the surrounding objects; the memory, the judgment, and the imagination, are supplied with subjects suitable to the nature of the operations.

Disshonor not your eyes
By throwing it on any other object.
SHAKESPEARE.
This subject for heroic song pleases me.
MILTON.

When object is taken for that which is intellectual, it retains a similar signification; it is the thing that presents itself to the mind; it is seen by the mind's eye: the subject, on the contrary, is that which must be sought for, and when found it engages the mental powers: hence we say an object of consideration, an object of delight, an object of concern; a subject of reflection, a subject of mature deliberation, the subject of a poem, the subject of grief, of lamentation, and the like. When the mind becomes distracted by too great a multiplicity of objects, it can fix itself on no one individual object with sufficient steadiness to take a survey of it; in like manner, if a child have too many objects set before it, for the exercise of its powers, it will acquire a familiarity with none: such things are not fit subjects of discussion.

He whose sublime pursuit is God and truth,
Burns, like some absent and impatient youth,
To join the object of his warm desires. JENNYS.

The hymns and odes (of the inspired writers) excel those delivered down to us by the Greeks and Romans, in the poetry as much as in the subject. ADDISON.

TO OBJECT, OPPOSE.

To OBJECT (v. Object) is to cast in the way, to OPPOSE is to place in the way; there is, therefore, very little original difference, except that casting is a more momentary and sudden proceeding, placing is a more premeditated action; which distinction, at the same time, corresponds with the use of the terms in ordinary life: to object to a thing is to propose or start something against it; but to oppose it is to set one's self up steadily against it: one objects to ordinary matters that require no reflection; one opposes matters that call for deliberation, and afford serious reasons for and against: a parent objects to his child's learning the classics, or to his running about the streets; he opposes his marriage when he thinks the connection or the circumstances not desirable.

About this time, an Archbishop of York objected to clerks (recommended to benefices by the Pope), because they were ignorant of English. TIRWHITT.

'Twas of no purpose to oppose,
She'd hear to no excuse in prose. SWIFT.

OBJECTION, DIFFICULTY, EXCEPTION.

OBJECTION (v. Demur) is here a general term; it comprehends both the DIFFICULTY and the EXCEPTION, which are but species of the objection: an objection and a difficulty are started; an exception is made: the objection to a thing is in general that which renders it less desirable; but the difficulty is that which renders it less practicable; there is an objection against every scheme which incurs a serious risk: the want of means to begin, or resources to carry on a scheme, are serious difficulties.

I would not desire what you have written to be omitted, unless I had the merit of removing your objection. POPE.

Such passages will then have no more difficulty in them than the other frequent predictions of divine vengeance in the writings of the prophets. HOMER.

Objection and exception both respect the nature, the moral tendency, or moral consequences of a thing; but an objection may be frivolous or serious; an exception is something serious: the objection is positive; the exception is relatively considered; that is, the thing excepted from other things, as not good, and consequently objected to. Objections are made sometimes to proposals for the mere sake of getting rid of an engagement: those who do not wish to give themselves trouble find an easy method of disengaging themselves, by making objections to every proposition. We take exception at the conduct of others, when we think it not sufficiently respectful.

All these objections were overruled, so that I was obliged to comply. GOLDSMITH.

I am sorry you persist to take ill my not accepting your invitation, and to find your exception not unmix'd with some suspicion. POPE.

OBLONG, OVAL.

OBLONG, in Latin oblongus, from the intensive syllable ob, signifies very long, longer than it is broad. OVAL, from the Latin ovum, an egg, signifies egg-shaped. The oval is a species of the oblong: what is oval is oblong; but what is oblong is not always oval. Oblong is peculiarly applied to figures formed by right lines; that is, all rectangular parallelograms, except squares, are oblong; but the oval is applied to curvilinear oblong figures, as ellipses, which are distinguished from the circle: tables are oftener oblong than oval; garden beds are as frequently oval as they are oblong.

OBNOXIOUS, OFFENSIVE.

OBNOXIOUS, from ob and noxious, signifies either being in the way of what is noxious, or being very noxious or hateful. OFFENSIVE signifies simply apt to give offence or displeasure. The obnoxious conveys more than the offensive, implying to receive as well as to give offence; a man may be obnoxious to evils as well as obnoxious to persons.

In ships of various rates they sail,
Of ensigns various; all alike in this:
All restless, anxious, toss'd with hopes and fears,
In calmest skies; obnoxious all to storms.

YOUNG.

In the sense of giving offence, obnoxious implies as much as hateful, offensive little more than displeasing: a man is obnoxious to a party, whose interests or principles he is opposed to; he may be offensive to an individual merely on account of his manners or any particular actions. Men are obnoxious only to their fellow-creatures, but they may be offensive though not obnoxious to their Maker.

I must have leave to be grateful to any one who serves me, let him be ever so obnoxious to any party. POPE.

Since no man can do ill with a good conscience, the consolation which we therein seem to find is but a mere deceitful pleasure of ourselves in error, which must needs turn to our greater grief, if that which we do to please God must be for the manifold defects therein offensive unto him. BEVERIDGE.

Persons only are obnoxious to others, things as well as persons are offensive; dust is offensive to the eye; sounds are offensive to the ear; advice, or even one's own thoughts, may be offensive to the mind.

The understanding is often drawn by the will and the affections from fixing its contemplation on an offensive truth. SOUTH.

OBSERVATION, OBSERVANCE.

THESE terms derive their use from the different significations of the verb: OBSERVATION is the act of observing objects with the view to examine them (v. To notice); OBSERVANCE is the act of observing in the sense of keeping or holding sacred (v. To keep). From a minute observation of the human body, anatomists have discovered the circulation of the blood, and the source of all the humors; by a strict observance of truth and justice, a man acquires the title of an upright man.

The pride which, under the check of public observation, would have been only vented among domestics, becomes, in a country baronet, the torment of a province. JOHNSON.

You must not fall to behave yourself toward my Lady Clare, your grandmother, with all duty and observance. EARL STAFFORD.

TO OBSERVE, WATCH.

OBSERVE, v. To notice. WATCH, v. To guard.

These terms agree in expressing the act of looking at an object; but to observe is not to look after so strictly as is implied by to watch; a general observes the motions of an enemy when they are in no particular state of activity; he watches the motions of an enemy when they are in a state of commotion; we observe a thing in order to draw an inference from it; we watch anything in order to discover what may happen: we observe with coolness; we watch with eagerness: we observe carefully; we watch narrowly: the conduct of mankind in general is observed; the conduct of suspicious individuals is watched.

Nor must the ploughman less observe the skies.
DRYDEN.

For thou know'st
 What hath been warn'd us, what malicious foe
Witches, no doubt, with greedy hope to find,
 His wish and best advantage, us assunder.
MILTON.

OBSTINATE, CONTUMACIOUS, STUBBORN, HEADSTRONG, HEADY.

OBSTINATE, in Latin obstinatus, participle of obstinere, from ob and stinere, sto or sisto, signifies standing in the way of another. CONTUMACIOUS, v. Contumacy. STUBBORN, or stout-born, signifies stiff or immovable by nature. HEADSTRONG signifies strong in the head or the mind; and HEADY, full of one's own head.

Obstinacy is a habit of the mind; contumacy is either a particular state of feeling or a mode of action; obstinacy consists in an attachment to one's own mode of acting; contumacy consists in a swelling contempt of others: the obstinate man adheres tenaciously to his own ways, and opposes reason to reason; the contumacious man disputes the right of another to control his actions, and opposes force to force. Obstinacy interferes with a man's private conduct, and makes him blind to right reason; contumacy is a crime against lawful authority; the contumacious man sets himself against his superiors: when young people are obstinate they are bad subjects of education; when grown people are contumacious they are troublesome subjects to the king.

But man we find the only creature,
 Who, led by folly, combats nature;
 Who, when she loudly cries forbear,
 With obstinacy fixes there.
SWIFT.

When an offender is cited to appear in any ecclesiastical court, and he neglects to do it, he is pronounced contumacious.
BEVERIDGE.

The stubborn and the headstrong are species of the obstinate: the former lies altogether in the perversion of the will; the latter in the perversion of the judgment: the stubborn person wills what he wills; the headstrong person thinks what he thinks. Stubbornness is mostly inherent in a person's nature; a headstrong temper is commonly associated with violence and impetuosity of character. Obstinacy discovers itself in persons of all ages and stations; a stubborn and headstrong disposition betrays itself mostly in those who are bound to conform to the will of another. Heady may be said of any who are full of conceit and bent upon following it.

From whence he brought them to these salvage parts,
 And with science mollified their stubborn hearts.
SPENSER.

We, blindly by our headstrong passions led,
 Are hot for action.
DRYDEN.
Heady confidence promises victory without contest.
JOHNSON.

OCCASION, OPPORTUNITY.

OCCASION, in Latin occasio, from ob and cadere, signifies that which falls in the way so as to produce some change. OPPORTUNITY, in Latin opportunitas, from opportunus, fit, signifies the thing that happens fit for the purpose.

These terms are applied to the events of life; but the occasion is that which determines our conduct, and leaves us no choice; it amounts to a degree of necessity: the opportunity is that which invites to action; it tempts us to embrace the moment for taking the step. We do things, therefore, as the occasion requires, or as the opportunity offers. There are many occasions on which a man is called upon to uphold his opinions. There are but few opportunities for men in general to distinguish themselves.

Waller preserved and won his life from those who were most resolved to take it, and in an occasion in which he ought to have been ambitious to have lost it (to lose it).
CLARENDON.

Every man is obliged by the Supreme Maker of the universe to improve all the opportunities of good which are afforded him. JOHNSON.

OCCASION, NECESSITY.

OCCASION (v. Occasion) includes, NECESSITY (v. Necessity) excludes, the idea of choice or alternative. We are regulated by the occasion, and can exercise our own discretion; we yield or submit to the necessity, without even the exercise of the will. On the death of a relative we have occasion to go into mourning, if we will not offer an affront to the family; but there is no express necessity: in case of an attack on our persons, there is a necessity of self-defence for the preservation of life.

God hath put us into an imperfect state, where we have perpetual occasion of each other's assistance. SWIFT.

Where necessity ends curiosity begins. JOHNSON.

OCCASIONAL, CASUAL.

THESE are both opposed to what is fixed or stated; but OCCASIONAL carries with it more the idea of infrequency, and CASUAL that of unfixtiness, or the absence of all design. A minister is termed an occasional preacher who preaches only on certain occasions; his preaching at a particular place or a certain day may be casual. Our acts of charity may be occasional; but they ought not to be casual.

The beneficence of the Roman emperors and consuls was merely occasional. JOHNSON.

What wonder if so near Looks intervene, and smiles, or objects new, Casual discourse draws on. MILTON.

OCCUPANCY, OCCUPATION,

ARE words which derive their meaning from the different acceptations of the primitive verb occupy: the former being used to express the state of holding or possessing any object; the latter to express the act of taking possession of, or the state of being in possession. He who has the occupancy of land enjoys the fruits of it: the occupation of a country by force of arms is of little avail, unless one has an adequate force to maintain one's ground. Both words are employed in regard to houses and lands, but when the term occupation is taken in the sense of a business, it is sufficiently distinguished to need no illustration.

As occupancy gave the right to the temporary use of the soil; so it is agreed on all hands, that occupancy gave also the original right to the permanent property in the substance of the earth itself. BLACKSTONE.

Of late years a great compass hath yielded but small profit, and this only through idle and negligent occupation of such as manured and had the same in occupying. HOLINGSHED.

ODD, UNEVEN.

ODD, in Swedish udde, connected with the Dutch oed, and German oede, empty, deserted, signifying something wanted to match, seems to be a mode of the UNEVEN; both are opposed to the even, but odd is only said of that which has no fellow; the uneven is said of that which does not square or come to an even point: of numbers we say that they are either odd or uneven; but of gloves, shoes, and everything which is made to correspond, we say that they are odd, when they are single; but that they are uneven when they are both different: in like manner a plank is uneven which has an unequal surface, or disproportionate dimensions; but a piece of wood is odd which will not match nor suit with any other piece.

This is the third time: I hope good-luck lies in odd numbers. SHAKESPEARE.

These high hills, and rough, uneven ways, Draw out our miles, and make them wearisome. SHAKESPEARE.

ECONOMICAL, SAVING, SPARING, THRIFTY, PENURIOUS, NIGGARDLY.

THE idea of not spending is common to all these terms: but ECONOMICAL (v. Economy) signifies not spending unnecessarily or unwisely. SAVING is keeping and laying by with care; SPARING is keeping out of that which ought to be spent; THRIFTY or THRIVING is accumulating by means of saving; PENURIOUS is suffering as from penury by means of saving; NIGGARDLY, after the manner of a niggard, nigh or close person, is not spending or letting go, but in the smallest possible quantities. To be economical is a virtue in those who have but narrow means; all the other epithets, however, are employed in a sense more or less unfavorable; he who is saving when young will be avaricious when old; he who is sparing will generally be sparing out of the comforts of others; he who is thrifty commonly adds the desire of getting with that of saving; he who is penurious wants nothing to make him a complete miser; he who is niggardly in his dealings will be mostly avaricious in his character.

I cannot fancy that a shopkeeper's wife in Cheapside has a greater tenderness for the fortune of her husband than a citizen's wife in Paris, or that Miss in a boarding-school is more an economist in dress than Mademoiselle in a nunnery. GOLDSMITH.

I may say of fame as Falstaff did of honor, "If it comes it comes unlook'd for, and there is an end on't." I am content with a bare saving game. FORD.

Youth is not rich, in time it may be poor, Part with it, as with money, sparing. YOUNG.

Nothing is penuriously imparted, of which a more liberal distribution would increase real felicity. JOHNSON.

Who by resolves and vows engag'd does stand, For days that yet belong to fate, Does, like an unthrift, mortgage his estate Before it falls into his hands. COWLEY.

No niggard nature; men are prodigals. YOUNG.

ECONOMY, FRUGALITY, PARSIMONY.

ECONOMY, from the Greek oikonomia, implies management. FRUGALITY, from the Latin fruges, fruits, implies temperance. PARSIMONY (v. Avaricious) implies simply forbearing to spend, which is in fact the common idea included in these terms; but the economical man spares expense according to circumstances; he adapts his expenditure to his means, and renders it by contrivance as effectual to his purpose as possible: the frugal man spares expense on himself or on his indulgences; he may, however, be liberal to others while he is frugal toward himself: the parsimonious man saves from himself as well as others; he has no other object than saving. By economy, a man may make a limited income turn to the best account for himself and his family; by frugality he may with a limited income be enabled to lay by money; by parsimony he may be enabled to accumulate great sums out of a narrow income: hence it is that we recommend a plan for being economical; we recommend a diet for being frugal; we condemn a habit or a character for being parsimonious.

Your economy, I suppose, begins now to be settled; your expenses are adjusted to your revenue. JOHNSON.

I accept of your invitation to supper, but I must make this agreement beforehand, that you dismiss me soon, and treat me frugally. MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF PLINY.

War and economy are things not easily reconciled, and the attempt or leaning toward parsimony in such a state may be the worst economy in the world. BURKE.

ECONOMY, MANAGEMENT.

ECONOMY (v. Economy) has a more comprehensive meaning than MANAGEMENT; for it includes the system of science and of legislation as well as that of domestic arrangements: as the economy of agriculture; the internal economy of a government; political, civil, or religious economy; or the economy of one's household. Management, on the contrary, is an action that is very seldom abstracted from its agent, and is always taken in a partial sense, namely, as a part of economy. The internal economy of a family depends principally on the prudent management of the female: the economy of every well-regulated community requires that all the members should keep their station, and preserve a strict subordination; the management of particular branches of this economy should belong to particular individuals.

Oh spare this waste of being half divine, And vindicate th' economy of Heav'n. YOUNG.

What incident can show more management and address in the poet (Milton), than this of Samson's refusing the summons of the idolaters, and obeying the visitation of God's spirit? CUMBERLAND.

OFFENCE, TRESPASS, TRANSGRESSION, MISDEMEANOR, MISDEED, AFFRONT.

OFFENCE is here the general term, signifying merely the act that offends (v. To displease), or runs counter to something else.

Offence is properly indefinite; it merely implies an object without the least signification of the nature of the object; TRESPASS and TRANSGRESSION have a positive reference to an object *trespas*ed upon or *transgress*ed; *trespas*s is contracted from trans and pass, that is, a passing beyond; and transgress, from trans and gressus, a going beyond. The offence, therefore, which constitutes a *trespas*s arises out of the laws of property; a passing over or treading upon the property of another is a trespass: the offence which constitutes a transgression flows out of the laws of society in general, which fix the boundaries of right and wrong: whoever, therefore, goes beyond or breaks through these bounds is guilty of a transgression. The trespass is a species of offence which peculiarly applies to the land or premises of individuals; transgression is a species of moral as well as political evil. Hunters are apt to commit trespasses in the eagerness of their pursuit; the passions of men are perpetually misleading them and causing them to commit various transgressions; the term trespass is sometimes employed improperly as respects time and other objects; transgression is always used in one uniform sense as respects rule and law; we trespass upon the time or patience of another; we transgress the moral or civil law.

Slight provocations and frivolous offences are the most frequent causes of disquiet. BLAIR.

Forgive the barbarous trespass of my tongue. OTWAY.

To whom with stern regard thus Gabriel spake:
Why hast thou, Satan, broke the bounds prescribed?
To thy transgressions! MILTON.

An offence is either public or private; a MISDEMEANOR is properly a private offence, although improperly applied for an offence against public law (v. Crime); for it signifies a wrong demeanor or an offence in one's demeanor against propriety; a MISDEED is always private, it signifies a wrong deed, or a deed which offends against one's duty. Riotous and disorderly behavior in company are serious misdeemeanors; every act of drunkenness, lying, fraud, or immorality of every kind, are misdeeds.

Smaller faults in violation of a public law are comprised under the name of misdeemeanor. BLACKSTONE.

Fierce famine is your lot, for this misdeed,
Reduc'd to grind the plates on which you feed. DRYDEN.

An offence is that which affects persons or principles, communities or individuals, and is committed either directly or indirectly against the person; an AFFRONT is altogether personal, and is directly brought to bear against the front of some particular person; it is an offence against another to speak disrespectfully of him in his absence; it is an affront to push past him with violence and rudeness. In this sense, whatever offence is committed against our Maker in our direct communications with him by prayer or worship, is properly an affront; and whatever offends him indirectly, may also be denominated an affront, as far as his will is opposed and his laws violated.

God may some time or other think it the concern of his justice and providence too to revenge the affronts put upon the laws of man. SOUTH.

OFFENDER, DELINQUENT.

THE OFFENDER (v. To displease) is he who offends in anything, either by commission or omission; the DELINQUENT, from delinquo, to fail, signifies properly he who fails by omission, but it is extended to signify failing by the violation of a law. Those who go into a wrong place are offenders; those who stay away when they ought to go are delinquents: there are many offenders against the Sabbath who commit violent and open breaches of decorum; there are still more delinquents who never attend a public place of worship.

When any offender is presented into any of the ecclesiastical courts he is cited to appear there.

BEVENSIDER.

But on those judges lies a heavy curse,
That measure crimes by the delinquent's purse. BROWNE.

OFFENDING, OFFENSIVE.

OFFENDING signifies either actually offending or calculated to offend (v. To displease); OFFENSIVE signifies calculated to offend at all times; a person may be offending in his manners to a particular individual, or use an offending expression on a particular occasion without any imputation on his character; but if his manners are offensive, it reflects both on his temper and education.

And tho' th' offending part felt mortal pain,
Th' immortal part its knowledge did retain.

DENNAM.

Gentleness corrects whatever is offences in our manners. BLAIR.

TO OFFER, BID, TENDER, PROPOSE.

OFFER (v. To give) is employed for that which is literally transferable, or for that which is indirectly communicable: BID (v. To ask) and TENDER, like the word tend, from tendo, to stretch, signifying to stretch forth by way of offering, belong to offer in the first sense. PROPOSE, in Latin proponi, perfect of propono, to place or set before, likewise characterizes a mode of offering, and belongs to offer in the latter sense. To offer is a voluntary and discretionary act; an offer may be accepted or rejected at pleasure; to bid and tender are specific modes of offering which depend on circumstances: one bids with the hope of its being accepted; one tenders from a prudential motive, and in order to serve specific purposes. We offer money to a poor person, it is an act of charity or good-nature; we bid a price for the purchase of a house, it is a commercial dealing subject to the rules of commerce; we tender a sum of money by way of payment, it is a matter of discretion in order to fulfil an obligation. By the same rule one offers a person the use of one's horse; one bids a sum at an auction; one tenders one's services to the government.

Nor, shouldst thou offer all thy little store,
Will rich Iolas yield, but offer more. DRYDEN.

To give interest a share in friendship, is to sell it by inch of candle; he that bids most shall have it, and when it is mercenary, there is no depending on it. COLLIER.

Aulus Gellius tells a story of one Lucius Nerattus, who made it his diversion to give a blow to whomsoever he pleased, and then tender them the legal forfeiture. BLACKSTONE.

To offer and propose are both employed in matters of practice or speculation; but the former is a less definite and decisive act than the latter; we offer an opinion by way of promoting a discussion; we propose a plan for the deliberation of others. Sentiments which differ widely from the major part of those present ought to be offered with modesty and caution; we should not propose to another what we should be unwilling to do ourselves. We commonly offer by way of obliging; we commonly propose by way of arranging or accommodating. It is an act of puerility to offer to do more than one is enabled to perform; it does not evince a sincere disposition for peace to propose such terms as we know cannot be accepted.

Our author offers no reasons.

LOCKE.

We propose measures for securing to the young the possession of pleasure (by connecting with it religion). BLAIR.

OFFERING, OBLATION.

OFFERING, from offer, and OBLATION, from oblatio and oblatus, or ofatus, come both from offero (v. To offer): the former is, however, a term of much more general and familiar use than the latter. Offerings are both moral and religious; oblation is religious only; the money which is put into the sacramental plate is an offering; the consecrated bread and wine at the sacrament is an oblation. The offering in a religious sense is whatever one offers as a gift by way of reverence to a superior; the oblation is the offering which is accompanied with some particular ceremony. The wise men made an offering to our Saviour, but not properly an oblation; the Jewish sacrifices, as in general all religious sacrifices, were in the proper sense oblations.

The winds to heav'n the curling vapors bore,
Ungrateful off'ring to th' immortal pow'rs,
Whose wrath hung heavy o'er the Trojan tow'rs. POPE.

Ye mighty princes, your oblations bring,
And pay due honors to your awful king. PITT.

OFFICE, PLACE, CHARGE, FUNCTION.

OFFICE, in Latin officium, from officio or officio, signifies either the duty performed or the situation in which the duty is performed. PLACE comprehends no idea of duty, for there may be sinecure places which are only nominal offices, and designate merely a relationship with the government: every office, therefore, of a public nature is in reality a place, yet every place is not an office. The place of secretary of state is likewise an office, but that of ranger of a park is a place only, and not always an office. An office is held; a place is filled: the office is given or intrusted to a person; the place is granted or conferred: the office reposes a confidence, and imposes a responsibility; the place gives credit and influence: the office is bestowed on a man from his qualification; the place is granted to him by favor or as a reward for past services; the office is more or less honorable; the place is more or less profitable.

You have contriv'd to take
From Rome all season'd office, and to wind
Yourself into a power tyrannical. SHAKESPEARE.

When rogues like these (a sparrow cries)
To honors and employments rise,
I court no favor, ask no place.

GAY.

In an extended application of the terms office and place, the latter has a much lower signification than that of the former, since the office is always connected with the State, or is something responsible; but the place may be a place for menial labor: the offices are multiplied in time of war; the places for domestic service are more numerous in a state of peace and prosperity. The office is frequently taken not with any reference to the place occupied, but simply to the thing done; this brings it nearer in signification to the term CHARGE (v. Care). An office imposes a task, or some performance: a charge imposes a responsibility; we have always something to do in an office, always something to look after in a charge; the office is either public or private, the charge is always of a private and personal nature: a person performs the office of a magistrate, or of a minister; he undertakes the charge of instructing youth, or of being a guardian, or of conveying a person's property from one place to another.

'Tis all men's office to speak patience
To those that wring under the load of sorrow.

SHAKESPEARE.

Denham was made governor of Farnham Castle for the king, but he soon resigned that charge and retreated to Oxford.

JOHNSON.

The office is that which is assigned by another; FUNCTION is properly the act of discharging or completing an office or business, from fungor, viz., finem and ago, to put an end to or bring to a conclusion; it is extended in its acceptation to the office itself or the thing done. The office, therefore, in its strict sense is performed only by conscious or intelligent agents, who act according to their instructions; the function, on the other hand, is an operation either of unconscious or of conscious agents acting according to a given rule. The office of a herald is to proclaim public events or to communicate circumstances from one public body to another: a minister performs his functions, or the body performs its functions.

The ministry is not now bound to any one tribe, now none is excluded from that function, of any degree, state, or calling.

WARROUR.

The word office is sometimes employed in the same application by the personification of nature, which assigns an office to the ear, to the tongue, to the eye, and the like. In this case the word office is applied to what is occasional or partial; function to that which is habitual and essential. When the frame becomes overpowered by a sudden shock, the tongue will frequently refuse to perform its office; when the animal functions are impeded for a length of time, the vital power ceases to exist.

Nature within me seems,
In all her functions, weary of herself. MILTON.

The two offices of memory are collection and distribution.

JOHNSON.

OFFSPRING, PROGENY, ISSUE.

OFFSPRING is that which springs off or from; PROGENY that which is brought forth or out of; ISSUE that which issues or proceeds from; and all in relation to the family or generation of the human species. Offspring is a familiar term applicable to one or many children; progeny is employed only as a collective noun for a number; issue is used in an indefinite manner without particular regard to number. When we speak of the children themselves we denominate them the offspring; when we speak of the parents, we denominate the children their progeny. A child is said to be the only offspring of his parents, or he is said to be the offspring of low parents; a man is said to have a numerous or a healthy progeny, or to leave his progeny in circumstances of honor and prosperity. The issue is said only in regard to a man that is deceased: he dies with male or female issue, with or without issue; his property descends to his male issue in a direct line.

The same cause that has drawn the haired of God and man upon the father of liars may justly entail it upon his offspring too.

SOUTH.

The base, degenerate iron offspring ends,
A golden progeny from Heav'n descends.

DEYDEN.

Next him King Leyr, in happy place long reigned,
But had no issue male him to succeed.

SPENCER.

OFTEN, FREQUENTLY.

OFTEN, or its contracted form oft, is in all probability connected with the Greek αἰ, again, and signifies properly repetition of action. FREQUENTLY, from frequent, crowded or numerous, respects a plurality or number of objects.

An ignorant man often uses a word without knowing what it means; ignorant people frequently mistake the meaning of the words they hear. A person goes out very often in the course of a week; he has frequently six or seven persons to visit him in the course of that time. By doing a thing often it becomes habitual: we frequently meet the same persons in the route which we often take.

*Often from the careless back
Of herds and flocks a thousand tugging bills
Pluck hair and wool.* THOMSON.

*Here frequent at the visionary hour,
When musing midnight reigns or silent noon,
Angelic harps are in full concert heard.* THOMSON.

OLD, ANCIENT, ANTIQUE, ANTIQUATED, OLD-FASHIONED, OBSOLETE.

OLD, in German alt, low German old, etc., is connected with the Greek εἰς, of yesterday. ANCIENT, in French ancien, and ANTIQUE, ANTIQUATED, all come from the Latin antiquus, and antea, before, signifying in general before our time. OLD-FASHIONED signifies after an old fashion. OBSOLETE, in Latin obsoletus, participle of obsoleo, signifies literally out of use.

Old respects what has long existed and still exists; ancient what existed at a distant period, but does not necessarily exist at present; antique, that which has been long ancient, and of which there remain but faint traces: antiquated, old-fashioned, and obsolete that which has ceased to be any longer used or esteemed. A fashion is old when it has been long in use; a custom is ancient when its use has long been passed; a bust or statue is antique when the model of it only remains; a person is antiquated whose appearance is grown out of date; manners which are gone quite out of fashion are old-fashioned; a word or custom is obsolete which is grown out of use.

The old is opposed to the new; some things are the worse for being old, other things are the better. Ancient and antique are opposed to modern: all things are valued the more for being ancient or antique; hence we esteem the writings of the ancients above those of the moderns. The antiquated is opposed to the customary and established; it is that which we cannot like, because we cannot esteem it: the old-fashioned is opposed to the fashionable: there is much in the old-fashioned to like and esteem; there is much that is ridiculous in the fashionable: the obsolete is opposed to the current; the obsolete may be good; the current may be vulgar and mean.

The Venetians are tenacious of old laws and customs to their great prejudice. ADDISON.
But sev'n wise men the ancient world did know.
We scarce know sev'n who think themselves not so. DENHAM.

Under an oak whose antique root peeps out
Under the brook that brawls along this wood,
A poor sequester'd stag,
That from the hunters' aim had ta'en a hurt,
Did come to languish. SHAKESPEARE.

The swords in the arsenal of Venice are old-fashioned and unwieldy. ADDISON.

Whoever thinks it necessary to regulate his conversation by antiquated rules, will be rather despised for his futility, than caressed for his politeness. JOHNSON.

Obsolete words may be laudably revised when they are more sounding or more significant than those in practice. DRYDEN.

OMEN, PROGNOSTIC, PRESAGE.

ALL these terms express some token or sign of what is to come. OMEN, in Latin omen, probably comes from the Greek οἶμα, to think, because it is what gives rise to much conjecture. PROGNOSTIC, in Greek προγνωστικον, from προγινωσκω, to know before, signifies the sign by which one judges a thing beforehand, because a prognostic is rather a deduction by the use of the understanding. PRESAGE, v. Augur.

The omen and prognostic are both drawn from external objects; the presage is drawn from one's own feelings. The omen is drawn from objects that have no necessary connection with the thing they are made to represent; it is the fruit of the imagination, and rests on superstition: the prognostic, on the contrary, is a sign which partakes in some degree of the quality of the thing denoted. Omens were drawn by the heathens from the flight of birds, or the entrails of beasts—"Aves dant omina dira," TIBULLUS—and often from different incidents; thus Ulysses, when landed on his native island, prayed to Jupiter that he would give him a double sign, by which he might know that he should be permitted to slay the suitors of his wife; and when he heard the thunder, and saw a maiden supplicating the gods in the temple, he took these for omens that he should immediately proceed to put in execution his design. Prognostics are discovered only by an acquaintance with the objects in which they exist, as the prognostics of a mortal disease are known to none so well as the physician; the prognostics of a storm or tempest are best known to the mariner.

A signal omen stopp'd the passing host. POPE.
Though your prognostics run too fast,
They must be verified at last. SWIFT.

In an extended sense, the word omen is also applied to objects which serve as a sign, so as to enable a person to draw a rational inference, which brings it nearer in sense to the prognostic and presage; but the omen may be said of that which is either good or bad; the prognostic and presage, when it expresses a sentiment, mostly of that which is unfavorable. It is an omen of our success, if we find those of whom we have to ask a favor in a good-humor; the spirit of discontent which pervades the countenances and discourse of a people is a prognostic of some popular commotion. The imagination is often filled with strange presages.

Hammond would steal from his fellows into places of privacy, there to say his prayers; omens of his future pacific temper and eminent devotion. FELL.

Careful observers
By sure prognostics may foretell a shower. SWIFT.

I know but one way of fortifying my soul against these gloomy presages, that is, by securing to myself the protection of that Being who disposes of events. ADDISON.

When presage is taken for the outward sign, it is understood favorably, or in an indifferent sense.

Our's joy fill'd, and shout
Presage of victory. MILTON.

ONE, SINGLE, ONLY.

UNITY is the common idea of all these terms; and at the same time the whole signification of ONE, which is opposed to none; SINGLE, in Latin singulus, each or one by itself, probably contracted from sine angulo, without an angle, because what is entirely by itself cannot form an angle, signifies that one which is abstracted from others, and is particularly opposed to two, or a double which may form a pair; ONLY, contracted from only, signifying in the form of unity, is employed for that of which there is no more. A person has one child, is a positive expression that bespeaks its own meaning: a person has a single child conveys the idea that there ought to be or might be more, that more was expected, or that once there were more: a person has an only child implies that he never had more.

For shame, Rutilliana, can you bear the sight,
Of one exposed for all, in single fight? DRYDEN.

Homely but wholesome roots
My daily food, and water from the nearest spring
My only drink. FLETCHER.

ONWARD, FORWARD, PROGRESSIVE.

ONWARD is taken in the literal sense of going nearer to an object: FORWARD is taken in the sense of going from an object, or going farther in the line before one: PROGRESSIVE has the sense of going gradually, or step by step, before one. A person goes onward who does not stand still; he goes forward who does not recede; he goes progressively who goes forward at certain intervals. Onward is taken only in the proper acceptance of travelling; the traveller who has lost his way feels it necessary to go onward with the hope of arriving at some point; forward is employed in the improper as well as the proper application; a traveller goes forward in order to reach his point of destination as quickly as possible; a learner uses his utmost endeavors in order to get forward in his learning: progressively is employed only in the improper application to what requires time and labor in order to bring it to a conclusion; every man goes on progressively in his art, until he arrives at the point of perfection attainable by him.

Remote, unfriended, melancholy, slow,
Or by the lazy Scheld, or wandering Po,
Or onward where the rude Carinthian door,
Against the houseless stranger shuts the door,
Where'er I roam, whatever realms to see,
My heart untravell'd fondly turns to thee.

GOLDSMITH.

Harbord, the chairman, was much blamed for his rashness; he said the duty of the chair was always to set things forward. BURNET.
Reason progressive, instinct is complete. YOUNG.

OPAQUE, DARK.

OPAQUE, in Latin opacus, comes from ops, the earth, because the earth is the darkest of all bodies; the word opaque is to DARK as the species to the genus, for it expresses that species of darkness which is inherent in solid bodies, in distinction from those which emit light from themselves, or admit of light into themselves; it is therefore employed scientifically for the more vulgar and familiar term dark. On this ground the earth is termed an opaque body in distinction from the sun, moon, or other luminous bodies: any solid substance, as a tree or a stone, is an opaque body, in distinction from glass, which is a clear or transparent body.

But all sunshine, as when his beams at noon,
Culminate from th' equator as they now
Shot upward still, whence no way round Shadow from body opaque can fall. MILTON.

OPENING, APERTURE, CAVITY.

OPENING signifies in general any place left open without defining any circumstances; the APERTURE is generally a specific kind of opening which is considered scientifically: there are openings in a wood when the trees are partly cut away; openings in streets by the removal of houses; or openings in a fence that has been broken down; but anatomists speak of apertures in the skull or in the heart, and the naturalist describes the apertures in the nests of bees, ants, beavers, and the like; the opening or aperture is the commencement of an enclosure; the CAVITY is the whole enclosure: hence they are frequently as a part to the whole: many animals make a cavity in the earth for their nest with only a small aperture for their egress and ingress.

The scented dew
Betrays her early labyrinth, and deep
In scattered sullen openings, far behind,
With every breeze she hears the coming storm. THOMSON.

In less than a minute he had thrust his little person through the aperture, and again and again perches upon his neighbor's cage. COWPER.

. In the centre of every floor, from top to bottom, is the chief room, of no great extent, round which there are narrow cavities or recesses. JOHNSON.

OPINIATED OR OPINIATIVE, CONCEITED, EGOISTICAL.

A FONDNESS for one's opinion bespeaks the OPINIATED man; a fond conceit of one's self bespeaks the CONCEITED man: a fond attachment to himself bespeaks the EGOISTICAL man: a liking for one's self or one's own is evidently the common idea that runs through these terms; they differ in the mode and in the object.

An opiniated man is not only fond of his own opinion, but full of his own opinion; he has an opinion on everything, which is the best possible opinion, and is therefore delivered freely to every one, that they may profit in forming their own opinions. A conceited man has a conceit or an idle fond opinion of his own talent; it is not only high in competition with others, but it is so high as to be set above others. The conceited man does not want to follow the ordinary means of acquiring knowledge: his conceit suggests to him that his talent will supply labor, application, reading, and study, and every other contrivance which men have commonly employed for their improvement; he sees by intuition what another learns by experience and observation; he knows in a day what others want years to acquire; he learns of himself what others are contented to get by means of instruction. The egoistical man makes himself the darling theme of his own contemplation; he admires and loves himself to that degree that he can talk and think of nothing else; his children, his house, his garden, his rooms, and the like, are the incessant theme of his conversation, and become invaluable from the mere circumstance of belonging to him. An opiniated man is the most unfit for conversation, which only affords pleasure by an alternate and equable communication of sentiment. A conceited man is the most unfit for co-operation, where a junction of talent and effort is essential to bring things to a conclusion; an egoistical man is the most unfit to be a companion or friend, for he does not know how to value or like anything out of himself.

Down was he cast from all his greatness, as it is pity but all such politic opintuors should.

BURKE.

To show their particular aversion to speaking in the first person, the gentlemen of Port Royal branded this form of writing with the name of egotism.

ADDISON.

OPINION, SENTIMENT, NOTION.

OPINION, in Latin opinio, from opinor, and the Greek επινοω, to think or judge, is the work of the head. SENTIMENT, from sentio, to feel, is the work of the heart. NOTION, in Latin notio, from nosco, to know, is a simple operation of the thinking faculty.

We form opinions, we have sentiments: we get notions. Opinions are formed on speculative matters; they are the result of reading, experience, and reflection: sentiments are entertained on matters of practice; they are the consequence of habits and circumstances: notions are gathered upon sensible objects, and arise out of the casualties of hearing and seeing. One forms opinions on religion, as respects its doctrines; one has sentiments on religion as respects its practice and its precepts. The heathens formed opinions respecting the immortality of the soul, but they amounted to nothing more than opinions. Christians entertain sentiments of reverence toward God as their creator, and of dependence upon him as their preserver.

No, consin (said Henry IV. when charged by the Duke of Bouillon with having changed his religion), I have changed no religion, but an opinion.

HOWELL.

There are never great numbers in any nation who can raise a pleasing discourse from their own stock of sentiments and images.

JOHNSON.

Opinions are more liable to error than sentiments. The opinion often springs from the imagination, and in all cases is but an inference or deduction which falls short of certain knowledge: opinions, therefore, as individual opinions, are mostly false; sentiments, on the other hand, depend upon the moral constitution or habits; they may, therefore, be good or bad according to the character or temper of the person. Notions are still more liable to error than either; they are the immatured decisions of the uninformed mind on the appearances of things. The difference of opinion among men, on the most important questions of human life, is a sufficient evidence that the mind of man is very easily led astray in matters of opinion: whatever difference of opinion there may be among Christians, there is but one sentiment of love and good-will among those who follow the example of Christ, rather than their own passions: the notions of a Deity are so imperfect among savages in general, that they seem to amount to little more than an indistinct idea of some superior invisible agent.

Time wears out the fictions of opinion, and doth by degrees discover and unmask that fallacy of ungrounded persuasions, but confirms the dictates and sentiments of nature.

WILKINS.

This letter comes to your lordship, accompanied with a small writing, entitled a notion; for such alone can that piece be called which aspires no higher than to the forming a project.

SHAFTESBURY.

TO OPPOSE, RESIST, WITHSTAND, THWART.

THE action of setting one thing up against another is obviously expressed by all these terms, but they differ in the manner and the circumstances. TO OPPOSE (v. To contradict) is the most general and unqualified term; it simply denotes the relative position of two objects, and when applied to persons it does not necessarily imply any personal characteristic: we may oppose reason or force to force; or things may be opposed to each other which are in an opposite direction, as a house to a church. RESIST, signifying literally to stand back, away from, or against, is always an act of more or less force when applied to persons; it is mostly a culpable action, as when men resist lawful authority; resistance is, in fact, always bad, unless in case of actual self-defence. Opposition may be made in any form, as when we oppose a person's admittance into a house by our personal efforts: or oppose his admission into a society by a declaration of our opinions. Resistance is always a direct action, as when we resist an invading army by the sword, or resist the evidence of our senses by denying our assent; or, in relation to things, when wood or any hard substance resists the violent efforts of steel or iron to make an impression.

So hot th' assault, so high the tumult rose,
While ours defend, and while the Greeks oppose.
DRYDEN.

To do all our sole delight,
As being the contrary to his high will
Whom we resist. MILTON.

With in WITHSTAND has the force of re in resist, and THWART, from the German quer, cross, signifying to come across, are modes of resistance applicable only to conscious agents. To withstand is negative; it implies not to yield to any foreign agency: thus, a person withstands the entreaties of another to comply with a request. To thwart is positive; it is actively to cross the will of another: thus humorous people are perpetually thwarting the wishes of those with whom they are in connection. It is a happy thing when a young man can withstand the allurements of pleasure. It is a part of a Christian's duty to bear with patience the untoward events of life that thwart his purposes.

Particular instances of second-sight have been given with such evidence, as neither Bacon nor Boyle have been able to resist. JOHNSON.

For twice five days the good old seer withstood
Th' intended treason, and was dumb to blood.
DRYDEN.

The understanding and will never disagreed

OPTION, CHOICE.

OPTION is immediately of Latin derivation, and is consequently a term of less frequent use than the word CHOICE, which has been shown (v. To choose) to be of Celtic origin. The former term, from the Greek orrochai, to see or consider, implies an uncontrolled act of the mind; the latter a simple leaning of the will. We speak of option only as regards one's freedom from external constraint in the act of choosing: one speaks of choice only as the simple act itself. The option or the power of choosing is given; the choice itself is made: hence we say a thing is at a person's option, or it is his own option, or the option is left to him, in order to designate his freedom of choice more strongly than is expressed by the word choice itself.

While they talk, we must make our choices:
they or the Jacobins. We have no other option.
BURKE.

ORDER, METHOD, RULE.

ORDER (v. To dispose) is applied in general to everything that is disposed; METHOD, in French méthode, Latin methodus, Greek μεθοδος, from meta and odos, signifying the ready or right way to do a thing; and RULE, from the Latin regula, a rule, and rego, to govern, direct, or make straight, the former expressing the act of making a thing straight or that by which it is made so, the latter the abstract quality of being so made, are applied only to that which is done; the order lies in consulting the time, the place, and the object, so as to make them accord; the method consists in the right choice of means to an end; the rule consists in that which will keep us in the right way. Where there is a number of objects there must be order in the disposition of them; where there is work to carry on, or any object to obtain, or any art to follow, there must be method in the pursuit; a tradesman or merchant must have method in keeping his accounts; a teacher must have a method for the communication of instruction: the rule is the part of the method; it is that on which the method rests; there cannot be method without rule, but there may be rule without method; the method varies with the thing that is to be done; the rule is that which is permanent, and serves as a guide under all circumstances. We adopt the method and follow the rule. A painter adopts a certain method of preparing his colors according to the rules laid down by his art.

He was a mighty lover of regularity and order, and managed his affairs with the utmost exactness.
BURNET.

It will be in vain to talk to you concerning the method I think best to be observed in schools.
LOCKE.

A rule that relates even to the smallest part of our life, is of great benefit to us, merely as it is a rule.
LAW.

Order is said of every complicated machine, either of a physical or a moral kind: the order of the universe, by which every part is made to harmonize to the other part, and all individually to the whole collectively, is that which constitutes its principal beauty: as rational beings, we aim at introducing the same order into the moral scheme of society: order is, therefore, that which is founded upon the nature of things, and seems in its extensive sense to comprehend all the rest. Method is the work of the understanding, mostly as it is employed in the mechanical process; sometimes, however, as respects intellectual objects. Rule is said either as it respects mechanical and physical actions or moral conduct. The term rule is, however, as before observed, employed distinctly from either order or method, for it applies to the moral conduct of the individual. The Christian religion contains rules for the guidance of our conduct in all the relations of human society.

The order and method of nature is generally very different from our measures and proportions.

BURKE.

Their story I revolv'd; and reverent own'd
Their polish'd arts of rule, their human virtues.

MALLEY.

As epithets, orderly, methodical, and regular, are applied to persons and even to things according to the above distinction of the nouns: an orderly man, or an orderly society, is one that adheres to the established order of things; the former in his domestic habits, the latter in their public capacity, their social meetings, and their social measures. A methodical man is one who adopts method in all he sets about; such a one may sometimes run into the extreme of formality, by being precise where precision is not necessary: we cannot speak of a methodical society, for method is altogether a personal quality. A man is regular, inasmuch as he follows a certain rule in his moral actions, and thereby preserves a uniformity of conduct: a regular society is one founded by a certain prescribed rule. So we say, an orderly proceeding, or an orderly course, for what is done in due order: a regular proceeding, or a regular course, which goes on according to a prescribed rule; a methodical grammar, a methodical delineation, and the like, for what is done according to a given method.

Then to their dams

ORIFICE, PERFORATION.

ORIFICE, in Latin orificium or orificium, from os and factum, signifies a made mouth, that is, an opening made, as it were. PERFORATION, in Latin perforatio, from perforo, signifies a piercing through.

These terms are both scientifically employed to designate certain cavities in the human body; but the former respects that which is natural, the latter that which is artificial: all the vessels of the human body have their orifices, which are so constructed as to open or close of themselves. Surgeons are frequently obliged to make perforations into the bones: sometimes perforation may describe what comes from a natural process, but it denotes a cavity made through a solid substance; but the orifice is particularly applicable to such openings as most resemble the mouth in form and use. In this manner the words may be extended in their application to other bodies besides animal substances, and in other sciences besides anatomy: hence we speak of the orifice of a tube; the orifice of any flower, and the like; or the perforation of a tree, by means of a cannon-ball or an iron instrument.

Etna was bored through the top with a monstrous orifice.

ADDISON.

Herein may be perceived slender perforations, at which may be expressed a black feculent matter.

SIR THOMAS BROWNE.

ORIGIN, ORIGINAL, BEGINNING, RISE, SOURCE.

THE ORIGIN and ORIGINAL both come from the Latin orior, to rise; the former designating the abstract property of rising, the latter the thing that is risen; the first of its kind from which others rise. Origin refers us to the cause as well as the period of beginning; original is said of those things which give an origin to another: the origin serves to date the existence of a thing; the term original serves to show the author of a thing, and is opposed to the copy. The origin of the world is described in the first chapter of Genesis; Adam was the original from whom all the human race has sprung.

Christianity explains the origin of all the disorders which at present take place on earth.

BLAIR.

And had his better half, his bride,
Carv'd from th' original, his side. BUTLER.

Origin has respect to the cause, BEGINNING simply to the period, of existence: everything owes its existence to the origin; it dates its existence from the beginning; there cannot be an origin without a beginning; but there may be a beginning where we do not speak of an origin. We look to the origin of a thing in order to learn its nature: we look to the beginning in order to learn its duration. When we have discovered the origin of a quarrel, we are in a fair way of becoming acquainted with the aggressors; when we trace a quarrel to the beginning, we may easily ascertain how long it has lasted.

The origin of forms, Pyrophilus, as it is thought the noblest, so if I mistake not, it hath been found one of the most perplexing inquiries that belong to natural philosophy.

BOYLE.

But wit and weaving had the same beginning,
Pallas first taught in poetry and spinning.

SWIFT.

Origin and RISE are both employed for the primary state of existence; but the latter is a much more familiar term than the former: we speak of the origin of an empire, the origin of a family, the origin of a dispute, and the like; but we say that a river takes its rise from a certain mountain, that certain disorders take their rise from particular circumstances which happen in early life: it is, moreover, observable that the term origin is confined solely to the first commencement of a thing's existence; but rise comprehends its gradual progress in the first stages of its existence; the origin of the noblest families is in the first instance sometimes ignoble; the largest rivers take their rise in small streams. We look to the origin as to the cause of existence: we look to the rise as to the situation in which the thing commences to exist, or the process by which it grows up into existence.

If all the parts which were ever questioned in our gospels were given up, it would not affect the origin of the religion in the smallest degree.

PALEY.

The friendship which is to be practised or expected by common mortals must take its rise from mutual pleasure.

JOHNSON.

The origin and rise are said of only one object; the SOURCE is said of that which produces a succession of objects: the origin of evil in general has given rise to much idle speculation; the love of pleasure is the source of incalculable mischiefs to individuals, as well as to society at large: the origin exists but once; the source is lasting: the origin of every family is to be traced to our first parent, Adam; we have a never-failing source of consolation in religion.

Nature which contemns its origin

Cannot be bordered certain within itself.

SHAKESPEARE.

One source of the sublime is infinity. BURKE.

TO OUTLIVE, SURVIVE.

To OUTLIVE is literally to live out the life of another, to live longer: to SURVIVE, in French survivre, is to live beyond any given period; the former is employed to express the comparison between two lives; the latter to denote a protracted existence beyond any given term: one person is said properly to outlive another who enjoys a longer life; but we speak of surviving persons or things, in an indefinite or unqualified manner: it is not a peculiar blessing to outlive all our nearest relatives and friends; no man can be happy in surviving his honor.

A man never outlives his conscience, and that for this cause only he cannot outlive himself.

SOUTH.

Those that survive let Rome reward with love.

SHAKESPEARE.

OUTWARD, EXTERNAL, EXTERIOR.

OUTWARD, or inclined to the out, after the manner of the out, indefinitely describes the situation; EXTERNAL, from the Latin externus and extra, is more definite in its sense, since it is employed only in regard to such objects as are conceived to be independent of man as a thinking being: hence, we may speak of the outward part of a building, of a board, of a table, a box, and the like; but of external objects acting on the mind, or of an external agency. EXTERIOR is still more definite than either, as it expresses a higher degree of the outward or external; the former being in the comparative, and the latter two in the positive degree: when we speak of anything which has two coats, it is usual to designate the outermost by the name of the exterior; when we speak simply of the surface, without reference to anything behind, it is denominated external: as the exterior coat of a walnut, or the external surface of things. In the moral application, the external or outward is that which comes simply to the view; but the exterior is that which is prominent, and which consequently may conceal something: a man may sometimes neglect the outside, who is altogether mindful of the in: a man with a pleasing exterior will sometimes gain more friends than he who has more solid merit.

And though my outward state misfortune hath Depress'd thus low, it cannot reach my faith.

DENHAM

The controversy about the reality of external evils is now at an end.

JOHNSON.

But when a monarch sins, it should be secret,
To keep exterior show of sanctity,
Maintain respect, and cover bad example.

DRYDEN.

TO OVERBALANCE, OUTWEIGH, PREPONDERATE.

TO OVERBALANCE is to throw the balance over on one side. To OUTWEIGH is to exceed in weight. To PREPONDERATE, from præ, before, and pondus, a weight, signifies also to exceed in weight. Although these terms approach so near to each other in their original meaning, yet they have now a different application: in the proper sense, a person overbalances himself who loses his balance and goes on one side; a heavy body outweighs one that is light, when they are put into the same pair of scales. Overbalance and outweigh are likewise used in the improper application; preponderate is never used otherwise: things are said to overbalance which are supposed to turn the scale to one side or the other; they are said to outweigh when they are to be weighed against each other; they are said to preponderate when one weighs everything else down: the evils which arise from innovations in society commonly overbalance the good; the will of a parent should outweigh every personal consideration in the mind; which will always be the case where the power of religion preponderates.

Whatever any man may have written or done, his precepts or his valor will scarcely overbalance the unimportant uniformity which runs through his time.

JOHNSON.

If endless ages can outweigh an hour,
Let not the laurel but the palm inspire.

YOUNG.

Looks which do not correspond with the heart cannot be assumed without labor, nor continued without pain; the motive to relinquish them must, therefore, soon preponderate.

HAWKSWORTH.

TO OVERBEAR, BEAR DOWN, OVERPOWER, OVERWHELM, SUBDUE.

TO OVERBEAR is to bear one's self over another, that is, to make another bear one's weight; to BEAR DOWN is literally to bring down by bearing upon; to OVERPOWER is to get the power over an object; to OVERWHELM, from whelm or wheel, signifies to turn quite round as well as over; to SUBDUE (r. To conquer) is literally to bring or put underneath. A man overbears by carrying himself higher than others, and putting to silence those who might claim an equality with him; an overbearing demeanor is most conspicuous in narrow circles, where an individual, from certain casual advantages, affects a superiority over the members of the same community. To bear down is an act of greater violence: one bears down opposition; it is properly the opposing force to force until one side yields, as when one party bears another down. Overpower, as the term implies, belongs to the exercise of power which may be either physical or moral: one may be overpowered by another, who in a struggle gets one into his power; or one may be overpowered in an argument, when the argument of one's antagonist is such as to bring one to silence. One is overborne or borne down by the exertion of individuals; overpowered by the active efforts of individuals, or by the force of circumstances; overwhelmed by circumstances or things only: overborne by another of superior influence; borne down by the force of his attack; overpowered by numbers, by entreaties, by looks, and the like; and overwhelmed by the torrent of words, or the impetuosity of the attack.

Crowding on the last the first impel
Till overborne with weight the Cyprians fell.
DRYDEN.

The residue were so disordered as they could not conveniently fight or fly, and not only justled and bore down one another, but in their confused tumbling back, brake a part of the avant-guard.
HAYWARD.

After the death of Crassus, Pompey found himself outwitted by Cæsar; he broke with him, overpowered him in the senate, and caused many unjust decrees to pass against him.
DRYDEN.

What age is this where honest men
Placed at the helm,
A sea of some foul mouth or pen
Shall overwhelm ?
B. JONSON.

Overpower and overwhelm denote a partial superiority; subdue denotes that which is permanent and positive: we may overpower or overwhelm for a time, or to a certain degree; but to subdue is to get an entire and lasting superiority. Overpower and overwhelm are said of what passes between persons nearly on a level; but subdue is said of those who are, or may be, reduced to a low state of inferiority: individuals or armies are overpowered or overwhelmed; individuals or nations are subdued.

Nothing could have subdued nature
To such a lowness, but his unkind daughter.
SHAKESPEARE.

In the moral or extended application, overbear and bear down both imply force or violence, but the latter even more than the former: one passion may be said to overbear another, or to overbear reason. Whatever bears down carries all before it.

The duty of fear, like that of other passions, is not to overbear reason, but to assist it.
JOHNSON.

Contention, like a horse
Full of high feeding, madly hath broke loose
And bears down all before him. SHAKESPEARE.

To overpower, overwhelm, and subdue, are likewise applied to the moral feelings, as well as to the external relations of things; but the former two are the effects of external circumstances; the latter follows from the exercise of the reasoning powers: the tender feelings are overpowered; the mind is overwhelmed with painful feelings; the unruly passions are subdued by the force of religious contemplation: a person may be so overpowered on seeing a dying friend, as to be unable to speak; a person may be so overwhelmed with grief, upon the death of a near and dear relative, as to be unable to attend to his ordinary avocations; the passion of anger has been so completely subdued by the influence of religion on the heart, that instances have been known of the most irascible tempers being converted into the most mild and forbearing.

All colors that are more luminous (than green) overpower and dissipate the animal spirits which are employed in sight.
ADDISON.

MILTON.

TO OVERFLOW, INUNDATE, DELUGE.

WHAT OVERFLOWS simply flows over; what INUNDATES (from in and unda, a wave) flows into; what DELUGES (from diluo) washes away.

The term overflow bespeaks abundance; whatever exceeds the measure of contents must flow over, because it is more than can be held: to inundate bespeaks not only abundance, but vehemence; when it inundates it flows in faster than is desired, it fills to an inconvenient height: to deluge bespeaks impetuosity; a deluge irresistibly carries away all before it. This explanation of these terms in their proper sense will illustrate their improper application: the heart is said to overflow with joy, with grief, with bitterness, and the like, in order to denote the superabundance of the thing; a country is said to be inundated by swarms of inhabitants, when speaking of numbers who intrude themselves to the annoyance of the natives; the town is said to be deluged with publications of different kinds, when they appear in such profusion and in such quick succession as to supersede others of more value.

I am too full of you not to overflow upon those I converse with.
POPE.

There was such an inundation of speakers, young speakers in every sense of the word, that neither my Lord Germaine nor myself could find room for a single word.
GIBBON.

To all those who did not wish to deluge their country in blood, the accepting of King William was an act of necessity.
BURKE.

TO OVERRULE, SUPERSEDE.

To OVERRULE is literally to get the superiority of rule; and to SUPERSEDE is to get the upper or superior seat; but the former is employed only as the act of persons; the latter is applied to things as the agents: a man may be overruled in his domestic government, or he may be overruled in a public assembly, or he may be overruled in the cabinet; large works in general supersede the necessity of smaller ones, by containing that which is superior both in quantity and quality.

When fancy begins to be overruled by reason, and corrected by experience, the most artful tale raises but little curiosity. JOHNSON.

Christoval received a commission empowering him to supersede Cortes. ROBERTSON.

OVERSPREAD, OVERRUN, RAVAGE.

To OVERSPREAD signifies simply to cover the whole surface of a body; but to OVERRUN is a mode of spreading, namely, by running; things in general, therefore, are said to overspread which admit of extension; nothing can be said to overrun but what literally or figuratively runs: the face is overspread with spots; the ground is overrun with weeds. To overrun and to RAVAGE are both employed to imply the active and extended destruction of an enemy; but the former expresses more than the latter: a small body may ravage in particular parts; but immense numbers are said to overrun, as they run into every part; the Barbarians overran all Europe, and settled in different countries; detachments are sent out to ravage the country or neighborhood.

The storm of hail and fire, with the darkness that overspread the land for three days, are described with great strength. ADDISON.

Most despotic governments are naturally overrun with ignorance and barbarity. ADDISON.

While Herod was absent, the thieves of Trachonites ravaged with their depredations all the parts of Judea and Cælo-Syria that lay within their reach. PAIDRAUX.

TO OVERTURN, OVERTHROW, SUBVERT, INVERT, REVERSE.

To OVERTURN is simply to turn over, which may be more or less gradual; but to OVERTHROW is to throw over, which will be more or less violent. To overturn is to turn a thing either with its side or its bottom upward; but to SUBVERT is to turn that under which should be upward: to REVERSE is to turn that before which should be behind; and to INVERT is to place that on its head which should rest on its feet. These terms differ accordingly in their application and circumstances: things are overturned by contrivance and gradual means; infidels attempt to overturn Christianity by the arts of ridicule and falsehood: governments are overthrown by violence. To overturn is said of small matters; to subvert only of national or large concerns: domestic economy may be overturned; religious or political establishments may be subverted: that may be overturned which is simply set up; that is subverted which has been established: an assertion may be overturned; the best sanctioned principles may by artifice be subverted.

To overturn, overthrow, and subvert generally involve the destruction of the thing so overturned, overthrown, or subverted, or at least renders it for the time useless, and are, therefore, mostly unallowed acts; but reverse and invert, which have a more particular application, have a less specific character of propriety: we may reverse a proposition by taking the negative instead of the affirmative; a decree may be reversed so as to render it nugatory; but both of these acts may be right or wrong, according to circumstances: likewise, the order of particular things may be inverted to suit the convenience of parties; but the order of society cannot be inverted without subverting all the principles on which civil society is built.

An age is rip'ning in revolving fate,
When Troy shall overturn the Grecian State. DRYDEN.

Thus prudes, by characters o'erthrown,
Imagine that they raise their own. GAY.

Others, from public spirit, labored to prevent a civil war, which, whatever party should prevail, must shake, and perhaps subvert, the Spanish power. ROBERTSON.

Our ancestors affected a certain pomp of style, and this affectation, I suspect, was the true cause of their so frequently inverting the natural order of their words, especially in poetry. TAYLOR.

He who walks not uprightly has neither from the presumption of God's mercy reversing the decree of his justice, nor from his own purposes of a future repentance, any sure ground to set his foot upon. SOCIETY.

TO OVERWHELM, CRUSH.

To OVERWHELM (v. To overbear) is to cover with a heavy body, so that one should sink under it: to CRUSH is to destroy the consistency of a thing by violent pressure: a thing may be crushed by being overwhelmed, but it may be overwhelmed without being crushed; and it may be crushed without being overwhelmed: the girl Tarpeia, who betrayed the Capitoline Hill to the Sabines, is said to have been overwhelmed with their arms, by which she was crushed to death: when many persons fall on one, he may be overwhelmed, but not necessarily crushed: when a wagon goes over a body, it may be crushed, but not overwhelmed.

Let not the political metaphysics of Jacobins break prison, to burst like a Levanter, to sweep the earth with their hurricane, and to break up the fountains of the great deep to overwhelm us.

BURNES.

Melt his cold heart, and wake dead nature in him,
Crush him in thy arms.

PACE, STEP.

PACE, in French pas, Latin passus, comes from the Hebrew paashat, to pass, and signifies the act of passing, or the ground passed over. STEP, which comes through the medium of the Northern languages, from the same source as the Greek στειβω, to tread, signifies the act of stepping, or the ground stepped over.

As respects the act, the pace expresses the general manner of passing on, or moving the body; the step implies the manner of setting or extending the foot: the pace is distinguished by being either a walk or a run; and in regard to horses a trot or a gallop: the step is distinguished by being long or short, to the right or left, forward or backward. The same pace may be modified so as to be more or less easy, more or less quick; the step may vary as it is light or heavy, graceful or ungraceful, long or short: we may go a slow pace with long steps, or we may go a quick pace with short steps: a slow pace is best suited to the solemnity of a funeral; a long step must be taken by soldiers in a slow march.

To-morrow, to-morrow, and to-morrow,
Creeps in a stealing pace from day to day.

SHAKESPEARE.

Grace was in all her steps, Heaven in her eye,
In every gesture dignity and love.

MILTON.

As respects the space passed or stepped over, the pace is a measured distance, formed by a long step; the step, on the other hand, is indefinitely employed for any space stepped over, but particularly that ordinary space which one steps over without an effort: a thousand paces was the Roman measurement for a mile; a step or two designates almost the shortest possible distance.

PAIN, PANG, AGONY, ANGUISH.

PAIN, in Saxon pin, German pein, etc., is connected with the Latin pæna, and the Greek ποινή, punishment, πενος, labor, and πενομαι, to be poor or in trouble. PANG is but a variation of pain. AGONY comes from the Greek αγωνίζω, to struggle or contend, signifying the labor or pain of a struggle. ANGUISH, from the Latin ango, contracted from ante and ago, to act against, or in direct opposition to, signifies the pain arising from severe pressure.

Pain, which expresses the feeling that is most repugnant to the nature of all sensible beings, is here the generic, and the rest specific terms: pain and agony are applied indiscriminately to what is physical and mental; pang and anguish mostly respect that which is mental: pain signifies either an individual feeling or a permanent state; pang is only a particular feeling: agony is sometimes employed for the individual feeling, but more commonly for the state; anguish is always employed for the state. Pain is indefinite with regard to the degree; it may rise to the highest, or sink to the lowest possible degree; the rest are positively high degrees of pain: the pang is a sharp pain; the agony is a severe and permanent pain; the anguish is an overwhelming pain.

We should pass on from crime to crime, heedless and remorseless, if misery did not stand in our way, and our own pains admonish us of our folly.

JOHNSON.

What pangs the tender breast of Dido tore!

DRYDEN.

Thou shalt behold him stretch'd in all the agonies
Of a tormenting and a shameful death.

OTWAY.

Are these the parting pangs which nature feels,
When anguish rends the heartstrings? ROWS.

TO PAINT, DEPICT.

PAINT and DEPICT both come from the Latin pingo, to represent forms and figures: as a verb, to paint is employed either literally to represent figures on paper, or to represent circumstances and events by means of words; to depict is used only in this latter sense, but the former word expresses a greater exercise of the imagination than the latter: it is the art of the poet to paint nature in lively colors; it is the art of the historian or narrator to depict a real scene of misery in strong colors.

But who can paint the lover, as he stood
Pierc'd by severe amazement, hating life,
Speechless, and fix'd in all the death of woe?

THOMSON.

When the distractions of a tumult are sensibly depicted, every object and every occurrence are so presented to your view, that while you read you seem indeed to see them. FELTON.

As nouns, painting rather describes the action or operation, and picture the result. When we speak of a good painting, we think particularly of its execution as to drapery, disposition of colors, and the like; but when we speak of a fine picture, we refer immediately to the object represented, and the impression which it is capable of producing on the beholder: paintings are confined either to oil-paintings or paintings in colors: but every drawing, whether in pencil, in crayons, or in India ink, may produce a picture; and we have likewise pictures in embroidery, pictures in tapestry, and pictures in Mosaic.

The painting is almost the natural man,
He is but outside. SHAKESPEARE.

A picture is a poem without words. ADDISON.

Painting is employed only in the proper sense; picture is often used figuratively: old paintings derive a value from the master by whom they were executed; a well-regulated family, bound together by the ties of affection, presents the truest picture of human happiness.

I do not know of any paintings, bad or good, which produce the same effect as a poem. BURKE.

Vision is performed by having a picture, formed by the rays of light, reflected from an object on the retina of the eye. BURKE.

PALATE, TASTE.

PALATE, in Latin palatum, comes either from the Greek παῦ, to eat, or, which is more probable, from the Etruscan word farlantum, signifying the roof or arch of heaven, or, by an extended application, the roof of the mouth. TASTE comes from the German tasten, to touch lightly, because the sense of taste requires but the slightest touch to excite it.

Palate is, in an improper sense, employed for taste, because it is the seat of taste; but taste is never employed for palate: a person is said to have a nice palate when he is nice in what he eats or drinks; but his taste extends to all matters of sense, as well as those which are intellectual. A man of taste, or of a nice taste, conveys much more as a characteristic than a man of a nice palate: the former is said only in a good sense; but the latter is particularly applicable to the epicure.

No fruit our palate courts, or flow'r our smell.
JESTER.

In more exalted joys to fix our taste,
And wean us from delights that cannot last.
JESTER.

PALE, PALLID, WAN.

PALE, in French pale, and PALLID, in Latin pallidus, both come from pallere, to turn pale, which probably comes from the Greek παλλω, to make white, and that from παλιν, flour. WAN is connected with want and wane, signifying, in general, a deficiency or a losing color.

Pallid rises upon pale, and wan upon pallid: the absence of color in any degree, where color is a requisite quality, constitutes pale; but pallidness is an excess of pale; and wan is an unusual degree of pallidness: pale in the countenance may be temporary; but pallidness and wan are permanent; fear, or any sudden emotion, may produce pale; but protracted sickness, hunger, and fatigue bring on pallidness; and when these calamities are combined and heightened by every aggravation, they may produce that which is peculiarly termed wan.

Now morn, her lamp pale glimmering on the sight,
Scatter'd before her sun reluctant night.

FALCONER.

Her spirits faint,
Her cheeks assume a pallid tint. ADDISON.

And with them comes a third with regal pomp,
But faded splendor wan. MILTON.

TO PALPITATE, FLUTTER, PANT, GASP.

PALPITATE, in Latin palpitatus, from palpito, is a frequentative of the Greek παλλω, to vibrate. FLUTTER is a frequentative of fly, signifying to fly backward and forward in an agitated manner. PANT, probably derived from pent, and the Latin pendo, to hang in a state of suspense, so as not to be able to move backward or forward, as is the case with the breath when one panta. GASP is a variation of gape, which is the ordinary accompaniment in the action of *gasp*ing.

These terms agree in a particular manner, as they respect the irregular action of the heart or lungs: the former two are said of the heart; and the latter two of the lungs or breath; to palpitate expresses that which is strong; it is a strong beating of the blood against the vessels of the heart: to flutter expresses that which is rapid; it is a violent and alternate motion of the blood backward and forward: fear and suspense produce commonly palpitation, but joy and hope produce a fluttering; panting is, with regard to the breath, what palpitating is with regard to the heart; panting is occasioned by the inflated state of the respiratory organs which renders this palpitating necessary: *gasp*ing differs from the former, inasmuch as it denotes a direct stoppage of the breath; a cessation of action in the respiratory organs.

No plays have oftener filled the eyes with tears,
And the breast with palpitation, than those which are variegated with interludes of mirth. JOHNSON.

She springs aloft, with elevated pride,
Above the tangling mass of low desires,
That bind the fluttering crowd. THOMSON.

All nature fades extinct, and she alone,
Heard, felt, and seen, possesses every thought,
Fills every sense, and panta in every vein. THOMSON.

Had not the soul this outlet to the skies,
In this vast vessel of the universe,
How should we gasp, as in an empty void! YOUNG.

PARABLE, ALLEGORY.

BOTH these terms imply a veiled mode of speech, which serves more or less to conceal the main object of the discourse by presenting it under the appearance of something else, which accords with it in most of the particulars: the PARABLE, in French parabole, Greek παραβολη, from παραβαλλω, signifying what is thrown out or set before one, in lieu of something which it resembles, is mostly employed for moral purposes; the ALLEGORY (v. Figure) in describing historical events. The parable substitutes some other subject or agent, who is represented under a character that is suitable to the one referred to. In the allegory are introduced strange and arbitrary persons in the place of the real personages, or imaginary characteristics, and circumstances are ascribed to real persons. The parable is principally employed in the sacred writings; the allegory forms a grand feature in the productions of the Eastern nations.

What is thy fulsome parable to me?
My body is from all diseases free. DAYDEN.

Neither must we draw out our allegory too long, lest either we make ourselves obscure, or fall into affectation which is childish.

B. JONSON.

PART, DIVISION, PORTION, SHARE.

PART, in Latin pars, from the Hebrew peresh, to divide, is a term not only of more general use, but of more comprehensive meaning than DIVISION (v. To divide): it is always employed for the thing divided, but division may be either employed for the act of dividing, or the thing that is divided: but in all cases the word division has always a reference to some action, and the agent by whom it has been performed; whereas part, which is perfectly abstract, has altogether lost this idea. We always speak of the part as opposed to the whole, but of the division as it has been made of the whole. A part is formed of itself by accident, or made by design; a division is always the effect of design: a part is indefinite as to its quantity or nature, it may be large or small, round or square, of any dimension, of any form, of any size, or of any character; but a division is always regulated by some certain principles, it depends upon the circumstances of the divider and thing to be divided. A page, a line, or a word, is the part of any book; but the books, chapters, sections, and paragraphs are the divisions of the book.

Stones, wood, water, air, and the like, are parts of the world; fire, air, earth, and water are physical divisions of the globe; continents, seas, rivers, mountains, and the like, are geographical divisions, under which are likewise included its political divisions into countries, kingdoms, etc.

Shall little haughty ignorance pronounce
His works unwise, of which the smallest part
Exceeds the narrow vision of her mind.

THOMSON.

A division (in a discourse) should be natural and simple. BLAIR.

A part may be detached from the whole; a division is always conceived of in connection with the whole; PORTION, in Latin portio, is supposed to be changed from partio, which comes from partior, to distribute, and originally from peresh, as the word part; and SHARE, in Saxon scýran, to divide, German scheren, to sheer, in all probability from the Hebrew karah, to break in pieces, are particular species of divisions, which are said of such matters as are assignable to individuals; portion respects individuals without any distinction; share respects individuals specially referred to. The portion of happiness which falls to every man's lot is more equal than is generally supposed; the share which partners have in the profits of any undertaking depends upon the sum which each has contributed toward its completion. The portion is that which simply comes to any one; but the share is that which belongs to him by a certain right. According to the ancient customs of Normandy, the daughters could have no more than a third part of the property for their share, which was divided in equal portions between them.

The Jars of gen'rous wine, Acastes' gift,
He set abroad, and for the feast prepar'd.
In equal portions with the ven'ous share'd.

DAYDEN.

The monarch, on whom fertile Nile bestows
All which that grateful earth can bear,
Deceives himself, if he suppose

That more than this falls to his share.

COWLEY.

PART, PIECE, PATCH.

PART (v. Part) in its strict sense is taken in connection with the whole; PIECE, in French pièce, in Hebrew pas, to diminish, signifying the thing in its diminished form, that which is less than a whole, is the part detached from the whole; and the PATCH, which is a variation of piece, is that piece which is distinguished from others.

Things may be divided into parts without any express separation; but when divided into pieces they are actually cut asunder. Hence we may speak of a loaf as divided into twelve parts when it is conceived only to be so; and divided into twelve pieces when it is really so. On this ground we talk of the parts of a country, but not of the pieces; and of a piece of land, not a part of land; so, likewise, letters are said to be the component parts of a word, but the half or the quarter of any given letter is called a piece. The chapters, the pages, the lines, etc., are the various parts of a book; certain passages or quantities drawn from the book are called pieces: the parts of matter may be infinitely decomposed; various bodies may be formed out of so ductile a piece of matter as clay. The piece is that which may sometimes serve as a whole; but the patch is that which is always broken and disjointed, a something imperfect: many things may be formed out of a piece; but the patch only serves to fill up a chasm.

I understand both these sides to be not only returns, but parts of the front. BACON.

These lesser rocks or great bulky stones, that lie scattered in the sea or upon the land, are they not manifest fragments and pieces of these greater masses? BURNET.

It hath been much feared by the great critic Lipsius, lest some more impolitic hand hath sewed many patches of base cloth into that rich web, as his own metaphor expresses it. SELDEN.

TO PARTAKE, PARTICIPATE, SHARE.

PARTAKE and PARTICIPATE, the one English, and the other Latin, signify literally to take a part in a thing, and may be applied either in the sense of having a part in more than one object at the same time, or to have a part with others in the same object. In the first sense partake is the more familiar and ordinary expression, as a body may be said to partake of the essence of a salt and an acid. Participate is also used in the same sense, sometimes in poetry.

This passion may partake of the nature of those which regard self-preservation. BURKE.

Our God, when heav'n and earth he did create,
Form'd man, who should of both participate.

DENHAM.

In the sense of having a part with others in the same object, to partake is a selfish action, to participate is either a selfish or benevolent action; we partake of that which pleases ourselves, we participate in that which pleases others, or in their pleasures.

Portia, go in awhile,
And by-and-by thy bosom shall partake
The secrets of my heart. SHAKESPEARE.

Of fellowship I speak,
Such as I seek fit to participate all rational delights
Wherein the brute cannot be human consort.
MILTON.

To partake is the act of taking or getting a thing to one's self; to SHARE is the act of having a title to a share, or being in the habit of receiving a share: we may, therefore, partake of a thing without sharing it, and share it without partaking. We partake of things mostly through the medium of the senses: whatever, therefore, we take a part in, whether gratuitously or casually, that we may be said to partake of; in this manner we partake of an entertainment without sharing it: on the other hand, we share things that promise to be of advantage or profit, and what we share is what we claim; in this manner we share a sum of money which has been left to us in common with others.

All else of nature's common gift partake,
Unhappy Dido was alone awake. DRYDEN.

Avoiding love, I had not found despair,
But share'd with savage beasts the common air.
DRYDEN.

PARTICULAR, SINGULAR, ODD, ECCENTRIC, STRANGE.

PARTICULAR, in French particulier, Latin particularis, from particula, a particle, signifies belonging to a particle or a very small part. SINGULAR, in French singulier, Latin singularis, from singulus, every one, very probably comes from the Hebrew igelet, peculium, or private. ODD, in Swedish odd, without an equal, signifies literally unmatched (v. Odd). ECCENTRIC, from ex and centra, signifies out of the centre or direct line. STRANGE, in French étrange, Latin extra, and Greek εξ, out of, signifies out of some other part, or not belonging to this part.

All these terms are employed either as characteristics of persons or things. What is particular belongs to some small particle or point to which it is confined; what is singular is single, or the only one of its kind; what is odd is without an equal or anything with which it is fit to pair; what is eccentric is not to be brought within any rule or estimate, it deviates to the right and the left; what is strange is different from that which one is accustomed to see, it does not admit of comparison or assimilation. A person is particular as it respects himself; he is singular as it respects others; he is particular in his habits or modes of action; he is singular in that which is about him; we may be particular or singular in our dress; in the former case we study the minute points of our dress to please ourselves; in the latter case we adopt a mode of dress that distinguishes us from all others.

There is such a particularity forever affected by great beauties, that they are encumbered with their charms in all they say or do.

HUGHES.

Singularity is only vicious, as it makes men act contrary to reason.

ADDISON.

One is odd, eccentric, and strange, more as it respects established modes, forms, and rules, than individual circumstances: a person is odd when his actions or his words bear no resemblance to that of others; he is eccentric if he irregularly departs from the customary modes of proceeding; he is strange when that which he does makes him new or unknown to those who are about him. Particularity and singularity are not always taken in a bad sense; oddness, eccentricity, and strangeness are never taken in a good one. A person ought to be particular in the choice of his society, his amusements, his books, and the like; he ought to be singular in virtue, when vice is unfortunately prevalent: but particularity becomes ridiculous when it respects trifles; and singularity becomes culpable when it is not warranted by the most imperious necessity. As oddness, eccentricity, and strangeness consist in the violation of good order, of the decencies of human life, or the more important points of moral duty, they can never be justifiable and are often unpardonable. An odd man whom no one can associate with, and who likes to associate with no one, is an outcast by nature, and a burden to the society which is troubled with his presence. An eccentric character, who distinguishes himself by nothing but the breach of every established rule, is a being who deserves nothing but ridicule or the more serious treatment of censure or rebuke. A strange person, who makes himself a stranger among those to whom he is bound by the closest ties, is a being as unfortunate as he is worthless.

Even particularities were becoming in him, as he had a natural ease, that immediately adopted, and saved them from the air of affectation.

LOUIS OXFORD.

So proud, I am no slave;
So impudent, I own myself no knave;
So odd, my country's ruin makes me grave.

POPE.

That acute though eccentric observer, Rousseau, had perceived that, to strike and interest the public, the marvellous must be produced.

BURKE.

A strange proud return you may think I make you, madam, when I tell you it is not from everybody I would be thus obliged.

SUCKLING.

When applied to characterize inanimate objects, they are mostly used in an indifferent, but sometimes in a bad sense: the term particular serves to define or specify, it is opposed to the general or indefinite; a particular day or hour, a particular case, a particular person, are expressions which confine one's attention to one precise object in distinction from the rest; singular, like the word particular, marks but one object, and that which is clearly pointed out in distinction from the rest; but this term differs from the former, inasmuch as the particular is said only of that which one has arbitrarily made particular, but the singular is so from its own properties: thus a place is particular when we fix upon it, and mark it out in any manner so that it may be known from others; a place is singular if it have anything in itself which distinguishes it from others. Odd, in an indifferent sense, is opposed to even, and applied to objects in general; an odd number, an odd person, an odd book, and the like: but it is also employed in a bad sense, to mark objects which are totally dissimilar to others; thus an odd idea, an odd conceit, an odd whim, an odd way, an odd place. Eccentric is applied in its proper sense to mathematical lines or circles, which have not the same centre, and is never employed in an improper sense: strange, in its proper sense, marks that which is unknown or unusual, as a strange face, a strange figure, a strange place; but in the moral application it is like the word odd, and conveys the unfavorable idea of that which is uncommon and not worth knowing; a strange noise designates not only that which has not been heard before, but that which it is not desirable to hear; a strange place may signify not only that which we have been unaccustomed to see, but that which has also much in it that is objectionable.

Artists who propose only the imitation of such a particular person, without election of ideas, have been often reproached for that omission.

DEYDEN.

So singular a madness
Must have a cause as strange as the effect.

DENHAM.

History is the great looking-glass through which we may behold with ancestral eyes, not only the various actions of past ages, and the odd accidents that attend time, but also discern the different humors of men.

HOWELL.

Is it not strange that a rational man should worship an ox?

SOUTH.

PARTICULAR, INDIVIDUAL

PARTICULAR, v. Peculiar. INDIVIDUAL, in French individuel, Latin individuus, signifies that which cannot be divided.

Both these terms are employed to express one object; but particular is much more specific than individual; the particular confines us to one object only of many; but individual may be said of any one object among many. A particular object cannot be misunderstood for any other, while it remains particular; but the individual object can never be known from other individual objects, while it remains only individual. Particular is a term used in regard to individuals, and is opposed to the general: individual is a term used in regard to collectives; and is opposed to the whole or that which is divisible into parts.

Those particular speeches which are commonly known by the name of reints, are blemishes in our English tragedy.

ADDISON.

To give thee being, I lent
Out of my side to thee, nearest my heart,
Substantial life, to have thee by my side;
Henceforth an individual solace dear.

MILTON.

PATIENCE, ENDURANCE, RESIGNATION.

PATIENCE applies to any troubles or pains whatever, small or great; RESIGNATION is employed only for those of great moment, in which our dearest interests are concerned: patience, when compared with resignation, is somewhat negative; it consists in the abstaining from all complaint or indication of what one suffers: but resignation consists in a positive sentiment of conformity to the existing circumstances, be they what they may. There are perpetual occurrences which are apt to harass the temper, unless one regards them with patience: the misfortunes of some men are of so calamitous a nature, that if they have not acquired the resignation of Christians, they must inevitably sink under them. Patience applies only to the evils that actually hang over us; but there is a resignation connected with a firm trust in Providence which extends its views to futurity, and prepares us for the worst that may happen.

Though the duty of patience and subjection, where men suffer wrongfully, might possibly be of some force in those times of darkness, yet modern Christianity teaches that then only men are bound to suffer when they are not able to resist.

SOUTH.

My mother is in that dispirited state of resignation which is the effect of a long life, and the loss of what is dear to us.

POPE.

As patience lies in the manner and temper of suffering, and ENDURANCE in the act, we may have endurance and not patience: for we may have much to endure, and consequently endurance: but if we do not endure it with an easy mind and without the disturbance of our looks and words, we have not patience: on the other hand, we may have patience but not endurance: for our patience may be exercised by momentary trifles, which are not sufficiently great or lasting to constitute endurance.

There was never yet philosopher
That could endure the toothache patiently.

SHAKESPEARE.

PATIENT, PASSIVE, SUBMISSIVE.

PATIENT, from the Latin patiens, signifies literally suffering, and is applied to things in general, but especially to what is painful. PASSIVE, from the Latin passivus or passus, signifying literally suffered or acted upon, applies to those matters in which persons have to act; he is patient who bears what he has to suffer without any expression of complaint; he is passive who abstains altogether from acting when he might act.

Patient of thirst and toll,

Son of the desert, even the camel feels
Shoot through his wither'd heart the fiery blast.

THOMSON.

Some men have conceited that the soul has no knowledge or notion but what is in a passive way impressed or delineated upon her from the objects of sense.

MORE.

Patience is a virtue springing from principle; passiveness is always involuntary, and may be supposed to arise from want of spirit.

All I could end in with any satisfaction was patience and abstinence; and although I easily resolved of the last, yet the first was hard to be found in the circumstances of my business as well as of my health.

TEMPLE.

I know that we are supposed a dull, sluggish race, rendered passive by finding our situation tolerable.

BURKE.

Patience is therefore applicable to conscious agents only; passiveness is applicable to inanimate objects which do not act at all, or at least not adversely.

For high above the ground

Their march was; and the passive air upbore
Their nimble tread.

MILTON.

Passive and SUBMISSIVE both refer to the will of others; but passive signifies simply not resisting; submissive signifies positively conforming to the will of another.

Not those alone, who passives own her laws,
But who, weak rebels, more advance her cause.

POPE.

He, in delight

Both of her beauty and submissive charms,
Smil'd with superior love.

MILTON.

PEACE, QUIET, CALM, TRANQUILLITY.

PEACE, in Latin pax, may either come from pactio, an agreement or compact which produces peace, or it may be connected with pausa, and the Greek παυω, to cease. QUIET, v. Easy. CALM, v. Calm. TRANQUILLITY, in Latin tranquillitas, from tranquillus, that is, trans, the intensive syllable, and quillus or quietus, signifying altogether or exceedingly quiet.

Peace is a term of more general application and more comprehensive meaning than the others; it respects either communities or individuals; but quiet respects only individuals or small communities. Nations are said to have peace, but not quiet; persons or families may have both peace and quiet. Peace implies an exemption from public or private broils; quiet implies a freedom from noise or interruption. Every well-disposed family strives to be at peace with its neighbors, and every affectionate family will naturally act in such a manner as to promote peace among all its members: the quiet of a neighborhood is one of its first recommendations as a place of residence.

A false person ought to be looked upon as a public enemy, and a disturber of the peace of mankind. SOUTH.

A paltry tale-bearer will discompose the quiet of a whole family. SOUTH.

Peace and quiet, in regard to individuals, have likewise a reference to the internal state of the mind; but the former expresses the permanent condition of the mind, the latter its transitory condition. Serious matters only can disturb our peace; trivial matters may disturb our quiet: a good man enjoys the peace of a good conscience; but he may have unavoidable cares and anxieties which disturb his quiet. There can be no peace where a man's passions are perpetually engaged in a conflict with each other; there can be no quiet where a man is embarrassed in his pecuniary affairs.

Religion directs us rather to secure inward peace than outward ease, to be more careful to avoid everlasting torments than light afflictions. TILLOTSON.

Indulgent quiet; power serene,
Mother of peace, and joy, and love. HUGHES.

Calm is a species of quiet, which respects objects in the natural or the moral world; it indicates the absence of violent motion as well as violent noise; it is that state which more immediately succeeds a state of agitation. As storms at sea are frequently preceded as well as succeeded by a dead calm, so political storms have likewise their calms which are their attendants, if not their precursors. Tranquillity, on the other hand, is taken more absolutely: it expresses the situation as it exists in the present moment, independently of what goes before or after; it is sometimes applicable to society, sometimes to natural objects, and sometimes to the mind. The tranquillity of the State cannot be preserved unless the authority of the magistrates be upheld; the tranquillity of the air and of all the surrounding objects is one thing which gives the country its peculiar charms; the tranquillity of the mind in the season of devotion contributes essentially to produce a suitable degree of religious fervor.

Cheerfulness banishes all anxious care and discontent, soothes and composes the passions, and keeps the soul in a perpetual calm. ADDISON.

By a patient acquiescence under painful events for the present, we shall be sure to contract a tranquillity of temper. CUMBERLAND.

As epitheta, these terms bear the same relation to each other: people are peaceable as they are disposed to promote peace in society at large, or in their private relations; they are quiet, inasmuch as they abstain from every loud expression, or are exempt from any commotion in themselves; they are calm, inasmuch as they are exempt from the commotion which at any given moment rages around them; they are tranquil, inasmuch as they enjoy an entire exemption from everything which can discompose. A town is peaceable as respects the disposition of the inhabitants: it is quiet as respects its external circumstances, or freedom from bustle and noise: an evening is calm when the air is lulled into a particular stillness, which is not interrupted by any loud sounds: a scene is tranquil which combines everything calculated to soothe the spirits to rest.

Having awed them into very peaceable dispositions, and settled his colony in a very growing condition, he returned home for the benefit of his health. BURNES.

Reputation, beauty, grandeur, nay, royalty itself, would have been gladly exchanged by the possessors for that more quiet and humble station which you enjoy. BLAIR.

Instead of resorting to Jews, computing the value of his father's life, and raising great sums by anticipation, methods which are better suited to the calm unenterprising dissipation of the present age, Henry Clifford turned outlaw.

WHITAKER.

I had been happy
So I had nothing known. Oh now forever
Farewell the tranquil mind! Farewell content.
SHAKESPEARE.

PEACEABLE, PEACEFUL, PACIFIC.

PEACEABLE is used in the proper sense of the word peace, as it expresses an exemption from strife or contest (v. Peace); but PEACEFUL is used in its improper sense, as it expresses an exemption from agitation or commotion. Persons or things are peaceable; things, particularly in the higher style, are peaceful: a family is designated as peaceable in regard to its inhabitants; a house is designated as a peaceful abode, as it is remote from the bustle and hurry of a multitude. PACIFIC signifies either making peace, or disposed to make peace, and is applied mostly to what we do to others. We are peaceable when we do not engage in quarrels of our own; we are pacific if we wish to keep peace, or make peace, between others. Hence the term peaceable is mostly employed for individual or private concerns, and pacific most properly for national concerns: subjects ought to be peaceable, and monarchs pacific.

I know that my peaceable disposition already gives me a very ill figure here (at Ratisbon).

LADY W. MONTAGUE.

Still as the peaceful walks of ancient night,
Silent as are the lamps that burn in tombs.

SHAKESPEARE.

The tragical and untimely death of the French monarch put an end to all pacific measures with regard to Scotland.

ROBERTSON.

PECULIAR, APPROPRIATE, PARTICULAR.

PECULIAR, in Latin peculiaris, from pecus, cattle, in which property consisted, is said of that which belongs to persons or things; APPROPRIATE, signifying appropriated (v. To ascribe), is said of that which belongs to things only: the faculty of speech is peculiar to man, in distinction from all other animals; an address may be appropriate to the circumstances of the individual. Peculiar and PARTICULAR (v. Particular) are both employed to distinguish objects; but the former distinguishes the object by showing its connection with, or alliance to, others; particular distinguishes it by a reference to some acknowledged circumstance; hence we may say that a person enjoys peculiar privileges or particular privileges: in this case peculiar signifies such as are confined to him, and enjoyed by none else; particular signifies such as are distinguished in degree and quality from others of the kind.

Great father Bacchus, to my song repair,
For clust'ring grapes are thy peculiar care.

DRYDEN.

Modesty and diffidence, gentleness and meekness, were looked upon as the appropriate virtues of the sex.

JOHNSON.

When we trust to the picture that objects draw of themselves on the mind, we deceive ourselves, without accurate and particular observation; it is but ill-drawn at first, the outlines are soon blurred, the colors every day grow fainter.

GRAY.

TO PEEL, PARE.

PEEL, from the Latin pellis, a skin, is the same as to skin or to take off the skin: to PARE, from the Latin parare, to trim or make in order, signifies to smooth. The former of these terms denotes a natural, the latter an artificial process: the former excludes the idea of a forcible separation; the latter includes the idea of separation by means of a knife or sharp instrument: potatoes and apples are peeled after they are boiled; they are pared before they are boiled; an orange and a walnut are always peeled but not pared; a cucumber must be pared and not peeled: in like manner, the skin may sometimes be peeled from the flesh, and the nails are pared.

PELLUCID, TRANSPARENT.

PELLUCID, in Latin pellucidus, changed from perlucidus, signifies very shining. TRANSPARENT, in Latin transparens, from trans, through or beyond, and pareo, to appear, signifies that which admits light through it. Pellucid is said of that which is pervious to the light, or of that into which the eye can penetrate; transparent is said of that which is throughout bright: a stream is pellucid; it admits of the light so as to reflect objects, but it is not transparent for the eye.

TO PENETRATE, PIERCE, PERFORATE, BORE.

To PENETRATE (v. Discernment) is simply to make an entrance into any substance; to PIERCE, in French percer, Chaldee peret, to break or rend, is to go still deeper: to PERFORATE, from the Latin per, through, and foris, a door, signifies to make a door through, and to BORE, in Saxon borian, probably changed from fore or foris, a door, signifying to make a door or passage, are to go through, or at all events to make a considerable hollow. To penetrate is a natural and gradual process; in this manner rust penetrates iron, water penetrates wood; to pierce is a violent, and commonly artificial, process; thus an arrow or a bullet pierces through wood. The instrument by which the act of penetration is performed is in no case defined; but that of piercing commonly proceeds by some pointed instrument: we may penetrate the earth by means of a spade, a plough, a knife, or various other instruments; but one pierces the flesh by means of a needle, or one pierces the ground or a wall by means of a pickaxe.

For if when dead we are but dust or clay,
Why think of what posterity shall say?
Their praise or censure cannot us concern,
Nor ever penetrate the silent urn. JENYNS.
Subtle as lightning, bright, and quick, and fierce,
Gold through doors and walls did pierce. COWLEY.

To perforate and bore are modes of piercing that vary in the circumstances of the action, and the objects acted upon; to pierce, in its peculiar use, is a sudden action by which a hollow is produced in any substance; but to perforate and bore are commonly the effect of mechanical art. The body of an animal is pierced by a dart; but cannon is made by perforating or boring the iron: channels are formed under ground by perforating the earth; holes are made in the ear by perforation; holes are made in the leather, or in the wood, by boring; these last two words do not differ in sense, but in application; the latter being a term of vulgar use, though sometimes used in poetry.

Descending like a torrent, it bore directly against the middle of the mountain, and they pretend perforated it from side to side; this, however, I doubt; but certain it is that it pierced to a great depth. BAYDENE.

But Cypys, and the graver sort, thought fit,
The Greeks' suspected present to commit
To seas or flames, at least to search or bore
The sides, and what that space contains 't' explore. DEKHAM.

To penetrate and pierce are likewise employed in an improper sense; to perforate and bore are employed only in the proper sense. The first two bear the same relation to each other as in the former case: penetrate is, however, only employed as the act of persons; pierce is used in regard to things. There is a power in the mind to penetrate the looks and actions, so as justly to interpret their meaning; the eye of the Almighty is said to pierce the thickest veil of darkness. Affairs are sometimes involved in such mystery, that the most enlightened is unable to penetrate either the end or the beginning; the shrieks of distress are sometimes so loud as to seem to pierce the ear.

Inveterate habits choke the unfruitful heart,
Their fibres penetrate its tenderest part. COWPER.

These metaphysic rights entering into common life, like rays of light which pierce into a dense medium, are by the laws of nature refracted from their straight line. BURKE.

PENETRATION, ACUTENESS, SAGACITY.

As characteristics of mind, these terms have much more in them in which they differ than in what they agree: PENETRATION is a necessary property of mind; it exists to a greater or less degree in every rational being that has the due exercise of its rational powers: ACUTENESS is an accidental property that belongs to the mind only, under certain circumstances. As penetration (v. Discernment) denotes the process of entering into substances physically or morally, so acuteness, which is the same as sharpness, denotes the fitness of the thing that performs this process: and as the mind is in both cases the thing that is spoken of, the terms penetration and acuteness are in this particular closely allied. It is clear, however, that the mind may have penetration without having acuteness, although one cannot have acuteness without penetration. If by penetration we are commonly enabled to get at the truth which lies concealed, by acuteness we succeed in piercing the veil that hides it from our view; the former is, therefore, an ordinary, and the latter an extraordinary gift.

He saw the strong and the feeble of a question with much penetration. CUMBERLAND.

Their affairs lay in a narrower compass, their libraries were indifferently furnished, and philosophical researches were carried on with much less industry and acuteness of penetration.

COWPER.

SAGACITY, in Latin sagacitas, from sagis, to perceive quickly, comes in all probability, from the Persian sag, a dog, whence the term has been peculiarly applied to dogs, and from thence extended to all brutes which discover an intuitive wisdom, and also to children, or uneducated persons, in whom there is more penetration than may be expected from the narrow compass of their knowledge; hence, properly speaking, sagacity is natural or uncultivated acuteness.

Activity to seize, not sagacity to discern, is the requisite which youth value. BLAIR.

PEOPLE, NATION.

PEOPLE is in Latin populus, which is connected with the Greek λαος, people, πληθος, a multitude, and πολυς, many. Hence the simple idea of numbers is expressed by the word people: but the term NATION, from natus, marks the connection of numbers by birth; people is, therefore, the generic, and nation the specific term. A nation is a people connected by birth; there cannot, therefore, strictly speaking, be a nation without a people: but there may be a people where there is not a nation. The Jews, when considered as an assemblage, under the special direction of the Almighty, are termed the people of God; but when considered in regard to their common origin, they are denominated the Jewish nation. The Americans, when spoken of in relation to Britain, are a distinct people, because they have each a distinct government; but they are not a distinct nation, because they have a common descent. On this ground the Romans are not called the Roman nation, because their origin was so various, but the Roman people, that is, an assemblage, living under one form of government.

It is too flagrant a demonstration how much vice is the darling of any people, when many among them are preferred for those practices for which in other places they can scarce be pardoned. SOUTH.

When we read the history of nations, what do we read but the crimes and follies of men? BLAIR.

In a still closer application, people is taken for a part of the State, namely, that part of a state which consists of a multitude, in distinction from its government; whence arises a distinction in the use of the terms; for we may speak of the British people, the French or the Dutch people, when we wish merely to talk of the mass, but we speak of the British nation, the French nation, and the Dutch nation, when public measures are in question, which emanate from the government, or the whole people. The English people have ever been remarkable for their attachment to liberty: the abolition of the slave-trade is one of the most glorious acts of public justice which was ever performed by the British nation. Upon the same ground republican States are distinguished by the name of people: but kingdoms are commonly spoken of in history as nations. Hence we say the Spartan people, the Athenian people, the people of Genoa, the people of Venice; but the nations of Europe, the African nations, the English, French, German, and Italian nations.

You speak o' the people

As if you were a god to punish, not

A man of their infirmity. SHAKESPEARE.

It was the resolution of the present ministry to put an end to it (the war), as it had involved the nation in debt almost to bankruptcy.

GOLDSMITH.

PEOPLE, POPULACE, MOB, MOBILITY.

PEOPLE and POPULACE are evidently changes of the same word to express a number. The signification of these terms is that of a number gathered together. People is said of any body supposed to be assembled, as well as really assembled: populace is said of a body only, when actually assembled. The voice of the people is sometimes too loud to be disregarded; the populace in England are fond of dragging their favorites in carriages.

The people like a headlong torrent go,
And every dam they break or overflow.

SHAKESPEARE.

The pliant populace,
Those dupes of novelty, will bend before us.

MALLET.

MOB and MOBILITY are from the Latin mobilis, signifying movableness, which is the characteristic of the multitude: hence Virgil's mobile vulgus. These terms, therefore, designate not only what is low, but tumultuous. A mob is at all times an object of terror: the mobility, whether high or low, are a fluttering order that mostly run from bad to worse.

By the senseless and insignificant clink of misapplied words, some restless demagogues had inflamed the mind of the sottish mob to a strange, unaccountable abhorrence of the best of men.

SOUTH.

PEOPLE, PERSONS, FOLKS.

THE term PEOPLE has already been considered in two acceptations (v. People, Nation; People, Populace), under the general idea of an assembly; but in the present case it is employed to express a small number of individuals: the word people, however, is always considered as one undivided body, and the word PERSON may be distinctly used either in the singular or plural; as we cannot say one, two, three, or four people: but we may say one, two, three, or four persons: yet, on the other hand, we may indifferently say, such people or persons; many people or persons; some people or persons, and the like.

With regard to the use of these terms, which is altogether colloquial, people is employed in general propositions; and persons in those which are specific or referring directly to some particular individuals: people are generally of that opinion; some people think so; some people attended: there were but few persons present at the entertainment; the whole company consisted of six persons.

As the term people is employed to designate the promiscuous multitude, it has acquired a certain meanness of acceptance which makes it less suitable than the word persons, when people of respectability are referred to: were I to say, of any individuals, I do not know who the people are, it would not be so respectful as to say, I do not know who those persons are: in like manner one says, from people of that stamp, better is not to be expected; persons of their appearance do not frequent such places.

FOLKS, through the medium of the Northern languages, is connected with the Latin vulgus, the common people: it is not unusual to say good people, or good folks; and in speaking jocularly to one's friends, the latter term is likewise admissible: but in the serious style it is never employed except in a disrespectful manner: such folks (speaking of gamblers) are often put to sorry shifts.

Performance is even the duller for his act; and, but in the plainer and simple Kind of the people, the deed is quite out of Use.

SHAKESPEARE.

You may observe many honest, inoffensive persons strangely run down by an ugly word.

SOUTH.

I paid some compliments to great folks, who like to be complimented.

HERRING.

TO PERCEIVE, DISCERN, DISTINGUISH.

TO PERCEIVE, in Latin percipio, or per and cipio, signifying to take hold of thoroughly, is a positive, to DISCERN (v. Discernment) a relative, action: we perceive things by themselves; we discern them amidst many others: we perceive that which is obvious; we discern that which is remote, or which requires much attention to get an idea of it. We perceive by a person's looks and words what he intends; we discern the drift of his actions. We may perceive sensible or spiritual objects; we commonly discern only that which is spiritual: we perceive light, darkness, colors, or the truth or falsehood of anything; we discern characters, motives, the tendency and consequences of actions, etc. It is the act of a child to perceive according to the quickness of its senses; it is the act of a man to discern according to the measure of his knowledge and understanding.

And lastly, turning inwardly her eyes, Perceives how all her own ideas rise.

JENKINS.

He was not only of a very keen courage in the exposing of his person, but an excellent discerner and pursuer of advantage upon the enemy.

CLARENDON.

To discern and DISTINGUISH (v. Difference) approach the nearest in sense to each other; but the former signifies to see only one thing, the latter to see two or more in quick succession so as to compare them. We discern what lie in things; we distinguish things according to their outward marks; we discern things in order to understand their essences; we distinguish in order not to confound them together. Experienced and discreet people may discern the signs of the times; it is just to distinguish between an action done from inadvertence, and that which is done from design. The conduct of people is sometimes so veiled by art, that it is not easy to discern their object: it is necessary to distinguish between practice and profession.

One who is actuated by party spirit is almost under an incapacity of discerning either real blemishes or beauties. ADDISON.

Mr. Boyle observes that though the mole be not totally blind (as is generally thought), she has not sight enough to distinguish objects. ADDISON.

PERCEPTION, IDEA, CONCEPTION, NOTION.

PERCEPTION expresses either the act of perceiving (v. To perceive), or the impression produced by that act; in this latter sense it is analogous to an IDEA (v. Idea). The impression of an object that is present to us is termed a perception; the revival of that impression, when the object is removed, is an idea. A combination of ideas by which any image is presented to the mind is a CONCEPTION (v. To comprehend); the association of two or more ideas, so as to constitute a decision, is a NOTION (v. Opinion). Perceptions are clear or confused, according to the state of the sensible organs, and the perceptive faculty; ideas are faint or vivid, vague or distinct, according to the nature of the perception; conceptions are gross or refined, according to the number and extent of one's ideas; notions are true or false, correct or incorrect, according to the extent of one's knowledge. The perception which we have of remote objects is sometimes so indistinct as to leave hardly any traces of the image on the mind; we have in that case a perception, but not an idea: if we read the description of any object, we may have an idea of it; but we need not have any immediate perception: the idea in this case being complex, and formed of many images of which we have already had a perception.

If we present objects to our minds, according to different images which have already been impressed, we are said to have a conception of them: in this case, however, it is not necessary for the objects really to exist; they may be the offspring of the mind's operation within itself: but with regard to notions it is different, for they are formed respecting objects that do really exist, although perhaps the properties or circumstances which we assign to them are not real. If I look at the moon, I have a perception of it; if it disappear from my sight, and the impression remains, I have an idea of it; if an object, differing in shape and color from that or anything else which I may have seen present itself to my mind, it is a conception; if of this moon I conceive that it is no bigger than what it appears to my eye, this is a notion, which, in the present instance, assigns an unreal property to a real object.

What can the fondest mother wish for more,
Ev'n for her darling son, than solid sense,
Perceptions clear, and flowing eloquence?

WYNN.

Imagination selects ideas from the treasures of remembrance. JOHNSON.

It is not a head that is filled with extravagant conceptions which is capable of furnishing the world with diversions of this nature (from humor). ADDISON.

Those notions which are to be collected by reason, in opposition to the senses, will seldom stand forward in the mind, but be treasured in the remoter repositories of the memory. JOHNSON.

TO PERISH, DIE, DECAY.

To PERISH, in French périr, in Latin pereo, compounded of per and eo, signifying to go thoroughly away, expresses more than to DIE (v. To die), and is applicable to many objects; for the latter is properly applied only to express the extinction of animal life, and figuratively to express the extinction of life or spirit in vegetables, or other bodies; but the former is applied to express the dissolution of substances, so that they lose their existence as aggregate bodies. What perishes, therefore, does not always die, although whatever dies, by that very act perishes to a certain extent. Hence we say that wood perishes, although it does not die; people are said either to perish or die: but as the term perish expresses even more than dying, it is possible for the same thing to die and not perish; thus a plant may be said to die when it loses its vegetative power; but it is said to perish if its substance crumbles into dust.

To perish expresses the end; to DECAY (v. To decay) the process by which this end is brought about: a thing may be long in decaying, but when it perishes it ceases at once to act or to exist: things may, therefore, perish without decaying; they may likewise decay without perishing. Things which are altogether new, and have experienced no kind of decay, may perish by means of water, fire, lightning, and the like: on the other hand, wood, iron, and other substances may begin to decay, but may be saved from immediately perishing by the application of preventives.

Beauty and youth about to perish, finds
Such noble pity in brave English minds.

WALLER.

The steer, who to the yoke was bred to bow,

Falls down and dies.

DRYDEN.

The soul's dark cottage, batter'd and decay'd,
Lets in new light through chinks that time has

WALLER.

TO PERPETRATE, COMMIT.

THE idea of doing something wrong is common to these terms; but PERPETRATE, from the Latin perpetro, compounded of per and petro, in Greek par- ro, signifying thoroughly to compass or bring about, is a much more determined proceeding than that of COMMITTING. One may commit offences of various degrees and magnitude; but one perpetrates crimes only, and those of the more heinous kind. A lawless banditti, who spend their lives in the perpetration of the most horrid crimes, are not to be restrained by the ordinary course of justice; he who commits any offence against the good order of society exposes himself to the censure of others, who may be his inferiors in certain respects.

Then shows the forest which, in after-times,
Fierce Romulus, for perpetrated crimes,
A refuge made.

DRYDEN.

The miscarriages of the great designs of princes are of little use to the bulk of mankind, who seem very little interested in admonitions against errors which they cannot commit.

JOHNSON.

TO PERSUADE, ENTICE, PREVAIL UPON.

PERSUADE (v. Conviction) and ENTICE (v. To allure) are employed to express different means to the same end; namely, that of drawing any one to a thing: one persuades a person by means of words; one entices him either by words or actions; one may persuade either to a good or bad thing; but one entices commonly to that which is bad; one uses arguments to persuade, and arts to entice.

Persuade and entice comprehend either the means or the end, or both; PREVAIL UPON comprehends no more than the end: we may persuade without prevailing upon, and we may prevail upon without persuading. Many will turn a deaf ear to all our persuasions, and will not be prevailed upon, although persuaded: on the other hand, we may be prevailed upon by the force of remonstrance, authority, and the like; and in this case we are prevailed upon without being persuaded. We should never persuade another to do that which we are not willing to do ourselves; credulous or good-natured people are easily prevailed upon to do things which tend to their own injury.

I beseech you let me have so much credit with you as to persuade you to communicate any doubt or scruple which occurs to you, before you suffer them to make too deep an impression upon you.

CLARENDON.

PRIDEAUX.

PICTURE, PRINT, ENGRAVING.

PICTURE (v. To paint) is any likeness taken by the hand of the artist: the PRINT is the copy of the painting in a printed state; and the ENGRAVING is that which is produced by an engraver: every engraving is a print; but every print is not an engraving; for the picture may be printed off from something beside an engraving, as in the case of woodcuts. The term picture is sometimes used for any representation of a likeness, without regard to the mode by which it is formed: in this case it is employed mostly for the representations of the common kind that are found in books; but print and engraving are said of the higher specimens of the art. On certain occasions the word engraving is most appropriate, as to take an engrav- ing of a particular object; on other occasions the word print, as a handsome print, or a large print.

The pictures plac'd for ornament and use,
The twelve good rules, the royal game of goose.

GOLDSMITH.

Tim, with surprise and pleasure staring,
Ran to the glass, and then comparing
His own sweet figure with the print,
Distinguish'd every feature in't.

SWIFT.

Since the public has of late begun to express a relish for engravings, drawings, copyings, and for the original paintings of the chief Italian school, I doubt not that in very few years we shall make an equal progress in this other science.

SHAPTESBURY.

PILLAR, COLUMN.

PILLAR, from pila, signifies that which is piled up. COLUMN, which comes immediately from the Latin columna, is of Celtic origin, being in the Welsh colov, and the Irish coll, which signifies a stem or stalk. Though very different in their original meaning, they are both applied to the same object, namely, to whatever is artificially set up in wood, stone, or other hard material; but the word pillar having come first into use, is the most general in its application to any structure, whether rude or otherwise; the term column, on the other hand, is applied to whatever is ornamental, as the Grecian order of columns.

Pillars, which we may likewise call columns, for the word among artificers is almost naturalized, I could distinguish into simple and compound.

WOTTON.

So in poetry, where simply a support is spoken of, the term pillar may be used.

The palace built by Picus vast and proud,
Supported by a hundred pillars stood.

DRYDEN.

But where grandeur or embellishment is to be expressed, the term column.

What'er adorns
The princely dome, the column, and the arch,
The breathing marbles, and the sculptur'd gold,
Beyond the proud possessor's narrow claim
His tuneful breast enjoys.

AKENSIDE.

Both terms are applied to other objects having a similarity either of form or use. Whatever is set up in the form of a pillar is so denominated; as stone pillars in cross-ways, or over graves, and the like.

In the court of a mosque there stands a pillar, on which is marked the Nile's increase.

ROLLIN.

Whatever is drawn out in the form of a column, be the material what it may of which it is composed, it is denominated a column; as a column of water, smoke, etc.; a column of men, a column of a page.

I see a column of slow rising smoke
Overtop the lofty wood, that skirts the wild.

COWPER.

Pillar is frequently employed in a moral application, and in that case it always implies a support.

Withdraw religion, and you shake all the pillars of society.

BLAIR.

PITEOUS, DOLEFUL, WOFUL, RUEFUL.

PITEOUS signifies moving pity (v. Pity). DOLEFUL, or full of dole, in Latin dolor, pain, signifies indicative of much pain. WOFUL, or full of woe, signifies likewise indicative of woe, which from the German weh, implies pain. RUEFUL, or full of rue, from the German reuen, to repent, signifies indicative of much sorrow.

The close alliance in sense of these words one to another is obvious from the above explanation; piteous is applicable to one's external expression of bodily or mental pain; a child makes piteous lamentations when it suffers for hunger, or has lost its way; doleful applies to those sounds which convey the idea of pain; there is something doleful in the tolling of a funeral bell or in the sound of a muffled drum: woful applies to the circumstances and situations of men; a scene is woful in which we witness a large family of young children suffering under the complicated horrors of sickness and want; rueful applies to the outward indications of inward sorrow depicted in the looks or countenance. The term is commonly applied to the sorrows which spring from a gloomy or distorted imagination, and has therefore acquired a somewhat ludicrous acceptance; hence we find in Don Quixote, the knight of the rueful countenance introduced.

Entreat, pray, beg, and raise a doleful cry.

DRYDEN.

A brutish temptation made Samson, from a judge of Israel, a woful judgment upon it.

SOUTH.

With pond'rous clubs,
As weak against the mountain heaps they push
Their beating breast in vain and piteous bray,
He lays them quivering on th' ensanguin'd plain.

THOMSON.

Coccyus nam'd, of lamentation loud,
Heard on the rueful stream.

MILTON.

PITIABLE, PITEOUS, PITIFUL.

THREE three epithets drawn from the same word have shades of difference in sense and application. PITIABLE signifies deserving of pity; PITEOUS, moving pity; PITIFUL, full of that which awakens pity: a condition is pitiable which is so distressing as to call forth pity; a cry is piteous which indicates such distress as can excite pity; a conduct is pitiful which marks a character entitled to pity. The first of these terms is taken in the best sense of the term pity; the last two in its unfavorable sense: what is pitiable in a person is independent of anything in himself; circumstances have rendered him pitiable; what is piteous and pitiful in a man arises from the helplessness and imbecility or worthlessness of his character; the former respects that which is weak; the latter that which is worthless in him: when a poor creature makes piteous moans, it indicates his incapacity to help himself as he ought to do out of his troubles; when a man of rank has recourse to pitiful shifts to gain his ends, he betrays the innate meanness of his soul.

Is it then impossible that a man may be found who, without criminal ill intention or pitiable absurdity, shall prefer a mixed government to either of the extremes?

BURKE.

I have in view, calling to mind with heed
Part of our sentence, that thy seed shall bruise
The serpent's head; piteous amends, unless
Be meant, whom I conjecture, our grand foe.

MILTON.

Bacon wrote a pitiful letter to King James I.
not long before his death.

HOWELL.

PITY, COMPASSION.

PITY is in all probability contracted from piety. COMPASSION, in Latin compassio, from con and patior, signifies to suffer in conjunction with another.

The pain which one feels at the distresses of another is the idea that is common to the signification of both these terms, but they differ in the object that causes the distress: the former is excited principally by the weakness or degraded condition of the subject; the latter by his uncontrollable and inevitable misfortunes. We pity a man of a weak understanding who exposes his weakness: we compassionate the man who is reduced to a state of beggary and want. Pity is kindly extended by those in higher condition to such as are humble in their outward circumstances; the poor are at all times deserving of pity, even when their poverty is the positive fruit of vice: compassion is a sentiment which extends to persons in all conditions; the good Samaritan had compassion on the traveller who fell among thieves. Pity, though a tender sentiment, is so closely allied to contempt, that an ingenuous mind is always loath to be the subject of it, since it can never be awakened but by some circumstance of inferiority; it hurts the honest pride of a man to reflect that he can excite no interest but by provoking a comparison to his own disadvantage: on the other hand, such is the general infirmity of our natures, and such our exposure to the casualties of human life, that compassion is a pure and delightful sentiment, that is reciprocally bestowed and acknowledged by all with equal satisfaction.

Others extended naked on the floor,
Exil'd from human pity here they lie,
And know no end of misery till they die.

POMFREY.

His late compassion in the victor bred;
Stern as he was, he yet rever'd the dead.

PORR.

PITY, MERCY.

THE feelings one indulges, and the conduct one adopts, toward others who suffer for their demerits, is the common idea which renders these terms synonymous; but PITY lays hold of those circumstances which do not affect the moral character, or which diminish the culpability of the individual: MERCY lays hold of those external circumstances which may diminish punishment. Pity is often a sentiment unaccompanied with action; mercy is often a mode of action unaccompanied with sentiment: we have or take pity upon a person, but we show mercy to a person. Pity is bestowed by men in their domestic and private capacity; mercy is shown in the exercise of power: a master has pity upon his offending servant by passing over his offences, and affording him the opportunity of amendment; the magistrate shows mercy to a criminal by abridging his punishment. Pity lies in the breast of an individual, and may be bestowed at his discretion: mercy is restricted by the rules of civil society; it must not interfere with the administration of justice. Young offenders call for great pity, as their offences are often the fruit of inexperience and bad example, rather than of depravity: mercy is an imperative duty in those who have the power of inflicting punishment, particularly in cases where life and death are concerned.

I pity from my soul unhappy men,
Compell'd by want to prostitute their pen.

ROSCOMMON.

Examples of justice must be made for terror to some, examples of mercy for comfort to others.

BACON.

Pity and mercy are likewise applied to the brute creation with a similar distinction: pity shows itself in relieving real misery, and in lightening burdens; mercy is displayed in the measure of pain which one inflicts. One takes pity on a poor ass to whom one gives fodder to relieve hunger; one shows it mercy by abstaining from laying heavy stripes upon its back.

An ant dropped into the water, a wood-pigeon took pity on him, and threw him a little bough.

L'ESTRANGE.

Cowards are cruel, but the brave
Love mercy, and delight to save.

GAY.

These terms are moreover applicable to the Deity, in regard to his creatures, particularly man. God takes pity on us as entire dependents upon him: he extends his mercy toward us as offenders against him: he shows his pity by relieving our wants; he shows his mercy by forgiving our sins.

PLACE, STATION, SITUATION, POSITION, POST.

PLACE, in German platz, from platt, even or open, is the abstract or general term that comprehends the idea of any given space that may be occupied: STATION (v. Condition) is the place where one stands or is fixed; SITUATION, in Latin situs, from the Hebrew sai, to put, and POSITION, which is a variation of the same, respect the object as well as the place; that is, they signify how the object is put, as well as where it is put. A place or a station may be either vacant or otherwise; a situation and a position necessarily suppose some occupied place. A place is either assigned or not assigned, known or unknown, real or supposed: a station is a specifically assigned place. We choose a place according to our convenience, and we leave it again at pleasure; but we take up our station, and hold it for a given period. One inquires for a place which is known only by name; the station is appointed for us, and is, therefore, easily found out. Travellers wander from place to place; soldiers have always some station.

Surely the church is a place where one day's truce ought to be allowed to the dissensions and animosities of mankind.

BURKE.

The seditious remained within their stations, which, by reason of the nastiness of the beastly multitude, might more fitly be termed a kennel than a camp.

HAYWARD.

The terms place and situation are said of objects animate or inanimate; station only of animate objects, or those which are figuratively considered as such; position properly of inanimate objects, or those which are considered as such: a person chooses a place; a thing occupies a place, or has a place set apart for it: a station or stated place must always be assigned to each person who has to act in concert with others; a situation or position is chosen for a thing to suit the convenience of an individual: the former is said of things as they stand with regard to others; the latter of things as they stand with regard to themselves. The situation of a house comprehends the nature of the place, whether on high or low ground; and also its relation to other objects, that is, whether higher or lower, nearer or more distant: the position of a window in a house is considered as to whether it is straight or crooked; the position of a book is considered as to whether it stands leaning or upright, with its face or back forward. Situation is moreover said of things that come there of themselves; position only of those things which have been put there at will. The situation of some tree or rock, on some elevated place, is agreeable to be looked at, or to be looked from. The faulty position of a letter in writing sometimes spoils the whole performance.

Hope, with uplifted foot set free from earth,
Pants for the place of her ethereal birth.

COWPER.

The planets in their station listening stood.

MILTON.

Prince Cesarini has a palace in a pleasant situation, and set off with many beautiful walks.

ADDISON.

By varying the position of my eye, and moving it nearer to, or farther from, the direct beam of the sun's light, the color of the sun's reflected light constantly varied upon the speculum as it did upon my eye.

NEWTON.

Situation and position, when applied to persons, are similarly distinguished; the situation is that in which a man finds himself, either with or without his own choice; the position is that in which he is placed without his own choice.

A situation in which I am as unknown to all the world as I am ignorant of all that passes in it would exactly suit me.

COWPER.

Every step in the progression of existence changes our position with respect to the things about us.

JOHNSON.

Place, situation, and station have an extended signification in respect to men in civil society, that is, either to their circumstances or actions; POST has no other sense when applied to persons. Place is as indefinite as before; it may be taken for that share which we personally have in society either generally, as when every one is said to fill a place in society; or particularly for a specific share of its business, as to fill a place under government: situation is that kind of place which specifies either our share in its business, but with a higher import than the general term place, or a share in its gains and losses, as the prosperous or adverse situation of a man: a station is that kind of place which denotes a share in its relative consequence, power, and honor; in which sense every man holds a certain station; the post is that kind of place in which he has a specific share in the duties of society; the situation comprehends many duties; but the post includes properly one duty only; the word being figuratively employed from the post or particular spot which a soldier is said to occupy. A clerk in a counting-house fills a place: a clergyman holds a situation by virtue of his office; he is in the station of a gentleman by reason of his education, as well as his situation: a faithful minister will always consider that his post where good is to be done.

These two sorts of men (rich and poor) move in the same direction, though in a different place. They both move with the order of the universe.

BURKE.

Though this is a situation of the greatest ease and tranquility in human life, yet this is by no means fit to be the subject of all men's petitions to God.

ROGERS.

It has been my fate to be engaged in business much and often, by the stations in which I have been placed.

ATTENBURY.

I will never, while I have health, be wanting to my duty in my post.

ATTENBURY.

TO PLACE, DISPOSE, ORDER.

To PLACE is to assign a place (v. Place) to a thing; to DISPOSE is to place according to a certain rule; to ORDER is to place in a certain order. To place is an unqualified act both as to the manner and circumstances of the action; to dispose is a qualified act, it is qualified as to the manner; the former is an act of expediency or necessity; the latter is an act of judgment or discretion. Things are often placed from the necessity of being placed in some way or another: they are disposed so as to appear to the best advantage. We may place a single object, but it is necessary that there should be several objects to be disposed. One places a book on a shelf, or disposes a number of books according to their sizes on different shelves.

If I have a wish that is prominent above the rest, it is to see you placed to your satisfaction near me.

SAMUEL JOHNSON.

And last the relics by themselves dispose,
Which in a brassen urn the priests enclose.

DRYDEN.

To order and dispose are both taken in the sense of putting several things in some order, but dispose may be simply for the purpose of order and arrangement; ordering, on the other hand, comprehends command as well as regulation. Things are disposed in a shop to the best advantage, or in the moral application, the thoughts are disposed; a man orders his family, or a commander orders the battle.

On Tuesday, the 16th of May, about five of the clock in the morning, they disposed themselves to their work. CLARENDON.

Major-general Chudleigh, who ordered the battle, failed in no part of a soldier. CLARENDON.

PLACE, SPOT, SITE.

A PARTICULAR or given space is the idea common to these terms; but the former is general and indefinite, the latter specific. PLACE is limited to no size or quantity, it may be large: but SPOT implies a very small place, such as, by a figure of speech, is supposed to be no larger than a spot: the term place is employed upon every occasion; the term spot is confined to very particular cases: we may often know the place in a general way where a thing is, but it is not easy after a course of years to find out the exact spot on which it has happened. The place where our Saviour was buried is to be seen and pointed out, but not the very spot where he lay.

Oh how unlike the place from whence they fell! MILTON.

My fortune leads to traverse realms alone,
And find no spot of all the world my own.

GOLDSMITH.

The SITE is the spot on which anything stands or is situated; it is more commonly applied to a building, or any place marked out for a specific purpose; as the site on which a camp had been formed.

This place is celebrated for being the site of the most ancient British monastery. PENNANT.

PLAY, GAME, SPORT.

PLAY, in French plaire, to please, signifies in general what one does to please one's self. GAME, in Saxon gaming, is very probably connected with the Greek γᾱμew, to marry, which is the season for games; the word γᾱμew itself comes from γᾱw, to be buoyant or boasting, whence comes our word gay. SPORT is in German spass or posse, which is connected with the Greek παίζω, to jest.

Play and game both include exercise, corporeal or mental, or both; but play is an unsystematic, game a systematic, exercise: children play when they merely run after each other, but this is no game; on the other hand, when they exercise with the ball according to any rule, this is a game: every game, therefore, is a play, but every play is not a game: trundling a hoop is a play, but not a game: cricket is both a play and a game. One person may have his play by himself, but there must be more than one to have a game. Play is adapted to infants; games to those who are more advanced in years.

Boys and girls come out to play,
Moon shines as bright as day. OLD SONG.

If I play at plquet for sixpence with a man or a woman two years younger than myself, I always lose; and there is a young girl of twenty who never fails winning my money at backgammon, though she is a bungler and the game ecclesiastic. SWIFT.

Play is sometimes taken for the act of amusing one's self with anything intellectual, and game for the act with which any game is played.

Play is not unlawful merely as a contest. HAWKSWORTH.

There is no man of sense and honesty but must see and own, whether he understands the game or not, that it is an evident folly for any people, instead of prosecuting the old honest methods of industry and frugality, to sit down to a public gaming-table and play off their money to one another. BERKELEY.

Play and sport signify any action or motion for pleasure whether as it regards man or brute; but play refers more to the action, and sport to the pleasure produced by the action.

The squirrel flippant, pert, and full of play. COWPER.

So Eden was a scene of harmless sport,
Where kindness on his part who ruled the whole
Begot a tranquil confidence in all,
And fear as yet was not, nor cause for fear.

COWPER.

Game and sport both imply an object pursued, but game comprehends an object of contest which is to be obtained by art, as the Olympic and other games of antiquity.

The Olympian games were celebrated once in five years. POTTER.

Sport comprehends a pleasurable object to be obtained by bodily exercise; as field sports, rustic sports, and the like.

Now for our mountain sport up to yon hill;
Your legs are young. SHAKESPEARE.

Game may be extended figuratively to any object of pursuit; as the game is lost, the game is over.

War! that mad game the world so loves to play. SWIFT.

Sport is sometimes used for the subject of sport to another.

Commit not thy prophetic mind
To flitting leaves, the sport of every wind,
Lest they disperse in air. DRYDEN.

PLAYFUL, GAMESOME, SPORTIVE.

PLAYFUL, or full of play, GAME-SOME, having game, or a disposition to game, and SPORTIVE, disposed to sport, are taken in a sense similar to the primitive (v. Play). Playful is applicable to youth or childhood, when there is the greatest disposition to play. Gamesome and sportive are applied to persons of maturer years; the former in the bad sense, and the latter in the good sense. A person may be said to be gamesome who gives into idle jests, or sportive who indulges in harmless sport.

He is scandalized at youth for being lively, and childhood at being playful. ADDISON.

Bellial in like gamesome mood. MILTON.

I am not in a sportive humor now;
Tell me, and daily not, where is the money?
SHAKESPEARE.

PLEASURE, JOY, DELIGHT, CHARM.

PLEASURE, from the Latin placere, to please or give content, is the generic term, involving in itself the common idea of the other terms. JOY, v. Glad. DELIGHT, in Latin delicia, from delicio, to allure, signifies what allures the mind.

Pleasure is a term of most extensive use; it embraces one grand class of our feelings and sensations, and is opposed to nothing but pain, which embraces the second class or division: joy and delight are but modes or modifications of pleasure, differing as to the degree, and as to the objects or sources. Pleasure, in its peculiar acceptation, is smaller in degree than either joy or delight, but in its universal acceptation it defines no degree: the term is indifferently employed for the highest as well as the lowest degree: whereas joy and delight can be employed only to express a positively high degree. Pleasure is produced by any or every object; everything by which we are surrounded acts upon us more or less to produce it; we may have pleasure either from without or from within: pleasure from the gratification of our senses, from the exercise of our affections, or the exercise of our understandings; pleasure from our own selves, or pleasures from others: but joy is derived from the exercise of the affections; and delight either from the affections or the understanding. In this manner we distinguish the pleasures of the table, social pleasures, or intellectual pleasures; the joy of meeting an old friend; or the delight of pursuing a favorite object.

Pleasures are either transitory or otherwise: joy is in its nature commonly short of duration, it springs from particular events; it is pleasure at high tide, but it may come and go as suddenly as the events which caused it; one's joy may be awakened and damped in quick succession. Delight is not so fleeting as joy, but it may be less so than simple pleasure; delight arises from a state of outward circumstances which is naturally more durable than that of joy; but it is a state seldomer attainable and not so much at one's command as pleasure.

My young men have the pleasure of hearing themselves praised by those who are in years.

ADDISON.

While he who virtue's radiant course has ran,
Descends like a serenely setting sun;
His thoughts triumphant heav'n alone employs,
And hope anticipates his future joys. JENYNS.
Vain are all sudden sallies of delight,
Convulsions of a weak distemper'd joy. YOUNG.

Pleasure, joy, and delight are likewise employed for the things which give pleasure, joy, or delight. CHARM (v. Attraction) is used only in the sense of what charms, or gives a high degree of pleasure; but not a degree equal to that of joy or delight, though greater than of ordinary pleasure; pleasure intoxicates; the joys of heaven are objects of a Christian's pursuit; the delights of matrimony are lasting to those who are susceptible of true affection; the charms of rural scenery never fail of their effect whenever they offer themselves to the eye.

That every day has its pains and sorrows is universally experienced; but if we look impartially about us, we shall find that every day has likewise its pleasures and its joys. JOHNSON.

Before the day of departure (from the country) a week is always appropriated for the payment and reception of ceremonial visits, at which nothing can be mentioned but the delights of London. JOHNSON.

When thus creation's charms around combine,
Amid the store should thankless pride repine?
GOLDSMITH.

PLENTIFUL, PLENTEOUS, ABUNDANT, COPIOUS, AMPLE.

PLENTIFUL and PLENTEOUS, signifying the presence of plenty, plenitude, or fulness, differ only in use: the former being mostly employed in the familiar, the latter in the grave style. Plenty fills; ABUNDANCE, in Latin abundantia, from abundo, to overflow, compounded of the intensive ab and unda, a wave, signifying literally overflowing, does more, it leaves a superfluity; as that, however, which fills suffices as much as that which flows over, the term abundance is often employed promiscuously with that of plenty; we can indifferently say a plentiful harvest, or an abundant harvest. Plentiful is, however, a more familiar term than abundant: we say, therefore, most commonly, a plenty of provisions; a plenty of food; a plenty of corn, wine, and oil: but an abundance of words; an abundance of riches; an abundance of wit or humor. In certain years fruit is plentiful, and at other times grain is plentiful; in all cases we have abundant cause for gratitude to the Giver of all good things.

The resty knaves are overrun with ease,
As plenty ever is the nurse of faction. ROWE.
And God said, let the waters generate
Reptile with spawn abundant, living soul.

MILTON.

COPIOUS, in Latin copiosus, from copia, or con and open, wealth, signifying having a store, and AMPLE (v. Ample) are modes either of plenty or abundance: the former is employed in regard to what is collected or brought into one point; the term ample is employed only in regard to what may be narrowed or expanded; a copious stream of blood, or a copious flow of words, equally designate the quantity which is collected together, as an ample provision, an ample store, an ample share, marks that which may at pleasure be increased or diminished.

Smooth to the shelving brink a copious flood
Rolls fair and placid. THOMSON.
Peaceful beneath primeval trees, that cast
Their ample shade o'er Niger's yellow stream,
Leans the huge elephant, wisest of brutes.

THOMSON.

TO PLUNGE, DIVE.

PLUNGE is but a variation of pluck, pull, and the Latin pello, to drive or force forward. DIVE is but a variation of dip, which is, under various forms, to be found in the Northern languages.

One plunges sometimes in order to dive; but one may plunge without diving, and one may dive without plunging: to plunge is to dart head-foremost into the water: to dive is to go to the bottom of the water, or toward it: it is a good practice for bathers to plunge into the water when they first go in, although it is not advisable for them to dive; ducks frequently dive into the water without ever plunging. Thus far they differ in their natural sense; but in the figurative application they differ more widely: to plunge, in this case, is an act of rashness: to dive is an act of design: a young man hurried away by his passions will plunge into every extravagance when he comes into possession of his estate: people of a prying temper seek to dive into the secrets of others.

The French plunged themselves into these calamities they suffer, to prevent themselves from settling into a British constitution. BUREK.

How he did seem to dive into their hearts
With humble and familiar courtesy.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO POISE, BALANCE.

POISE is in French poide, a weight, and peser, to weigh. BALANCE is in French balance, from the Latin bilanz, or bis and lanz, a pair of scales.

To poise is properly to keep the weight from pressing on either side; to balance is to keep the balance even. The idea of bringing into an equilibrium is common to both terms, but a thing is poised as respects itself; it is balanced as respects other things; a person poises a plain stick in his hand when he wants it to lie even; he balances the stick if it has a particular weight at each end: a person may poise himself, but he balances others: when not on firm ground, it is necessary to poise one's self; when two persons are situated one at each end of a beam, they may balance one another. In the moral application they are similarly distinguished.

Some evil, terrible and unforeseen,
Must sure ensue to poise the scale against
This vast profusion of exceeding pleasure.

ROWE.

This, oh! this very moment let me die,
While hopes and fears in equal balance lie.

DRYDEN.

POISON, VENOM.

POISON, in French poison, Latin potio, a potion, is a general term; in its original meaning it signifies any potion which acts destructively upon the system. VENOM, in French venin, Latin venenum, is a species of deadly or malignant poison: a poison may be either slow or quick; a venom is always most active in its nature: a poison must be administered inwardly to have its effect; a venom will act by an external application: the juice of the hellebore is a poison; the tongue of the adder and the tooth of the viper contain venom; many plants are unfit to be eaten on account of the poisonous quality which is in them; the Indians are in the habit of dipping the tips of their arrows in a venomous juice, which renders the slightest wound mortal.

Hemlock was formerly supposed a deadly poison.
GOLDSMITH.

As the venom spread,
Frightful convulsions writh'd his tortur'd limbs.
FENTON.

The moral application of these terms is clearly drawn from their proper acceptation: the poison must be infused or injected into the subject; the venom acts upon him externally: bad principles are justly compared to a poison, which some are so unhappy as to suck in with their mother's milk; the shafts of envy are peculiarly venomous when directed against those in elevated stations.

The devil can convey the poison of his suggestions quicker than the agitation of thought or the strictures of fancy.

SHAKESPEARE.

POLITE, POLISHED, REFINED.

POLITE (v. Civil) denotes a quality; POLISHED, a state: he who is polite is so according to the rules of politeness; he who is polished is polished by the force of art: a polite man is, in regard to his behavior, a finished gentleman; but a rude person may be more or less polished or freed from rudeness. REFINED rises in sense, both in regard to polite and polished: a man is indebted to nature, rather than to art, for his refinement; but his politeness, or his polish, is entirely the fruit of education. Politeness and polish do not extend to anything but externals; refinement applies as much to the mind as the body: rules of conduct, and good society, will make a man polite; lessons in dancing will serve to give a polish; refined manners or principles will naturally arise out of refinement of men.

As polish extends only to the exterior, it is less liable to excess than refinement: when the language, the walk, and deportment of a man is polished, he is divested of all that can make him offensive in social intercourse; but if his temper be refined beyond a certain boundary, he loses the nerve of character which is essential for maintaining his dignity against the rude shocks of human life.

A pedant among men of learning and sense is like an ignorant servant giving an account of polite conversation.
STEELE.

In rude nations the dependence of children on their parents is of shorter continuance than in polished societies.
ROBERTSON.

What is honor but the height and flower of morality, and the utmost refinement of conversation?

POLITICAL, POLITIC.

POLITICAL has the proper meaning of the word polity, which, from the Greek πολιτεία and πολις, a city, signifies the government either of a city or a country. POLITIC, like the word policy, has the improper meaning of the word polity, namely, that of clever management, because the affairs of states are sometimes managed with considerable art and finesse: hence we speak of political government as opposed to that which is ecclesiastic; and of politic conduct as opposed to that which is unwise and without foresight: in political questions, it is not politic for individuals to set themselves up in opposition to those who are in power; the study of politics, as a science, may make a man a clever statesman; but it may not always enable him to discern true policy in his private concerns.

Machiavel laid down this for a master rule, in his political scheme, that the show of religion was helpful to the politician.
SOUTH.

BURKE.

POOR, PAUPER.

POOR and PAUPER are both derived from the Latin pauper, which comes from the Greek παυρος, small. Poor is a term of general use; pauper is a term of particular use: a pauper is a poor man who lives upon alms or the relief of the parish: the former is, therefore, indefinite in its meaning; the latter conveys a reproachful idea. The word poor is used as a substantive only in the plural number; pauper is a substantive both in the singular and plural: the poor of the parish are, in general, a heavy burden upon the inhabitants: there are some persons who are not ashamed to live and die as paupers.

POSITION, POSTURE.

POSITION (v. Place) is here the general term, POSTURE the particular term. The position is that in which a body is placed in respect to other bodies; as the standing with one's face or back to an object is a position; but a posture is that position which a body assumes in respect to itself, as a sitting or reclining posture.

Every step in the progression of existence changes our position with respect to the things about us. JOHNSON.

When I entered his room he was sitting in a contemplative posture, with his eyes fixed on the ground. HAWKSWORTH.

POSITIVE, ABSOLUTE, PEREMPTORY.

POSITIVE, in Latin positivus, from pono, to put or place, signifies placed or fixed, that is, fixed or established in the mind. ABSOLUTE (v. Absolute) signifies uncontrolled by any external circumstances. PEREMPTORY, in Latin peremptorius, from perimo, to take away, signifies removing all further question.

Positive and absolute are employed either for things or persons; peremptory for persons only, or for that which is personal. What is positive has a determinate existence, it is opposed to what is negative, indeterminate, or precarious; as positive good, positive pleasure or pain; what is absolute is without dependence or connection, it is opposed mostly to the relative or conditional, as absolute existence, absolute justice.

The diminution or ceasing of pain does not operate like positive pleasure. BURKE.

Those parts of the moral world which have not an absolute, may yet have a relative beauty, in respect of some other parts concealed from us. ADDISON.

In regard to persons or what is personal, positive either applies to the assurance of a man, or to the manner of his expressing that assurance; a person may be positive in his own mind (v. Confident), or he may make a positive assertion; absolute applies either to the mode of acting or the circumstances under which one acts, as to have an absolute possession or command, to make an absolute promise; peremptory is applied to the nature of the action, or the manner of performing it; a command may be peremptory, and a tone peremptory. A positive assertion will remove doubt if made by one entitled to credit; an absolute promise will admit of no reservation on the part of the person making it. A peremptory command admits of no demur or remonstrance; a peremptory answer satisfies or puts to silence.

This he very confidently and positively denied, being well assured it could never be proved. CLARENDON.

Many things might have happened to render an absolute engagement of this nature highly inexpedient. SIR W. SCOTT.

The Highlander gives to every question an answer so prompt and peremptory, that scepticism is dared into silence. JOHNSON.

POSSESSOR, PROPRIETOR, OWNER, MASTER.

THE POSSESSOR has the full power, if not the right, of the present disposal over the object of possession; the PROPRIETOR and OWNER have the unlimited right of transfer, but not always the power of immediate disposal. The proprietor and the owner are the same in signification, though not in application: the first term being used principally in regard to matters of importance; the latter on familiar occasions: the proprietor of an estate is a more suitable expression than the owner of an estate: the owner of a book is more becoming than the proprietor. The possessor and the MASTER are commonly the same person, when those things are in question which are subject to possession; but the terms are otherwise so different in their original meaning, that they can scarcely admit of comparison: the possessor of a house is naturally the master of the house; and, in general, whatever a man possesses that he has in his power, and is consequently master of; but we may have, legally, the right of possessing a thing over which we have actually no power of control: in this case, we are nominally possessor, but virtually not master. A minor, or insane person, may be both possessor and proprietor of that over which he has no control; a man is, therefore, on the other hand, appropriately denominated master, not possessor of his actions.

I am convinced that a poetic talent is a blessing to its possessor. SEWARD.

Death! great proprietor of all! 'tis thine

One cause of the insufficiency of riches (to produce happiness) is, that they very seldom make their owner rich. JOHNSON.

POSSIBLE, PRACTICABLE, PRACTICAL.

POSSIBLE, from the Latin possum, to be able, signifies properly to be able to be done: PRACTICABLE, from practico (v. To exercise), signifies to be able to put in practice: hence the difference between possible and practicable is the same as between doing a thing at all, or doing it as a rule. There are many things possible which cannot be called practicable; but what is practicable must, in its nature, be possible. The possible depends solely on the power of the agent; the practicable depends on circumstances: a child cannot say how much it is possible for him to learn until he has tried; schemes have sometimes everything apparently to recommend them to notice but that which is of the first importance, namely, their practicability.

How can we, without supposing ourselves under the constant care of a Supreme Being, give any possible account for that nice proportion which we find in every great city between the deaths and births of its inhabitants? ADDISON.

He who would aim at practicable things should turn upon allaying our pain, rather than removing our sorrow. STEELE.

The practicable is that which may or can be practised; the PRACTICAL is that which is intended for practice: the former, therefore, applies to that which men devise to carry into practice; the latter to that which they have to practise: projectors ought to consider what is practicable; divines and moralists have to consider what is practical. The practicable is opposed to the impracticable; the practical to the theoretical or speculative.

Practical cunning shows itself in political matters. SOCIETY.

POVERTY, WANT, PENURY, INDIGENCE, NEED.

POVERTY, which marks the condition of being poor, is a general state of fortune opposed to that of riches.

Poverty is apt to betray a man into envy, riches into arrogance. ADDISON.

Poverty admits of different states or degrees which are expressed by the other terms. WANT, from the verb to want, denotes, when taken absolutely, the want of the first necessities, which is a permanent state, and a low state of poverty; but it may sometimes denote an occasional want, as a traveller in a desert may be exposed to want; or it may imply the want of particular things, as when we speak of our wants.

Want is a bitter and a hateful good, Because its virtues are not understood; Yet many things, impossible to thought, Have been by need to full perfection brought. DRYDEN.

PENURY, in Latin penuria, signifying extreme want, is poverty in its most abject state, which is always supposed to be as permanent as it is wretched, to which those who are already poor are brought, either by misfortune or imprudence.

Thus tender Spenser lived with mean repast,
Content, depress'd by penury, and pined
In foreign realm. S. PHILLIPS.

INDIGENCE, in Latin indigentia, from indigeo, and the Greek δεομαι, to want, signifies the state of wanting such things as one has been habituated to, or are suited to one's station, and is properly applied to persons in the superior walks of life.

If we can but raise him above indigence, a moderate share of good-fortune and merit will be sufficient to open his way to whatever else we can wish him to obtain.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

NEED (v. Necessity) implies a present want, or the state of wanting such things as the immediate occasion calls for: a temporary state to which persons of all conditions are exposed.

All men deem thus, that to have need goeth before indigence, supposing him that standeth in need of things which are not ready at hand, nor easy to be gotten, is indigent. To make this more plain, no man is said to be indigent of horns or wings, for that he hath no need of them; but we say truly and properly that some have need of armor, of money, and of apparel; when in the want of these things, they neither have them, nor can come by the means to supply their necessities.

HOLLAND.

TO POUR, SPILL, SHED.

POUR is probably connected with pore, and the Latin preposition per, through, signifying to make to pass, as it were, through a channel. SPILL and splash, and the German spillen, are probably onomatopœias. SHED comes from the German scheiden, to separate, signifying to cast from.

We pour with design; we spill by accident: we pour water over a plant or a bed; we spill it on the ground. To pour is an act of convenience; to spill and shed are acts more or less hurtful; the former is to cause to run in small quantities, the latter in large quantities: we pour wine out of a bottle into a glass; but the blood of a person is said to be spilled or shed when his life is violently taken away: what is poured is commonly no part of the body from whence it is poured; but what is shed is no other than a component part; hence trees are said to shed their leaves, animals their hair, or human beings to shed tears. Hence the distinction between these words in their moral application.

Poesy is of so subtle a spirit, that, in the pouring out of one language into another, it will evaporate.

DENHAM.

O reputation! dearer far than life,
Thou precious balsam, lovely, sweet of smell,
Whose cordial drops once spilt by some rash hand,

Not all the owner's care, nor the repenting toll
Of the rude spiller, can collect.

SEWEL.

Herod acted the part of a great mourner for the deceased Aristobulus, shedding abundance of tears.

PRIDEAUX.

POWER, STRENGTH, FORCE, AUTHORITY, DOMINION.

POWER, in French pouvoir, Latin possum, to be able, is the generic and universal term, comprehending in it that simple principle of nature which exists in all subjects. STRENGTH, or the abstract quality of strong, and FORCE (v. Energy) are modes of power. These terms are all used either in a physical or moral application. Power, in a physical sense, respects whatever causes motion: strength respects that species of power that lies in the vital and muscular parts of the body. Strength is therefore internal, and depends on the internal organization of the frame; power on the external circumstances. A man may have strength to move, but not the power, if he be bound with cords. Our strength is proportioned to the health of the body and the firmness of its make: our power may be increased by the help of instruments.

Observing in ourselves that we can at pleasure move several parts of our bodies, which were at rest; the effects also that natural bodies are able to produce in one another occurring every moment to our senses, we by both these ways get the idea of power.

LOCKE.

Not founded on the brittle strength of bones.

MILTON.

Power may be exerted or otherwise; force is power exerted or active; bodies have a power of resistance while in a state of rest, but they are moved by a certain force from other bodies.

A ship which hath struck sail doth run

By force of that force which before it won.

DOWNE.

The word power is used technically for the moving force.

By understanding the true difference between the weight and the power, a man may add such a fitting supplement to the strength of the power, that it shall move any conceivable weight, though it should never so much exceed that force which the power is naturally endowed with.

WILKINS.

In a moral acceptance, power, strength, and force may be applied to the same objects with a similar distinction: thus we may speak of the power of language generally; the strength of a person's expressions to convey the state of his own mind; and the force of terms, as to the extent of their meaning and fitness to convey the ideas of those who use them.

All power of fancy over reason is a degree of insanity: but, while this power is such as we can control and repress, it is not visible to others nor considered as any deprivation of our faculties. JOHNSON.

Thus we are affected by strength, which is natural power. BURKE.

Bound by no principle, and restrained by no ties, his uncommon parts having room to play, appeared in their utmost force to the world. MACPHERSON.

Power is either public or private, which brings it in alliance with AUTHORITY (v. Influence). Civil power includes in it all that which enables us to have any influence or control over the actions, persons, property, etc., of others; authority is confined to that species of power which is derived from some legitimate source. Power exists independently of all right; authority is founded only on right. A king has often the power to be cruel, but he has never the authority to be so. Subjects have sometimes the power of overturning the government, but they can in no case have the authority.

Hence thou shalt prove my might and curse the hour
Thou stoodst a rival of imperial power. POPE.

Power arising from strength is always in those who are governed, who are many; but authority arising from opinion is in those who govern, who are few. TEMPLE.

Power is indefinite as to degree; one may have little or much power: dominion is a positive degree of power. A monarch's power may be limited by various circumstances; a despot exercises dominion over all his subjects, high and low. One is not said to get a power over any object, but to get an object into one's power: on the other hand, we get a dominion over an object; thus some men have a dominion over the consciences of others.

Naturally restless in his temper, he loved trouble from its amusement, and, though ambitious, was fond of confusion, more as a field of action than as a means of acquiring power. MACPHERSON.

And each of these must will, perceive, design,
And draw confus'dly in a different line;
Which then can claim dominion o'er the rest,
Or stamp the ruling passion in the breast? JENTINE.

POWERFUL, POTENT, MIGHTY.

POWERFUL is full of power; POTENT, from the Latin potens, signifies literally being able, or having power; and MIGHTY signifies having might. Powerful is applicable to strength as well as power: a powerful man is one who by size and make can easily overpower another; and a powerful person is one who has much in his power: potent is used only in this latter sense, in which it expresses a larger extent of power: a potent monarch is much more than a powerful prince: mighty expresses a still higher degree of power; might is power unlimited by any consideration or circumstance; a giant is called mighty in the physical sense, and genius is said to be mighty which takes everything within its grasp; the Supreme Being is entitled either Omnipotent or Almighty; but the latter term seems to convey the idea of boundless extent more forcibly than the former.

It is certain that the senses are more powerful as the reason is weaker. JOHNSON.

Now, flaming up the heavens, the potent sun
Melts into limpid air the high-raised clouds. THOMSON.

He who lives by a mighty principle within,
Which the world about him neither sees nor understands, he only ought to pass for godly. SOCRATE.

TO PRAISE, COMMEND, APPLAUD, EXTOL.

PRAISE, in the German preisen, to value, is connected with our own word price, signifying to give a value to a thing. COMMEND, in Latin commendo, compounded of com and mando, signifies to commit to the good opinion of others. APPLAUD, v. Applause. EXTOL in Latin extollo, signifies to lift up very high.

All these terms denote the act of expressing approbation. To praise is the most general and indefinite; it may rise to a high degree, but it generally implies a lower degree: we praise a person generally; we commend him particularly: we praise him for his diligence, sobriety, and the like; we commend him for his performances, or for any particular instance of prudence or good conduct. To applaud is an ardent mode of praising; we applaud a person for his nobleness of spirit: to extol is a reverential mode of praising; we extol a man for his heroic exploits. Praise is confined to no station, though with most propriety bestowed by superiors on equals : commendation is the part of a superior ; a parent commends his child for an act of charity : applause is the act of many as well as of one ; theatrical performances are the frequent subjects of public applause : to extol is the act of inferiors, who declare thus decidedly their sense of a person's superiority.

PRAYER, PETITION, REQUEST, ENTREATY, SUIT.

PRAYER, from the Latin preco, and the Greek κατερχομαι, to pray, is a general term, including the common idea of application to some person for any favor to be granted : PETITION, from peto, to seek ; REQUEST (v. To ask) ; ENTREATY (v. To beg) ; SUIT, from sue, in French suiere, Latin sequor, to follow after, denote different modes of prayer, varying in the circumstances of the action and the object acted upon.

The prayer is made more commonly to the Supreme Being ; the petition is made more generally to one's fellow-creatures ; we may, however, pray our fellow-creatures, and petition our Creator : the prayer is made for everything which is of the first importance to us as living beings ; the petition is made for that which may satisfy our desires : hence our prayers to the Almighty respect all our circumstances as moral and responsible agents ; our petitions respect the temporary circumstances of our present existence.

Prayer among men is supposed a means to change the person to whom we pray, but prayer to God doth not change him, but fits us to receive the thing prayed for.

STILLINGFLEET.

When the term prayer is applied to men, it carries with it the idea of earnestness and submission ; the petition is a public act, in which many express their wishes to the Supreme Authority ; the request and entreaty are individual acts between men in their private relations : the people petition the king or the parliament ; a child makes a request to its parent ; one friend makes a request to another. The request marks an equality, but the entreaty defines no condition ; it differs, however, from the former in the nature of the object and the mode of preferring ; the request is but a simple expression ; the entreaty is urgent : the request may be made in trivial matters ; the entreaty is made in matters that deeply interest the feelings : we request a friend to lend us a book ; we use every entreaty in order to divert a person from those purposes which we think detrimental : one complies with a request ; one yields to entreaties. It was the dying request of Socrates that they would sacrifice a cock to Æsculapius ; Regulus was deaf to every entreaty of his friends, who wished him not to return to Carthage.

Torture him with thy softness,
Nor, till thy prayers are granted, set him free.

OTWAY.

DRYDEN.

ROBERTSON.

The suit is a higher kind of prayer, varying both in the nature of the subject and the character of the agent. A gentleman pays his suit to a lady ; a courtier makes his suit to the prince.

Seldom or never is there much spoke, whenever any one comes to prefer a suit to another.

PRELUDE, PREFACE.

PRELUDE, from the Latin ludo, to play, signifies the game that precedes another ; PREFACE, from the Latin for, to speak, signifies the speech that precedes. The idea of a preparatory introduction is included in both these terms ; but the former consists of actions, the latter of words : the throwing of stones and breaking of windows is the prelude on the part of a mob to a general riot ; an apology for one's ill behavior is sometimes the preface to soliciting a remission of punishment. The prelude is frequently, though not always, preparatory to that which is in itself actually bad: the preface is either to guard against something objectionable or to secure something desirable. Intemperance in liquor is the prelude to every other extravagance; when one wishes to insure compliance with a request that may possibly be unreasonable, it is necessary to pave the way by some suitable preface.

And horns shrill warbling in each glade, prelude

Of prefices brooking through his zeal of right. MILTON.

TO PREMISE, PRESUME.

PREMISE, from pre and mitto, signifies to set down beforehand; PRESUME, from sumo, to take, signifies to take beforehand. Both these terms are employed in regard to our previous assertions or admissions of any circumstance; the former is used for what is theoretical or belongs to opinions; the latter is used for what is practical or belongs to facts: we premise that the existence of a Deity is unquestionable when we argue respecting his attributes; we presume that a person has a firm belief in Divine revelation when we exhort him to follow the precepts of the Gospel. No argument can be pursued until we have premiered those points upon which both parties are to agree; we must be careful not to presume upon more than what we are fully authorized to take for certain.

Here we must first promise what it is to enter into temptation. SOUTH.

In the long iambic meter it does not appear that Chaucer ever composed at all; for I presume no one can imagine that he was the author of Gamelyn. TYRWHITT.

TO PRESS, SQUEEZE, PINCH, GRIPE.

PRESS, in Latin pressus, participle of premo, probably comes from the Greek βαρυνω, heaviness. SQUEEZE, in Saxon squizza, Latin quasso, Hebrew reshak, to press together. PINCH is but a variation from pincer, pin, spine. GRIPE, from the German greifen, signifies to seize, like the word grapple or grasp, the Latin rapio, the Greek ῥαπίδω, to fish or catch, and the Hebrew geraph, to catch.

The forcible action of one body on another is included in all these terms. In the word press this is the only idea; the rest differ in the circumstances. We may press with the foot, the hand, the whole body, or any particular limb; one squeezes commonly with the hand; one pinches either with the fingers or an instrument constructed in a similar form; one gripes with teeth, claws, or any instrument that can gain hold of the object. Inanimate as well as animate objects press or pinch; but to squeeze and gripe are more properly the actions of animate objects; the former is always said of persons, the latter of animals; stones press that on which they rest their weight; a door which shuts of itself may pinch the fingers; one squeezes the hand of a friend; lobsters and many other shell-fish gripe whatever comes within their claws.

In the figurative application they have a similar distinction; we press a person by importunity, or some coercive measure; an extortioner squeezes in order to get that which is given with reluctance or difficulty; a miser pinches himself if he contracts his subsistence; he gripes all that comes within his possession.

All these women (the thirty wives of Orodes) pressed hard upon the old king, each soliciting for a son of her own. PRIDEAUX.

Ventidius receiving great sums from Herod to promote his interest, and at the same time greater to hinder it, squeezed each of them to the utmost, and served neither. PRIDEAUX.

Pinch'd with afflictive want. SOMERVILLE.

How can he be envied for his felicity who is conscious that a very short time will give him up to the gripes of poverty? JOHNSON.

PRESSING, URGENT, IMPORTUNATE.

PRESSING and URGENT, from to press and urgo, are applied as qualifying terms either to persons or things; IMPORTUNATE, from the verb to importune, which probably signifies to wish to get into port, to land at some port, is applied only to persons. In regard to pressing, it is said either of one's demands, one's requests, or one's exhortations; urgent is said of one's solicitations or entreaties; importunate is said of one's begging or applying for a thing. The pressing has more of violence in it; it is supported by force and authority; it is employed in matters of right: the urgent makes an appeal to one's feelings; it is more persuasive, and is employed in matters of favor: the importunate has some of the force, but none of the authority or obligation, of the pressing; it is employed in matters of personal gratification. When applied to things, pressing is as much more forcible than urgent as in the former case; we speak of a pressing necessity, an urgent case. A creditor will be pressing for his money when he fears to lose it; one friend is urgent with another to intercede in his behalf; beggars are commonly importunate with the hope of teasing others out of their money.

Mr. Gay, whose zeal in your concern is worthy a friend, writes to me in the most pressing terms about it. POPE.

Neither would he have done it at all but at my urgency. SWIFT.

Sleep may be put off from time to time, yet the demand is of so importunate a nature as not to remain long unsatisfied. JOHNSON.

PRESUMPTIVE, PRESUMPTUOUS, PRESUMING.

PRESUMPTIVE comes from presume, in the sense of supposing or taking for granted; PRESUMPTUOUS, PRESUMING (v. Assumption), comes from the same verb in the sense of taking upon one's self, or taking to one's self any importance: the former is therefore employed in an indifferent, the latter in a bad acceptance: a presumptive heir is one presumed or expected to be heir; presumptive evidence is evidence founded on some presumption or supposition; so likewise presumptive reasoning; but a presumptuous man, a presumptuous thought, a presumptuous behavior, all indicate an unauthorized presumption in one's own favor. Presumptuous is a stronger term than pre- suming, because it has a more definite use; the former, from the termination ous, signifies full of presumption; the latter the inclination to presume: a man is presumptuous when his conduct partakes of the nature of presumption; he is presuming, inasmuch as he shows himself disposed to presume: hence we speak of presumptuous language, not presuming language: a presuming temper, not a presumptuous temper. In like manner, when one says it is presumptuous in a man to do anything, this expresses the idea of presumption much more forcibly than to say it is presuming in him to do it. It would be presumptuous in a man to address a monarch in a language of familiarity and disrespect; it is presuming in a common person to address any one who is superior in station with familiarity and disrespect.

There is no qualification for government but virtue and wisdom, actual or presumptive. BURKE.

See what is got by those presumptuous principles which have brought your leaders (of the revolution) to despise all their predecessors. BURKE.

Presuming of his force with sparkling eyes,
Already he devours the promis'd prize. DRYDEN.

PRETENCE, PRETENSION, PRETEXT, EXCUSE.

PRETENCE comes from pretend (v. To feign) in the sense of setting forth anything independent of ourselves. PRETENSION comes from the same verb in the sense of setting forth anything that depends upon ourselves. The pretence is commonly a misrepresentation; the pretension is frequently a miscalculation: the pretence is set forth to conceal what is bad in one's self; the pretension is set forth to display what is good: the former betrays one's falsehood, the latter one's conceit or self-importance; the former can never be employed in a good sense, the latter may sometimes be employed in an indifferent sense: a man of bad character may make a pretence of religion by adopting an outward profession; men of the least merit often make the highest pretensions.

Ovid had warn'd her to beware
Of strolling gods, whose usual trade is,
Under pretences of taking air,
To pick up sublunary ladies. SWIFT.
Each thinks his own the best pretension. GAY.

The pretence and PRETEXT alike consist of what is unreal; but the former is not so great a violation of truth as the latter: the pretence may consist of truth and falsehood blended; the pretext consists altogether of falsehood: the pretence may sometimes serve only to conceal or palliate a fault; the pretext serves to hide something seriously culpable or wicked: a child may make indisposition a pretence for idleness; a thief makes his acquaintance with the servants a pretext for getting admittance into a house.

Let not the Trojans, with a feigned pretence
Of proffer'd peace, delude the Latin prince.

DAYDEN.

Justifying perfidy and murder for public benefit, public benefit would soon become the pretext, and perfidy and murder the end.

BURKE.

The pretence and EXCUSE are both set forth to justify one's conduct in the eyes of others; but the pretence always conceals something more or less culpable, and by a greater or less violation of truth; the excuse may sometimes justify that which is justifiable, and with strict regard to truth. To oblige one's self under the pretence of obliging another, is a despicable trick; illness is an allowable excuse to justify any omission in business.

I should have dressed the whole with greater care, but I had little time, which I am sure you know to be more than pretence.

WAKE.

Nothing but love this patience could produce,
And I allow your rage that kind excuse.

DAYDEN.

And even where the excuse may be frivolous it does not imply direct falsehood.

The last refuge of a guilty person is to take shelter under an excuse.

SOUTH.

PRETENSION, CLAIM.

PRETENSION (v. Pretence) and CLAIM (v. To ask for) both signify an assertion of rights, but they differ in the nature of the rights. The first refers only to the rights which are considered as such by the individual; the latter to those which exist independent of his supposition: there cannot, therefore, be a pretension without some one to pretend, but there may be a claim without any immediate claimant: thus we say a person rests his pretension to the crown upon the ground of being descended from the former king; in hereditary monarchies there is no one who has any claim to the crown except the next heir in succession.

But if to unjust things thou dost pretend,
Ere they begin, let thy pretensions end.

DEWEAM.

Whence is this pow'r, this fondness of all arts,
Serving, adorning life through all its parts:
Which names imposed, by letters mark'd those names,

Adjusted property by legal claims?

JENTEN.

The pretension is commonly built upon personal merits; the claim rests upon the laws of civil society: a person makes high pretensions who estimates his merits and consequent deserts at a high rate; he judges of his claims according as they are supported by the laws of his country or the circumstances of the case: the pretension when denied can never be proved; the claim, when proved, can be enforced.

It is often charged upon writers, that, with all their pretensions to genius and discoveries, they do little more than copy one another.

JOHNSON.

This night our minister we name,
Let every servant speak his claim.

GAY.

PREVAILING, PREVALENT, RULING, OVERRULING, PREDOMINANT.

PREVAILING and PREVALENT both come from the Latin prevaleo, to be strong above others. RULING, OVERRULING, and PREDOMINANT (from dominor, to rule), signify ruling or bearing greater sway than others.

Prevailing expresses the actual state or quality of a particular object: prevaleant marks the quality of prevailing, as it affects objects in general. The same distinction exists between overruling and predominant. A person has a prevailing sense of religion; religious feeling is prevaleant in a country or in a community. There is always some prevailing fashion which some persons are ever ready to follow. The idea has of late years become prevaleant.

The evils naturally consequent upon a prevailing temptation are intolerable.

SOUTH.

The conduct of a peculiar providence made the instruments of that great design prevaleant and victorious, and all those mountains of opposition to become plains.

SOUTH.

Whate'er thou shalt ordain, thou ruling pow'r,
Unknown and sudden be the dreadful hour.

ROWE.

Prevailing and prevaleant mark simply the existing state of superiority: ruling and predominant express this state, in relation to some other which it has superseded or reduced to a state of inferiority. An opinion is said to be prevailing as respects the number of persons by whom it is maintained: a principle is said to be ruling as respects the superior influence which it has over the conduct of men more than any other. Particular disorders are prevalent at certain seasons of the year, when they affect the generality of persons: a particular taste or fashion is predominant which supersedes all other tastes or fashions.

Nor can a man, independently of the overruling influence of God's blessing and care, call himself one penny richer. SOUTH.

The doctrine of not owning a foreigner to be a king was held and taught by the Pharisees, a predominant sect of the Jews. PRIDEAUX.

TO PREVENT, ANTICIPATE.

To PREVENT is literally to come beforehand, and ANTICIPATE to take beforehand: the former is employed for actual occurrences; the latter as much for calculations as for actions: to prevent is the act of a person toward other persons or things; to anticipate is the act of a being either toward himself or another. In this sense God is said to prevent man with his favor by interposing so as to direct his purposes to the right object.

Be careful still to guard thy soul from wrong,
And let thy thought prevent thy hand and tongue. ROWE.

And a man may prevent what is to happen, by causing it to happen before the time.

But I do think it most cowardly and vile,
For fear of what might fall, so to prevent
The time of life. SHAKESPEARE.

We anticipate the happiness which we are to enjoy in future; we anticipate what a person is going to say by saying the same thing before him.

Why should we
Anticipate our sorrows? 'Tis like those
Who die for fear of death. SHAKESPEARE.

These words may also be both taken in the sense of causing a thing not to be done, but with this distinction, that to prevent is to cause a thing not to be done or happen at all, and anticipate is to prevent another from doing it by doing it one's self.

They sent a party of twelve hundred horse and dragoons, under the command of Sir George Chudleigh, to surprise the high-sheriff and principal gentlemen of the county, and thereby to prevent the coming up of any more strength to the king's party. CLARENDON.

I am far from pretending to instruct the profession, or anticipating their directions to such as are under their government. ARBUTHNOT.

TO PREVENT, OBTIATE, PRECLUDE.

ALL these terms imply the causing something not to take place or exist. To PREVENT (v. To hinder) is to happen before, so as to render the thing impracticable. To OBTIATE, from ob and via, signifies coming in the way so as to render the thing unnecessary or of no value. Prevent applies to events or circumstances in life; obviate to mental acts or objects: bad weather prevents a person setting out according to a certain arrangement; a change of plan obviates every difficulty.

Every disease of age we may prevent,
Like those of youth, by being diligent. DENHAM.

The wind and my unfortunate sprain together, in a great measure prevented our electrical experiments. BAYDENE.

The imputation of folly, if it is true, must be suffered without hope; but that of immorality may be obviated by removing the cause.

HAWKESWORTH.

Upon the ministers of the Church it is incumbent, as occasions offer, to explain and illustrate its design and uses to the more unlearned, as well as to obviate the crude exceptions made against its doctrines or language. CLEAVER.

To PRECLUDE, from pre and cludo, or claudio, to shut, signifying to shut before or out, to put a stop to by the intervention of something, is, like obviate, applied to mental objects.

The design of subscription being to preserve one uniform tenor of faith, and to preclude diversity of opinion. WATTELAND.

To prevent and preclude are rather the act of the thing than of the person; to obviate is rather the act of the person than of the thing. Circumstances may prevent or preclude anything from happening: a person obviates a difficulty or objection; so, according to this distinction, we may say either to obviate a necessity, or to preclude a necessity for anything, according as this is effected by any person, or by any circumstance.

I have begun two or three letters to you by snatches, and been prevented from finishing them by a thousand avocations and dissipations.

SWIFT.

There appears to be no reason to suppose that he paid any attention to the law; indeed, his dramatic pursuits must have precluded the necessary application.

ANTHONY A. WOOD.

For the obviating that difficulty, I have willingly declined that instance against the eternal succession of mankind.

HALE.

PREVIOUS, PRELIMINARY, PREPARATORY, INTRODUCTORY.

PREVIOUS, in Latin *præviu*s, compounded of præ and via, signifies leading the way or going before. PRELIMINARY, from præ and limen, a threshold, signifies belonging to the threshold or entrance. PREPARATORY and INTRODUCTORY signify belonging to a preparation or introduction.

Previous denotes simply the order of succession: the other terms, in addition to this, convey the idea of connection between the objects which succeed each other. Previous applies to actions and proceedings in general; as a previous question, a previous inquiry, a previous determination: preliminary is employed only for matters of contract: a preliminary article, a preliminary condition, are what precede the final settlement of any question: preparatory is employed for matters of arrangement; the disposing of men in battle is preparatory to an engagement; the making of marriage deeds and contracts is preparatory to the final solemnization of the marriage: introductory is employed for matters of science or discussion; as remarks are introductory to the main subject in question; compendiums of grammar, geography, and the like, as introductory to larger works, are useful for young people. Prudent people are careful to make every previous inquiry before they seriously enter into engagements with strangers: it is impolitic to enter into details until all preliminary matters are fully adjusted: one ought never to undertake any important matter without first adopting every preparatory measure that can facilitate its prosecution: in complicated matters it is necessary to have something introductory by way of explanation.

One step by which a temptation approaches to its crisis is a previous growing familiarity of the mind with the sin which a man is tempted to.

SOUTH.

I have discussed the nuptial preliminaries so often, that I can repeat the forms in which jointures are settled and pin-money secured.

JOHNSON.

Æschylus is in the practice of holding the spectator in suspense by a preparatory silence in his chief person.

CUMBERLAND.

Consider yourselves as acting now, under the eye of God, an introductory part to a more important scene.

BLAIR.

PRIDE, VANITY, CONCEIT.

PRIDE is in all probability connected with the word parade, and the German pracht, show or splendor, as it signifies that high-flown temper in a man which makes him paint to himself everything in himself as beautiful or splendid. VANITY, in Latin vanitas, from vain and vanus, is compounded of ve or valde and inania, signifying exceeding emptiness. CONCEIT, v. Conceit.

The valuing of one's self on the possession of any property is the idea common to these terms, but they differ either in regard to the object or the manner of the action. Pride is the term of most extensive import and application, and comprehends in its signification not only that of the other two terms, but likewise ideas peculiar to itself. Pride is applicable to every object, good or bad, high or low, small or great; vanity is applicable only to small objects: pride is therefore good or bad: vanity is always bad, it is always emptiness or nothingness. A man is proud who values himself on the possession of his literary or scientific talent, on his wealth, on his rank, on his power, on his acquisitions, or his superiority over his competitors; he is vain of his person, his dress, his walk, or anything that is frivolous. Pride is the inherent quality in man; and, while it rests on noble objects, it is his noblest characteristic; vanity is the distortion of one's nature flowing from a vicious constitution or education: pride shows itself variously, according to the nature of the object on which it is fixed; a noble pride seeks to display itself in all that can command the respect or admiration of mankind; the pride of wealth, of power, or of other adventitious properties, commonly displays itself in an unseemly deportment toward others; vanity shows itself in false pretensions.

He was commonly represented as a proud and distant man, but in fact he had no more pride at heart than every man of honor carries about with him, and which serves to repel everything that inclines toward meanness with becoming indignation. CUMBERLAND.

His vanity disposed him to be his excellency, and his weakness to believe that he should be the general in the houses as well as in the field, and be able to govern their counsels and restrain their passions, as well as to fight their battles. CLARENDON.

Pride, in the limited and bad sense, is always associated with strength, and produces more or less violence; vanity is coupled with weakness.

Vanity makes men ridiculous, pride odious, and ambition terrible. STEELE.

'Tis an old maxim in the schools,
That vanity's the food of fools. SWIFT.

Conceit is that species of self-valuation that respects one's talents only; it is so far, therefore, closely allied to pride; but a man is said to be proud of that which he really has, but to be conceited of that which he really has not: a man may be proud to an excess of merits which he actually possesses; but when he is conceited, his merits are all in his own conceit; the latter is therefore obviously founded on falsehood altogether. As self-conceit is the offspring of ignorance and vanity, it is most frequently found in youth, but, as it is the greatest obstacle to improvement, it may grow up with a person and go with him through life.

The self-conceit of the young is the great source of those dangers to which they are exposed. BLAIR.

PRIDE, HAUGHTINESS, LOFTINESS, DIGNITY.

PRIDE is employed principally as respects the temper of the mind: HAUGHTINESS (v. Haughty) and LOFTINESS (v. High) respect either the temper of mind or the external behavior. DIGNITY (v. Honor) respects only the external behavior. Pride is, as before (v. Pride), the general term; the others are modes of pride. Pride, inasmuch as it consists purely of self-esteem, is a positive sentiment which one may entertain independently of other persons: it lies in the inmost recesses of the human heart, and mingles itself insensibly with our affections and passions. Haughtiness is that mode of pride which springs out of one's comparison of one's self with others: the haughty man dwells on the inferiority of others; the proud man, in the strict sense, dwells on his own perfections. Loftiness is a mode of pride which raises the spirit above objects supposed to be inferior; it does not set man so much above others as above himself, or that which concerns himself.

Every demonstration of an implacable rancor and an untamable pride were the only encouragements we received (from the regicides) to the renewal of our supplications. BURKE.

Prosperity doth not only shut the earth against counsel by reason of the dulness which it leaves upon the senses, but also on account of that arrogance and untutored haughtiness that it brings upon the mind. SOUTH.

Augustus and Tiberius had loftiness enough in their temper, and affected to make a sovereign figure. COLLIER.

As respects the exterior, pride in the behavior is always bad.

He was commonly represented as a proud and distant man. CUMBERLAND.

But it is taken in an indifferent sense in application to brutes or unconscious agents.

He, like a proud steed rein'd, went haughty on. MILTON.

Haughtiness in one's carriage, and loftiness in one's tone or air, are mostly unbecoming, and seldom warranted.

Provoked by Edward's haughtiness, even the passive Balliol began to mutiny. ROBERTSON.

Waller describes Sacharissa as a predominating beauty, of lofty charms and imperious influence. JOHNSON.

Dignity, which arises from a proper consciousness of what is due to one's self, is always taken in a good sense. It is natural to some men, and shows itself at all times; on other occasions it requires to be assumed.

As soon as Almagro knew his fate to be inevitable, he met it with the dignity and fortitude of a veteran. ROBERTSON.

PRIMARY, PRIMITIVE, PRISTINE, ORIGINAL.

PRIMARY, from primus, signifies belonging to or like the first. PRIMITIVE, from the same, signifies being the first. PRISTINE, in Latin pristinus, from præ, signifies in former times. ORIGINAL signifies containing the origin.

The primary denotes simply the order of succession, and is therefore the generic term; primitive, pristine, and original include also the idea of some other relation to the thing that succeeds, and are therefore modes of the primary. The primary has nothing to come before it; in this manner we speak of the primary cause as the cause which precedes secondary causes: the primitive is that after which other things are formed; in this manner a primitive word is that after which, or from which, the derivatives are formed: the pristine is that which follows the primitive, so as to become customary; there are but few specimens of the pristine purity of life among the professors of Christianity: the original is that which either gives birth to the thing, or belongs to that which gives birth to the thing; the original meaning of a word is that which was given to it by the makers of the word.

Memory is the primary and fundamental power, without which there could be no other intellectual operation. JOHNSON.

Meanwhile our primitive great sire to meet,
His godlike guest walks forth. MILTON.

As to the share of power each individual ought to have in the State, that I must deny to be among the direct original rights of man.

BURKE.

While with her friendly clay he deign'd to dwell,
Shall she with safety reach her pristine seat.

PRIOR.

PRINCE, MONARCH, SOVEREIGN, POTENTATE.

PRINCE, in French prince, Latin princeps, from primus, signifies the chief or the first person in the nation. MONARCH, from the Greek μοναρχ, alone, and αρχη, government, signifies one having sole authority. SOVEREIGN has been supposed to be changed from superregnum, but, like the French souverain, the Spanish soberano, and the Italian sovrano, it may, perhaps, with greater propriety, be derived from supernus or supremus, supreme. POTENTATE, from potens, powerful, signifies one having supreme power.

Prince is the generic term, the rest are specific terms; every monarch, sovereign, and potentate is a prince, but not vice versa. The term prince is indefinite as to the degree of power: a prince may have a limited or despotic power; but in its restricted sense it denotes a smaller degree of power than any of the other terms: the term monarch does not define the extent of the power, but simply that it is undivided, as opposed to that species of power which is lodged in the hands of many: sovereign and potentate indicate the highest degree of power; but the former is employed only as respects the nation that is governed, the latter respects other nations: a sovereign is supreme over his subjects; a potentate is powerful by means of his subjects. Every man having independent power is a prince, let his territory be ever so inconsiderable: Germany is divided into a number of small states, which are governed by petty princes. Every one reigning by himself in a state of some considerable magnitude, and having an independent authority over his subjects, is a monarch; kings and emperors, therefore, are all monarchs. Every monarch is a sovereign whose extent of dominion and number of subjects rises above the ordinary level; he is a potentate if his influence either in the cabinet or the field extends very considerably over the affairs of other nations.

Of all the princes who had sway'd the Mexican sceptre, Montezuma was the most haughty.

ROBERTSON.

The Mexican people were warlike and enterprising, the authority of the monarch unbounded.

ROBERTSON.

The Peruvians yielded a blind submission to their sovereigns.

ROBERTSON.

How mean must the most exalted potentate upon earth appear to that eye which takes in innumerable orders of spirits!

ADDISON.

PRINCIPLE, MOTIVE.

THE PRINCIPLE (v. Doctrine) may sometimes be the MOTIVE; but often there is a principle where there is no motive, and there is a motive where there is no principle. The principle lies in conscious and unconscious agents; the motive only in conscious agents: all nature is guided by certain principles; its movements go forward upon certain principles: man is put into action by certain motives; the principle is the prime moving cause of everything that is set in motion; the motive is the prime moving cause that sets the human machine into action.

The principle in its restricted sense comes still nearer to the motive, when it refers to the opinions which we form: the principle in this case is that idea which we form of things, so as to regulate our conduct; the motives is that idea which simply impels to action: the former is therefore something permanent, and grounded upon the exercise of our reasoning powers; the latter is momentary, and arises simply from our capacity of willing and thinking: bad principles lead a man into a bad course of life; but a man may be led by bad motives to do what is good as well as what is bad.

The best legislators have been satisfied with the establishment of some sure, solid, and ruling principle in government. BURKE.

The danger of betraying our weakness to our servants, and the impossibility of concealing it from them, may be justly considered as one motive to a regular life. JOHNSON.

PRIORITY, PRECEDENCE, PRE-EMINENCE, PREFERENCE.

PRIORITY denotes the abstract quality of being before others: PRECEDENCE, from præ and cedo, signifies the state of going before: PRE-EMINENCE signifies being more eminent or elevated than others: PREFERENCE signifies being put before others. Priority respects simply the order of succession, and is applied to objects either in a state of motion or rest; precedence signifies priority in going, and depends upon a right or privilege; pre-eminence signifies priority in being, and depends upon merit; preference signifies priority in placing, and depends upon favor. The priority is applicable rather to the thing than the person; it is not that which is sought for, but that which is to be had: age frequently gives priority where every other claim is wanting. The immoderate desire for precedence is often nothing but a childish vanity; it is a distinction that flows out of rank and power; a nobleman claims a precedence on all occasions of ceremony. The love of pre-eminence is laudable, inasmuch as it requires a degree of moral worth which exceeds that of others; a general aims at pre-eminence in his profession. Those who are anxious to obtain the best for themselves are eager to have the preference: we seek for the preference in matters of choice.

A better place, a more commodious seat, priority in being helped at table, etc., what is it but sacrificing ourselves in such trifles to the conveniences and pleasures of others?

EARL CHATHAM.

Ranks will then (in the next world) be adjusted, and precedency set aright. ADDISON.

It is the concern of mankind that the destruction of order should not be a claim to rank; that crimes should not be the only title to pre-eminence and honor. BURKE.

We find in ourselves a power to begin or forbear several actions of our minds or motions of our bodies, barely by a thought or preference of the mind. LOCKE.

PRIVACY, RETIREMENT, SECLUSION.

PRIVACY literally denotes the abstract quality of private; but when taken by itself it signifies the state of being private: RETIREMENT literally signifies the abstract act of retiring: and SECLUSION that of reclusing one's self: but retirement by itself frequently denotes a state of being retired, or a place of retirement; seclusion, a state of being secluded: hence we say a person lives in privacy, in retirement, in seclusion: privacy is opposed to publicity; he who lives in privacy, therefore, is one who follows no public line, who lives so as to be little known: retirement is opposed to openness or freedom of access; he, therefore, who lives in retirement withdraws from the society of others, he lives by himself: seclusion is the excess of retirement; he who lives in seclusion bars all access to himself; he shuts himself from the world. Privacy is most suitable for such as are in circumstances of humiliation, whether from their misfortune, or their fault; retirement is peculiarly agreeable to those who are of a reflective turn; but seclusion is chosen only by those who labor under some strong affection of the mind, whether of a religious or a physical nature.

Fly with me to some safe, some sacred privacy. ROWE.

In our retirements everything disposes us to be serious. ADDISON.

There have appeared divines of enlightened and discerning minds, who have confirmed the observation that superstitious gloom ever grows darker and assumes new horrors in seclusion.

ZIMMERMAN.

PRIVILEGE, PREROGATIVE, EXEMPTION, IMMUNITY.

PRIVILEGE, in Latin privilegium, compounded of privus and lex, signifies a law made for any individual or set of individuals. PREROGATIVE, in Latin prærogative, was so called from præ and rogare, to ask, because they were first asked whom they would have to be consuls: hence applied in our language to the right of determining or choosing first in many particulars. EXEMPTION, from the verb to exempt, and IMMUNITY, from the Latin immunus, free, are both employed for the object from which one is exempt or free.

Privilege and prerogative consist of positive advantages; exemption and immunity of those which are negative: by the former we obtain an actual good, by the latter the removal of an evil. Privilege, in its most extended sense, comprehends all the rest: for every prerogative, exemption, and immunity are privileges, inasmuch as they rest upon certain laws or customs, which are made for the benefit of certain individuals. In the restricted sense, the privilege may be enjoyed by many; the prerogative, which is a peculiar and distinguished privilege, can be enjoyed only by a few. As they respect the public, privileges belong to or are granted to the subject; prerogatives belong to the crown. It is the privilege of a member of Parliament to escape arrest for debt; it is the prerogative of the crown to be irresponsible for the conduct of its ministers: as respects private cases, it is the privilege of females to have the best places assigned to them; it is the prerogative of the male to address the female.

As the aged depart from the dignity, so they forfeit the privileges, of gray hairs. BLAIR.

By the worst of usurpations, a usurpation on the prerogatives of nature, you attempt to force tailors and carpenters into the State. BURKE.

Privileges are applied to every object which it is desirable to have; prerogative is confined to the case of making one's election, or exercising any special power; exemption is applicable to cases in which one is exempted from any tribute or payment; immunity, from the Latin munus, an office, is peculiarly applicable to cases in which one is freed from a service: all chartered towns or corporations have privileges, exemptions, and immunities: it is the privilege of the city of London to shut its gates against the king.

Neither nobility nor clergy (in France) enjoyed any exemption from the duty on consumable commodities. BURKE.

You claim an immunity from evil, which belongs not to the lot of man. BLAIR.

PROCEEDING PROCESS, PROGRESS.

THE manner of performing actions for the attainment of a given end is the common idea comprehended in these terms. PROCEEDING is the most general, as it simply expresses the general idea of the manner of going on; the rest are specific terms, denoting some particularity in the action, object, or circumstance. Proceeding is said commonly of such things as happen in the ordinary way of doing business; PROCESS is said of such things as are done by rule: the former is considered in a moral point of view; the latter in a scientific or technical point of view: the Freemasons have bound themselves together by a law of secrecy not to reveal some part of their proceedings; the process by which paper is made has undergone considerable improvements since its first invention.

What could be more fair than to lay open to an enemy all that you wished to obtain, and to desire him to imitate your ingenious proceeding? BURKE.

Saturnian Juno now, with double care,
Attends the fatal process of the war. DRYDEN.

Proceeding and PROGRESS both refer to the moral actions of men; but the proceeding simply denotes the act of going on, or doing something; the progress denotes an approximation to the end: the proceeding may be only a partial action comprehending both the beginning and the end; but the progress is applied to that which requires time, and a regular succession of action, to bring it to a completion: that is a proceeding in which every man is tried in a court of law; that is a progress which one makes in learning, by the addition to one's knowledge: hence we do not talk of the proceeding of life, but of the progress of life.

It is very observable that our proceedings discovered plainly when his lordship thought well of himself, and when not, for if he was in good heart he observed us narrowly. NOATON.

His penetrating and comprehensive mind saw that the progress of social, and especially commercial, intercourse was producing new combinations, which had not been specifically foreseen when the laws applied to such subjects were enacted. BISSSET.

PROCEEDING, TRANSACTION.

PROCEEDING signifies literally the thing that proceeds; and TRANSACTION the thing transacted: the former is, therefore, of something that is going forward; the latter of something that is already done: we are witnesses to the whole proceeding; we inquire into the whole transaction. The term proceeding is said of every event or circumstance which goes forward through the agency of men; transaction comprehends only those matters which have been deliberately transacted or brought to a conclusion: in this sense we use the word proceeding in application to an affray in the street; and the word transaction to some commercial negotiation that has been carried on between certain persons. The term proceeding marks the manner of proceeding; as when we speak of the proceedings in a court of law: transaction marks the business transacted; as the transactions on the Exchange. A proceeding may be characterized as disgraceful; a transaction as iniquitous.

The proceedings of a council of old men in an American tribe, we are told, were no less formal and sagacious than those in a senate in more polished republics. ROBERTSON.

It was Bothwell's interest to cover, if possible, the whole transaction under the veil of darkness and silence. ROBERTSON.

PROCESSION, TRAIN, RETINUE.

PROCESSION, from the verb proceed, signifies the act of going forward or before, that is, in the present instance, of going before others, or one before another. TRAIN in all probability comes from the Latin traho, to draw, signifying the thing drawn after another; and in the present instance the persons who are led after, or follow, any object. RETINUE, from the verb to retain, signifies those who are retained as attendants.

All these terms are said of any number of persons, who follow in a certain order; but this, which is the leading idea in the word procession, is but collateral in the terms train and retinue: on the other hand, the procession may consist of persons of all ranks and stations; but train and retinue apply only to such as follow some person or thing in a subordinate capacity: the former in regard to such as make up the concluding part of some procession; the latter only in regard to the servants or attendants on the great. At funerals there is frequently a long train of coaches belonging to the friends of the deceased, which close the procession; princes and nobles never go out on state or public occasions without a numerous retinue: the beauty of every procession consists in the order with which every one keeps his place, and the regularity with which the whole goes forward; the length of a train is what renders it most worthy of notice; the number of a retinue in Eastern nations is one criterion by which the wealth of the individual is estimated.

And now the priests, Potitius at their head,
In skins of beasts involv'd, the long procession
led. DRYDEN.

The moon, and all the starry train,
Hung the vast vault of heav'n. GAY.
Him and his sleeping slaves he slew; then spies
Where Remus with his rich retinue lies.
DRYDEN.

PRODUCTION, PRODUCE, PRODUCT.

THE term PRODUCTION expresses either the act of producing or the thing produced; PRODUCT and PRODUCE express only the thing produced: the production of a tree from a seed is one of the wonders of nature; the produce will not be considerable. In the sense of the thing produced, production is applied to every individual thing that is produced, whether by nature or art; as a tree is a production, or a painting is a production of art or skill: produce and product are properly applicable to those productions of nature which are made to turn to account; the former in a collective sense, and in reference to some particular object; the latter in an abstract and general sense: the aggregate quantity of grain drawn from a field is termed the produce of the field; but corn, hay, vegetables, and fruits in general, are termed products of the earth: the naturalist examines all the productions of nature; the husbandman looks to the produce of his lands; the topographer and traveller inquire about the products of different countries.

He was expert in all the parts of physic; but for the history of nature, of the productions of all countries, of the virtues and improvements of plants, ores, and minerals, with their varieties in different climates, he was perhaps the perfectest and exactest man in the world. BURNET.

A storm of hail, I am informed, has destroyed all the produce of my estate in Tuscany.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

Our British products are of such kinds and quantities as can turn the balance of trade to our advantage. ADDISON.

There is the same distinction between these terms in their improper as in their proper acceptation; the production is whatever results from an effort, physical or mental, as a production of genius, a production of art, and the like; the produce is the amount or aggregate result from physical or mental labor: thus, whatever the husbandman reaps from the cultivation of his land is termed the produce of his labor; whatever results from any public subscription or collection is, in like manner, the produce: the product is employed properly in regard to the mental operation of figures, as the product from multiplication, but may be extended to anything which is the fruit of the brain.

What would become of the scrofulous consumptive productions furnished by our men of wit and learning? SWIFT.

This tax has already been so often tried, that we know the exact produce of it. ADDISON.

I cannot help thinking the Arabian tales the product of some woman's imagination.

ATTENBURY.

PRODUCTION, PERFORMANCE, WORK.

WHEN we speak of anything as resulting from any specified operation, we term it a PRODUCTION; as the production of an author, signifying what he has produced by the effort of his mind: Homer's Iliad is esteemed as one of the finest productions of the imagination. When we speak of anything as executed or performed by some person, we term it a PERFORMANCE, as a drawing or a painting is denominated the performance of a particular artist. The term production cannot be employed without specifying or referring to the source from which it is produced, or the means by which it is produced; as the production of art, the production of the inventive faculty, the production of the mind, etc.: a performance cannot be spoken of without referring to the individual by whom it has been performed; hence we speak of this or that person's performance. When we wish to specify anything that results from WORK or labor, it is termed a work: in this manner we either speak of the work of one's hands, or a work of the imagination, a work of time, a work of magnitude.

Nature, in her productions slow, aspires
By just degrees to reach perfection's height.

SOMERVILLE.

The performances of Pope were burned by those whom he had, perhaps, selected as most likely to publish them. JOHNSON.

Yet there are some works which the author must consign unpublished to posterity. JOHNSON.

TO PROFESS, DECLARE.

PROFESS, in Latin professus, participle of profiteor, compounded of pro and fateor, to speak, signifies to set forth, or present to public view. DECLARE, v. 7b declare.

An exposure of one's thoughts or opinions is the common idea in the signification of these terms; but they differ in the manner of the action, as well as the object: one professes by words or by actions; one declares by words only: a man professes to believe that on which he acts; but he declares his belief of it either with his lips or in his writings. A profession may be general and partial, it may amount to little more than an intimation: a declaration is positive and explicit; it leaves no one in doubt: a profession may, therefore, sometimes be hypocritical; he who professes may wish to imply that which is not real: a declaration must be either directly true or false; he who declares expressly commits himself upon his veracity. One professes either as respects single actions, or a regular course of conduct; one declares either passing thoughts or settled principles. A person professes to have walked to a certain distance; to have taken a certain route, and the like: a Christian professes to follow the doctrine and precepts of Christianity; a person declares that a thing is true or false, or he declares his firm belief in a thing.

A naked profession may have credit, when no other evidence can be given. SWIFT.

We are a considerable body, who, upon a proper occasion, would not fail to declare ourselves. ADDISON.

To profess is employed only for what concerns one's self; to declare is likewise employed for what concerns others: one professes the motives and principles by which one is guided: one declares facts and circumstances with which one is acquainted: one professes nothing but what one thinks may be creditable and fit to be known; but one declares whatever may have fallen under one's notice, or passed through one's mind, as the case requires; there is always a particular and private motive for profession; there are frequently public grounds for making a declaration.

Pretending first
Wise to fly pain, professing next the spy, Argues no leader. MILTON.

There are nowhere so plain and full declarations of mercy and love to the sons of men as are made in the Gospel. TILLOTSON.

PROFLIGATE, ABANDONED, REPROBATE.

PROFLIGATE, in Latin profligatus, participle of profligo, compounded of the intensive pro and fligo, to dash or beat, signifies completely ruined and lost to everything. ABANDONED, v. To abandon. REPROBATE (v. To reprove) signifies one thoroughly rejected.

These terms, in their proper acceptance, express the most wretched condition of fortune into which it is possible for any human being to be plunged, and consequently, in their improper application, they denote that state of moral desertion and ruin which cannot be exceeded in wickedness or depravity. A profligate man has lost all by his vices, and consequently to his vices alone he looks for the regaining those goods of fortune which he has squandered; as he has nothing to lose, and everything to gain in his own estimation, by pursuing the career of his vices, he surpasses all others in his unprincipled conduct: an abandoned man is altogether abandoned to his passions, which, having the entire sway over him, naturally impel him to every excess: the reprobate man is one who has been reprov'd until he becomes insensible to reproof, and is given up to the malignity of his own passions.

Aged wisdom can check the most forward, and abash the most profligate. BLAIR.

To be negligent of what any one thinks of you, does not only show you arrogant but abandoned. HUGHES.

And here let those who boast in mortal things,
Learn how their greatest monuments of fame,
And strength, and art, are easily outdone
By reprobate spirits. MILTON.

PROFUSION, PROFUSENESS.

PROFUSION, from the Latin profundo, to pour forth, is taken in relation to unconscious objects, which pour forth in great plenty; PROFUSENESS is taken from the same, in relation to conscious agents, who likewise pour forth in great plenty: the term profusion, therefore, is put for plenty itself, and the term profuseness as a characteristic of persons in the sense of extravagance. At the hospitable board of the rich, there will naturally be a profusion of everything which can gratify the appetite; when men see an unusual degree of profusion, they are apt to indulge themselves in profuseness.

Ye glittering towns with wealth and splendor
crown'd,
Ye fields where summer spreads profusion
round,
For me your tributary stores combine.
GOLDSMITH.

I was convinced that the liberality of my young companions was only profuseness. JOHNSON.

PROGRESS, PROGRESSION, ADVANCE, ADVANCEMENT.

A FORWARD motion is designated by these terms: but PROGRESS and PROGRESSION simply imply this sort of motion; ADVANCE and ADVANCEMENT also imply an approximation to some object: we may make a progress in that which has no specific termination, as a progress in learning, which may cease only with life; but the advance is only made to some limited point or object in view; as an advance in wealth or honor, which may find a termination within the life. Progress and advance are said of that which has been passed over; but progression and advancement may be said of that which one is passing: the progress is made, or the person is in advance; he is in the act of progression or advancement: a child makes a progress in learning by daily attention; the progression from one stage of learning to another is not always perceptible; it is not always possible to overtake one who is in advance; sometimes a person's advancement is retarded by circumstances that are altogether contingent: the first step in any destructive course still prepares for the second, and the second for the third, after which there is no stop, but the progress is infinite.

I wish it were in my power to give a regular history of the progress which our ancestors have made in this species of versification. TAYLOR.

And better thence again, and better still,
In infinite progression. THOMSON.

The most successful students make their advances in knowledge by short flights. JOHNSON.

I have lived to see the fierce advancement, the sudden turn, and the abrupt period, of three or four enormous friendships. POPE.

PROGRESS, PROFICIENCY, IMPROVEMENT.

PROGRESS (v. Proceeding) is a generic term, the rest are specific; PROFICIENCY, from the Latin proficio, compounded of pro and facio, signifies a profited state, that is to say, a progress already made; and IMPROVEMENT, from the verb improvo, signifies an improved condition; that is, progress in that which improves. The term progress here, as in the former paragraph, marks the step or motion onward, and the two others the point already reached; but progress is applied either in the proper or improper sense, that is, either to those travelling forward, or to those going on stepwise in any work; proficiency is applied, in the improper sense, to the ground gained in an art, and improvement to what is gained in knowledge, or understanding, or abilities; when idle people set about any work, it is difficult to perceive that they make any progress in it from time to time; those who have a thorough taste for either music or drawing will make a proficiency in it which is astonishing to those who are unacquainted with the circumstances; the improvement of the mind can never be so effectually and easily obtained as in the period of childhood.

Solon, the sage, his progress never ceased,
But still his learning with his days increas'd.

DENNIS.

When the lad was about nineteen, his uncle desired to see him, that he might know what proficiency he had made. HAWKSWORTH.

The improvement which grows from habituating the mind to the comprehensive views of religion must not be thought wholly to regard the understanding. ADDISON.

Progress and proficiency are applied to the acts of persons, but improvement denotes also the act or state of things; one must make a progress or proficiency, but things admit of improvement.

The metrical part of our poetry, in the time of Chaucer, was capable of more improvement.

TAYLOR.

PROMINENT, CONSPICUOUS.

PROMINENT signifies hanging over; CONSPICUOUS (v. Distinguished) signifies easy to be beheld: the former is, therefore, to the latter, in some measure, as the species to the genus; what is prominent is, in general, on that very account conspicuous; but many things may be conspicuous which are not expressly prominent: nothing is prominent but what projects beyond a certain line; everything is conspicuous which may be seen by many: the nose on a man's face is a prominent feature, owing to its projecting situation; and it is sometimes conspicuous, according to the position of the person: a figure in a painting is said to be prominent, if it appears to stand forward or before the others; but it is not properly conspicuous, unless there be something in it which attracts the general notice, and distinguishes it from all other things; on the contrary, it is conspicuous, but not expressly prominent, when the colors are vivid.

Lady Macbeth's walking in her sleep is an incident so full of tragic horror, that it stands out as a prominent feature in the most sublime drama in the world. CUMBERLAND.

That innocent mirth which had been so conspicuous in Sir Thomas More's life, did not forsake him to the last. ADDISON.

PROMISCUOUS, INDISCRIMINATE.

PROMISCUOUS, in Latin promiscuus, from promisceo, or pro and misceo, to mix-gle, signifies thoroughly mingled. INDISCRIMINATE, from the Latin in, privative, and discrimen, a difference, signifies without any difference.

Promiscuous is applied to any number of different objects mingled together; indiscriminate is only applied to the action in which one does not discriminate different objects: a multitude is termed promiscuous, as characterizing the thing; the use of different things for the same purpose, or of the same things for different purposes, is termed indiscriminate, as characterizing the person: things become promiscuous by the want of design in any one; they are indiscriminate by the express intention of some one: plants of all descriptions are to be found promiscuously situated in the beds of a garden: it is folly to level any charge indiscriminately against all the members of any community or profession.

Victors and vanquish'd join promiscuous cries.

POPE.

From this indiscriminate distribution of misery, the moralists have always derived one of their strongest moral arguments for a future state.

JOHNSON.

PROMISE, ENGAGEMENT, WORD.

PROMISE, in Latin promissus, from promitto, compounded of pro, before, and mitto, to set or fix; that is, to fix beforehand, is specific, and consequently more binding than the ENGAGEMENT (v. Business); we promise a thing in a set form of words, that are clearly and strictly understood; we engage in general terms, that may admit of alteration: a promise is mostly unconditional; an engagement is frequently conditional. In promises the faith of an individual is admitted upon his word, and built upon as if it were a deed; in engagements the intentions of an individual for the future are all that are either implied or understood: on the fulfilment of promises often depend the most important interests of individuals; an attention to engagements is a matter of mutual convenience in the ordinary concerns of life: a man makes a promise of payment, and upon his promise it may happen that many others depend for the fulfilment of their promises: when engagements are made to visit or meet others, an inattention to such engagements causes great trouble.

An acre of performance is worth the whole world of promises.

HOWELL.

The engagements I had to Dr. Swift were such as the actual services he had done me, in relation to the subscription for Homer, obliged me to.

POPE.

As a promise and engagement can be made only by words, the WORD is often put for either, or for both, as the case requires: he who breaks his word in small matters cannot be trusted when he gives his word in matters of consequence.

Æneas was our prince; a juster lord,
Or nobler warrior, never drew a sword;
Observant of the right, religious of his word.

DAYDEN.

PROOF, EVIDENCE, TESTIMONY.

THE PROOF (v. Argument) is that which simply proves; the EVIDENCE is that which makes evident (v. Clear); the TESTIMONY, from testis, a witness, is a species of evidence by means of witnesses. In the legal acceptance of the terms proofs are commonly denominated evidence, because nothing can be admitted as proof which does not tend to make evident; but as what is proved is made more certain or indubitable than what is made evident, proof is more than evidence. Proof is likewise taken for the act of proving as well as for the thing that proves, which distinguishes it still further from evidence.

Positive proof is always required where, from the nature of the case, it appears it might possibly have been had. But next to positive proof circumstantial evidence, or the doctrine of presumptions, must take place.

BLACKSTONE.

Evidence comprehends whatever is employed to make evident, be it words or deeds, be it writing or discourse; testimony is properly evidence by words spoken, and, more strictly speaking, the person giving the evidence.

Evidence is either written or parole.

BLACKSTONE.

Our law considers that there are many transactions to which only one person is privy, and therefore does not always demand the testimony of two.

BLACKSTONE.

In an extended application of these terms they are employed with a similar distinction: the proof is the mark or sign which proves: the evidence is the mark or sign which makes evident: the testimony is that which is offered or given by things personified in proof of anything.

Of the fallaciousness of hope and the uncertainty of schemes, every day gives some new proof. JOHNSON.

Cato Major, who had borne all the great offices, has left us an evidence, under his own hand, how much he was versed in country affairs. LOCKE.

Evidence is said to arise from testimony, when we depend upon the credit and relation of others for the truth or falsehood of anything. WILKINS.

The proof is employed for facts or physical objects: the evidence is applied to that which is moral; testimony regards that which is personal. All that our Saviour did and said were evidences of his divine character, which might have produced faith in the minds of many, even if they had not had such numerous and miraculous proofs of his power. One friend makes a present to another in testimony of his regard: the proof and the testimony is something external, or some outward mark or indication; the evidence may be internal, or lie in the thing itself, as the internal evidences of Christianity.

Men ought not to expect either sensible proof or demonstration for such matters as are not capable of such proofs, supposing them to be true. WILKINS.

Of Swift's general habits of thinking, if his letters can be supposed to afford any evidence, he was not a man to be either loved or envied. JOHNSON.

Ye Trojan flames, your testimony bear
What I perform'd, and what I suffer'd there. DRYDEN.

PROPORTIONATE, COMMENSURATE, ADEQUATE.

PROPORTIONATE, from the Latin proportio, compounded of pro and portio, signifies having a portion, suitable to, or in agreement with, some other object. COMMENSURATE, from the Latin commensus or commensor, signifies measuring in accordance with some other thing, being suitable in measure to something else. ADEQUATE, in Latin adequatus, participle of adequo, signifies made level with some other body.

Proportionate is here a term of general use; the others are particular terms, employed in a similar sense, in regard to particular objects: that is proportionate which rises as a thing rises, and falls as a thing falls; that is commensurate which is made to rise to the same measure or degree; that is adequate which is made to come up to the height of another thing. Proportionate is employed either in the proper or improper sense; in all recipes and prescriptions of every kind proportionate quantities must always be taken; when the task increases in difficulty and complication, a proportionate degree of labor and talent must be employed upon it. Commensurate and adequate are employed only in the moral sense; the former to denote suitability of things in point of measure, the latter to denote the equalizing of powers: a person's recompense should in some measure be commensurate with his labor and deserts: a person's resources should be adequate to the work he is engaged in.

All envy is proportionate to desire. JOHNSON.

Where the matter is not commensurate to the words, all speaking is but tautology. SOCR.

Outward actions are not adequate expressions of our virtues. ADDISON.

PROPOSAL, PROPOSITION.

PROPOSAL comes from propose, in the sense of offer: PROPOSITION comes from proposere, in the sense of setting down in a distinct form of words. We make a proposal to a person to enter into a partnership with him; we make a proposition to one who is at variance with us to settle the difference by arbitration.

I have proposed a visit to her friend Lady Campbell, and my Anna seemed to receive the proposal with pleasure. SIR WILLIAM JONES.

The Protestants, averse from proceeding to any act of violence, listened with pleasure to the pacific proposition of the queen regent. ROBERTSON.

TO PROROGUE, ADJOURN.

PROROGUE, from the Latin prorogare, signifies to put off, and is used in the general sense of deferring for an indefinite period. ADJOURN, from journer, the day, signifies only to put off for a day, or some short period: the former is applied to national assemblies only; the latter is applicable to any meeting.

A prorogation is the continuance of Parliament from one session to another. BLACKSTONE.

An adjournment is no more than a continuance of the session from one day to another.

BLACKSTONE.

TO PROVE, DEMONSTRATE, EVINCE, MANIFEST.

PROVE, in Latin probo, signifies to make good, i. e., to make good by proofs, which is here the general term; the other terms imply different modes of proving: we prove in different ways, and in different degrees. To DEMONSTRATE, from monstro, to show, and the intensive syllable de, signifies to prove in a specific manner, that is, in a clear and undeniable manner; we may prove facts, innocence, guilt, and the like; we demonstrate the truth or falsity of a thing.

The existence of a God is so far from being a thing that wants to be proved, that I think it the only thing of which we are certain.

GUARDIAN.

The nature of this eternity is utterly inconceivable by the mind of man: our reason demonstrates to us that it has been, but at the same time can frame no idea of it, but what is big with absurdity and contradiction.

ADDISON.

Prove and demonstrate may also be applied to that which a person may show of himself; evinces and manifest are used only in this application. To prove in this case is to give a proof, as to prove one's valor; to demonstrate is to give a clear or ocular proof, as to demonstrate an attachment to a thing; to evinces is to show by convincing proof, as to evinces one's integrity by the whole course of one's dealings; to manifest is to make manifest, as to manifest one's displeasure or satisfaction.

From what is left on record of his actions, he plainly appears to have proved, what the prophet foresaw him to be, a man of violence, cruelty, and blood.

BLAIR.

By the very setting apart and consecrating places for the service of God, we demonstrate our acknowledgment of his power and sovereignty over us.

BEVERIDGE.

We must evinces the sincerity of our faith by good works.

BLAIR.

In the life of a man of sense, a short life is sufficient to manifest himself a man of honor and virtue.

STEELE.

In regard to things, to prove is to serve as a proof; to evinces is to serve as a particular proof; to manifest is to serve as a public proof. The beauty and order in the Creation prove the wisdom of the Creator; a persistence in a particular course of conduct may either evinces great virtue or great folly; the miracles wrought in Egypt manifested the Divine power.

Why on those shores are they with joy survey'd,
Admir'd as heroes, and as gods obey'd,
Unless great acts superior merit prove? POPE.
His master's interest and his own combined,
Prompt every movement of his heart and mind,
Thought, word, and deed his liberty evinces,
His freedom is the freedom of a prince. COWPER.

This intermediate space is so well husbanded and managed that there is scarce a degree of perception which does not exist in some one part of the world of life. Is the goodness or wisdom of the Divine Being more manifested in this proceeding?

ADDISON.

TO PROVIDE, PROCURE, FURNISH, SUPPLY.

PROVIDE, in Latin provideo, signifies literally to see before, but figuratively to get in readiness for some future purpose. PROCURE, v. To get. FURNISH is in French fournir. SUPPLY, in French suppléer, Latin suppleo, from sub and pleo, signifies to fill up a deficiency, or make up what is wanting.

Provide and procure are both actions that have a special reference to the future; furnish and supply are employed for that which is of immediate concern: one provides a dinner in the contemplation that some persons are coming to partake of it; one procures help in the contemplation that it may be wanted; we furnish a room, as we find it necessary for the present purpose; one supplies a family with any article of domestic use. Calculation is necessary in providing; one does not wish to provide too much or too little: labor and management are requisite in procuring; when a thing is not always at hand, or not easily come at, one must exercise one's time, strength, or ingenuity to procure it: judgment is requisite in furnishing; what one furnishes ought to be selected with reference to the circumstances of the individual who furnishes; care and attention are wanted in supplying; we must be careful to know what a person really wants, in order to supply him to his satisfaction. One provides against all contingencies; one procures all necessities; one furnishes all comforts; one supplies all deficiencies.

A rude hand may build walls, form roofs, and lay floors, and provides all that warmth and security require. JOHNSON.

Such dress as may enable the body to endure the different seasons, the most unenlightened nations have been able to procure. JOHNSON.

Auria having driven the Turks from Corone, both by sea and land, furnished the city with corn, wine, victual, and gunpowder. KNOLLES.

Although I neither lend nor borrow,
Yet to supply the ripe wants of my friend
I'll break a custom. SHAKESPEARE.

Provide and procure are the acts of persons only; furnish and supply are the acts of unconscious agents: one's garden and orchard may be said to furnish him with delicacies; the earth supplies us with food. So in the improper application: the daily occurrences of a great city furnish materials for a newspaper; a newspaper, to an Englishman, supplies almost every other want.

Your ideas are new, and borrowed from a mountainous country, the only one that can furnish truly picturesque scenery. GRAY.

And clouds, dissolv'd, the thirsty ground supply. DRYDEN.

PROVIDENCE, PRUDENCE.

PROVIDENCE and PRUDENCE are both derived from the verb to provide; but the former expresses the particular act of providing; the latter the habit of providing. The former is applied both to animals and men; the latter is employed only as a characteristic of men. We may admire the providence of the ant in laying up a store for the winter; the prudence of a parent is displayed in his concern for the future settlement of his child. It is provident in a person to adopt measures of escape for himself, in certain situations of peculiar danger; it is prudent to be always prepared for all contingencies.

In Albion's isle, when glorious Edgar reign'd,
He, wisely provident, from her white cliffs,
Launch'd half her forests. SOMERVILLE.

Prudence operates on life in the same manner as rules on composition; it produces vigilance rather than elevation. JOHNSON.

PRUDENT, PRUDENTIAL.

PRUDENT (v. Judgment) characterizes the person or the thing; PRUDENTIAL characterizes only the thing. Prudent signifies having prudence; prudential, according to rules of prudence, or as respects prudence. The prudent is opposed to the imprudent and inconsiderate; the prudential is opposed to the voluntary: the course is prudent which accords with the principles of prudence; the reason or motive is prudential, as flowing out of circumstances of prudence or necessity. Every one is called upon at certain times to adopt prudent measures; those who are obliged to consult their means in the management of their expenses must act upon prudential motives.

Ulysses first in public care she found,
For prudential counsel like the gods renown'd. POPE.

Those who possess elevated understandings are naturally apt to consider all prudential maxims as below their regard. JOHNSON.

TO PRY, SCRUTINIZE, DIVE INTO.

PRY is in all probability changed from prove, in the sense of try. SCRUTINIZE comes from the Latin scrutator, to search thoroughly. DIVE, v. To plunge.

Pry is taken in the bad sense of looking more narrowly into things than one ought: scrutinize and dive into are employed in the good sense of searching things to the bottom. A person who pries looks into that which does not belong to him; and too narrowly also into that which may belong to him; it is the consequence of a too eager curiosity or a busy meddling temper: a person who scrutinizes looks into that which is intentionally concealed from him; it is an act of duty flowing out of his office: a person who dives penetrates into that which lies hidden very deep; he is impelled to this action by the thirst of knowledge and a laudable curiosity.

A love of prying into the private affairs of families makes a person a troublesome neighbor: it is the business of the magistrate to scrutinize all matters which affect the good order of society: there are some minds so imbued with a love of science that they delight to dive into the secrets of nature.

The peaceable man never officiously seeks to pry into the secrets of others. BLAIR.

He who enters upon this scrutiny (into the depths of the mind) enters into a labyrinth. SOCRATES.

In man the more we dive, the more we see Heaven's signet stamping an immortal make. YONGE.

TO PUBLISH, PROMULGATE, DIVULGE, REVEAL, DISCLOSE.

PUBLISH, v. To advertise. PROMULGATE, in Latin promulgatus, participle of promulgo or provulgo, signifies to make vulgar. DIVULGE, in Latin divulgo, that is, in diversos vulgo, signifies to make vulgar in different parts. REVEAL, in Latin revelo, from velo, to veil, signifies to take off the veil or cover. DISCLOSE signifies to make the reverse of close.

To publish is the most general of these terms, conveying in its extended sense the idea of making known; but it is in many respects indefinite: we may publish to many or few; but to promulgate is always to make known to many. We may publish that which is a domestic or a national concern; we promulgate properly only that which is of general interest: the affairs of a family or of a nation are published in the newspapers; doctrines, principles, precepts, and the like, are promulgated.

The Jews read Moses and the Prophets of old time, as their Book of Acts informs us. And so, indeed, do writers of their own in the same age with it, who boast of the practice as a most-useful and honorable distinction peculiar to their nation, that the laws of life were thus published to the people. SECKER.

An absurd theory on one side of a question forms no justification for alleging a false fact or promulgating mischievous maxims on the other. BURKE.

We may publish things to be known, or things not to be known; we divulge things mostly not to be known: we may publish our own shame, or the shame of another, and we may publish that which is advantageous to another; but we commonly divulge the secrets or the crimes of another.

There was, we may very well think, some cause which moved the Apostle St. Paul to require that those things which any one church's affairs gave particular occasion to write, might, for the instruction of all, be published, and that by reading. HOOKER.

Tremble, thou wretch,
That hast within thee undivulged crimes. SHAKESPEARE.

To publish is said of that which was never before known, or never before existed; to reveal and disclose are said of that which has been only concealed or lay hidden: we publish the events of the day; we reveal the secret or the mystery of a transaction; we disclose the whole affair from beginning to end, which has never been properly known or accounted for.

If I should tell you how these two did coact,
Shall I not lie in publishing the truth?

SHAKESPEARE.

In confession, the revealing is not for worldly use, but for the ease of a man's heart. BACON.

Then earth and ocean various forms disclose.

DRYDEN.

TO PURPOSE, PROPOSE.

WE PURPOSE (v. To design) that which is near at hand, or immediately to be set about; we PROPOSE that which is more distant: the former requires the setting before one's mind, the latter requires deliberation and plan. We purpose many things which we never think worth while doing; but we ought not to propose anything to ourselves which is not of too much importance to be lightly adopted or rejected. We purpose to go to town on a certain day; we propose to spend our time in a particular study.

When listening Philomela deigns
To let them joy, and purposes in thought
Elate, to make her night excel their day.

THOMSON.

There are but two plans on which any man can propose to conduct himself through the dangers and distresses of human life. BLAIR.

TO PUSH, SHOVE, THRUST.

ALL these words denote the giving an impulse to a body with more or less force, but differ as to the situation in which the impulse is given. PUSH and SHOVE require the bodies which give and receive the impulse to be in contact: one person cannot push or shove another without coming in direct personal contact with him; as when a person touches another in passing, it may be a push more or less violent: to shove is a continued action, which causes the body to move forward; as to shove a load along the ground. A body may be both pushed and shoved along, but in the former case this is effected by repeated pushes, and in the latter case by a continuation of the same act. To THRUST, like push, is a single act; but thrusting is commonly performed by some instrument, as a pole, a stick, a hand, or some part of a body.

Our enemies have beat us to the pit;
It is more worthy to leap in ourselves
Than tarry till they push us. SHAKESPEARE.

There the British Neptune stood
Beneath them, to submit th' officious flood,
And with his trident shove'd them off the sand. DRYDEN.

When the king comes, offer him no violence
Unless he seek to thrust you out by force. SHAKESPEARE.

A body may likewise, in a similar manner, thrust itself, but it always pushes or shoves some other body.

Who's there, I say? How dare you thrust yourself
Into my private meditations? SHAKESPEARE.

TO PUT, PLACE, LAY, SET.

PUT is in all probability derived from the same root as the Latin positus, participle of pono, to place. PLACE, v. To place. LAY, in Saxon legan, German legen, Latin loco, and Greek λεγομαι, signifies to cause to lie; and SET, in German setzen, Latin sisto, and sto, to stand, signifies to cause to stand. Put is the most general of all these terms; place, lay, and set are but modes of putting; one puts things generally, but the way of putting is not defined; we may put a thing into one's room, one's desk, one's pocket, and the like; but to place is to put in a specific manner, and for a specific purpose; one places a book on a shelf as a fixed place for it, and in a position most suitable to it. To lay and set are still more specific than place; the former being applied only to such things as can be made to lie; and set only to such as can be made to stand: a book may be said to be laid on the table when placed in a downward position, and set on a shelf when placed on one end: we lay ourselves down on the ground; we set a trunk upon the ground.

The laborer cuts
Young slips, and in the soil securely puts. DRYDEN.

Then youths and virgins, twice as many, join
To place the dishes, and to serve the wine. DRYDEN.

Here some design a mole, while others there
Lay deep foundations for a theatre. DRYDEN.

Ere I could Give him that parting kiss, which I had set
Between two charming words, comes in my father. SHAKESPEARE.

Q.

QUALIFICATION, ACCOMPLISHMENT.

THE QUALIFICATION (v. Competent) serves the purpose of utility; the ACCOMPLISHMENT serves to adorn: by the first we are enabled to make ourselves useful; by the second we are enabled to make ourselves agreeable. The qualifications of a man who has an office to perform must be considered: of a man who has only pleasure to pursue, the accomplishments are to be considered. A readiness with one's pen, and a facility at accounts, are necessary qualifications either for a school or a counting-house; drawing is one of the most agreeable and suitable accomplishments that can be given to a young person.

The companion of an evening, and the companion for life, require very different qualifications. JOHNSON.

Where nature bestows genius, education will give accomplishments. CROMWELL.

TO QUALIFY, TEMPER, HUMOR.

QUALIFY, v. Competent. TEMPER, from tempero, is to regulate the temperament. HUMOR, from humor, is to suit the humor.

Things are qualified according to circumstances: what is too harsh must be qualified by something that is soft and lenitive; things are tempered by nature or by providence, so that things perfectly discordant should not be combined; things are humored by contrivance: what is subject to many changes requires to be humored; a polite person will qualify a refusal by some expression of kindness; Providence has tempered the seasons so as to mix something that is pleasant in them all. Nature itself is sometimes to be humored when art is employed: but the tempers of man require still more to be humored.

It is the excellency of friendship to rectify, or at least to qualify, the malignity of these surmises. SCOTT.

God in his mercy has so framed and tempered his word, that we have for the most part a reserve of mercy wrapped up in a curse. SCOTT.

Our British gardeners, instead of humoring nature, love to deviate from it as much as possible. ADDISON.

QUALITY, PROPERTY, ATTRIBUTE.

QUALITY, in Latin qualitas, from qualis, such, signifies such as a thing really is. PROPERTY, which is changed from propriety and proprius, proper or one's own, signifies belonging to a thing as an essential ingredient. ATTRIBUTE, in Latin attributus, participle of attribuo, to bestow upon, signifies the things bestowed upon or assigned to another.

The quality is that which is inherent in the thing and coexistent; the property is that which belongs to it for the time being; the attribute is the quality which is assigned to any object. We cannot alter the quality of a thing without altering the whole thing; but we may give or take away properties from bodies at pleasure, without entirely destroying their identity; and we may ascribe attributes at discretion.

Humility and patience, industry and temperance, are very often the good qualities of a poor man. ADDISON.

No man can have sunk so far into stupidity, as not to consider the properties of the ground on which he walks, of the plants on which he feeds, or of the animals that delight his ear. JOHNSON.

Man o'er a wider field extends his views,
God through the wonder of his works pursues,
Exploring thence his attributes and laws,
Adores, loves, imitates, th' Eternal Cause.

JENYNS.

QUARREL, BROIL, FEUD.

QUARREL (v. Difference) is the general and ordinary term; BROIL, from brawl, and FEUD, in German fehde, connected with the word fight, including active hostility, are particular terms. The idea of a variance between two or more parties is common to these terms; but the former respects the complaints and charges which are reciprocally made; broil respects the confusion and entanglement which arises from a contention and collision of interests; feud respects the hostilities which arise out of the variance. There are quarrels where there are no broils, and there are both where there are no feuds; but there are no broils and feuds without quarrels: the quarrel is not always openly conducted between the parties; it may sometimes be secret, and sometimes manifest itself only in a coolness of behavior: the broil is a noisy kind of quarrel, it always breaks out in loud, and mostly reproachful language: feud is a deadly kind of quarrel which is heightened by mutual aggravations and insults. Quarrels are very lamentable when they take place between members of the same family; broils are very frequent among profligate and restless people who live together: feuds were very general in former times between different families of the nobility.

The dirk or broad dagger, I am afraid, was of more use in private quarrels than in battles.

JOHNSON.

Ev'n haughty Juno, who with endless broils,
Earth, seas, and heav'n, and Jove himself turmoils,

At length aton'd, her friendly pow'r shall join,
To cherish and advance the Trojan line.

DREYDEN.

The poet describes (in the poem of Chevy Chase) a battle occasioned by the mutual feuds which reigned in the families of an English and Scotch nobleman.

ADDISON.

QUARREL, AFFRAY, OR FRAY.

A QUARREL (v. Difference) is indefinite, both as to the cause and the manner in which it is conducted; an AFFRAY or FRAY, from frico, to rub, signifies the collision of the passions, and is a particular kind of quarrel: a quarrel may subsist between two persons from a private difference; an affray always takes place between many upon some public occasion: a quarrel may be carried on merely by words; an affray is commonly conducted by acts of violence: many angry words pass in a quarrel between too hasty people; many are wounded, if not killed, in affrays, when opposite parties meet.

The quarrel between my friends did not run so high as I find your accounts have made it.

STEELE.

The Provost of Edinburgh, his son, and several citizens of distinction, were killed in the fray.

ROBERTSON.

QUESTION, QUERY.

QUESTION, v. To ask. QUERY is but a variation of quære, from the verb quæro, to seek or inquire.

Questions and queries are both put for the sake of obtaining an answer; but the former may be for a reasonable or unreasonable cause; a query is mostly a rational question: idlers may put questions from mere curiosity; learned men put queries for the sake of information.

I shall conclude with proposing only some queries in order to a further search to be made by others.

NEWTON.

Because he that knoweth least is fittest to ask questions, it is more reason for the entertainment of the time that ye ask me questions than that I ask you.

BACON.

QUICKNESS, SWIFTNESS, FLEETNESS, CELERITY, RAPIDITY, VELOCITY.

THESE terms are all applied to the motion of bodies, of which QUICKNESS, from quick, denotes the general and simple idea which characterizes all the rest. Quickness is near akin to life, and is directly opposed to slowness. SWIFTNESS, in all probability from the German schweifen, to roam; and FLEETNESS, from fly, express higher degrees of quickness. CELERITY, probably from celer, a horse; VELOCITY, from velo, to fly; and RAPIDITY, from rapio, to seize or hurry along, differ more in application than in degree. Quick and swift are applicable to any objects; men are quick in moving, swift in running: dogs hear quickly, and run swiftly; a mill goes quickly or swiftly round, according to the force of the wind: fleetness is the peculiar characteristic of winds or horses; a horse is fleet in the race, and is sometimes described to be as fleet as the winds: that which we wish to characterize as particularly quick in our ordinary operations, we say is done with celerity; in this manner our thoughts pass with celerity from one object to another: those things are said to move with rapidity which seem to hurry everything away with them; a river or stream moves with rapidity; time goes on with a rapid flight: velocity signifies the swiftness of flight, which is a motion that exceeds all others in swiftness: hence, we speak of the velocity of a ball shot from a cannon, or of a celestial body moving in its orbit; sometimes these words, rapidity and velocity, are applied in the improper sense by way of emphasis to the very swift movements of other bodies: in this manner the wheel of a carriage is said to move rapidly; and the flight of an animal, or the progress of a vessel before the wind, is compared to the flight of a bird in point of velocity.

Impatience of labor seizes those who are most distinguished for quickness of apprehension.

JOHNSON.

Above the bounding billows swift they flew,
Till now the Grecian camp appear'd in view.

POPE.

For fear, though *fleet*er than the wind,
Believes 'tis always left behind.

BUTLER.

By moving the eye we gather up with great celerity the several parts of an object, so as to form one piece.

BURKE.

Meantime the radiant sun, to mortal sight
Descending swift, roll'd down the rapid light.

POPE.

Lightning is productive of grandeur, which it chiefly owes to the velocity of its motion.

BURKE.

R.

RACE, GENERATION, BREED.

RACE, v. Family. GENERATION, in Latin generatio, from gnero, and the Greek gennaw, to engender or beget, signifies the thing begotten. BREED signifies that which is bred (v. To breed). These terms are all employed in regard to a number of animate objects which have the same origin; the first two are said only of human beings, the latter only of brutes: the term race is employed in regard to the dead as well as the living; generation is employed mostly in regard to the living: hence we speak of the race of the Heraclidæ, the race of the Bourbons, the race of the Stuarts, and the like; but the present generation, the whole generation, a worthless generation, and the like: breed is said of those animals which are brought forth, and brought up in the same manner. Hence, we denominate some domestic animals as of a good breed, where particular care is taken not only as to the animals from which they come, but also of those which are brought forth.

Where *rac*es are thus numerous and thus combined, none but the chief of a clan is thus addressed by his name.

JOHNSON.

Like leaves on trees the *rac*e of man is found,
Now green in youth, now with'ring on the ground;

So generations in their course decay.

So flourish these when those are pass'd away.

POPE.

Nor last forget thy faithful dogs, but feed
With fatt'ning whey the mastiff's generous breed.

DATTES.

RADIANCE, BRILLIANCY.

BOTH these terms express the circumstance of a great light in a body; but

RADIANCE, from radius, a ray, denotes the emission of rays, and is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to bodies naturally luminous, like the heavenly bodies; and BRILLIANCY (v. Bright) denotes the whole body of light emitted, and may, therefore, be applied equally to natural and artificial light. The radiancy of the sun, moon, and stars constitutes a part of their beauty; the brilliancy of a diamond is frequently compared with that of a star.

Among the crooked lanes, on every hedge,
The glowworm lights his gem, and through the dark
A moving radiance twinkles. THOMSON.

Brilliancy (v. Bright) is applied to objects which shine or glitter like a diamond.

The beauty of the ladies, the richness of their dress, and brilliancy of their jewels, were displayed in the most advantageous manner.

BAYDOWE.

It is also applied figuratively to moral objects.

A circumstance intervened during the pendency of the negotiation to set off the good faith of the company with an additional brilliancy, and to make it sparkle and glow with a variety of splendid faces.

BURKE.

RAPACIOUS, RAVENOUS, VORACIOUS.

RAPACIOUS, in Latin rapax, from rapio, to seize, signifies seizing or grasping anything with an eager desire to have. RAVENOUS, from the Latin rabies, fury, and rapio, to seize, signifies the same as rapacious. VORACIOUS, from voro, to devour, signifies an eagerness to devour.

The idea of greediness, which forms the leading feature in the signification of all these terms, is varied in the subject and the object: rapacious is the quality peculiar to beasts of prey, or what is like beasts of prey: ravenous and voracious are common to all animals when impelled by hunger. The beasts of the forest are rapacious at all times; all animals are more or less ravenous or voracious, as circumstances may make them: the term rapacious applies to the seizing of anything that is eagerly wanted; ravenous applies to the seizing of anything which one takes for one's food: a lion is rapacious when it seizes on its prey: it is ravenous in the act of consuming it. The word ravenous respects the haste with which one eats; the word voracious respects the quantity which one consumes: a ravenous person is loath to wait for the dressing of his food; he consumes it without any preparation: a voracious person not only eats in haste, but he consumes great quantities, and continues to do so for a long time. Abstinence from food for an unusual length will make any healthy creature ravenous; habitual intemperance in eating, or a diseased appetite, will produce voracity.

Rapacious death asserts his tyrant power.

MRS. CARTER.

Again the holy fires on altars burn,
And once again the rae'nous birds return.

DAYDEN.

Ere you remark another's sin,
Bid thy own conscience look within;
Control thy more voracious bill,
Nor for a breakfast nations kill.

GAY.

In an extended sense, rapacity is applied as a characteristic of persons to denote their eagerness to seize anything which falls in their way.

A display of our wealth before robbers is not the way to restrain their boldness, or to lessen their rapacity.

BURKE.

Ravenous denotes an excess of rapacity, and voracious is applied figuratively to moral objects.

So great a hatred hadde the greedie ravenousness of their proconsultes rooted in the hearts of them all.

GOLDING.

So voracious is this humor grown, that it draws in everything to feed upon.

GOVERNMENT OF THE TONGUE.

RAPINE, PLUNDER, PILLAGE.

THE idea of property taken from another contrary to his consent is included in all these terms: but the term RAPINE includes most violence; PLUNDER includes removal or carrying away; PILLAGE, search and scrutiny after a thing. A soldier who makes a sudden incursion into an enemy's country, and carries away whatever comes within his reach, is guilty of rapine: he goes into a house full of property, and carries away much plunder; he enters with the rest of the army into a town, and, stripping it of everything that was to be found, goes away loaded with pillage; mischief and bloodshed attend rapine; loss attends plunder; distress and ruin follow wherever there has been pillage.

Upon the banks
Of Tweed, slow winding thro' the vale, the seat
Of war and rapine once. SOMERVILLE.

Ship-money was pitched upon as fit to be formed by excise and taxes, and the burden of the subjects took off by plunderings and sequestrations. SOUTH.

Although the Eretrians for a time stood resolutely to the defence of their city, it was given up by treachery on the seventh day, and pillaged and destroyed in a most barbarous manner by the Persians. CUMBERLAND.

RARE, SCARCE, SINGULAR.

RARE, in Latin rarus, comes from the Greek ῥαῖος, rare. SCARCE, in Dutch schaers, sparing, comes from scheren, to cut or clip, and signifies cut close. SINGULAR, v. Particular.

Rare and scarce both respect number or quantity, which admit of expansion or diminution: rare is a thinned number; scarce is a quantity cut short. Rare is applied to matters of convenience or luxury; scarce to matters of utility or necessity: that which is rare becomes valuable, and fetches a high price; that which is scarce becomes precious, and the loss of it is seriously felt. The best of everything is in its nature rare; there will never be a superfluity of such things; there are, however, some things, as particularly curious plants or particular animals, which, owing to circumstances, are always rare: that which is most in use will, in certain cases, be scarce; when the supply of an article fails, and the demand for it continues, it naturally becomes scarce. An aloe in blossom is a rarity, for nature has prescribed such limits to its growth as to give but very few of such flowers: the paintings of Raphael, and the former distinguished painters, are daily becoming more scarce, because time will diminish their quantity, although not their value.

A perfect union of wit and judgment is one of the rarest things in the world. BURKE.

When any particular piece of money grew very scarce, it was often recoined by a succeeding emperor. ADDISON.

What is rare will often be singular, and what is singular will often, on that account, be rare: but these terms are not necessarily applied to the same object: fewness is the idea common to both; but rare is said of that of which there might be more; while singular is applied to that which is single, or nearly single, in its kind. The rare is that which is always sought for; the singular is not always that which one esteems: a thing is rare which is difficult to be obtained; a thing is singular for its peculiar qualities, good or bad. Indian plants are many of them rare in England, because the climate will not agree with them: the sensitive plant is singular, as its quality of yielding to the touch distinguishes it from all others.

And it was seated in an island strong,
Abounding all with delicies most rare.

SPENSER.

We should learn, by reflecting on the misfortunes which have attended others, that there is nothing singular in those which befall ourselves.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

RASHNESS, TEMERITY, HASTINESS, PRECIPITANCY.

RASHNESS denotes the quality of rash, which, like the German rasch, and our word rush, and the Latin ruo, expresses hurried and excessive motion. TEMERITY, in Latin temeritas, from temere, possibly comes from the Greek τημερον, at the moment, denoting the quality of acting by the impulse of the moment. HASTINESS, v. Angry and Cursory. PRECIPITANCY, from the Latin prope and capio, signifies the quality or disposition of taking things before they ought to be taken.

Rashness and temerity have a close alliance with each other in sense; but they have a slight difference which is entitled to notice: rashness is a general and indefinite term, in the signification of which an improper celerity is the leading idea: this celerity may arise either from a vehemence of character, or a temporary ardor of the mind: in the signification of temerity, the leading idea is want of consideration, springing mostly from an overweening confidence, or a presumption of character. Rashness is therefore applied to corporeal actions, as the jumping into a river, without being able to swim, or the leaping over a hedge, without being an expert horseman; temerity is applied to our moral actions, particularly such as require deliberation, and a calculation of consequences. Hastiness and precipitancy are but modes or characteristics of rashness, and consequently employed only in particular cases, as hastiness in regard to our movements, and precipitancy in regard to our measures.

Nature to youth hot rashness doth dispense,
But with cold prudence age doth recompense.

DENHAM.

All mankind have a sufficient plea for some degree of restlessness, and the fault seems to be little more than too much temerity of conclusion in favor of something not experienced. JOHNSON.

And hurry through the woods with hasty step,
Rustling and full of hope. SOMERVILLE.

As the chemist, by catching at it too soon, lost the philosophical elixir, so precipitancy of our understandings is an occasion of error.

GLANVILLE.

RATE, PROPORTION, RATIO.

RATE (v. To estimate) and RATIO, which has the same origin and original meaning as rate, are in sense species of PROPORTION (v. Proportionate): that is, they are supposed or estimated proportions, in distinction from proportions that lie in the nature of things. The first term, rate, is employed in ordinary concerns; a person receives a certain sum weekly at the rate of a certain sum yearly: ratio is applied only to numbers and calculations; as two is to four, so is four to eight, and eight to sixteen; the ratio in this case being double: proportion is employed in matters of science, and in all cases where the two more specific terms are not admissible; the beauty of an edifice depends upon observing the doctrine of proportions; in the disposing of soldiers a certain regard must be had to proportion in the height and size of the men.

At Ephesus and Athens, Anthony lived at his usual rate in all manner of luxury. PRIEUR.

The rate of interest (to lenders) is generally in a compound ratio formed out of the inconvenience and the hazard.

BLACKSTONE.

Repentance cannot be effectual but as it bears some proportion to sin.

SOUTH.

RAVAGE, DESOLATION, DEVASTATION.

RAVAGE comes from the Latin rapio, and the Greek απράχω, signifying a seizing or tearing away. DESOLATION, from solus, alone, signifies made solitary or reduced to solitude. DEVASTATION, in Latin devastatio, from devasto, to lay waste, signifies reducing to a waste or desert.

Ravage expresses less than either desolation or devastation: a breaking, tearing, or destroying is implied in the word ravage; but desolation signifies the entire unpeopling a land, and devastation the entire clearing away of every vestige of cultivation. Torrents, flames, and tempests ravage; war, plague, and famine desolate; armies of barbarians, who inundate a country, carry devastation with them wherever they go.

Beasts of prey retire, that all night long,
Urg'd by necessity, had rang'd the dark,
As if their conscious ravage shunn'd the light,
Asham'd. THOMSON.

Amid thy bow'rs the tyrant's hand is seen,
And desolation saddens all thy green.

GOLDSMITH.

How much the strength of the Roman republic is impaired, and what dreadful devastation has gone forth into all its provinces!

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

Ravage is employed likewise in the moral application; desolation and devastation only in the proper application to countries. Disease makes its ravages on beauty; death makes its ravages among men in a more terrible degree at one time than at another.

Would one think 'twere possible for love
To make such ravages in a noble soul? ADDISON.

RAY, BEAM.

RAY (v. Gleam) is indefinite in its meaning; it may be said either of a large or small quantity of light: BEAM (v. Gleam) is something positive; it can be said only of that which is considerable. We can speak of rays either of the sun, or the stars, or any other luminous body; but we speak of the beams of the sun or the moon. The rays of the sun break through the clouds; its beams are scorching at noonday. A room can scarcely be so shut up, that a single ray of light shall not penetrate through the crevices; the sea, in a calm moonlight night, presents a beautiful spectacle, with the moon's beams playing on its waves.

The stars emit a shivered ray. THOMSON.

The modest virtues mingle in her eyes,
Still on the ground dejected, darting all
Their humid beams into the blooming flowers.

THOMSON.

READY, APT, PROMPT.

READY (v. Easy) is in general applied to that which has been intentionally prepared for a given purpose; PROMPT (v. Expedition) is applied to that which is at hand so as to answer the immediate purpose; APT, from aptus, fit, is applied to that which is fit, or from its nature has a tendency to produce effects.

The god himself with ready trident stands
And ope the deep, and spreads the moving sands.
DRYDEN.

Let not the fervent tongue,
Prompt to deceive, with adulation smooth,
Gain on your purpos'd will. THOMSON.

Poverty is apt to betray a man into envy, riches
into arrogance. ADDISON.

When applied as personal characteristics, ready respects the will or understanding, which is prepared for anything; as ready to serve a person, a ready wit; prompt denotes the vigor or zeal which impels to action without delay, or at the moment when wanted; and apt, a fitness to do anything from the habit or temper of the mind.

All things are ready if our minds be so.
SHAKESPEARE.
But in his duty prompt at every call,
He watch'd and wept, he pray'd and felt for all.
GOLDSMITH.

This so eminent industry in making proselytes more of that sex than of the other growth that they are deemed apt to serve as instruments in the cause.
HOOKER.

REASONABLE, RATIONAL.

REASONABLE, or accordant with reason, and RATIONAL, having reason, are both derived from the same Latin word ratio, reason, which, from ratus and reor, to think, signifies the thinking faculty. They differ principally according to the different meanings of the word reason. Reasonable is sometimes applied to persons in the general sense of having the faculty of reason.

Human nature is the same in all reasonable creatures.
ADDISON.

But more frequently the word rational is used in this abstract sense of reason.

Can anything so probably conduce to the well-being of a rational and social animal as the right exercise of that reason, and of those social affections?
HARRIS.

In application to things reasonable and rational both signify according to reason;

but the former is used in reference to the business of life, as a reasonable proposal, wish, etc.; rational to abstract matters, as rational motives, grounds, questions, etc.

Men have no right to what is not reasonable, and to what is not for their benefit. BENTHAM.

The evidence which is afforded for a future state is sufficient for a rational ground of conduct. BAKER.

TO REBOUND, REVERBERATE, RECOIL.

To REBOUND is to bound or spring back: a ball rebounds. To REVERBERATE is to verberate or beat back: a sound reverberates when it echoes. To RECOIL is to coil or whirl back: a snake recoils. The two former are used in an improper application, although rarely; but we may say of recoil, that a man's schemes will recoil on his own head.

Honor is but the reflection of a man's own actions shining bright in the face of all about him, and from thence rebouncing upon himself.
SCOTT.

You seemed to reverberate upon me with the beams of the sun.
HOWELL.

Who in deep mines for hidden knowledge toils,
Like guns o'ercharg'd, breaks, misses, or recoils.
DEKANE.

TO RECEDE, RETREAT, RETIRE, WITHDRAW, SECEDE.

To RECEDE is to go back; to RETREAT is to draw back; the former is a simple action, suited to one's convenience; the latter is a particular action, dictated by necessity: we recede by a direct backward movement; we retreat by an indirect backward movement: we recede a few steps in order to observe an object more distinctly; we retreat from the position we have taken in order to escape danger; whoever can advance can recede; but in general those only retreat whose advance is not free: receding is the act of every one; retreating is peculiarly the act of soldiers, or those who make hostile movements.

As the sun recedes, the moon and stars discover themselves.
GLANTIL.
With dread of death to flight or foul retreat.
MILTON.

To RETIRE and WITHDRAW originally signify the same as retreat, that is, to draw back or off; but they agree in application mostly with recede, to denote leisurely, and voluntary acts: to recede is to go back from a given spot; but to retire and withdraw have respect to the place or the presence of the persons: we may recede on an open plain; but we retire or withdraw from a room, or from some company. In this application withdraw is the more familiar term: retire may likewise be used for an army; but it denotes a much more leisurely action than retreat: a general retreats, by compulsion, from an enemy; but he may retire from an enemy's country when there is no enemy present.

She from her husband soft withdrew. MILTON.

After some slight skirmishes he retired himself (retired) into the castle of Farnham.

CLARENDON.

Recede, retreat, retire, and withdraw are also used in a moral application; SECEDE is used only in this sense: a person recedes from his engagement, or his pretensions; he retires from business, or withdraws from a society. To secede is a public act; men secede from a religious or political body; withdraw is a private act; they withdraw themselves as individual members from any society.

We were soon brought to the necessity of receding from our imagined equality with our cousins.

JOHNSON.

Retirement from the world's cares and pleasures has been often recommended as useful to repentance.

JOHNSON.

A temptation may withdraw for awhile, and return again.

SOUTH.

How certain is our ruin, unless we sometimes retreat from this pestilential region (the world of pleasure).

BLAIR.

Pisistratus and his sons maintained their usurpations during a period of sixty-eight years, including those of Pisistratus' secessions from Athens.

CUMBERLAND.

RECEIPT, RECEPTION.

RECEIPT comes from receive, in its application to inanimate objects, which are taken into possession. RECEPTION comes from the same verb, in the sense of treating persons at their first arrival: in the commercial intercourse of men, the receipt of goods or money must be acknowledged in writing; in the friendly intercourse of men, their reception of each other will be polite or cold, according to the sentiments entertained toward the individual.

If a man will keep but of even hand, his ordinary expenses ought to be but to half of his receipts.

BACON.

I thank you and Mrs. Pope for my kind reception.

ATTENBURY.

TO RECKON, COUNT OR ACCOUNT, NUMBER.

The idea of esteeming is here common to these terms, which differ less in meaning than in application: RECKON (v. To calculate) is the most familiar; ACCOUNT (v. To calculate) and NUMBER, i. e., to put in the number, are employed only in the grave style: we reckon it a happiness to enjoy the company of a particular friend; we ought to account it a privilege to be enabled to address our Maker by prayer; we must all expect to be one day numbered with the dead.

Reckoning themselves absolved, by Mary's attachment to Bothwell, from the engagements which they had come under when she yielded herself a prisoner, they carried her next evening, under a strong guard, to the castle of Lochleven.

ROBERTSON.

There is no bishop of the Church of England but accounts it his interest, as well as his duty, to comply with this precept of the Apostle Paul to Titus, "These things teach and exhort."

SOUTH.

He whose mind never pauses from the remembrance of his own sufferings may justly be numbered among the most miserable of human beings.

JOHNSON.

TO RECLAIM, REFORM.

RECLAIM, from clamo, to call, signifies to call back to its right place that which has gone astray. REFORM signifies to form anew that which has changed its form: they are allied only in their application to the moral character. A man is reclaimed from his vicious courses by the force of advice or exhortation; he may be reformed by various means, external or internal. A parent endeavors to reclaim a child, but too often in vain; the offender is in general not reformed.

Scotland had nothing to dread from a princess of Mary's character, who was wholly occupied in endeavoring to reclaim her heretical subjects.

ROBERTSON.

A monkey, to reform the times,
Resolv'd to visit foreign climes.

GAY.

TO RECLINE, REPOSE.

To RECLINE is to lean back; to REPOSE is to place one's self back: he who

reclines, reposes ; but we may recline without reposing : when we recline we put ourselves into a particular position ; but when we repose we put ourselves into that position which will be most easy.

For consolation on his friend reclin'd.

FALCONER.

I first awak'd, and found myself repos'd
Under a shade, on flowers. MILTON.

RECOGNIZE, ACKNOWLEDGE.

RECOGNIZE, in Latin recognoscere, that is, to take knowledge of, or bring to one's own knowledge, is to take cognizance of that which comes again before our notice ; to ACKNOWLEDGE (v. To acknowledge) is to admit to one's knowledge whatever comes fresh under our notice : we recognize a person whom we have known before ; we recognize him either in his former character, or in some newly assumed character ; we acknowledge either former favors, or those which have been just received : princes recognize certain principles which have been admitted by previous consent ; they acknowledge the justice of claims which are preferred before them.

When conscience threatens punishment to secret crimes, it manifestly recognizes a Supreme Governor from whom nothing is hidden. BLAIR.

I call it atheism by establishment, when any State, as such, shall not acknowledge the existence of God as the moral governor of the world.

BURKE.

RECORD, REGISTER, ARCHIVE.

RECORD is taken for the thing recorded, or the collection in which a thing is recorded ; REGISTER, either for the thing registered, or the place in which it is registered ; ARCHIVE, mostly for the place, and sometimes for the thing : records are either historical details or short notices, which serve to preserve the memory of things ; registers are but short notices of particular and local circumstances ; archives are always connected with the State : every place of antiquity has its records of the different circumstances which have been connected with its rise and progress, and the various changes which it has experienced ; in public registers we find accounts of families, and of their various connections and fluctuations ; in archives we find all legal deeds and instruments which involve the interests of the nation, both in its internal and external economy. In an extended application of these terms, records contain whatever is to be remembered at ever so distant a period ; registers, that which is to serve present purposes ; archive, that in which any things are stored.

Though we think our words vanish with the breath that utters them, yet they become records in God's court, and are laid up in his archives as witnesses either for or against us.

GOVERNMENT OF THE TOWNER.

This island, as appeareth by faithful registers of those times, had ships of great content.

BACON.

It may be found in the same archives where the famous compact between magistrate and people, so much insisted on in the vindications of the rights of mankind, is repositied. WARBURTON.

TO RECOVER, RETRIEVE, REPAIR, RECRUIT.

RECOVER is to get again under one's cover or protection. RETRIEVE, from the French trouver, to find, is to find again. REPAIR, in French reparer, Latin reparo, from re and paro, to make ready or right again, signifies to make a thing good as it was before. RECRUIT, in French recru, from cru, and the Latin crecco, to grow, signifies either to grow or to cause to grow again, as before.

Recover is the most general term, and applies to objects in general ; retrieve, repair, and the others are only partial applications : we recover things either by our own means or by casualties ; we retrieve and repair by our own efforts only : we recover that which has been taken, or that which has been any way lost ; we retrieve that which has passed away or been consumed ; we repair that which has been injured ; we recruit that which has been diminished : we recover property from those who wish to deprive us of it ; we retrieve our misfortunes, or our lost reputation ; we repair the damage done to our property ; we recruit the strength which has been exhausted : we do not seek after that which we think irrecoverable ; we give that up which is irretrievable ; we do not labor on that which is irreparable ; our power of recruiting depends upon circumstances ; he who makes a moderate use of his resources may in general easily recruit himself when they are gone.

The serious and impartial retrospect of our conduct is indisputably necessary to the confirmation or recovery of our virtue. JOHNSON.

Why may not the soul receive
New organs, since ev'n art can these retrieve? JENYNS.

Your men shall be receiv'd, your fleet repair'd. DRYDEN.

With greens and flow'rs recruit their empty hives. DRYDEN.

RECOVERY, RESTORATION.

RECOVERY (v. To recover) is the regaining of any object which has been lost or missing; RESTORATION is the getting back what has been taken away, or that of which one has been deprived. What is recovered may be recovered with or without the use of means; the restoration is effected by foreign agency; that which is lost by accident may be recovered by accident; the restoration of a prince to his throne is mostly effected by his subjects.

This is that fulness of the Gentiles of which St. Paul speaks coincident in time with the recovery of the Jews, and in a great degree the effect of their conversion. HORSLEY.

Mr. Morrice and Sir John Granville, whom the General (Monk) trusted with his secret intentions in the arduous affair of the restoration, were at that time taken notice of to be intimate with Mr. Mordaunt. CLARENDON.

In respect to health or other things, recovery signifies, as before, the regaining something; and restoration, the bringing back to its former state.

When the cure was perfected, the names of the diseased persons, together with the manner of their recovery, were registered in the temple. POTTER.

My depressed spirits, on account of Joanna's critical and almost hopeless situation, greatly contributed to prevent the restoration of my health. STEDMAN.

So likewise in the moral application.

Let us study to improve the assistance which this revelation affords for the restoration of our nature and the recovery of our felicity. BLAIR.

RECTITUDE, UPRIGHTNESS.

RECTITUDE is properly rightness, which is expressed in a stronger manner by UPRIGHTNESS: we speak of the rectitude of conduct, or of judgment; of uprightness of mind, or of moral character, which must be something more than straight, for it must be elevated above everything mean or devious.

We are told by Cumberland that rectitude is merely metaphorical, and that as a right line describes the shortest passage from point to point, so a right action effects a good design by the fewest means. JOHNSON.

Who to the fraudulent impostor foul,
In his uprightness, answer thus return'd. MILTON.

TO REDEEM, RANSOM.

REDEEM, in Latin redimo, is compounded of re and emo, to buy off, or back to one's self. RANSOM is in all probability a variation of redeem.

Redeem is a term of general application; ransom is employed only on particular occasions: we redeem persons as well as things; we ransom persons only: we may redeem by labor, or anything which supplies an equivalent to money; we ransom persons with money only: we redeem a watch, or whatever has been given in pawn; we ransom a captive: redeem is employed in the improper application; ransom only in the proper sense: we may redeem our character, redeem our life, or redeem our honor; and in this sense our Saviour redeems repentant sinners; but those who are ransomed only recover their bodily liberty.

Thus in her crime her confidence she plac'd,
And with new treasons would redeem the past. DRYDEN.

A third tax was paid by vassals to the king, to ransom him if he should happen to be taken prisoner. ROBERTSON.

REDRESS, RELIEF.

REDRESS, like address (v. Accost), in all probability comes from the Latin dirigo, signifying to direct or bring back to the former point, is said only with regard to matters of right and justice; RELIEF (v. To help) to those of kindness and humanity: by power we obtain redress; by active interference we obtain a relief: an injured person looks for redress to the government; an unfortunate person looks for relief to the compassionate and kind: what we suffer through the oppression or wickedness of others can be redressed only by those who have the power of dispensing justice; whenever we suffer, in the order of Providence, we may meet with some relief from those who are more favored. Redress applies to public as well as private grievances; relief applies only to private distresses:

under a pretence of seeking redress of grievances, mobs are frequently assembled to the disturbance of the better disposed; under a pretence of soliciting charitable relief, thieves gain admittance into families.

Instead of redressing grievances, and improving the fabric of their state, the French were made to take a very different course. BURKE.

His house was known to all the vagrant train,
He chid their wanderings, but relieved their pain.
GOLDSMITH.

TO REDUCE, LOWER.

REDUCE is to bring back or to a given point, i. e., in an extended sense, to bring down; LOWER is to make low or lower, which proves the close connection of these words in their original meaning; it is, however, only in their improper application that they have any further connection. Reduce is used in the sense of lessen, when applied to number, quantity, price, etc.; lower is used in the same sense when applied to price, demands, terms, etc.: the former, however, occurs in cases where circumstances as well as persons are concerned; the latter only in cases where persons act: the price of corn is reduced by means of importation; a person lowers his price or his demand when he finds them too high.

The regular metres then in use may be reduced, I think, to four. TWEEDITT.

Mr. Locke, Mr. Law, and Mr. Montesquieu, as well as many other writers, seem to have imagined that the increase of gold and silver, in consequence of the discovery of the Spanish West Indies, was the real cause of the lowering of the rate of interest through the greater part of Europe. SMITH.

In the moral application, reduce expresses more than lower; a man is said to be reduced to an abject condition, but to be lowered in the estimation of others; to be reduced to a state of slavery, to be lowered in his own eyes.

I think the low circumstances she was reduced to was a piece of good luck for us. GUARDIAN.

It would be a matter of astonishment to me that any critic should be found proof against the beauties of Agamemnon as to lower its author to a comparison with Sophocles or Euripides. CUMBERLAND.

TO REFER, RELATE, RESPECT, REGARD.

REFER, from the Latin re and fero, signifies literally to bring back; and RE-

LATE, from the participle latus, of the same verb, signifies brought back: the former is, therefore, transitive, and the latter intransitive. Refer is commonly said of circumstances that carry the memory to events or circumstances; relate is said of things that have a natural connection: the religious festivals and ceremonies of the Roman Catholics have all a reference to some events that happened in the early periods of Christianity; the notes and observations at the end of a book relate to what has been inserted in the text.

Our Saviour's words (in his sermon on the mount) all refer to the Pharisees' way of speaking. SOUTH.

Homer artfully interweaves, in the several succeeding parts of his poem, an account of every thing material which relates to his prince. ADDISON.

Refer and relate carry us back to that which may be very distant; but RESPECT and REGARD (v. To esteem) turn our views to that which is near. Whatever respects or regards a thing has a moral influence over it; but the former is more commonly employed than the latter; it is the duty of the magistrates to take into consideration whatever respects the good order of the community; laws respect the general welfare of the community; the due administration of the laws regards the happiness of the individual.

Religion is a pleasure to the mind, as respects practice. SOUTH.

What I have said regards only the vain part of the sex. ADDISON.

RE FORM, REFORMATION.

REFORM has a general application; REFORMATION a particular application: whatever undergoes such a change as to give a new form to an object occasions a reform; when such a change is produced in the moral character, it is termed a reformation: the concerns of a state require occasional reform; those of an individual require reformation. When reform and reformation are applied to the moral character, the former has a more extensive signification than the latter; the term reform conveying the idea of a complete amendment; reformation implying only the process of amending or improving. A reform in one's life and conversation will always be accompanied with a corresponding increase of happiness to the individual; when we observe any approaches to reformation, we may cease to despair of the individual who gives the happy indications.

He was anxious to keep the distemper of France from the least countenance in England, where he was sure some wicked persons had shown a strong disposition to recommend an imitation of the French spirit of reform. BURKE.

Examples are pictures, and strike the senses, nay, raise the passions, and call in those (the strongest and most general of all motives) to the aid of reformation. FORB.

TO REFUSE, DECLINE, REJECT, REPEL, REBUFF.

REFUSE (v. To deny) signifies simply to pour back, that is, to send back, which is the common idea of all these terms. DECLINE, in Latin declino, signifies literally to turn aside; REJECT, from jacio, to throw, to cast back; REPEL, from pello, to drive, to drive back; REBUFF, from buff or puff, to puff one back, or send off with a puff.

Refuse is an unqualified action, it is accompanied with no expression of opinion; decline is a gentle and indirect mode of refusal; reject is a direct mode, and conveys a positive sentiment of disapprobation: we refuse what is asked of us, for want of inclination to comply; we decline what is proposed from motives of discretion; we reject what is offered to us, because it does not fall in with our views: we refuse to listen to the suggestions of our friends; we decline an offer of service; we reject the insinuations of the interested and evil-minded.

But all her arts are still employ'd in vain;
Again she comes, and is refus'd again. DRYDEN.
Why should he then reject a suit as just?

DRYDEN.

Melissa, though she could not boast the apathy of Cato, wanted not the more prudent virtue of Serpio, and gained the victory by declining the contest. JOHNSON.

To refuse is said only of that which passes between individuals; to reject is said of that which comes from any quarter: requests and petitions are refused by those who are solicited; opinions, propositions, and counsels are rejected by particular communities: the king refuses to give his assent to a bill; the Parliament rejects a bill.

Having most affectionately set life and death before them, and conjured them to choose one and avoid the other, he still leaves unto them, as to free and natural agents, a liberty to refuse all his calls, to let his talents lie by them unprofitable. HAMMOND.

The House was then so far from being possessed with that spirit, that the utmost that could be obtained upon a debate upon that petition was that it should not be rejected. CLARENDON.

To repel is to reject with violence; to rebuff is to refuse with contempt, or what may be considered as such. We refuse and reject that which is either offered, or simply presents itself for acceptance: the act may be negative, or not outwardly expressed; we repel and rebuff that which forces itself into our presence, contrary to our inclination: it is in both cases a direct act of force; we repel the attack of an enemy, or we repel the advances of one who is not agreeable; we rebuff those who put that in our way which is offensive. Importunate persons must necessarily expect to meet with rebuffs, and are in general less susceptible of them than others; delicate minds feel a refusal as a rebuff.

If he should choose the right casket, you would refuse to perform your father's will, if you should refuse to accept him. SHAKESPEARE.

Whether it be a divine revelation or no, reason must judge, which can never permit the mind to reject a greater evidence to embrace what is less evident. LOCKE.

Th' unwearied watch their listening leaders keep,
And, couching close, repel invading sleep. FORB.
At length rebuff'd, they leave their mangled prey. DRYDEN.

TO RELATE, RECOUNT, DESCRIBE.

RELATE, in Latin relatus, participle of refero, signifies to bring that to the notice of others which has before been brought to our own notice. RECOUNT is properly to count again, or count over again. DESCRIBE, from the Latin scribo, to write, is literally to write down.

The idea of giving an account of events or circumstances is common to all these terms, which differ in the object and circumstances of the action. Relate is said generally of all events, both of those which concern others as well as ourselves; recount is said particularly of those things in which the recounter has a special interest: those who relate all they hear often relate that which never happened; it is a gratification to an old soldier to recount all the transactions in which he bore a part during the military career of his early youth. We relate events that have happened at any period of time immediate or remote; we recount mostly those things which have been long passed: in recounting, the memory reverts to past scenes, and counts over all that has deeply interested the mind. Travellers are pleased to relate to their friends whatever they have seen remarkable in other countries; the recounting of our adventures in distant regions of the globe has a peculiar interest for all who hear them. We may relate either by writing or by word of mouth; we recount mostly by word of mouth. Relate is said properly of events or that which passes: describe is said of that which exists: we relate the particulars of our journey; and we describe the country we pass through. Personal adventure is always the subject of a relation; the quality and condition of things are those of the description. We relate what happened on meeting a friend; we describe the dress of the parties, or the ceremonies which are usual on particular occasions.

O Muse! the causes and the crimes relate,
What goddess was provok'd, and whence her hate.
DRYDEN.

To recount Almighty works
What words or tongue of scraph can suffice?
MILTON.

In describing a rough torrent or deluge, the numbers should run easy and flowing. FORD.

RELATION, RECITAL, NARRATION, NARRATIVE.

RELATION, from the verb relate, denotes the act of relating or the thing related. RECITAL, from recite, denotes the act of reciting or the thing recited. NARRATION, from narrate, denotes either the act of narrating or the thing narrated. NARRATIVE, from the same verb, denotes the thing narrated. Relation is here, as in the former paragraph (v. To relate), the general, and the others particular terms. Relation applies to every object which is related, whether of a public or private, a national or an individual nature; history is the relation of national events; biography is the relation of particular lives: recital is the relation or repetition of actual or existing circumstances; we listen to the recital of misfortunes, distresses, and the like. The relation may concern matters of indifference: the recital is always of something that affects the interests of some individual: the pages of the journalist are filled with the relation of daily occurrences which simply amuse in the reading; but the recital of another's woes often draws tears from the audience to whom it is made. Relation and recital are seldom employed but in connection with the object related or recited; narrative is mostly used by itself: hence we say the relation of any particular circumstance; the recital of any one's calamities; but an affecting narrative, or a simple narrative.

Those relations are commonly of most value in which the writer tells his own story. JOHNSON.

Old men fall easily into recitals of past transactions. JOHNSON.

Homer introduces the best instructions in the midst of the plainest narrations. DENHAM.

Therefore by this narrative you now understand the state of the question. BACON.

RELATION, RELATIVE, KINSMAN, KIN-DRED.

RELATION is here taken to express the person related; it is, as in the former paragraph, the general term both in sense and application; RELATIVE is employed only as respects the particular individual to whom one is related; KINSMAN designates the particular kind of relation, and KINDRED is a collective term comprehending all one's relations, or those who are akin to one. In abstract propositions we speak of relations; a man who is without relations feels himself an outcast in society; in designating one's close and intimate connection with persons we use the term relative; our near and dear relatives are the first objects of our regard: in designating one's relationship and connection with persons, kinsman is preferable; when a man has not any children, he frequently adopts one of his kinsmen as his heir: when the ties of relationship are to be specified in the persons of any particular family, they are denominated kindred; a man cannot abstract himself from his kindred while he retains any spark of human feeling.

You are not to imagine that I think myself discharged from the duties of gratitude only because my relations do not adjust their looks to my expectation.

JOHNSON.

Our friends and relatives stand weeping by.

POPE.

Herod put all to death whom he found in Trechoritis of the families and kindred of any of those at Repta.

PRIDEAUX.

TO RELAX, REMIT.

The general idea of lessening is that which allies these words to each other; but they differ very widely in their original meaning, and somewhat in their ordinary application; RELAX, from the word laz, or loose, signifies to make loose, and in its moral use to lessen anything in its degree of tightness or rigor; to REMIT, from re and mitto, to send back, signifies to take off in part or entirely that which has been imposed; that is, to lessen in quantity. In regard to our attempts to act, we may speak of relaxing in our endeavors, and remitting our labors or exertions; in regard to our dealings with others, we may speak of relaxing in discipline, relaxing in the severity or strictness of our conduct, of remitting a punishment or remitting a sentence. The discretionary power of showing mercy when placed in the hands of the sovereign, serves to relax the rigor of the law; when the punishment seems to be disproportioned to the magnitude of the offence, it is but equitable to remit it.

No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear,
Relax his ponderous strength, and lean to hear.

GOLDSMITH.

How often have I blessed the coming day,
When toll remitting lent its turn to play.

GOLDSMITH.

REMAINS, RELICS.

REMAINS signifies literally what remains: RELICS, from the Latin relinquo, to leave, signifies what is left. The former is a term of general and familiar application; the latter is specific. What remains after the use or consumption of anything is termed the remains; what is left of anything after a lapse of years is the relic or relics. There are remains of buildings mostly after a conflagration; there are relics of antiquity in most monasteries and old churches. Remains are of value, or not, according to the circumstances of the case; relics always derive a value from the person to whom they were supposed originally to belong. The remains of a person, that is, what corporally remains of a person after the extinction of life, will be respected by his friend; a bit of a garment that belonged, or was supposed to belong, to some saint, will be a precious relic in the eyes of a superstitious Roman Catholic. All nations have agreed to respect the remains of the dead; religion, under most forms, has given a sacredness to relics in the eyes of its most zealous votaries; the veneration of genius, or the devotedness of friendship, has in like manner transferred itself from the individual himself to some object which has been his property or in his possession, and thus fabricated for itself relics equally precious.

Upon these friendly shores and flow'ry plains,
Which hide Anchises and his blest remains.

DRYDEN.

This church is very rich in relics.

ADDISON.

Sometimes the term relics is used to denote what remains after the decay or loss of the rest, which further distinguishes it from the word remains, that simply signifies what is left.

Among the remains of old Rome, the grandeur of the commonwealth shows itself chiefly in works that were either necessary or convenient.

ADDISON.

All those arts, rarities, and inventions which the ingenious pursue, and all admire, are but the reliquies of an intellect defaced with sin and time.

SOUTH.

REMARK, OBSERVATION, COMMENT, NOTE, ANNOTATION, COMMENTARY.

REMARK (v. To notice), OBSERVATION (v. To notice), and COMMENT, in Latin commentum, from commiscescor, to call to mind, are either spoken or written: NOTE, ANNOTATION (v. Note), COMMENTARY, a variation of comment, are always written. Remark and observation, admitting of the same distinction in both cases, have been sufficiently explained in the article referred to: comment is a species of remark which often loses in good-nature what it gains in seriousness; it is mostly applied to particular persons or cases, and more commonly employed as a vehicle of censure than of commendation; public speakers and public performers are exposed to all the comments which the vanity, the envy, and ill-nature of self-constituted critics can suggest; but when not employed in personal cases, it serves for explanation: the other terms are used in this sense only, but with certain modifications; the note is most general, and serves to call the attention to as well as illustrate particular passages in the text: annotations and commentaries are more minute; the former being that which is added by way of appendage; the latter being employed in a general form; as the annotations of the Greek scholiasts, and the commentaries on the sacred writings.

Spence, in his remarks on Pope's Odyssey, produces what he thinks an unconquerable quotation from Dryden's preface to the Æneid, in favor of translating an epic poem into blank verse.

JOHNSON.

If the critic has published nothing but rules and observations on criticism, I then consider whether there be a propriety and elegance in his thoughts and words.

ADDISON.

Sublime or low, unbended or intense,
The sound is still a comment to the sense.

ROSCOMMON.

The history of the notes (to Pope's Homer) has never been traced.

JOHNSON.

I love a critic who mixes the rules of life with annotations upon writers.

STEELE.

Memoirs or memorials are of two kinds, whereof the one may be termed commentaries, the other registers.

BACON.

TO REPEAT, RECITE, REHEARSE, RECAPITULATE.

THE idea of going over any words, or actions, is common to all these terms. REPEAT, from the Latin repeto, to seek, or go over again, is the general term, including only the common idea. To RECITE, REHEARSE, and RECAPITULATE are modes of repetition, conveying each some accessory idea. To recite is to repeat in a formal manner; to rehearse is to repeat or recite by way of preparation; to recapitulate, from capitulum, a chapter, is to repeat the chapters or principal heads of any discourse. We repeat both actions and words; we recite only words; we repeat single words, or even sounds; we recite always a form of words: we repeat our own words or the words of another; we recite only the words of another; we repeat a name; we recite an ode, or a set of verses.

I could not half those horrid crimes repeat,
Nor half the punishments those crimes have met.

DRYDEN.

Whenever the practice of recitation was disused, the works, whether poetical or historical, perished with the authors.

JOHNSON.

We repeat for purposes of general convenience; we recite for the convenience or amusement of others; we rehearse for some specific purpose, either for the amusement or instruction of others: we recapitulate for the instruction of others. We repeat that which we wish to be heard; we recite a piece of poetry before a company; we rehearse the piece in private which we are going to recite in public; we recapitulate the general heads of that which we have already spoken in detail. A master must always repeat to his scholars the instruction which he wishes them to remember; Homer is said to have recited his verses in different parts; players rehearse their different parts before they perform in public; ministers recapitulate the leading points in their discourse. To repeat is commonly to use the same words; to recite, to rehearse, and to recapitulate, do not necessarily require any verbal sameness. We repeat literally what we hear spoken by another; but we recite and rehearse events, and we recapitulate in a concise manner what has been uttered in a particular manner. An echo repeats with the greatest possible precision; Homer recites the names of all the Grecian and Trojan leaders, together with the names and account of their countries, and the number of the forces which they commanded; Virgil makes Æneas to rehearse before Dido and her courtiers the story of the capture of Troy, and his own adventures; a judge recapitulates evidence to a jury.

He repeated the question so often that we were obliged to give him a reply.

BYRON.

The way has been to recite it at the prime or first hour every Lord's-day.

WATERLAND.

Now take your turns, ye muses, to rehearse
His friend's complaints, and mighty magic verse.

DRYDEN.

The parts of a judge are to direct the evidence to moderate length, repetition, or impertinency of speech, to recapitulate, select, and collate the material points of that which has been said.

BACON.

These terms may be applied with equal propriety to words written as to words spoken.

I am always naturally sparing of my letters to my friends, for a reason I think a great one, that it is needless after experience to repeat assurances of friendship.

POPE.

The thoughts of gods let Glanville's verse recite,
And bring the scenes of opening fates to light.

POPE.

Let Dryden with new rules our state refine,
And his great models form by this design;
But where's a second Virgil to rehearse
Our hero's glories in his epic verse?

ROCHESTER.

Hence we see the reason why creeds were no larger nor more explicit, being but a kind of a recapitulation of what the catechumens had been taught before.

WATERLAND.

REPENTANCE, PENITENCE, CONTRITION, COMPUNCTION, REMORSE.

REPENTANCE, from re, back, and pœnitet, to be sorry, signifies thinking one's self wrong for something past: PENITENCE, from the same source, signifies simply sorrow for what is amiss. CONTRITION, from contero, to rub together, is to bruise, as it were, with sorrow; COMPUNCTION, from compungo, to prick thoroughly; and REMORSE, from remordeo, to have a gnawing pain; all express modes of penitence differing in degree and circumstance. Repentance refers more to the change of one's mind with regard to an object, and is properly confined to the time when this change takes place; we therefore, strictly speaking, repent of a thing but once; we may, however, have penitence for the same thing all our lives. Repentance supposes a change of conduct, at least as long as the sorrow lasts; but the term penitence is confined to the sorrow which the sense of guilt occasions to the offender.

This is the sinner's hard lot, that the same thing which makes him need repentance makes him also in danger of not obtaining it.

SOUTH.

Heaven may forgive a crime to penitence,
For Heaven can judge if penitence be true.

DRYDEN.

Repentance is a term of more general application than penitence, being employed in respect to offences against men as well as against God; penitence, on the other hand, is applicable only to spiritual guilt. Repentance may have respect to our interests here, penitence to our interests hereafter.

But thou, in all thou dost with early cares,
Strive to prevent a fate like theirs,
That sorrow on the end may never wait,
Nor shape repentance, make thee wise too late.

ROWE.

Penitence is a general sentiment, which belongs to all men as offending creatures; but contrition, compunction, and remorse are awakened by reflecting on particular offences: contrition is a continued and severe sorrow, appropriate to one who has been in a continued state of peculiar sinfulness: compunction is rather an occasional but sharp sorrow, provoked by a single offence, or a moment's reflection; remorse may be temporary, but it is a still sharper pain awakened by some particular offence of peculiar magnitude and atrocity. The prodigal son was a contrite sinner; the brethren of Joseph felt great compunction when they were carried back with their sacks to Egypt; David was struck with remorse for the murder of Uriah.

His frown was full of terror, and his voice
Shook the delinquent with such fits of awe,
As left him not, till penitence had won
Lost favor back again, and closed the breach.

COWPER.

Contrition, though it may melt, ought not to sink or overpower the heart of a Christian.

BLAIR.

All men, even the most depraved, are subject more or less to compunctions of conscience.

BLAIR.

The heart,
Pierc'd with a sharp remorse for guilt, disclaims
The costly poverty of hecatombs,
And offers the best sacrifice itself.

JEFFRY.

REPETITION, TAUTOLOGY.

REPETITION is to TAUTOLOGY as the genus to the species; the latter being a species of repetition. There may be frequent repetition which is warranted by necessity or convenience; but tautology is that which nowise adds to either the sense or the sound. A repetition may, or may not, consist of literally the same words; but tautology, from the Greek tauroc, the same, and logos, a word, supposes such a sameness in expression as renders the signification the same. In the liturgy of the Church of England there are some repetitions, which add to the solemnity of the worship; in most extemporary prayers there is much tautology, which destroys the religious effect of the whole.

The Psalms, for the excellency of their contents, deserve to be oftener repeated, but that the multitude of them permitteth not any oftener repetition.

HOOKER.

That is truly and really tautology where the same thing is repeated, though under never so much variety of expression.

SOUTH.

REPREHENSION, REPROOF.

PERSONAL blame or censure is implied by both these terms, but the former is much milder than the latter. By REPREHENSION the personal independence is not so sensibly affected as in the case of REPROOF: people of all ages and stations, whose conduct is exposed to the investigation of others, are liable to reprehension; but children only, or such as are in a subordinate capacity, are exposed to reproof. Reprehension amounts to little more than passing an unfavorable sentence upon the conduct of another: reproof adds to this words more or less severe. The master of a school may be exposed to the reprehension of the parents for any supposed impropriety: his scholars are subject to his reproof.

When a man feels the reprehension of a friend seconded by his own heart, he is easily heated into resentment.

JOHNSON.

There is an oblique way of reproof which takes off from the sharpness of it.

STEELE.

TO REPRESS, RESTRAIN, SUPPRESS.

To REPRESS is to press back or down: to RESTRAIN is to strain back or down: the former is the general, the latter the specific term: we always repress when we restrain, but not vice versa. Repress is used mostly for pressing down, so as to keep that inward which wants to make its appearance: restrain is an habitual repression by which a thing is kept in a state of lowness: a person is said to repress his feelings when he does not give them vent either by his words or actions; he is said to restrain his feelings when he never lets them rise beyond a certain pitch: good morals as well as good manners call upon us to repress every unseemly expression of joy in the company of those who are not in a condition to partake of our joy; it is prudence as well as virtue to restrain our appetites by an habitual forbearance, that they may not gain the ascendancy.

Philosophy has often attempted to repress inscience by asserting that all conditions are levelled by death.

JOHNSON.

He that would keep the power of sin from running out into act, must restrain it from conversing with the object.

SOUTH.

To restrain is the act of the individual toward himself; repress may be an act directed to others, as to repress the ardor and impetuosity of youth; to suppress, which is to keep under, or keep from appearing or being perceptible, is also said in respect of ourselves or others: as to repress one's feelings; to suppress laughter, sighs, etc.

After we had landed on the island and walked about four miles through the midst of beautiful plains and sloping woodlands, we at length came to a little hill, on the side of which yawned a horrid cavern, that by its gloom at first struck us with terror, and almost repressed curiosity.

GOLDENITE.

With him Palemon kept the watch at night, in whose sad bosom many a sigh suppressed Some painful secret of the soul confess'd.

FALCONER.

So likewise when applied to external objects; as to repress the impetuosity of the combatants; to suppress a rebellion, information, etc.

Her forwardness was repressed with a frown by her mother or aunt.

JOHNSON.

Some, taking dangers to be the only remedy against dangers, endeavored to set up the sedition again, but they were speedily repressed, and thereby the sedition suppressed wholly.

HAYWARD.

REPRIEVE, RESPITE.

REPRIEVE comes in all probability from the French reprie, participle of prendre, and the Latin reprehendo, signifying to take back or take off that which has been laid on. RESPITE, in all probability, is changed from respiratus, participle of respiro, signifying to breathe again.

The idea of a release from any pressure or burden is common to these terms; but the reprieve is that which is granted; the respite sometimes comes to us in the course of things: we gain a reprieve from any punishment or trouble which threatens us; we gain a respite from any labor or weight that presses upon us. A criminal gains a reprieve when the punishment of death is commuted for that of transportation; a debtor may be said to obtain a reprieve when, with a prison before his eyes, he gets such indulgence from his creditors as sets him free: there is frequently no respice for persons in a subordinate station, when they fall into the hands of a hard task-master; Sisyphus is feigned by the poets to have been condemned to the toil of perpetually rolling a stone up a hill as fast as it rolled back, from which toil he had no respice.

All that I ask is but a short reprieve,
Till I forget to love and learn to grieve,
Some pause and respice only I require,
Till with my tears I shall have quench'd my fire.
DENHAM.

A little pause for the use of this instrument will not only give some respice and refreshment to the congregation, but may be advantageously employed, either to reflect on what is passed of the service, or prepare our minds for what is to come.
SECKER.

REPROACH, CONTUMELY, OBLOQUY.

THE idea of contemptuous or angry treatment of others is common to all these terms; but reproach is the general, contumely and obloquy are the particular terms. REPROACH (v. To blame) is either deserved or undeserved; the name of Puritan is applied as a term of reproach to such as affect greater purity than others; the name of Christian is a name of reproach in Turkey: CONTUMELY, from contumeo, that is, contra tumeo, signifying to swell up against, is always undeserved; it is the insolent swelling of a worthless person against merit in distress; our Saviour was exposed to the contumely of the Jews: OBLOQUY, from ob and loquor, signifying to speak against or to the disparagement of any one, is always supposed to be deserved or otherwise; it is applicable to those whose conduct has rendered them objects of general censure, and whose name, therefore, has almost become a reproach. A man who uses his power only to oppress those who are connected with him will naturally and deservedly bring upon himself much obloquy.

Has foul reproach a privilege from heav'n?

POPE.

The royal captives followed in the train, amidst the horrid yells, and frantic dances, and infamous contumelies, of the furies of hell.

BURKE.

How often and how soon have the faint echoes of renown slept in silence, or been converted into the clamor of obloquy!

HARVEY.

REPROACHFUL, ABUSIVE, SCURRILOUS.

REPROACHFUL, or full of reproach (v. Reproach), when applied to persons, signifies full of reproaches; when to things, deserving of reproach: ABUSIVE, or full of abuse (v. Abuse), is only applied to the person, signifying using abuse: SCURRILOUS, in Latin scurrilis, from scurra, signifying like a buffoon or saucy jester, is employed as an epithet either for persons or things, in the sense of using scurrility, or after the manner of scurrility. The conduct of a person is reproachful inasmuch as it provokes, or is entitled to, the reproaches of others; the language of a person is reproachful when it abounds in reproaches, or partakes of the nature of a reproach: a person is abusive who indulges himself in abuse or abusive language: and he is scurrilous who adopts scurrility or scurrilous language. When applied to the same object, whether to the person or to the thing, they rise in sense: the reproachful is less than the abusive, and this than the scurrilous: the reproachful is sometimes warranted by the provocation; but the abusive and scurrilous are always unwarrantable; reproachful language may be, and generally is, consistent with decency and propriety of speech: abusive and scurrilous language are outrages against the laws of good-breeding, if not of morality. A parent may sometimes find it necessary to address an unruly son in reproachful terms; or one friend may adopt a reproachful tone to another; none, however, but the lowest orders of men, and those only when their angry passions are awakened, will descend to abusive or scurrilous language.

Honor teaches a man not to revenge a contumelious or reproachful word, but to be above it.

SOUTH.

Thus envy pleads a nat'ral claim

To persecute the Muscs' fame,

Our poets in all times abusive,

From Homer down to Pope inclusive.

SWIFT.

I am of opinion that if his Majesty had kept aloof from that wash and offscouring of everything that is low and barbarous in the world, it might be well thought unworthy of his dignity to take notice of such scurrility.

BURKE.

TO REPROBATE, CONDEMN.

To REPROBATE is much stronger than to CONDEMN: we always condemn

when we reprobate, but not vice versa: to reprobate is to condemn in strong and reproachful language. We reprobate all measures which tend to sow discord in society, and to loosen the ties by which men are bound to each other; we condemn all disrespectful language toward superiors. We reprobate only the thing; we condemn the person also: any act of disobedience in a child cannot be too strongly reprobated; a person must expect to be condemned when he involves himself in embarrassments through his own imprudence.

Simulation (according to my Lord Chesterfield) is by no means to be reprobated as a disguise for chagrin or an engine of wit. MACKENZIE.

I see the right, and I approve it, too;
Condemn the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue.

TATE.

RESERVE, RESERVATION.

RESERVE and RESERVATION, from servo, to keep, and re, back, both signify a keeping back, but differ as to the object and the circumstance of the action. Reserve is applied in a good sense to anything natural or moral which is kept back to be employed for a better purpose on a future occasion; reservation is an artful keeping back for selfish purposes: there is a prudent reserve which every man ought to keep in his discourse with a stranger; equivocators deal altogether in mental reservation.

A man, whom marks of condescending grace
Teach, while they flatter him, his proper place,
Who comes when called, at a word withdraws,
Speaks with reserve, and listens with applause.

COWPER.

There be three degrees of this hiding and veiling a man's self: first, reservation and secrecy; second, dissimulation in the negative; and the third, simulation. BACON.

TO RESERVE, RETAIN.

RESERVE, from the Latin servo, to keep, signifies to keep back. RETAIN, from teneo, to hold, signifies to hold back: they in some measure, therefore, have the same distinction as keep and hold.

To reserve is an act of more specific design; we reserve that which is the particular object of our choice: to retain is a simple exertion of our power; we retain that which is once come in our possession. To reserve is employed only for that which is allowable; we reserve a thing, that is,

keep it back with care for some future purpose: to retain is often an unlawful act; a debtor frequently retains in his hands the money which he has borrowed.

Augustus caused most of the prophetic books to be burned as spurious, reserving only those which bore the name of some of the sibyls for their authors. PRIDEAUX.

They who have restored painting in Germany, not having seen any of those fair relics of antiquity, have retained much of that barbarous method. DRYDEN.

To reserve, whether in the proper or improper application, is employed only as the act of a conscious agent; to retain is often the act of an unconscious agent: we reserve what we have to say on a subject until a more suitable opportunity offers; the mind retains the impressions of external objects by its peculiar faculty, the memory; certain substances are said to retain the color with which they have been dyed.

Conceal your esteem and love in your own breast, and reserve your kind looks and language for private hours. SWIFT.

Whatever ideas the mind can receive and contemplate without the help of the body, it is reasonable to conclude it can retain without the help of the body too. LOCKE.

REST, REMAINDER, REMNANT, RESIDUE.

REST evidently comes from the Latin resto, in this case, though not in the former (v. Ease), signifying what stands or remains back. REMAINDER literally signifies what remains after the first part is gone. REMNANT is but a variation of remainder. RESIDUE, from resido, signifies likewise what remains back.

All these terms express that part which is separated from the other and left distinct: rest is the most general, both in sense and application; the others have a more specific meaning and use: the rest may be either that which is left behind by itself, or that which is set apart as a distinct portion: the remainder, remnant, and residue are the quantities which remain when the other parts are gone. The rest is said of any part, large or small; but the remainder commonly regards the smaller part which has been left after the greater part has been taken. A person may be said to sell some and give away the rest: when a number of hearty persons sit down to a meal, the remainder of the provisions, after all have been satisfied, will not be considerable. Rest is applied either to persons or things; remainder only to things: some were of that opinion, but the rest did not agree to it: the remainder of the paper was not worth preserving.

A last farewell:

For since a last must come, the rest are vain,
Like gasps in death, which but prolong our pain.

DRYDEN.

If he to whom ten talents have been committed has squandered away five, he is concerned to make a double improvement of the remainder.

ROGERS.

Remnant, from the Latin remanens, remaining, is a species of remainder after the greater part has been consumed or wasted: it is, therefore, properly a small remainder, as a remnant of cloth; and metaphorically applied to persons, as a remnant of Israel. A residue is another species of remainder, which resides or keeps back after a distribution or division of anything has taken place; as the residue of a person's property, that which remains undisposed of.

Whatever you take from amusements or indolence will be repaid you a hundred-fold for all the remainder of your days.

EARL OF CHATHAM.

For this, far distant from the Latian coast,
She drove the remnant of the Trojan host.

DRYDEN.

The rising deluge is not stopp'd with dams,
But wisely managed, its divided strength
Is sluic'd in channels, and securely drained;
And while its force is spent, and unsupplied,
The residue with mounds may be restrain'd.

SHAKESPEARE.

RESTORATION, RESTITUTION, REPARATION, AMENDS.

RESTORATION is employed in the ordinary application of the verb restore: RESTITUTION, from the same verb, is employed simply in the sense of making good that which has been unjustly taken, or which ought to be restored. Restoration of property may be made by any one, whether it be the person taking it or not: restitution is supposed to be made by him who has been guilty of the injustice. The dethronement of a king may be the work of one set of men, and his restoration that of another; it is the bounden duty of every individual who has committed any sort of injustice to another to make restitution to the utmost of his power.

The strange proceedings of the Long Parliament (called the Rump) gave his lordship hopes that matters began to ripen for the restoration of the royal family.

LOVE.

The justices may, if they think it reasonable, direct restitution of a ratable share of the money given with an apprentice (upon his discharge).

BLACKSTONE.

Restitution and REPARATION are both employed in the sense of undoing that which has been done to the injury of another; but the former respects only injuries that affect the property, and reparation those which affect a person in various ways. He who is guilty of theft or fraud must make restitution by either restoring the stolen article or its full value: he who robs another of his good name, or does any injury to his person, has it not in his power so easily to make reparation.

He restitution to the value makes,
Nor joy in his extorted treasure takes.

SANDYS.

Justice requires that all injuries should be repaired.

JOHNSON.

REPARATION and AMENDS (v. Compensation) are both employed in cases where some mischief or loss is sustained; but the term reparation comprehends the idea of the act of repairing, as well as the thing by which we repair; amends is employed only for the thing that will amend or make better: hence we speak of the reparation of an injury; but of the amends by itself. The term reparation comprehends all kinds of injuries, particularly those of a serious nature; the amends is applied only to matters of inferior importance. It is impossible to make reparation for taking away the life of another. It is easy to make amends to any one for the loss of a day's pleasure.

I am sensible of the scandal I have given by my loose writings, and make what reparation I am able.

DRYDEN.

The latter pleas'd; and love (concern'd the most)
Prepar'd th' amends for what by love he lost.

DRYDEN.

RESTORE, RETURN, REPAY.

RESTORE, in Latin restauo, from the Greek εραπος, a pale, signifies properly to new pale, that is, to repair by a new paling, and, in an extended application, to make good what has been injured or lost. RETURN signifies properly to turn again, or to send back; and REPAY, to pay back.

The common idea of all these terms is that of giving back. What we restore to another may or may not be the same as what we have taken; justice requires that it should be an equivalent in value, so as to prevent the individual from being in any degree a sufferer: what we return and repay ought to be precisely the same as we have received: the former in application to general objects, the latter in application only to pecuniary matters. We restore upon a principle of equity; we return upon a principle of justice and honor; we repay upon a principle of undeniable right. We cannot always claim that which ought to be restored; but we cannot only claim, but enforce the claim in regard to what is to be returned or repaid: an honest man will be scrupulous not to take anything from another without restoring to him its full value. Whatever we have borrowed we ought to return; and when it is money which we have obtained, we ought to repay it with punctuality. We restore to many as well as to one, to communities as well as to individuals; a king is restored to his crown; or one nation restores a territory to another: we return and repay not only individually, but personally and particularly: we return a book to its owner; we repay a sum of money to him from whom it was borrowed.

When both the chiefs are sunder'd from the fight,
Then to the lawful king restore his right.

DRYDEN.

When any one of our relations was found to be a person of a very bad character, a troublesome guest, or one we desired to get rid of, upon his leaving my house, I ever took care to lend him a riding-coat, or a pair of boots, or sometimes a horse of small value, and I always had the satisfaction to find he never came back to return them.

GOLDSMITH.

As for the hundred pounds to be paid, if you are unable to raise it yourselves, I will advance it, and you shall repay me at your leisure.

GOLDSMITH.

Restore and return may be employed in their improper application, as respects the moral state of persons and things; as a king restores a courtier to his favor, or a physician restores his patient to health: we return a favor; we return an answer or a compliment. Repay may be figuratively employed in regard to moral objects, as an ungrateful person repays kindnesses with reproaches.

She was the only person of our little society that a week did not restore to cheerfulness.

GOLDSMITH.

The swain
Receives his easy food from nature's hand,
And just returns of cultivated land. DRYDEN.
Cæsar, whom fraught with Eastern spoils,
Our heav'n, the just reward of human toils,
Securely shall repay with rights divine.

DRYDEN.

TO RESTRAIN, RESTRICT.

RESTRAIN (v. Coerce) and RESTRICT are but variations from the same verb; but they have acquired a distinct acceptation: the former applies to the desires, as well as the outward conduct; the latter only to the outward conduct. A person restrains his inordinate appetite; or he is restrained by others from doing mischief: he is restricted in the use of his money. To restrain is an act of power; but to restrict is an act of authority or law: the will or the actions of a child are restrained by the parent; but a patient is restricted in his diet by a physician, or any body of people may be restricted by laws.

Tully, whose powerful eloquence awhile
Restrained the rapid fate of rushing Rome.

THOMSON.

Though the Egyptians used flesh for food, yet they were under greater restrictions in this particular than most other nations.

RETALIATION, REPRISAL.

RETALIATION, from retaliare, in Latin retaliatum, participle of retalis, such, signifies such again, or like for like. REPRISAL, in French repris, from reprandre, in Latin reprehendo, to take again, signifies to take in return for what has been taken. The idea of making another suffer in return for the suffering he has occasioned is common to these terms; but the former is employed in ordinary cases; the latter mostly in regard to a state of warfare, or to active hostilities. A trick practised upon another in return for a trick is a retaliation; but a reprisal always extends to the capture of something from another, in return for what has been taken. Retaliation is very frequently employed in the good sense for what passes innocently between friends: reprisal has always an unfavorable sense. Goldsmith's poem, entitled the "Retaliation," was written for the purpose of retaliating on his friends the humor they had practised upon him; when the quarrels of individuals break through the restraints of the law, and lead to acts of violence on each other's property, reprisals are made alternately by both parties.

Therefore I pray let me enjoy your friendship in that fair proportion, that I desire to return unto you by way of correspondence and retaliation.

HOWELL.

Go publish o'er the plain,
How mighty a proselyte you gain!
How noble a reprisal on the great!

TO RETARD, HINDER.

To RETARD, from the Latin tardus, slow, signifying to make slow, is applied to the movements of any object forward; as in the Latin "Impetum inimici tardare:" to HINDER (v. To hinder) is applied to the person moving or acting: we retard or make slow the progress of any scheme toward completion; we hinder or keep back the person who is completing the scheme: we retard a thing, therefore, often by hindering the person; but we frequently hinder a person without expressly retarding, and, on the contrary, the thing is retarded without the person being hindered. The publication of a work is sometimes retarded by the hinderances which an author meets with in bringing it to a conclusion; but a work may be retarded through the idleness of printers, and a variety of other causes which are independent of any hinderance. So in like manner a person may be hindered in going to his place of destination; but we do not say that he is retarded, because it is only the execution of an object, and not the simple movements of the person which are retarded.

Nothing has tended more to retard the advancement of science than the disposition in vulgar minds to vilify what they cannot comprehend.

JOHNSON.

The very nearness of an object sometimes retards the sight of it.

SOUTH.

To retard stops the completion of an object only for a time, but to hinder is to stop it altogether.

It is as natural to delay a letter at such a season, as to retard a melancholy visit to a person one cannot relieve.

FOSTER.

For these thou sayst, raise all the stormy strife,
Which hinder thy repose, and trouble life.

PRIOR.

RETORT, REPARTEE.

RETORT, from re and torqueo, to twist or turn back, to recoil, is an ill-natured reply: REPARTEE, from the word part, signifies a smart reply, a ready taking one's own part. The retort is always in answer to a censure for which one returns a like censure; the repartee is commonly in answer to the wit of another, where one returns wit for wit. In the acrimony of disputes it is common to hear retort upon retort to an endless extent; the vivacity of discourse is sometimes greatly enhanced by the quick repartes of those who take a part in it.

Those who have so vehemently urged the dangers of an active life have made use of arguments that may be retorted upon themselves. JOHNSON.

Henry IV. of France would never be transported beyond himself with choler, but he would pass by anything with some repartes. HOWELL.

RETRIBUTION, REQUITAL.

RETRIBUTION, from tribuo, to bestow, signifying a bestowing back or giving in return, is a particular term; REQUITAL (v. Reward) is general: the retribution comes from Providence; requital is the act of man: retribution is by way of punishment; requital is mostly by way of reward: retribution is not always dealt out to every man according to his deeds; it is a poor requital for one who has done a kindness to be abused.

Christ substituted his own body in our room, to receive the whole stroke of that dreadful retribution inflicted by the hand of an angry omnipotence.

SOUTH.

Leander was indeed a conquest to boast of, for he had long and obstinately defended his heart, and for a time made as many requitals upon the tender passions of her sex as she raised contributions upon his.

CUMBERLAND.

RETROSPECT, REVIEW, SURVEY.

A RETROSPECT, which signifies literally looking back, from retro, behind, and spicio, to behold or cast an eye upon, is always taken of that which is past and distant; REVIEW, which is a view repeated, may be taken of that which is present and before us; every retrospect is a species of review, but every review is not a retrospect. We take a retrospect of our past life in order to draw salutary reflections from all that we have done and suffered; we take a review or a second view of any particular circumstance which is passing before us, in order to regulate our present conduct. The retrospect goes farther by virtue of the mind's power to reflect on itself, and to recall all past images to itself; the review may go forward by the exercise of the senses on external objects. The historian takes a retrospect of all the events which have happened within a given period; the journalist takes a review of all the events that are passing within the time in which he is living.

Believe me, my lord, I look upon you as a spirit entered into another life, where you ought to despise all little views and mean retrospects.

Pope's LETTERS TO ARMBURGH.

The retrospect of life is seldom wholly untended by uneasiness and shame. It too much resembles the review which a traveller takes from some eminence of a barren country.

BLAIR.

The review may be said of the past as well as the present: it is a view not only of what is, but what has been: the SURVEY, which is a looking over at once, from the French sur, upon, and voir, to see, is entirely confined to the present; it is a view only of that which is, and is taken for some particular purpose. We take a review of what we have already viewed, in order to get a more correct insight into it; we take a survey of a thing in all its parts, in order to get a comprehensive view of it, in order to examine it in all its bearings. A general occasionally takes a review of all his army; he takes a survey of the fortress which he is going to besiege or attack.

We make a general review of the whole work, and a general review of nature, that, by comparing them, their full correspondency may appear.

BURNET.

Every man accustomed to take a survey of his own notions will, by a slight retrospection, be able to discover that his mind has undergone many revolutions.

JOHNSON.

TO RETURN, REVERT.

RETURN is the English, and REVERT the Latin: return is therefore used in ordinary cases to denote the coming back to any point of time or place; as to return home, or to return at a certain hour; or to apply again to the same business or employment; as to return to one's writing: to revert is to throw back with one's mind to any object; we may therefore say, to return or revert to any intellectual object, with this distinction, that to return is to go back to the point where one left off treating of any subject; to revert is simply to carry one's mind back to the same object.

To return to the business in hand, the use of a little insight in those parts of knowledge is to accustom our minds to all sorts of ideas.

LOCKE.

It gives me pleasure to find you so often reverting to a subject that most people take so much pains to avoid.

Mrs. ROWE.

As the act of an unconscious agent, return is used as before.

One day the soul, supine with ease and fulness, Revels secure, and fondly tells herself The hour of evil can return no more.

BOWEN.

Revert signifies either to fall back into the same state, or to fall back by reflection on the same object; all things reverted to their primitive order and regularity.

Whatever lies or legendary tales May taint my spotless deeds, the guilt, the shame, Will back revert on the inventor's head.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO REVILE, VILIFY.

REVILE, from the Latin viliis, signifies to reflect upon a person, or retort upon him that which is vile: to VILIFY, signifies to make a thing vile, that is, to set it forth as vile. To revile is a personal act, it is addressed directly to the object of offence, and is addressed for the purpose of making the person vile in his own eyes: to vilify is an indirect attack which serves to make the object appear vile in the eyes of others. Revile is said only of persons, for persons only are reviled; but to vilify is said of persons as well as things. To revile is contrary to all Christian duty; it is commonly resorted to by the most worthless, and practised upon the most worthy: to vilify is seldom justifiable; for we cannot vilify without using improper language; it is seldom resorted to but for the gratification of ill-nature.

But chief he gloried with licentious style, To lash the great, and monarchs to revile.

Pope.

There is nobody so weak of invention that cannot make some little stories to vilify his enemy.

ADDISON.

REVISAL, REVISION, REVIEW.

REVISAL, REVISION, and REVIEW all come from the Latin video, to see, and signify looking back upon a thing or looking at it again: the terms revisal and revision are, however, mostly employed in regard to what is written; review is used for things in general. The revisal of a book is the work of the author, for the purposes of correction: the review of a book is the work of the critic, for the purpose of estimating its value. Revisal and revision differ neither in sense nor application, unless that the former is more frequently employed abstractedly from the object revised, and revision mostly in conjunction: whoever wishes his work to be correct, will not spare a revisal; the revision of classical books ought to be intrusted only to men of profound erudition.

There is in your persons a difference and a peculiarity of character preserved through the whole of your actions, that I could never imagine but that this proceeded from a long and careful revisal of your work. LOFTUS.

A commonplace-book accustoms the mind to discharge itself of its reading on paper, instead of relying on its natural powers of retention aided by frequent revisions of its ideas. EARL OF CHATHAM.

How enchanting must such a review (of their memorandum-books) prove to those who make a figure in the polite world. HAWKSWORTH.

TO REVIVE, REFRESH, RENOVATE, RENEW.

REVIVE, from the Latin vivo, to live, signifies to bring to life again; to REFRESH, to make fresh again; to RENEW and RENOVATE, to make new again. The restoration of things to their primitive state is the common idea included in these terms; the difference consists in their application. Revive, refresh, and renovate are applied to animal bodies; revive expressing the return of motion and spirits to one who was for the time lifeless; refresh expressing the return of vigor to one in whom it has been diminished; the air revives one who is faint; a cool breeze refreshes one who flags from the heat. Revive and refresh respect only the temporary state of a body; renovate respects the permanent state, that is, the health or powers of a body; one is revived and refreshed after a partial exhaustion; one's health is renovated after having been considerably impaired.

And temper all, thou world-reviving sun,
Into the perfect year. THOMSON.

Nor less thy world, Columbus! drinks, refresh'd,
The lavish moisture of the melting year. THOMSON.

All nature feels the renovating force
Of winter. THOMSON.

Revive is applied likewise in the moral sense; refresh and renovate mostly in the proper sense; renew only in the moral sense. A discussion is said to be revived, or a report to be revived; a clamor is said to be renewed, or entreaties to be renewed: customs are revived which have lain long dormant, and, as it were, dead; practices are renewed that have ceased for a time.

Herod's rage being quenched by the blood of Mariamne, his love to her again revived. PRIDEAUX.

The last great age, foretold by sacred rhymes,
Renews its finished course. THOMSON.

RICHES, WEALTH, OPULENCE, AFFLUENCE.

RICHES, in German reichthum, from reich, a kingdom, is connected with the Latin rego, to rule; because riches and power are intimately connected.

WEALTH, from well, signifies well-being. OPULENCE, from the Latin opes, riches, denotes the state of having riches. AFFLUENCE, from the Latin ad and fluo, denotes either the act of riches flowing in to a person, or the state of having things flowing in.

Riches is a general term denoting any considerable share of property, but without immediate reference to a possessor; whatever serves to make one rich is denominated riches, inasmuch as it supplies us with the means of getting what is really good; wealth, and the other terms, refer us immediately to outward possessions.

His best companions innocence and health,
And his best riches ignorance of wealth. GOLDSMITH.

Riches is a condition opposed to poverty; the whole world is divided into rich and poor, and riches are distributed in different degrees; but wealth, opulence, and affluence all denote a considerable share of riches: wealth is a positive and substantial share of this world's goods, but particularly of money or the precious commodities; it may be taken in the abstract or in application to individuals: opulence consists of any large share in possessions or property generally, as houses, lands, goods, and chattels, and is applicable to the present and actual condition of the individual. Affluence is a term peculiarly applicable to the fluctuating condition of things which flow in in great quantities to a person. We speak of riches as to their effects upon men's minds and manners; it is not every one who knows how to use them: we speak of wealth as it raises a man in the scale of society, and contributes to his weal or well-being: we speak of opulence as the present actually flourishing state of the individual; and of affluence as the temporary condition.

Riches are apt to betray a man into arrogance.
ADDISON.

Seek not in needless luxury to waste
Thy wealth and substance with a spendthrift's haste.
ROWE.

Prosperity is often an equivocal word, denoting merely affluence of possession.
BLAIR.

Our Saviour did not choose for himself an easy and opulent condition.
BLAIR.

Wealth and opulence are applied to communities as well as individuals.

Along the lawn where scatter'd hamlets rose,
Unwieldy wealth and cumb'rous pomp repose.
GOLDSMITH.

Industrious habits in each bosom reign,
And industry begets a love of gain:
Hence all the good from opulence that springs,
With all those ills superfluous treasure brings,
Are here display'd.
GOLDSMITH.

RIDICULE, SATIRE, IRONY, SARCASM.

RIDICULE (v. To deride) has simple laughter in it; SATIRE, in Latin satyr, probably from sat and ira, abounding in anger, has a mixture of ill-nature or severity: the former is employed in matters of a trifling nature; but satire is employed either in personal or grave matters. IRONY, in Greek εἰρωνία, signifying dissimulation, is disguised satire; an ironist seems to praise that which he really means to condemn. SARCASM, from the Greek σαρκασμος, and σαρκάζω, and σαρξ, flesh, signifying biting or nipping satire, so, as it were, to tear the flesh, is bitter and personal satire; all the others may be successfully and properly employed to expose folly and vice; but sarcasm, which is the indulgence only of personal resentment, is never justifiable.

Nothing is a greater mark of a degenerate and vicious age than the common ridicule which passes on this state of life (marriage). ADDISON.

A man resents with more bitterness a satire upon his abilities than his practice.

HAWKSWORTH.

The severity of this sarcasm stung me with intolerable rage.
HAWKSWORTH.

When Regan (in King Lear) counsels him to ask her sister forgiveness, he falls on his knees and asks her, with a striking kind of irony, how such supplicating language as this becometh him.
JOHNSON.

RIGHT, JUST, FIT, PROPER.

RIGHT, in German recht, Latin rectus, signifying upright, not leaning to one side or the other, standing as it ought, is here the general term: the others express modes of right. The right and wrong are defined by the written will of God, or are written in our hearts according to the original constitutions of our nature: the JUST, in Latin justus, from jus, law, signifying according to a rule of right, and the unjust, are determined by the written laws of men; the FIT (v. Fit) and PROPER, in Latin proprius, signifying belonging to a given specific rule, are determined by the established principles of civil society.

Between the right and the wrong there are no gradations: a thing cannot be more right or more wrong; whatever is right is not wrong, and whatever is wrong is not right: the just and unjust, proper and improper, fit and unfit, on the contrary, have various shades and degrees that are not so easily definable by any forms of speech or written rules.

Hear, then, my argument—confess we must
A God there is supremely wise and just.
If so, however things affect our sight,
As sings our bard, whatever is is right. JENNIS.

The right and wrong depend upon no circumstances; what is once right or wrong is always right or wrong, but the just or unjust, proper or improper, are relatively so according to the circumstances of the case: it is a just rule for every man to have that which is his own; but what is just to the individual may be unjust to society. It is proper for every man to take charge of his own concerns; but it would be improper for a man, in an unsound state of mind, to undertake such a charge. Right is applicable to all matters, important or otherwise; just is employed mostly in matters of essential interest; proper is rather applicable to the minor concerns of life. Everything that is done may be characterized as right or wrong: everything done to others may be measured by the rule of just or unjust: in our social intercourse, as well as in our private transactions, finis and propriety must always be consulted. As Christians, we desire to do that which is right in the sight of God and man; as members of civil society, we wish to be just in our dealings; as rational and intelligent beings, we wish to do what is fit and proper in every action, however trivial.

I'm assur'd if I be measur'd rightly
Your Majesty hath no just cause to hate me.
SHAKESPEARE.

What is settled by custom, though it be not good, yet at least it is fit; and those things which have long gone together may, as it were, confederate within themselves. BACON.

Visitors are no proper companions in the chamber of sickness. JOHNSON.

RIGHT, CLAIM, PRIVILEGE.

RIGHT signifies in this sense what it is right for one to possess, which is in fact a word of large meaning: for since the right and the wrong depend upon indeterminate questions, the right of having is equally indeterminate in some cases with every other species of right. A CLAIM (v. To ask for) is a species of right to have that which is in the hands of another; the right to ask another for it. The PRIVILEGE (v. Privilege) is a species of right peculiar to particular individuals or bodies.

Right, in its full sense, is altogether an abstract thing which is independent of human laws and regulations; claims and privileges are altogether connected with the establishments of civil society. Liberty, in the general sense, is an unalienable right which belongs to man as a rational and responsible agent; it is not a claim, for it is set above all question and all condition; nor is it a privi- lege, for it cannot be exclusively granted to one being, nor unconditionally be taken away from another.

In ev'ry street a city bard
Rules like an alderman his ward,
His undisputed rights extend
Through all the lane from end to end. SWIFT.

Between right and power there is often as wide a distinction as between truth and falsehood; we have often a right to do that which we have no power to do; and the power to do that which we have no right to do: slaves have a right to the freedom which is enjoyed by creatures of the same species with themselves, but they have not the power to use this freedom as others do. In England men have the power of thinking for themselves as they please; but by the abuse which they make of this power, we see that in many cases they have not the right, unless we admit the contradiction that men have a right to do what is wrong; they have the power, therefore, of exercising this right only because no other person has the power of controlling them. We have often a claim to a thing which is not in our power to substantiate; and, on the other hand, claims are set up in cases which are totally unfounded on any right. Privileges are rights granted to individuals, depending either upon the will of the grantor, or the circumstances of the receiver, or both; privileges are therefore partial rights transferable at the discretion of persons individually or collectively.

Will he not, therefore, of the two evils choose the least, by submitting to a master who hath no immediate claim upon him, rather than to another, who hath already revived several claims upon him? SWIFT.

A thousand bards thy rights down,
And with rebellious arm pretend
An equal privilege to descend. SWIFT.

RIPE, MATURE.

RIPE is the English, MATURE the Latin word; the former has a universal application both proper and improper; the latter has mostly an improper application. The idea of completion in growth is simply designated by the former term; the idea of moral perfection, as far at least as it is attainable, is marked by the latter: fruit is ripe when it requires no more sustenance from the parent stock;

a judgment is mature which requires no more time and knowledge to render it perfect or fitted for exercise: in the same manner a project may be said to be ripe for execution, or a people ripe for revolt; and, on the contrary, reflection may be said to be mature to which sufficiency of time has been given, and age may be said to be mature which has attained the highest pitch of perfection. Ripeness is, however, not always a good quality; but maturity is always a perfection: the ripeness of some fruit diminishes the excellence of its flavor: there are some fruits which have no flavor until they come to maturity.

So to his crowne, she him restor'd againe,
In which he dyde, made ripe for death by eld.
SPENSER.

Th' Athenian sage, revolving in his mind
This weakness, blindness, madness of mankind,
Foretold that in maturer days, though late,
When time should ripen the decrees of fate,
Some god would light us. JENYNS.

TO RISE, ISSUE, EMERGE.

To RISE (v. To arise) may either refer to open or enclosed spaces; ISSUE (v. To arise) and EMERGE (v. Emergency) have both a reference to some confined body: a thing may either rise in a body, without a body, or out of a body; but it issues and emerges out of a body. A thing may either rise in a plain or a wood; it issues out of a wood: it may either rise in water or out of the water; it emerges from the water; that which riseth out of a thing comes into view by becoming higher: in this manner an air balloon might rise out of a wood; that which issues comes from the very depths of a thing, and comes, as it were, out as a part of it; but that which emerges proceeds from the thing in which it has been, as it were, concealed. Hence, in the moral application, a person is said to rise in life without a reference to his former condition; but he emerges from obscurity: color riseth in the face; but words issue from the mouth.

Ye mists and exhalations that now rise,
In honor to the world's great author rise.
MILTON.

Does not the earth quit scores with all the elements in the noble fruits and productions that issue from it?
SOUTH.

Let earth dissolve, yon ponderous orbs descend,
And grind us into dust, the soul is safe,
The man emerges. YOUNG.

TO ROT, PUTREFY, CORRUPT.

THE dissolution of bodies by an internal process is implied by all these terms: but the first two are applied to natural bodies only; the last to all bodies, natural and moral. ROT is the strongest of all these terms; it denotes the last stage in the progress of dissolution: PUTREFY expresses the progress toward rottenness; and CORRUPTION the commencement. After fruit has arrived at its maturity, or proper state of ripeness, it rots: meat which is kept too long putrefies: there is a tendency in all bodies to corruption; iron and wood corrupt with time; whatever is made, or done, or wished by men, is equally liable to be corrupt, or to grow corrupt.

Debate destroys despatch, as fruits we see
Rot when they hang too long upon the tree.
DENHAM.

And draws the copious stream from swampy fens,
Where putrefaction into life ferments.
THOMSON.

After that they again returned beene,
That in that garden planted be agayne
And grow afresh, as they had never seene
Fleshy corruption, nor mortall payne.
SPENSER.

ROUNDNESS, ROTUNDITY.

ROUNDNESS and ROTUNDITY both come from the Latin rotundus and rota, a wheel, which is the most perfectly round body which is formed: the former term is, however, applied to all objects in general; the latter only to solid bodies which are round in all directions: one speaks of the roundness of a circle, the roundness of the moon, the roundness of a tree; but the rotundity of a man's body which projects in a round form in all directions, and the rotundity of a full cheek, or the rotundity of a turnip.

Bracelets of pearls gave roundness to her arms.
PRIOR.

Angular bodies lose their points and asperities by frequent friction, and approach by degrees to uniform rotundity. JOHNSON.

ROUTE, ROAD, COURSE.

ROUTE comes in all probability from rotundus, round, and rota, a wheel, signifying the round which one goes. ROAD comes no doubt from ride, signifying the place where one rides, as COURSE, from the Latin cursum (v. Cursum), signifies the place where one walks or runs.

Route is to road as the species to the genus: a route is a circular kind of road; it is chosen as the circuitous direction toward a certain point: the road may be either in a direct or indirect line; the route is always indirect; the route is chosen only by horsemen, or those who go to a considerable distance; the road may be chosen for the shortest distance; the route and road are pursued in their beaten track; the course is often chosen in the unbeaten track: an army or a company go a certain route; foot-passengers are seen to take a certain course over fields.

Cortez (after his defeat at Mexico) was engaged in deep consultation with his officers concerning the route which they ought to take in their retreat. ROBERTSON.

At our first sally into the intellectual world, we all march together along one straight and open road. JOHNSON.

Then to the stream when neither friends nor force,
Nor speed, nor art avail, he shapes his course. DENHAM.

ROYAL, REGAL, KINGLY.

ROYAL and REGAL, from the Latin rex, a king, though of foreign origin, have obtained more general application than the corresponding English term KINGLY. Royal signifies belonging to a king, in its most general sense; regal, in Latin regalis, signifies appertaining to a king, in its particular application; kingly signifies properly like a king. A royal carriage, a royal residence, a royal couple, a royal salute, royal authority, all designate the general and ordinary appurtenances to a king: regal government, regal state, regal power, regal dignity, denote the peculiar properties of a king: kingly always implies what is becoming a king, or after the manner of a king; a kingly crown is such as a king ought to wear; a kingly mien, that which is after the manner of a king.

He died, and oh! may no reflection shed
Its poisonous venom on the royal dead. PRIOR.

Jerusalem combin'd must see
My open fault and regal infamy. PRIOR.

Scipio, you know how Massanissa bears
His kingly port at more than ninety years. DENHAM.

TO RUB, CHAFE, FRET, GALL.

To RUB is traced, through the medium of the Northern languages, to the Hebrew

rup; it is the generic term, expressing simply the act of bodies moving in contact with and against others; to CHAFE, from the French chauffer, and the Latin calfacere, to make hot, signifies to rub a thing until it is heated: to FRET, like the word fritter, comes from the Latin frico, to rub or crumble, signifying to wear away by rubbing: to GALL, from the noun gall, signifies to make as bitter or painful as gall, that is, to wound by rubbing. Things are rubbed sometimes for purposes of convenience; but they are chafed, fretted, and galled injuriously: the skin is liable to chafe from any violence; leather will fret from the motion of a carriage; when the skin is once broken, animals will become galled by a continuance of the friction. These terms are likewise used in the moral sense, to denote the actions of things on the mind, where the distinction is clearly kept up: we meet with rubs from the opposing sentiments of others; the angry humors are chafed; the mind is fretted and made sore by the frequent repetition of small troubles and vexations; pride is galled by humiliations and severe degradations.

A boy educated at home meets with continual rubs and disappointments (when he comes into the world). BEATTIE.

Accounted as we were, we both plung'd in
The troubled Tiber, chafing with the shores. SHAKESPEARE.

And full of indignation frets

Thus every poet in his kind
Is bit by him that comes behind,
Who, tho' too little to be seen,
Can tease and gall, and give the spleen. SWIFT.

Foul cank'ring rust the hidden treasure frets,
But gold that's put to use more gold begets. SHAKESPEARE.

RUPTURE, FRACTURE, FRACTION.

RUPTURE, from runpo, to break or burst, and FRACTURE or FRACTION, from frango, to break, denote different kinds of breaking, according to the objects to which the action is applied. Soft substances may suffer a rupture; as the rupture of a blood-vessel: hard substances a fracture; as the fracture of a bone.

Th' egg,
Bursting with kindly rupture, forth disclos'd
Its callow young. MILTON.

We arrived here all safe and well yesterday afternoon, with no worse accident than some fractures in our tackle. MRS. CARTER.

Fraction is used only in respect to broken numbers, as the fraction of a unit.

Pliny put a round number near the truth rather than a fraction. ARBUTHNOT.

Rupture is also used in an improper application; as the rupture of a treaty.

To be an enemy, and once to have been a friend, does it not embitter the rupture? SOUTH.

RURAL, RUSTIC.

ALTHOUGH both these terms, from the Latin rus, country, signify belonging to the country, yet the former is used in a good, and the latter in a bad or an indifferent sense. RURAL applies to all country objects except man; it is, therefore, always connected with the charms of nature: RUSTIC applies only to persons, or what is personal, in the country, and is, therefore, always associated with the want of culture. Rural scenery is always interesting; but the rustic manners of the peasants have frequently too much that is uncultivated and rude in them to be agreeable; a rural habitation may be fitted for persons in a higher station; but a rustic cottage is adapted only for the poorer inhabitants of the country.

E'en now, methinks, as pondering here I stand,
I see the rural virtues leave the land.

GOLDSMITH.

The freedom and laxity of a rustic life produces remarkable peculiarities of conduct. JOHNSON.

S.

SAFE, SECURE.

SAFE, in Latin salvus, coming from the Hebrew salah, to be tranquil, implies exemption from harm, or the danger of harm; SECURE (v. Certain), the exemption from danger: a person may be safe or saved in the midst of a fire, if he be untouched by the fire; but he is, in such a case, the reverse of secure. In the sense of exemption from danger, safety expresses much less than security: we may be safe without using any particular measures; but none can reckon on any degree of security without great precaution: a person may be very safe on the top of a coach, in the daytime; but if he wish to secure himself, at night, from falling off, he must be fastened.

It cannot be safe for any man to walk upon a precipice, and to be always on the very border of destruction. SOUTH.

No man can rationally account himself secure unless he could command all the chances of the world. SOUTH.

SAGE, SAGACIOUS, SAPIENT.

SAGE and SAGACIOUS are variations from the Latin sagax and sagis, probably from the Persian sag, a dog, sagacity being the peculiar property of a dog. SAPIENT is in Latin sapiens, from sapio, which is either from the Greek σοφος, wise, or, in the sense of tasting, from the Hebrew sephah, the lip.

The first of these terms has a good sense, in application to men, to denote the faculty of discerning immediately, which is the fruit of experience, and very similar to that sagacity in brutes which instinctively perceives a thing without the deductions of reason; sagacious is now employed only in regard to animals which are trained up to particular arts; its use, therefore, in respect to human beings, is mostly in the lofty or burlesque style.

So strange they will appear, but so it happen'd
That these most sage Academicians sat
In solemn consultation—on a cabbage.

CUMBERLAND.

Sagacious all to trace the smallest game,
And bold to seize the greatest. YOUNG.

Many a wretch in Bedlam,
Though perhaps among the rout
He wildly flings his filth about,
Still has gratitude and sapience,
To spare the folks that give them ha'pence.

SWIFT.

SAKE, ACCOUNT, REASON, PURPOSE, END.

THESE terms are all employed adverbially, to modify or connect propositions; hence one says, for his SAKE, on his ACCOUNT, for this REASON, for this PURPOSE, and to this END. Sake, which comes from the word to seek, is mostly said of persons; what is done for a person's sake is the same as because of his seeking or at his desire; one may, however, say in regard to things, for the sake of good order, implying what good order requires: account is indifferently employed for persons or things; what is done on a person's account is done in his behalf, and for his interest; what is done on account of indisposition is done in consequence of it, the indisposition being the cause: purpose is properly personal, and refers to that which a person purposes to himself; if we ask, therefore, for what purpose a thing is done, it may be to know something of a person's character and principle: reason and end are applied to things only: we speak of the reason as the thing that justifies: we explain why we do a thing when we say we do it for this or that reason: we speak of the end by way of explaining the nature of the thing: the propriety of measures cannot be known unless we know what end it will answer.

Thou neither dost persuade me to seek wealth
For empire's sake, nor empire to affect
For glory's sake. SHAKESPEARE.

In matters where his judgment led him to oppose men, on a public account, he would do it vigorously and heartily. ATTENBURY.

He travelled the world on purpose to converse with the most learned men. GUARDIAN.

I mark the business from the common eye
For sundry weighty reasons. SHAKESPEARE.

Others are apt to attribute them to some false end or intention. ADDISON.

SALUTE, SALUTATION, GREETING.

SALUTE (v. Accost) respects the thing; and SALUTATION, which is a variation of salute, respects the person giving the salute: a salute may consist either of a word or an action; salutations pass from one friend to another: the salute may be either direct or indirect; the salutation is always direct and personal; guns are fired by way of a salute: bows are given in the way of a salutation.

He was received on board the Bellerophon respectfully, but without any salute or distinguished honors. SIR W. SCOTT.

Josephus makes mention of a Manaken, who had the spirit of prophecy, and one time meeting with Herod among his school-fellows, greeted him with this salutation, "Hail, King of the Jews!" PRIDEAUX.

The salutation is a familiar and ordinary form of courtesy between individuals; GREETING (v. To accost) is frequently a particular mode of salutation adopted on extraordinary occasions, indicative of great joy or satisfaction in those who greet.

After the first salutations they began to make inquiries about their absent friends. The greeting which took place between the parties upon their remeeting was general and cordial.

SIR W. SCOTT.

I was harassed by the multitude of eager salutations, and returned the common civilities with hesitation and impropriety. JOHNSON.

SANGUINARY, BLOODY, BLOOD-THIRSTY.

SANGUINARY, from sanguis, is employed both in the sense of BLOODY, or having blood, and BLOOD-THIRSTY, or thirsting after blood: sanguinary, in the first case, relates only to blood shed, as a sanguinary engagement, or a sanguinary conflict; bloody is used in the familiar application, to denote the simple presence of blood, as a bloody coat, or a bloody sword.

The scene is now more sanguinary and fuller of actors; never was such a confused mysterious civil war as this. HOWELL.

And from the wound,
Black bloody drops distill'd upon the ground. DRYDEN.

In the second case, sanguinary is employed to characterize the tempers of persons only; blood-thirsty to characterize the tempers of persons or any other beings: revolutionists will be frequently sanguinary, because they are abandoned to their passions, and follow a lawless course of violence; tigers are by nature the most blood-thirsty of all creatures.

They have seen the French rebel against a mild and lawful monarch with more fury than ever any people has been known to rise against the most illegal usurper or the most sanguinary tyrant. BURKE.

The Peruvians fought not like the Mexicans, to glut blood-thirsty divinities with human sacrifices. ROBERTSON.

SAP, UNDERMINE.

SAP signifies the juice which springs from the root of a tree; hence to sap signifies to come at the root of anything by digging: to UNDERMINE signifies to form a mine under the ground, or under whatever is upon the ground: we may sap, therefore, without undermining; and undermine without sapping: we may sap the foundation of a house without making any mine underneath; and in fortifications we may undermine either a mound, a ditch, or a wall, without striking immediately at the foundation: hence, in the moral application, to sap is a more direct and decisive mode of destruction; to undermine is a gradual, and may be a partial action. Infidelity saps the morals of a nation; courtiers undermine one another's interests at court.

With morning drams,
A filthy custom which he caught from thee,
Clean from his former practice, now he saps
His youthful vigor. CUMBERLAND.

To be a man of business is, in other words, to be a plague and spy, a treacherous supplanter and underminer of the peace of families.

SOUTH.

TO SATISFY, PLEASE, GRATIFY.

To SATISFY (v. Contentment) is rather to produce pleasure indirectly; to PLEASE (v. Agreeable) is to produce it directly: the former is negative, the latter positive pleasure: as every desire is accompanied with more or less pain, satisfaction, which is the removal of desire, is itself to a certain extent pleasure; but what satisfies is not always calculated to please; nor is that which pleases, that which will always satisfy: plain food satisfies a hungry person, but does not please him when he is not hungry; social enjoyments please, but they are very far from satisfying those who do not restrict their indulgences. To GRATIFY is to please in a high degree, to produce a vivid pleasure: we may be pleased with trifles: but we are commonly gratified with such things as act strongly either on the senses or the affections: an epicure is gratified with those delicacies which suit his taste; an amateur in music will be gratified with hearing a piece of Handel's composition finely performed.

He who has run over the whole circle of earthly pleasures will be forced to complain that either they were not pleasures or that pleasure was not satisfaction.

SOUTH.

Did we consider that the mind of man is the man himself, we should think it the most unnatural sort of self-murder to sacrifice the sentiment of the soul to gratify the appetites of the body.

STEELE.

TO SATISFY, SATIATE, GLUT, CLOY.

To SATISFY is to take enough: SATIATE is a frequentative, formed from satis, enough, signifying to have more than enough. GLUT, in Latin glutio, from gula, the throat, signifies to take down the throat. Satisfaction brings pleasure; it is what nature demands; and nature, therefore, makes a suitable return: satiety is attended with disgust; it is what appetite demands; but appetite is the corruption of nature, and produces nothing but evil: glutting is an act of intemperance; it is what the inordinate appetite demands; it greatly exceeds the former in degree both of the cause and the consequence: CLOYING is the consequence of glutting. Every healthy person satisfies himself with a regular portion of food; children, if unrestrained, seek to satiare their appetites, and cloy themselves by their excesses; brutes, or men debased into brutes, glut themselves with that which is agreeable to their appetites. So, in the moral application, we satisfy desires in general, or any particular desire; we satiare the appetite for pleasure; one gluts the eyes or the ears by anything that is horrid or painful, or *cloy*s the mind.

The only thing that can give the mind any solid satisfaction is a certain complacency and repose in the good providence of God. HERRING.

'Twas not enough
By subtle fraud to snatch a single life,
Fancy impiety! whole kingdoms fell,
To sate the lust of power.

PORTER.

If the understanding be detained by occupations less pleasing, it returns again to study with greater alacrity than when it is glutted with ideal pleasures.

JOHNSON.

Religious pleasure is such a pleasure as can never cloy or overwork the mind.

SOUTH.

TO SAVE, SPARE, PRESERVE, PROTECT.

To SAVE is to keep or make safe (v. Safe). SPARE, in German sparen, like the Latin parco, comes from the Hebrew parek, to free. PRESERVE, compounded of pre and servo, to keep, signifies to keep off. PROTECT, v. To defend.

The idea of keeping free from evil is the common idea of all these terms, and the peculiar signification of the term save; they differ either in the nature of the evil kept off, or the circumstances of the agent: we may be saved from every kind of evil; but we are spared only from those which it is in the power of another to inflict: we may be saved from falling, or saved from an illness; a criminal is spared from punishment, or we may be spared by Divine Providence in the midst of some calamity.

The plague destroying those the sword would spare,

'Tis time to save the few remains of war. POPE.

Spare my sight the pain
Of seeing what a world of tears it cost you.

DRYDEN.

We may be saved and spared from any evils, great or small; we are preserved and protected only from evils of magnitude: we may be saved either from the inclemency of the weather, or the fatal vicissitudes of life: we may be spared the pain of a disagreeable meeting, or we may be spared our lives; we are preserved from ruin, or protected from oppression. To save and spare apply to evils that are actual and temporary; preserve and protect to those which are possible or permanent: we may be saved from drowning; a person may be preserved from infection, or protected from an attack. To save may be the effect of accident or design; to spare is always the effect of intentional forbearance; to preserve and protect are the effect of a special exertion of power; the latter in a still higher degree than the former: we may be preserved, by ordinary means, from the evils of human life; but we are protected by the government, or by Divine Providence, from the active assaults of those who aim at doing us mischief.

A wondrous ark
To save himself and household from amid
A world devote to universal wreck. MILTON.

Let Caesar spread his conquests far,
Less pleas'd to triumph than to spare.

JOHNSON.

Cortes was extremely solicitous to preserve the city of Mexico as much as possible from being destroyed. ROBERTSON.

How poor a thing is ruin, whom death itself
Cannot protect from injuries! RANDOLPH.

To spare and protect refer mostly to personal injuries; save and preserve are said of whatever one keeps from injury on account of its value; as to save one's good name, to preserve one's honor.

Attilius sacrific'd himself to save
That faith which to his barb'rous foes he gave.
DENHAM.

Then to preserve the fame of such a deed
For Pythia slain were Pythian games decreed.
DRYDEN.

SCARCITY, DEARTH.

SCARCITY (v. Rare) is a generic term to denote the circumstance of a thing being scarce. DEARTH, which is the same as dearthness, is a mode of scarcity applied in the literal sense to provisions mostly, as provisions are mostly dear when they are scarce; the word dearth, therefore, denotes scarcity in a high degree:

whatever men want, and find it difficult to procure, they complain of its scarcity:
when a country has the misfortune to be visited with a famine, it experiences the frightfullest of all dearths.

They drink very few liquors that have not lain in fresco, insomuch that a scarvotly of snow would raise a mutiny at Naples. ADDISON.

I find the dearth at this time very great.
Wheat was at four marks the quarter. BURNET.

Dearth is figuratively applied to moral objects; as a dearth of intelligence, of talent, and the like.

The French have brought on themselves that dearth of plot. DRYDEN.

SCHOLAR, DISCIPLE.

SCHOLAR and DISCIPLE are both applied to such as learn from others:
but the former is said only of those who learn the rudiments of knowledge; the latter of one who acquires any art or science from the instruction of another:
the scholar is opposed to the teacher;
the disciple to the master: children are always scholars; adult persons may be disciples. Scholars chiefly employ themselves in the study of words; disciples, as the disciples of our Saviour, in the study of things: we are the scholars of any one under whose care we are placed, or from whom we learn anything, good or bad; we are the disciples only of those who are distinguished, and for the most part in the good sense, though not always so: children are sometimes too apt scholars in learning evil from one another.
Philosophers of old had their disciples, and nowadays there are many who have been exalted into that character who have their disciples and followers.

The Romans confessed themselves the scholars of the Greeks. JOHNSON.

We are not the disciples of Voltaire. BURKE.

SCHOOL, ACADEMY.

THE Latin term schola signifies a lotering-place, a place for desultory conversation or instruction, from the Greek σχολή, leisure; hence it has been extended to any place where instruction is given, particularly that which is communicated to youth. ACADEMY derives its name from the Greek ακαδημία, the name of a public place in Athens, where the philosopher Plato first gave his lectures, which afterward became a place of resort for learned men; hence societies of learned men have since been termed academies. The leading idea in the word SCHOOL is that of instruction given and doctrine received; in the word academy is that of association among those who have already learned: hence we speak in the literal sense of the school where young persons meet to be taught, or in the extended and moral sense of the old and new school, the Pythagorean school, the philosophical school, and the like; but the academy of arts or sciences, the French academy, being members of any academy and the like.

The world is a great school, where deceit, in all its forms, is one of the lessons that is first learned. BLAIR.

As for other academies, such as those for painting, sculpture, or architecture, we have not so much as heard the proposal. SHAFESBURY.

TO SCOFF, GIBE, JEER, SNEER.

SCOFF comes from the Greek σκαπτω, to deride. GIBE and JEER are connected with the words gabble and jabber, denoting an unseemly mode of speech. SNEER is connected with sneeze and nose, the member by which sneering is performed.

Scoffing is a general term for expressing contempt; we may scoff either by gibes, jeers, or sneers; or we may scoff by opprobrious language and contemptuous looks with gibing, jeering, or sneering: to gibe, jeer, and sneer, are personal acts; the gibe and jeer consist of words addressed to an individual: the former has most of ill-nature and reproach in it; the latter has more of ridicule or satire in it; they are both, however, applied to the actions of vulgar or unseemly people, who practise their coarse jokes on others.

Truth from his lips prevail'd with double sway,
And fools who came to scoff remain'd to pray.

GOLDSMITH.

And sneers as learnedly as they,
Like females o'er their morning tea. SWIFT.

Scoff and sneer are directed either to persons or things, as the object; gibe and

jeer only toward persons; scoff is taken only in the proper sense; sneer derives its meaning from the literal act of sneering: the scoffer speaks lightly of that which deserves serious attention: the sneerer speaks either actually with a sneer, or as it were by implication with a sneer: the scoffers at religion set at naught all thoughts of decorum, they openly avow the little estimation in which they hold it; the sneerers at religion are more sly, but not less malignant; they wish to treat religion with contempt, but not to bring themselves into the contempt they deserve.

The fop sets learning at defiance,
Scoffs at the pedant and the science. GAY.

Shrewd fellows, and such arch wags! A tribe

That jeering demeanor is a quality of great offence to others and danger toward a man's self.
LORD WESTWORTH.

There is one short passage still remaining (of Alexes the poet's) which conveys a sneer at Pythagoras. CUMBERLAND.

Where town and country vicars flock in tribes,
Secur'd by numbers from the laymen's gibes. SWIFT.

Midas, expos'd to all their jeers,
Had lost his art, and kept his ears. SWIFT.

TO SCRUPLE, HESITATE, WAVER.

To SCRUPLE (v. Conscientious) simply keeps us from deciding; the terms HESITATE (v. To demur) and WAVER, from the word wave, signifying to move backward and forward like a wave, bespeak a fluctuating or variable state of the mind. We scruple simply from motives of doubt as to the propriety of a thing; we hesitate and waver from various motives, particularly such as affect our interests. Conscience produces scruples, fear produces hesitation, irresolution produces wavering: a person scruples to do an action which may hurt his neighbor or offend his Maker; he hesitates to do a thing which he fears may not prove advantageous to him; he wavers in his mind between going or staying, according as his inclinations impel him to the one or the other: a man who does not scruple to say or do as he pleases will be an offensive companion, if not a dangerous member of society: he who hesitates only when the doing of good is proposed, evinces himself a worthless member of society; he who wavers between his duty and his inclination will seldom maintain a long or doubtful contest.

The Jacobins desire a change, and they will have it if they can; if they cannot have it by English cabal, they will make no sort of scruple to have it by the cabal of France. BURKE.

The lords of the congregation did not hesitate a moment whether they should employ their whole strength in one generous effort to rescue their religion and liberty from impending destruction. ROBERTSON.

It is the greatest absurdity to be watering and unsettled without closing with that side which appears the most safe and probable. ADDISON.

SEAL, STAMP.

SEAL is a specific, STAMP a general term: there cannot be a seal without a stamp; but there may be many stamps where there is no seal. The seal, in Latin sigillum, signifies a signet or little sign, consisting of any one's coat of arms or any device; the stamp is, in general, any impression whatever which has been made by stamping, that is, any impression which is not easily to be effaced. In the improper sense, the seal is the authority; thus, to set one's seal is the same as to authorize, and the seal of truth is any outward mark which characterizes it: but the stamp is the impression by which we distinguish the thing; thus a thing is said to bear the stamp of truth, of sincerity, of veracity, and the like.

Therefore not long in force this charter stood,
Wanting that seal, it must be seal'd in blood.

DENHAM.

Wisdom for parts is madness for the whole.
This stamps the paradox, and gives us leave
To call the wisest weak. YOUNG.

SEAMAN, WATERMAN, SAILOR, MARINER.

ALL these words denote persons occupied in navigation; the SEAMAN, as the word implies, follows his business on the sea; the WATERMAN is one who gets his livelihood on fresh water: the SAILOR and the MARINER are both specific terms to designate the seaman: every sailor and mariner is a seaman; although every seaman is not a sailor or mariner; the former is one who is employed about the laborious part of the vessel; the latter is one who traverses the ocean to and fro, who is attached to the water, and passes his life upon it. Men of all ranks are denominated seamen, whether officers or men, whether in a merchantman or a king's ship: sailor is only used for the common men, or, in the sea phrase, for those before the mast, particularly in vessels of war; hence our sailors and soldiers are spoken of as the defenders of our country: a mariner is an independent kind of seaman who manages his own vessel, and goes on an expedition on his own account; fishermen, and those who trade along the coast, are in a particular manner distinguished by the name of mariners.

Thus the toss'd seaman, after boist'rous storms,
Lands on his country's breast. LEE.

Many a lawyer who makes but an indifferent figure at the bar might have made a very elegant waterman. SOUTH.

Through storms and tempests so the sailor drives. SHIRLEY.

Welcome to me, as to a sinking mariner
The lucky plank that bears him to the shore. LEE.

TO SECOND, SUPPORT.

To SECOND is to give the assistance of a second person; to SUPPORT is to bear up on one's own shoulders. To second does not express so much as to support: we second only by our presence or our word; but we support by our influence, and all the means that are in our power: we second a motion by a simple declaration of our assent to it; we support a motion by the force of persuasion: so likewise we are said always to second a person's views when we give him openly our countenance by declaring our approbation of his measures; and we are said to support him when we give the assistance of our purse, our influence, or any other thing essential for the attainment of an end.

The blasting vollied thunder made all speed,
And seconded thy else not dreaded spear. MILTON.

Impeachments no can best resist,
And AYE support the civil list. GAY.

SECOND, SECONDARY, INFERIOR.

SECOND and SECONDARY both come from the Latin secundus, changed from sequendus and sequor, to follow, signifying the order of succession: the former simply expresses this order; but the latter includes the accessory idea of comparative demerit: a person stands second in a list, or a letter is second which immediately succeeds the first; but a consideration is secondary, or of secondary importance, which is opposed to that which holds the first rank. Secondary and INFERIOR both designate some lower degree of a quality: but secondary is only applied to the importance or value of things; inferior is applied generally to all qualities: a man of business reckons everything as secondary which does not forward the object he has in view; men of inferior abilities are disqualified by nature for high and important stations, although they may be more fitted for lower stations than those of greater abilities.

Fond, foolish man! with fear of death surpris'd,
Which either should be wish'd for or despis'd;
This, if our souls with bodies death destroy,
That, if our souls a second life enjoy. DRYDEN.

Many, instead of endeavoring to form their own opinions, content themselves with the secondary knowledge which a convenient bench in a coffee-house can supply. JOHNSON.

Who am alone
From all eternity; for none I know
Second to me, or like. MILTON.

Hast thou not made me here thy substitute,
And these inferior far beneath me set? MILTON.

SECRET, HIDDEN, LATENT, OCCULT, MYSTERIOUS.

What is SECRET (v. Clandestine) is so apart or removed away as to be out of observation; what is HIDDEN (v. To conceal) is so covered over as to be altogether concealed: as, a corner may be secret; a hole under ground is hidden.

Ye boys, who pluck the flow'rs and spoil the spring,
Beware the secret snake that shoots a sting. DRYDEN.

The blind laborious mole
In winding mazes works her hidden hole. DRYDEN.

What is secret is known to some one; what is hidden may be known to no one: it rests in the breast of an individual to keep a thing secret; it depends on the course of things if anything remains hidden: every man has more or less of that which he wishes to keep secret; the talent of many lies hidden for want of opportunity to bring it into exercise, as many treasures lie hidden in the earth for want of being discovered and brought to light. A secret may concern only the individual or individuals who hold it, and those from whom it is kept; but that which is hidden may concern all the world: sometimes the success of a transaction depends upon its being kept secret; the stores of knowledge which yet remain hidden may be much greater than those which have been laid open. The LATENT, in Latin latens, lying hid, is the secret or concealed, in cases where it ought to be open: a latent motive is that which a person intentionally, though not justifiably, keeps to himself; the latent cause for any proceeding is that which is not revealed.

The cruelty of this boy, which he had long practised in so secret a manner that no creature suspected it, was at length discovered. COWPER.

Then deeply think, O man! how great thou art,
Pay thyself homage with a trembling heart;
Enter the sacred temple of thy breast,
And gaze and wander there a ravish'd guest:
Gaze on those hidden treasures thou shalt find. YOUNG.

Mem'ry confus'd, and interrupted thought,
Death's harbingers, lie latent in the draught. PRIOR.

OCCULT, in Latin occultus, participle of occulo, compounded of oc or ob and culo or colo, to cover over by tilling or ploughing, that is, to cover over with the earth, or by any natural body, and MYSTERIOUS (v. Dark), are species of the hidden: the former respects that which has a veil naturally thrown over it; the latter respects that mostly which is covered with a supernatural veil: an occult science is one that is hidden from the view of persons in general, which is attainable but by few; occult causes or qualities are those which lie too remote to be discovered by the inquirer: the operations of Providence are said to be mysterious, as they are altogether past our finding out; many points of doctrine in our religion are equally mysterious, as connected with and dependent upon the attributes of the Deity.

Some men have an occult power of stealing on the affections. JOHNSON.

From his void embrace,
Mysterious heaven! that moment to the ground,
A blackened corpse, was struck the beauteous maid. THOMSON.

SECULAR, TEMPORAL, WORLDLY.

SECULAR, in Latin secularis, from seculum, an age or division of time, signifies belonging to time or this life. TEMPORAL, in Latin temporalis, from tempus, time, signifies lasting only for a time. WORLDLY signifies after the manner of the world.

Secular is opposed to ecclesiastical; temporal and worldly are opposed to spiritual or eternal. The idea of the world or the outward objects and pursuits of the world, in distinction from that which is set above the world, is implied in common by all the terms; but secular is an indifferent term, applicable to the allowed pursuits and concerns of men; temporal is used either in an indifferent or a bad sense; and worldly mostly in a bad sense, as contrasted with things of more value. The office of a clergyman is ecclesiastical, but that of a school-master is secular, which is frequently vested in the same hands; the Upper House of Parliament consists of lords spiritual and temporal; worldly interest has a more powerful sway upon the minds of the great bulk of mankind than their spiritual interests.

Some saw nothing in what has been done in France but a firm and temperate exertion of freedom, so consistent with morals and piety, as to make it deserving not only of the secular applause of dashing Machiavelian politicians, but to make it a fit theme for all the devout effusions of sacred eloquence. BURKE.

The ultimate purpose of government is temporal, and that of religion is eternal, happiness. JOHNSON.

Worldly things are of such quality as to lessen upon dividing. GROVE.

SEDULOUS, DILIGENT, ASSIDUOUS.

THE idea of application is expressed by these epithets; but SEDULOUS, from the Latin sedulus and sedeo, signifying sitting close to a thing, is a particular, DILIGENT (v. Active, diligent) is a general term: one is sedulous by habit; one is diligent either habitually or occasionally: a sedulous scholar pursues his studies with a regular and close application; a scholar may be diligent at a certain period, though not invariably so. One is sedulous from a conviction of the importance of the thing; one may be diligent by fits and starts, according to the humor of the moment.

One thing I would offer is, that he would constantly and sedulously read Tully, which will insensibly work him into a good Latin style. LOCKE.

I would recommend a diligent attendance on the courts of justice (to a student for the bar). DUNNING.

ASSIDUOUS and sedulous both express the quality of sitting or sticking close to a thing, but the former may, like diligent, be employed on a partial occasion; the latter is always permanent: we may be assiduous in our attentions to a person; but we are sedulous in the important concerns of life. Sedulous peculiarly respects the quiet employments of life, but may be applied to any pursuit requiring persevering attention; a teacher may be entitled sedulous: diligent respects the active employments; one is diligent at work: assiduity holds a middle rank; it may be employed equally for that which requires active exertion, or otherwise: we may be assiduous in the pursuits of literature, or we may be assiduous in our attendance upon a person, or the performance of any office.

Methinks her sons before me patient stand,
Where the broad ocean leans against the land,
And, sedulous to stop the coming tide,
Lift the tall rampire's artificial pride.

GOLDSMITH.

We flatter ourselves that we shall cultivate with great diligence the arts of peace. JOHNSON.

Man cannot retain through life that respect and assiduity (toward a woman) by which he pleases for a day or a month. JOHNSON.

TO SEE, PERCEIVE, OBSERVE.

SEE, in the German sehen, Greek θεωω, Hebrew sacah or soah, is a general term; it may be either a voluntary or involuntary action: PERCEIVE, from the Latin percipio or per and capio, to take into the mind, is always a voluntary action; and OBSERVE (v. To notice) is an intentional action. The eye sees when the mind is absent; the mind and the eye or other senses perceive in conjunction: hence, we may say that a person sees, but does not perceive: we observe not merely by a simple act of the mind, but by its positive and fixed exertion. We see a thing without knowing what it is; we perceive a thing, and know what it is, but the impression passes away; we observe a thing, and afterward retrace the image of it in our mind. We see a star when the eye is directed toward it; we perceive it move if we look at it attentively; we observe its position in different parts of the heavens. The blind cannot see, the absent cannot perceive, the dull cannot observe. Seeing, as a corporeal action, is the act only of the eye; perceiving and observing are actions in which all the senses are concerned. We see colors, we perceive the state of the atmosphere, and observe its changes.

There plant eyes, all mist from thence
Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight. MILTON.

Sated at length, ere long I might perceive
Strange alteration in me. MILTON.

I doubt not but the same discrimination in the cast of countenances would be discoverable in hares (as in sheep); a circumstance little suspected by those who have not had opportunity to observe it. COWPER.

Seeing sometimes extends further in its application to the mind's operations, in which it has an indefinite sense; but perceive and observe have both a definite sense: we may see a thing distinctly and clearly, or otherwise; we perceive it always with a certain degree of distinctness; and observe it with a positive degree of minuteness: we see the truth of a remark; we perceive the force of an objection; we observe the reluctance of a person. It is further to be observed, however, that, when see expresses a mental operation, it expresses what is purely mental; perceive and observe are applied to such objects as are seen by the senses as well as the mind. We see the light with our eyes, or we see the truth of a proposition with our mind's eye; but we perceive the difference of climate, or we perceive the difference in the comfort of our situation; we observe the motions of the heavenly bodies.

Who is so gross
As cannot see this palpable device,
Yet who so bold but says he sees it not,
When such ill dealings must be seen in thought? SHAKESPEARE.

I perceive these lords
At this encounter do so much admire,
That they devour their reason, and scarce think
Their eyes do offices of truth. SHAKESPEARE.

Every part of your last letter glowed with that warmth of friendship which, though it was by no means new to me, I could not but observe with peculiar satisfaction.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS TO CICERO,

TO SEEK, SEARCH.

To SEEK and SEARCH (v. To examine) are but variations from the same word, and are both employed in the sense of looking after something that is not in sight: seek applies to that which is near at hand and easily found; search, to that which is remote, hidden, or not to be found without difficulty: to search, therefore, is properly to seek laboriously; we seek a person by simply going to the place where he is supposed to be; search is made from place to place when it is not known where he is: a school-boy seeks birds'-nests; the botanist searches for plants.

I have a venturesome fancy, that shall seek
The squirrel's board, and fetch thee thence NEW nuts. SHAKESPEARE.

Errors, like straws, upon the surface flow;
He who would search for pearls must dive below. DRYDEN.

These terms may also be applied to moral objects with the same distinction: as to seek peace, knowledge; to search the thoughts, to search into mysteries.

Sweet peace, where dost thou dwell?
I humbly crave,
Let me once know.
I sought thee in a secret cave,
And ask'd if peace were there. HERBERT.

Vain, very vain, my weary search to find
That bliss which only centres in the mind. GOLDSMITH.

TO SEEM, APPEAR.

THE idea of coming to the view is expressed by both these terms; but the word seem rises upon that of appear. SEEM, from the Latin similis, like, signifies literally to appear like, and is therefore a species of appearance; APPEAR, from the Latin appareo or pareo, and the Greek παρεμναι, to be present, signifies to be present, or before the eye. Every object may appear; but nothing seems, except that which the mind admits to appear in any given form. To seem requires some reflection and comparison of objects in the mind one with another; it is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to matters that may be different from what they appear, or of an indeterminate kind: that the sun seems to move is a conclusion which we draw from the exercise of our senses, and comparing this case with others of a similar nature; it is only by a further research into the operations of nature that we discover this to be no conclusive proof of its motion. To appear, on the contrary, is the express act of the things themselves on us; it is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to such objects as make an impression on us: to appear is the same as to present itself: the stars appear in the firmament, but we do not say that they seem; the sun appears dark through the clouds.

Leash'd into foam, the fierce conflicting brine
Seems o'er a thousand raging waves to burn.

THOMSON.

O heav'nly poet! Such thy verse appears,
So sweet, so charming to my ravish'd ears.

DRYDEN.

They are equally applicable to moral as well as natural objects with the above-mentioned distinction. Seem is said of that which is dubious, contingent, or future; appear, of that which is actual, positive, and past. A thing seems strange which we are led to conclude as strange from what we see of it: a thing appears clear when we have a clear conception of it: a plan seems practicable or impracticable; an author appears to understand his subject or the contrary. It seems as if all efforts to reform the bulk of mankind will be found inefficient; it appears, from the long catalogue of vices which are still very prevalent, that little progress has hitherto been made in the work of reformation.

No man had ever a greater power over himself, or was less the man he seemed to be, which shortly after appeared to everybody, when he cared less to keep on the mask. CLARENDON.

SELF-WILL, SELF-CONCEIT, SELF-SUFFICIENCY.

SELF-WILL signifies the will in one's self: SELF-CONCEIT, conceit of one's self: SELF-SUFFICIENCY, sufficiency in one's self. As characteristics they come very near to each other, but that depravity of the will which refuses to submit to every control either within or without is born with a person, and is among the earliest indications of character; in some it is less predominant than in others, but, if not early checked, it is that defect in our natures which will always prevail; self-conceit is a vicious habit of the mind which is superinduced on the original character; it is that which determines in matters of judgment: a self-willed person thinks nothing of right or wrong; whatever the impulse of the moment suggests, is the motive to action: the self-conceited person is always much concerned about right and wrong, but it is only that which he conceives to be right and wrong; self-sufficiency is a species of self-conceit applied to action: as a self-conceited person thinks of no opinion but his own; a self-sufficient person refuses the assistance of every one in whatever he is called upon to do.

First appetite enlists him truth's sworn foe,
Then obstinate self-will confirms him so.

COWPER.

Nothing so haughty and assuming as ignorance, where self-conceit bids it set up for infallible.

SOUTH.

There, safe in self-sufficient impudence,
Without experience, honesty, or sense,
Unknowing in her interest, trade, or laws,
He vainly undertakes his country's cause.

JENTON.

SENIOR, ELDER, OLDER.

THESE are all comparatives expressive of the same quality, and differ, therefore, less in sense than in application. SENIOR is employed not only in regard to the extent of age, but also to duration either in office or any given situation: ELDER is employed only in regard to age: an officer in the army is a senior by virtue of having served longer than another; a boy is a senior in a school either by virtue of his age, his standing in the school, or his situation in the class; when, therefore, age alone is to be expressed, elder is more suitable than senior; the elder children or the elder branches of a family are clearly understood to include those who have priority of age.

How can you admit your seniors to the examination or calling of them, not only being inferior in office and calling, but in gifts also?

WHITGIFT.

They bring the comparison of younger daughters conforming themselves in their attire to their elder sisters.

HOOKE.

Senior and elder are both employed as substantives, OLDER only as an adjective: hence we speak of the seniors in a school, or the elders in an assembly; but an older inhabitant, an older family. Elder has only a partial use; older is employed in general cases: in speaking of children in the same family we may say,

the elder son is heir to the estate; he is older than his brother by ten years.

The Spartans to their highest magistrate
The name of elder did appropriate. DENHAM.

Since oft
Man must compute that age he cannot feel,
He scarce believes he's older for his years. YOUNG.

SENSE, JUDGMENT.

SENSE (v. Feeling) signifies in general the faculty of feeling corporeally or perceiving mentally; in the latter case it is synonymous with JUDGMENT, which is a special operation of the mind. The sense is that primitive portion of the understanding which renders an account of things; and the judgment that portion of the reason which selects or rejects from this account. The sense is, so to speak, the reporter which collects the details, and exposes the facts; the judgment is the judge that passes sentence upon them. According to the strict import of the terms, the judgment depends upon the sense, and varies with it in degree. He who has no sense has no judgment; and he who loses sense loses judgment: since sense supplies the knowledge of things, and judgment pronounces upon them, it is evident that there must be sense before there can be judgment.

Then is the soul a nature, which contains
The power of sense within a greater power. DAVIES.

His apprehension was keen and ready; his judgment deep and sound; his reason clear and comprehensive; his method and elocution elegant and easy. LIFE OF LORD ELLENBOROUGH.

On the other hand, sense may be so distinguished from judgment, that there may be sense without judgment, and judgment without sense: sense is the faculty of perceiving in general; it is applied to abstract science as well as general knowledge; judgment is the faculty of determining, that is, of determining mostly in matters of practice. By sense the mind perceives by an immediate act, by the judgment it arrives at conclusions by a process. It is the lot of many, therefore, to have sense in matters of theory, who have no judgment in matters of practice; while others, on the contrary, who have nothing above common sense will have a soundness of judgment that is not to be surpassed. Nay, further, it is possible for a man to have good sense, and yet not a solid judgment: as they are both natural faculties, men are gifted with them as variously as with every other faculty. By good sense a man is enabled to discern, as it were, intuitively, that which requires another of less sense to ponder over and study; by a solid judgment a man is enabled to avoid those errors in conduct which one of a weak judgment is always falling into. There is, however, this distinction between sense and judgment, that the deficiencies of the former may be supplied by diligence and attention; but a defect in the latter is not so easily to be supplied by efforts of one's own. A man may improve his sense in proportion as he has the means of information; but the judgment once matured rarely makes any advances toward improvement afterward.

There's something previous ev'n to taste: 'tis sense.

Good senses, which only is the gift of heav'n,
And, though no science, fairly worth the seven;
A light within yourself you must perceive,
Jones and Le Notre have it not to give. POPE.

In all instances where our experience of the past has been extensive and uniform, our judgments concerning the future amounts to certainty. BRATTLE.

The words sense and judgment are frequently employed without any epithets to denote a positively large share of these faculties.

The fox, in deeper cunning vers'd,
The beauties of her mind rehears'd,
And talk'd of knowledge, taste, and sense,
To which the fair have vast pretence. MOORE.

To speak without flattery, few have like use of learning, or like judgment in learning, as I have observed in your lordship. BACON.

As epithets, sensible and judicious both denote the possession of these faculties in a high degree, but in their application they are distinguished as above. A writer or a speaker is said to be sensible; a friend, or an adviser, to be judicious. Sense displays itself in the conversation or the communication of one's ideas; judgment in the propriety of one's actions. A sensible man may be an entertaining companion, but a judicious man in any post of command is an inestimable treasure. Sensible remarks are always calculated to please and interest sensible people; judicious measures have a sterling value in themselves that is appreciated according to the importance of the object. Hence it is obvious that to be sensible is a desirable thing, but to be judicious is an indispensable requisite in those who have to act a part.

I have been tired with accounts from sensible men furnished with matters of fact which have happened within their own knowledge.

ADDISON.

Your observations are so judicious, I wish you had not been so sparing of them.

SIR W. JONES.

SENSIBLE, SENSITIVE, SENTIENT.

ALL these epithets, which are derived from the same source (v. To feel), have obviously a great sameness of meaning, though not of application. SENSIBLE and SENSITIVE both denote the capacity of being moved to feeling: SENTIENT implies the very act of feeling. Sensible expresses either a habit of the body and mind, or only a particular state referring to some particular object: a person may be sensible of things in general, or sensible of cold, sensible of injuries, sensible of the kindnesses which he has received from an individual. Sensitive signifies always an habitual or permanent quality; it is the characteristic of objects: a sensitive creature implies one whose sense is by distinction quickly to be acted upon; a sensitive plant is a peculiar species of plants, marked for the property of having sense or being sensible of the touch.

And, with affection wondrous sensible,
He wrung Bassanio's hand, and so they parted.

SHAKESPEARE.

Those creatures live more alone whose food,
and therefore prey, is upon other sensitive creatures.

TEMPLE.

Sensible and sensitive have always a reference to external objects; but sentient expresses simply the possession of feeling or the power of feeling, and excludes the idea of the cause. Hence, the terms sensible and sensitive are applied only to persons or corporeal objects: but sentient, which conveys the most abstract meaning, is applicable to men and spirits; sentient beings, taken absolutely, may include angels as well as men; it is restricted in its meaning by the context only.

If circumspection and caution are a part of wisdom, when we work only upon inanimate matter, surely they become a part of duty too, when the subject of our demolition and construction is not brick and mortar, but sentient beings, by the sudden alteration of whose condition and habits multitudes may be rendered miserable. BURKE.

SENSIBLE, PERCEPTIBLE.

THESE epithets are here applied not to the persons capable of being impressed, but to the objects capable of impressing: in this case SENSIBLE (v. To feel) applies to that which acts on the senses merely; PERCEPTIBLE (v. To see), to that which acts on the senses in conjunction with the mind. All corporeal objects are naturally termed sensible, inasmuch as they are sensible to the eye, the ear, the nose, the touch, and the taste; particular things are perceptible, inasmuch as they are to be perceived or recognized by the mind. Sometimes sensible signifies discernible by means of the senses, as when we speak of a sensible difference in the atmosphere, and in this case it comes nearer to the meaning of perceptible; but the latter always refers more to the operation of the mind than the former: the difference between colors is said to be scarcely perceptible when they approach very near to each other; so likewise the growth of a body is said not to be perceptible when it cannot be marked from one time to another by the difference of state.

I have suffered a sensible loss, if that word is strong enough to express the misfortune which has deprived me of so excellent a man.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

What must have been the state into which the Assembly has brought your affairs, that the relief afforded by so vast a supply has been hardly perceptible!

BURKE.

SENSUALIST, VOLUPTUARY, EPICURE.

THE SENSUALIST lives for the indulgence of his senses: the VOLUPTUARY (from voluptas, pleasure) is devoted to his pleasures, and, as far as these pleasures are the pleasures of sense, the voluptuary is a sensualist: the EPICURE, from Epicurus, is one who makes the pleasures of sense his god, and in this sense he is a sensualist and a voluptuary. In the application of these terms, however, the sensualist is one who is a slave to the grossest appetites; the voluptuary is one who studies his pleasures so as to make them the most valuable to himself; the epicure is a species of voluptuary who practises more than ordinary refinement in the choice of his pleasures.

Let the sensualist satisfy himself as he is able; he will find that there is a certain living spark within which all the drink he can pour in will never be able to quench. SOUTH.

To fill up the drawing of this personage, he conceived a voluptuary, who in his person should be bloated and blown up to the size of a Silenus; lazy, luxurious, in sensuality a satyr, in intemperance a bacchanalian. CUMBERLAND.

What epicure can be always plying his palate? SOUTH.

SENTENCE, PROPOSITION, PERIOD, PHRASE.

SENTENCE, in Latin sententia, is but a variation of sentiment (v. Opinion). PROPOSITION, v. Proposal. PERIOD, in Latin periodus, Greek περίοδος, from περί, about, and οδος, way, signifies the circuit or round of words which renders the sense complete. PHRASE, from the Greek φράσις, to speak, signifies the words uttered.

The sentence consists of any words which convey sentiment: the proposition consists of the thing set before the mind, that is, either our own minds or the minds of others; hence the term sentence has more special regard to the form of words, and the proposition to the matter contained: they are both used technically or otherwise: the former in grammar and rhetoric; the latter in logic. The sentence is simple and complex; the proposition is universal or particular. Period and phrase, like sentence, are forms of words, but they are solely so, whereas the sentence depends on the connection of ideas by which it is formed: we speak of sences either as to their structure or their sentiment; hence the sentence is either grammatical or moral: but the period regards only the structure; it is either well or ill turned: the term phrase denotes the character of the words; hence it is either vulgar or polite, idiomatic or general: the sentence must consist of at least two words to make sense; the phrase may be a single word or otherwise.

Some expect in letters pointed sentences and forcible periods. JOHNSON.

Chrysippus, laboring how to reconcile these two propositions, that all things are done by fate, and yet that something is in our own power, cannot extricate himself. HAMMOND.

Disastrous words can best disaster show.
In angry phrase the angry passions glow.

ELPHINSTONE.

TO SENTENCE, DOOM, CONDEMN.

To SENTENCE, or pass sentence, is to give a final opinion or decision which is to influence the fate of an object. CONDEMN, from damnum, a loss, is to pass such a sentence as shall be to the hurt of an object. DOOM, in Saxon dom, a judgment, comes from deman, to judge or deem.

When these terms are taken in the juridical sense, to sentence is indefinite as to the quantum of punishment, it may be great or small; a criminal may be senced to a mild or severe punishment: to condemn and doom are always employed to denote a severe punishment, and the latter still severer than the former. A person is condemned to the galleys, to transportation for life, or to death; he is doomed to eternal misery.

At the end of the tenth book, the poet joins this beautiful circumstance, that they offered up their penitential prayers on the very place where their judge appeared to them when he pronounced their sentence. ADDISON.

It so happened, by one of the judges withdrawing upon a sudden fit of the stone, the court was divided, one half for the condemning him, and the other half that he was not guilty.

CLARENDON.

To sentence is always the act of some conscious agent; but to condemn and doom may be the effect of circumstances, or brought about by the nature of things. A person is always senced by some one to suffer in consequence of his conduct; he is condemned or doomed, either by his misfortune or his fault, to suffer whatever circumstances impose upon him; immoral writers are justly condemned to oblivion or infamy; or persons may be condemned by their hard lot to struggle through life for a bare living; and some are doomed by a still harder lot to penury and wretchedness.

Liberty (Thomson's "Liberty") called in vain upon her votaries to read her praises; her praises were condemned to harbor spiders and gather dust. JOHNSON.

Even the abridger, compiler, and translator, though their labors cannot be ranked with those of the diurnal biographer, yet must not be rashly doomed to annihilation. JOHNSON.

To sentence is to pass sentence in the judicial sense only; but the noun sentence is taken in the sense of a judgment, and has likewise a moral as well as a judicial application, in which latter case it admits of a further comparison with condemn or condemnation. The sentence is a formal and the condemnation an informal judgment: the sentence may be favorable or unfavorable; the condemnation is always unfavorable: critics pronounce their sentence on the merits or demerits of a work; the public may condemn a measure in any manner by which they make their sentiments known. To doom, which signifies only to determine the fate of a person, is not allied to the other terms in their moral application.

Let him set out some of Luther's works, that by them we may pass sentences upon his doctrines. ATTERBURY.

This practice being intended only to honor Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, who hath risen upon us to enlighten us with that doctrine of salvation, to which we then declare our adherence, it ought not to be condemned as superstition. SECKER.

SENTENTIOUS, SENTIMENTAL.

SENTENTIOUS signifies having or abounding in sentences or judgments; SENTIMENTAL, having sentiment (v. Opinion). Books and authors are termed sententious; but travellers, society, intercourse, correspondence, and the like, are characterized as sentimental. Moralists, whose works and conversation abound in moral sentences, like Dr. Johnson's, are termed sententious; novelists and romance writers, like Mrs. Radcliffe, are properly sentimental. Sententious books always serve for improvement; sentimental works, unless they are of a superior order, are in general hurtful.

His (Mr. Ferguson's) love of Montesquieu and Tacitus has led him into a manner of writing too short-winded and sententious. GRAY.

In books, whether moral or amusing, there are no passages more captivating than those delicate strokes of sentimental morality which refer our actions to the determination of feeling. MACKENZIE.

SENTIMENT, SENSATION, PERCEPTION.

SENTIMENT and SENSATION are obviously derived from the same source (v. To feel). PERCEPTION, from perceive (v. To see), expresses the act of perceiving, or the impressions produced by perceiving.

The impressions which objects make upon the person are designated by all these terms; but the sentiment has its seat in the heart, the sensation is confined to the senses, and the perception rests in the understanding. Sentiments are lively, sensations are grateful, perceptions are clear. Gratitude is a sentiment the most pleasing to the human mind; the sensation produced by the action of electricity on the frame is generally unpleasant; a nice perception of objects is one of the first requisites for perfection in any art.

I am framing every possible pretence to live hereafter according to my own taste and sentiments. MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

Diversity of constitution or other circumstances vary the sensations, and to them Java pepper is cold. GLANVILLE.

Matter hath no life nor perception, and is not conscious of its own existence. BENTLEY.

The sentiment extends to manners, and renders us alive to the happiness or misery of others as well as our own; it is that by which men are most nearly allied to each other: the sensation is purely physical, and the effect of external objects upon either the body or the mind: perceptions carry us into the district of science; they give us an interest in all the surrounding objects as intellectual observers. A man of spirit or courage receives marks of honor, or affronts, with very different sentiments from the poltroon: he who bounds his happiness by the present fleeting existence must be careful to remove every painful sensation: we judge of objects as complex or simple according to the number of perceptions which they produce in us.

Alike to council or the assembly came,
With equal souls and sentiments the same. POPE.

When we describe our sensations of another's sorrows in condolence, the customs of the world scarcely admit of rigid veracity. JOHNSON.

When first the trembling eye receives the day,
External forms on young perception play. LANGHORNE.

TO SEPARATE, SEVER, DISJOIN, DETACH.

To SEPARATE (v. To abstract) is the general term: whatever is united or joined in any way may be separated, be the junction natural or artificial; but to SEVER, which is but a variation of separate, is a mode of separating natural bodies, or bodies naturally joined: we may separate in part or entirely; we sever entirely: we separate with or without violence; we sever with violence only: we may separate papers which have been pasted together, or fruits which have grown together; but the head is severed from the body, or a branch from the trunk.

Can a body be inflammable from which it would puzzle a chemist to separate an inflammable ingredient? BOTTLE.

To mention only that species of shell-fish that grow to the surface of several rocks, and immediately die upon their being severed from the place where they grow. ADDISON.

To separate may be said of things which are only remotely connected; DIS-JOIN, signifying to destroy a junction, is said of that which is intimately connected so as to be joined: we separate as convenience requires; we may separate in a right or a wrong manner; we mostly disjoin things which ought to remain joined: we separate syllables in order to distinguish them; but they are sometimes disjoined in writing by an accidental erasure. To DETACH, signifying to destroy a contact, has an intermediate sense between separate and disjoin, applying to bodies which are neither so loosely connected as the former, nor so closely as the latter: we separate things that directly meet in no point; we disjoin those which may meet in many points; we detach those things which meet in one point only.

Our Saviour did not separate from the Jewish Church, though the Scribes and Pharisees, who ruled in ecclesiastical matters at that time, had perverted the law. BENNETT.

In times and regions, so disjoined from each other that there can scarcely be imagined any communication of sentiments, has prevailed a general and uniform expectation of propitiating God by corporeal austerities. JOHNSON.

The several parts of it are detached one from the other, and yet join again one cannot tell how. POPE.

Separate, sever, and detach may be applied to mental as well as corporeal objects; persons may be separated from each other by diversity of interests or opinions; they may be severed from each other when their affections are estranged toward each other; they may be detached from each other by circumstances after having been attached by any tie.

They (the French Republicans) never have abandoned, and never will abandon, their old steady maxim of separating the people from their government. BURNS.

Better I were distract,
So should my thoughts be severed from my griefs. SHAKESPEARE.

As for the detached rhapsodies which Lychgus in more early times brought with him out of Asia, they must have been exceedingly imperfect. CUMBERLAND.

SEQUEL, CLOSE.

SEQUEL is a species of CLOSE; it is that which follows by way of termination; but the close is simply that which closes, or puts an end to anything. There cannot be a sequel without a close, but there may be a close without a sequel. A story may have either a sequel or a close; when the end is detached from the beginning so as to follow, it is a sequel; if the beginning and end are uninterrupted, it is simply a close. When a work is published in distinct parts, those which follow at the end may be termed the sequel: if it appears all at once, the concluding pages are the close.

Oh let me say no more;
Gather the sequel by what went before. SHAKESPEARE.

A tale should be judicious, clear, succinct,
The language plain, and incidents well link'd;
Tell not as new what everybody knows,
And, new or old, still hasten to a close.

COWPER.

SERIES, COURSE.

A SERIES, in Latin series, from sero, to bind or connect, is applied to things which are connected with each other, simply in order of time or number. COURSE, in Latin cursum, from currere, to run, signifying the line formed or the direction taken in running, applies to things which are so connected together as to form, as it were, a line; a series of events are such as follow in order of time; a series of numbers of any work are such as follow in numerical order; a course of events are such as tend to the same end; a course of lectures, such as are delivered on the same subject.

You may believe me I shall never forget from whom this long series of applications took its rise. BRATTLE.

If it be asked what is the improper expectation which it is dangerous to indulge, experience will answer, that it is an expectation that requires the common course of things to be changed.

JOHNSON.

SERVANT, DOMESTIC, MENIAL, DRUDGE.

IN the term SERVANT is included the idea of the service performed: in the term DOMESTIC, from domus, a house, is included the idea of one belonging to the house or family: in the word MENIAL, from manus, the hand, is included the idea of labor; and the term DRUDGE, that of drudgery. We hire a servant at a certain rate, and for a particular service; we are attached to our domestics according to their assiduity and attention to our wishes; we employ as a menial one who is unfit for a higher employment; and a drudge in any labor, however hard and disagreeable.

A servant dwells remote from all knowledge of his lord's purposes.

SOUTH.

Montezuma was attended by his own menial slaves, and served with his usual state.

ROBERTSON.

Some were his (King Charles's) own menial servants, and ate bread at his table before they lifted up their heel against him.

SOUTH.

He who will be vastly rich must resolve to be a drudge all his days.

SOUTH.

SERVITUDE, SLAVERY, BONDAGE.

SERVITUDE expresses less than SLAVERY, and this less than BONDAGE.

Servitude, from servio, conveys simply the idea of performing a service without specifying the principle upon which it is performed. Among the Romans, servus signified a slave, because all who served were literally slaves, the power over the person being almost unlimited. The mild influence of Christianity has corrected men's notions with regard to their rights as well as their duties, and established servitude on the just principle of a mutual compact, without any infraction on that most precious of all human gifts, personal liberty. Slavery, which marks a condition incompatible with the existence of this invaluable endowment, is a term odious to the Christian ear: it had its origin in the grossest state of society; the word being derived from the German slave, or Slavonians, a fierce and intrepid people who made a long stand against the Germans, and, being at last defeated, were made slaves. Slavery, therefore, includes not only servitude, but also the odious circumstance of the entire subjection of one individual to another. Bondage, from to bind, denotes the state of being bound, that is, slavery in its most aggravated form, in which, to the loss of personal liberty, is added cruel treatment; the term is seldom applied in its proper sense to any persons but the Israelites in Egypt. In a figurative sense, we speak of being a slave to our passions, and under the bondage of sin, in which cases the terms preserve precisely the same distinction.

It is fit and necessary that some persons in the world should be in love with a splendid servitude.

SOUTH.

So different are the geniuses which are formed under Turkish slavery and Grecian liberty.

ADDISON.

Our cage

We make a choir, as doth the prison'd bird,
And sing our bondage freely.

SHAKESPEARE.

The same distinction exists between the epithets servile and slavish, which are employed only in the moral application. He who is servile has the mean character of a servant, but he is still a free agent; but he who is slavish is bound and fettered in every possible form.

That servile path thou nobly dost decline,
Of tracing word by word, and line by line,
Those are the labor'd births of slavish brains,
Not the effect of poetry, but pains.

DENHAM.

SHADE, SHADOW.

SHADE and SHADOW, in German schatten, are in all probability connected with the word shine, show (v. To show, etc.). Both these terms express that darkness which is occasioned by the sun's rays being intercepted by any body; but shade simply expresses the absence of the light, and shadow signifies also the figure of the body which thus intercepts the light. Trees naturally produce a shade, by means of their branches and leaves: and wherever the image of the tree is reflected on the earth that forms its shadow. It is agreeable in the heat of summer to sit in the shade; the constancy with which the shadow follows the man has been proverbially adopted as a simile for one who clings close to another.

Welcome, ye shades! ye bowery thickets, hail!
THOMSON.

At every step,
Solemn and slow, the shadows blacker fall,
And all is awful listening gloom around.
THOMSON.

In the moral application they are more widely distinguished in their signification. As a shade implies darkness, so to be in the shade is the same as to be in obscurity; as the shadow is but a reflection or appearance, so, in the moral sense, the shadow of a thing is that which is opposed to the substance.

The pious prince then seeks the shade
Which hides from sight the pious maid.
DRYDEN.

As a man he has hardly left him the shadow
of a good quality.
COWPER.

TO SHAKE, TREMBLE, SHUDDER, QUIVER, QUAKE.

SHAKE, SHUDDER (in the German schütteln, schütten), QUIVER, and QUAKE, in the Latin quatio, cutio, and the Italian scuotere, are all derived from one common original; TREMBLE comes from the Latin tremō.

To shake is a generic term, the rest are but modes of shaking: to tremble is to shake from an inward cause, or what appears to be so: in this manner a person trembles from fear, from cold, or weakness; and a leaf which is imperceptibly agitated by the air is also said to tremble: to shudder is to tremble violently: to quiver and to quake are both to tremble quickly; but the former denotes rather a vibratory motion, as the point of a spear when thrown against wood; the latter a quick motion of the whole body, as in the case of bodies that have not sufficient consistency in themselves to remain still.

Under his burning wheels
The steadfast empyrean shook throughout,
All but the throne itself of God.
MILTON.

The trembling pilot, from his rudder torn,
Was headlong hurl'd.
DRYDEN.

He said, and hurl'd against the mountain side
His quivering spear.
DRYDEN.

Thereto as cold and dreary as a snake,
That seem'd to tremble evermore and quake.
SPENSER.

TO SHAKE, AGITATE, TOSS.

SHAKE, v. To shake. AGITATE, in Latin agito, is a frequentative of ago, to drive, that is, to drive different ways. TOSS is probably contracted from torsi, perfect of torqueo, to whirl.

A motion more or less violent is signified by all these terms, which differ both in the manner and the cause of the motion. Shake is indefinite, it may differ in degree as to the violence; to agitate and toss rise in sense upon the word shake: a breeze shakes a leaf, a storm agitates the sea, and the waves toss a vessel to and fro: large and small bodies may be shaken; large bodies are agitated: a handkerchief may be shaken; the earth is agitated by an earthquake. What is shaken and agitated is not removed from its place; but what is tossed is thrown from place to place. A house may frequently be shaken, while the foundation remains good; the waters are most agitated while they remain within their bounds; but a ball is tossed from hand to hand.

An unwholesome blast of air, a cold, or a surfelt, may shake in pieces a man's hardy fabric.
SCOTT.

I found the magnetical needle greatly agitated near the summit of the mountain.
BYRON.

Toss'd all the day in rapid circles round,
Breathless I fell.
POPE.

To shake and toss are the acts either of persons or things; to agitate is the act of things when taken in the active sense. A person shakes the hand of another, or the motion of a carriage shakes persons in general, and agitates those who are weak in frame: a child tosses his food about; or the violent motion of a vessel tosses everything about which is in it. To shake arises from external or internal causes; we may be shaken by others, or shake ourselves from cold: to agitate and toss arise always from some external action, direct or indirect; the body may be agitated by violent concussion from without, or from the action of perturbed feelings; the body may be tossed by various circumstances, and the mind may be tossed to and fro by the violent action of the passions. Hence the propriety of using the terms in the moral application. The resolution is shaken, as the tree is by the wind; the mind is agitated like troubled waters; a person is tossed to and fro in the ocean of life, as the vessel is tossed by the waves.

Not my firm faith
Can by his hand be shaken or seduc'd. MILTON.

We all must have observed that a speaker agitated with passion, or an actor who is indeed strictly an imitator, are perpetually changing the tone and pitch of their voice, as the sense of their words varies. SIM W. JONES.

Your mind is loosening on the sea,
There where your argosies
Do overpeer the petty traffickers. SHAKESPEARE.

SHARP, ACUTE, KEEN.

THE general property expressed by these epithets is that of sharpness, or an ability to cut. The term SHARP, in German, etc., scharf, from scheren, to cut, is generic and indefinite; the two others are modes of sharpness differing in the circumstance or the degree: the ACUTE (v. Acute) is not only more than sharp in the common sense, but signifies also sharp-pointed: a knife may be sharp; but a needle is properly acute. Things are sharp that have either a long or a pointed edge; but the KEEN (v. Acute) is applicable only to the long edge; and that in the highest degree of sharpness: a common knife may be sharp; but a razor or a lancet are properly said to be keen. These terms preserve the same distinction in their figurative use. Every pain is sharp which may resemble that which is produced by cutting; it is acute when it resembles that produced by piercing deep: words are said to be sharp which have any power in them to wound; they are keen when they cut deep and wide.

Be sure you avoid as much as you can to inquire after those that have been sharp in their judgments toward me. EARL OF STRAFFORD.

Wisdom's eye
Acute for what? To spy more miseries. YOUNG.
To this great end keen instinct stings him on.
YOUNG.

TO SHINE, GLITTER, GLARE, SPARKLE, RADIATE.

SHINE, in Saxon schinean, German scheinen, is in all probability connected with the words show, see, etc. GLITTER and GLARE are variations from the German gleissen, glänzen, etc., which have a similar meaning. To SPARKLE signifies to produce sparks; and spark is in Saxon spearce, low German and Dutch spark. To RADIATE is to produce rays, from the Latin radius, a ray.

The emission of light is the common idea conveyed by these terms. To shine expresses simply this general idea: glitter and the other verbs include some collateral idea in their signification. To shine is a steady emission of light; to glitter is an unsteady emission of light, occasioned by the reflection on transparent or bright bodies: the sun and moon shine whenever they make their appearance; but a set of diamonds glitter by the irregular reflection of the light on them; or the brazen spire of a steeple glitters when the sun in the morning shines upon it. This is the same in the improper as the proper application.

Yet something shines more glorious in his word,
His mercy this. WALLER.

The happiness of success glittering before him
withdraws his attention from the atrociousness
of the guilt. JOHNSON.

Shine specifies no degree of light; it may be barely sufficient to render itself visible, or it may be a very strong degree of light: glare, on the contrary, denotes the highest possible degree of light: the sun frequently glares when it shines only at intervals; and the eye also glares.

This glorious morning star was not the transitory light of a comet, which shines and glares for awhile, and then presently vanishes into nothing. SOUTH.

Against the capitol I met a lion,
Who glar'd upon me, and went surly by
Without annoying me. SHAKESPEARE.

To shine is to emit light in a full stream; but to sparkle is to emit it in small portions; and to radiate is to emit it in long lines. The fire sparkles in the burning of wood; or the light of the sun sparkles when it strikes on knobs or small points; or the eye sparkles: the sun radiates when it seems to emit its light in rays.

His eyes so sparkled with a lively flame. DRYDEN.
Now had the sun withdrawn his radiant light. DRYDEN.

SHOCK, CONCUSSION.

SHOCK denotes a violent shake or agitation; CONCUSSION, a shaking together. The shock is often instantaneous, but does not necessarily extend beyond the act of the moment; the concussion is permanent in its consequences, it tends to derange the system. Hence the different application of the terms: the shock may affect either the body or the mind; the concussion affects properly only the body, or corporeal objects: a violent and sudden blow produces a shock at the moment it is given; but it does not always produce a concussion: the violence of a fall will, however, sometimes produce a concussion in the brain, which in future affects the intellect.

He stood the shock of a whole host of foes.

ADDISON.

How can that concussion of atoms be capable of begetting those internal and vital affections, that self-consciousness, and those other powers and energies that we feel in our minds, seeing they only strike upon the outward surfaces? They cannot inwardly pervade one another; they cannot have any penetration of dimensions and conjunction of substance.

BENTLEY.

As shock conveys no idea of separation, only of impression, it is equally applicable to the mind and the body. Sudden news of an exceedingly painful nature will often produce a shock on the mind; but time mostly serves to wear away the effect which has been produced.

It is inconceivable how any such man, that hath stood the shock of an eternal duration without corruption or alteration, should after be corrupted or altered.

HALL.

TO SHOOT, DART.

To SHOOT and DART, in the proper sense, are clearly distinguished from each other, as expressing different modes of sending bodies to a distance from a given point. From the circumstances of the actions arise their different application to other objects in the improper sense; as that which proceeds by shooting goes forth from a body unexpectedly, and with great rapidity; so, in the figurative sense, a plant shoots up that comes so unexpectedly as not to be seen; a star is said to shoot in the sky, which seems to move in a shooting manner from one place to another.

Tell, how like a tall old oak, how learning shoots To heaven her branches, and to hell her roots.

DENHAM.

From a similarity in the form of rays, lightning, etc., to darts, they are figuratively said to be darted.

I'll safe at distance to his god he prays,
The god who darts around the world his rays.

POPE.

SHORT, BRIEF, CONCISE, SUCCINCT, SUMMARY.

SHORT, in French court, German kurz, Latin curtus, Greek κυρος, is the generic, the rest are specific terms: everything which admits of dimensions may be short, as opposed to the long, that is, either naturally or artificially; the rest are species of artificial shortness, or that which is the work of art: hence it is that material, as well as spiritual, objects may be termed short: but the BRIEF, in Latin brevis, in Greek βραχυς, CONCISE, in Latin concius, signifying cut into a small body, SUCCINCT, in Latin succinctus, participle of succingo, to tuck up, signifying brought within a small compass, and SUMMARY (v. Abridgment) are intellectual or spiritual only. We may term a stick, a letter, or a discourse, short; but we speak of brevity only in regard to the mode of speech; conciseness and succinctness as to the matter of speech; summary as to the mode either of speaking or acting: the brief is opposed to the prolix; the concise and succinct to the diffuse; the summary to the circumstantial or ceremonious. It is a matter of comparatively little importance whether a man's life be long or short; but it deeply concerns him that every moment be well spent: brevity of expression ought to be consulted by speakers, even more than by writers; conciseness is of peculiar advantage in the formation of rules for young persons; and succinctness is a requisite in every writer who has extensive materials to digest; a summary mode of proceeding may have the advantage of saving time, but it has the disadvantage of incorrectness, and often of injustice.

The widest excursions of the mind are made by short flights frequently repeated.

JOHNSON.

Premeditation of thought and brevity of expression are the great ingredients of that reverence that is required to a pious and acceptable prayer.

SWIFT.

TO SHOW, OR SHEW, POINT OUT,
MARK, INDICATE.

SHOW, in German schauen, etc., Greek θεαομαι, from the Hebrew shoah, to look upon, is here the general term, and the others specific: the common idea included in the signification of them all is that of making a thing visible to another. To show is an indefinite term; one shows by simply setting a thing before the eyes of another: to POINT OUT, to fix a point upon a thing, is specific; it is to show some particular point by a direct and immediate application to it: we show a person a book when we put it into his hands; but we point out the beauties of its contents by making a point upon them, or accompanying the action with some particular movement, which shall direct the attention of the observer in a specific manner. Many things, therefore, may be shown which cannot be pointed out: a person shows himself, but he does not point himself out; towns, houses, gardens, and the like, are shown; but single things of any description are pointed out.

If I do feign,
Oh let me in my present wildness die,
And never live to show the incredulous world
The noble change that I have purposed.

SHAKESPEARE.

I shall do justice to those who have distinguished themselves in learning, and point out their beauties.

ADDISON.

To show and point out are direct personal acts; to MARK (v. Mark, impression), i. e., to put a mark on, is an indirect means of making a thing visible or observable: a tradesman marks the prices of the articles which he sets forth in his shop.

Were they allowed first to show what they really are, I am persuaded they would not be half so bad.

BRYDENE.

When her eyes began to fail, she employed a reader, who marked on every volume or pamphlet the day when he began and ended his task.

WHITTAKER.

Show and mark denote the acts of conscious or unconscious agents; point out, that of conscious agents only: INDICATE (v. Mark, sign), that of unconscious agents only: in this case, what shows, serves as an evidence or proof; what marks, serves to direct or guide; what indicates, serves as an index to point out. That shows the fallacy of forming schemes for the future; it marks the progress of time; it indicates decay.

The glowworm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his ineffectual fire.

SHAKESPEARE.

Weakness of counsels, fluctuation of opinion, and deficiency of spirit, marked his administration during an inglorious period of sixteen years.

COXE.

Above the steeples shines a plate,
That turns and turns, to indicate
From what point blows the weather.

COWPER.

In an extended moral application they preserve the same distinction; to show is to prove in a general way that a thing is or will be; to indicate is to show or point out in a particular manner that a thing is.

That strengthens our argument. Exceptio probat regulam. Some being found, shows that if all remained many would be found.

JOHNSON.

Amidst this wreck of human nature, traces still remain which indicate its author.

BLAIR.

TO SHOW, EXHIBIT, DISPLAY.

To SHOW (v. To show) is here, as before, the generic term; to EXHIBIT (v. To give) and DISPLAY, in French de-ployer, in all probability changed from the Latin plico, signifying to unfold or set forth to view, are specific: they may all designate the acts either of persons or things: the first, however, does this either in the proper or the improper sense; the latter two rather in the improper sense. To show is an indefinite action applied to every object: things are shown for purposes of convenience; as one shows a book to a friend: exhibit is applied to matters that are extraordinary or unusual; things are exhibited to attract notice; as to exhibit flowers or animals: we show to one or many; we exhibit or display in as public a manner, and to as great numbers, as possible; as to show the marks to the by-standers; to exhibit a figure upon a pole; to display one's finery.

Signor Reenpero, who obligingly engages to be our cicerone, has shown us some curious remains of antiquity.

BRYDENE.

If any claim redress of injustice, they should exhibit their petition in the street.

SHAKESPEARE.

They are all couched in a pit with their lights put out, which at the very time of our meeting they will at once display to the night.

SHAKESPEARE.

They admit of the same distinction when applied to moral objects: we may show courage, dislike, or any other affection; exhibit skill, prowess, etc., in the field of battle; display heroism, and whatever may shine forth.

The courage he had showed in opposing ship-money raised his reputation to a great height.

CLARENDON.

He has no power of assuming that dignity or elegance, which some who have little of either in common life can exhibit on the stage.

JOHNSON.

Which interwoven Britons seem to raise,
And show the triumph that their shame displays.

DRYDEN.

When said of things, they differ principally in the manner or degree of clearness with which the thing appears to present itself to view: to show is, as before, altogether indefinite, and implies simply to bring to view; exhibit implies to bring inherent properties to light, that is, apparently by a process; to display is to set forth so as to strike the eye: the windows on a frosty morning will show the state of the weather; experiments with the air-pump exhibit the many wonderful and interesting properties of air; the beauties of the creation are peculiarly displayed in the spring season.

Then let us fall, but fall amid our foes,
Despair of life the means of living shows.

DRYDEN.

The world has ever been a great theatre, exhibiting the same repeated scene of the follies of men.

BLAIR.

Thou Heav'n's alternate beauty canst display,
The blush of morning and the Milky Way.

DRYDEN.

SHOW, EXHIBITION, REPRESENTATION, SIGHT, SPECTACLE.

SHOW signifies the thing shown (v. To show); EXHIBITION signifies the thing exhibited (v. To show); REPRESENTATION, the thing represented; SIGHT, the thing to be seen; and SPECTACLE, from the Latin specto, stands for the thing to be beheld.

Show is here, as in the former article, the most general term. Everything set forth to view is shown; and, if set forth for the amusement of others, it is a show. This is the common idea included in the terms exhibition and representation: but show is a term of vulgar meaning and application; the others have a higher use and signification. The show consists of that which merely pleases the eye; it is not a matter either of taste or art, but merely of curiosity: an exhibition, on the contrary, presents some effort of talent or some work of genius; and a representation sets forth the image or imitation of something by the power of art: hence we speak of a show of wild beasts; an exhibition of paintings; and a theatrical representation. The conjuror makes a show of his tricks at a fair to the wonder of the gazing multitude; the artist makes an exhibition of his works; representations of men and manners are given on the stage.

Charm'd with the wonders of the show,

On ev'ry side, above, below,

She now of this or that inquires,

What least was understood admires.

GAY.

Copley's picture of Lord Chatham's death is an exhibition of itself.

BRATTLE.

There are many virtues which in their own nature are incapable of any outward representation.

ADDISON.

Shows, exhibitions, and representations are presented by some one to the view of others; sights and spectacles present themselves to view. Sight, like show, is a vulgar term; and spectacle the nobler term. Whatever is to be seen to excite notice is a sight, in which general sense it would comprehend every show, but in its particular sense it includes only that which casually offers itself to view: a spectacle, on the contrary, is that species of sight which has something in it to interest either the heart or the head of the observer: processions, reviews, sports, and the like, are sights; but battles, bull-fights, or public games of any description, are spectacles, which interest, but shock the feelings.

Their various arms afford a pleasing sight.

DRYDEN.

The weary Britons, whose warrable youth
Was by Maximilian lately led away,

Were to those pagans made an open pray,

And daily spectacle of sad decay.

SPENSER.

SHOW, OUTSIDE, APPEARANCE, SEMBLANCE.

WHERE there is SHOW (v. To show) there must be OUTSIDE and APPEARANCE; but there may be the last without the former. The term show always denotes an action, and refers to some person or thing as agent; but the outside may be merely the passive quality of some thing. We speak, therefore, of a thing as mere show, to signify that what is shown is all that exists; and in this sense it may be termed mere outside, as consisting only of what is on the outside. In describing a house, however, we speak of its outside, and not of its show; as also of the outside of a book, and not of the show. Appearance denotes an action as well as show; but the former is the act of an unconscious agent, the latter of one that is conscious and voluntary: the appearance presents itself to the view; the show is purposely presented to view. A person makes a show so as to be seen by others; his appearance is that which shows itself in him. To look only to show, or to be concerned for show only, signifies to be concerned for that only which will attract notice; to look only to the outside signifies to be concerned only for that which may be seen in a thing, to the disregard of that which is not seen: to look only to appearances signifies the same as the former, except that outside is said in the proper sense of that which literally strikes the eye; but appearances extend to a man's conduct, and whatever may affect his reputation.

You'll find the friendship of the world is show,
Mere outward show. SAVAGE.

The greater part of men behold nothing more than the rotation of human affairs. This is only the outside of things. BLAIR.

Every accusation against persons of rank was heard with pleasure (by James I. of Scotland).
Every appearance of guilt was examined with rigor. ROBERTSON.

SEMBLANCE or seeming (v. To seem) always conveys the idea of an unreal appearance, or at least is contrasted with that which is real; he who only wears the semblance of friendship would be ill deserving the confidence of a friend.

But man, the wildest beast of prey,
Wears friendship's semblance to betray. MOORE.

SHOW, PARADE, OSTENTATION.

THESE terms are synonymous when they imply abstract actions: SHOW is here, as in the preceding article, taken in the vulgar sense; OSTENTATION and PARADE include the idea of something particular. Show consists simply in letting that be seen which a person might if he pleased keep out of view; parade is a studious effort to show, it is that which serves to attract notice: in this manner a person may make a show of his equipage or furniture, who sets it out to be seen; he makes a parade of his wealth if he sets it forth with any artifice or formality so as to make it more striking. Ostentation is, like parade, a studied show, but it refers rather to the intention of the person than to the method by which the show is made. Show and parade may, therefore, according to the circumstances, serve the purpose of ostentation. A person makes a show of his liberality, or a parade of his gifts, and thus he gratifies his ostentation.

'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,
Nor customary suits of solemn black,
Nor the dejected 'havior of the visage,
Together with all forms, modes, shows of grief,
That can denote me truly sad. SHAKESPEARE.
Be rich, but of your wealth make no parade. SWIFT.

His charity to those in want, and bounty to learned men, was extraordinary, but without ostentation. BURNET.

When taken in reference to things, the show is opposed to the reality; it is that which shows itself: the parade and ostentation is that which is ceremonious and artificial: the former in respect to what strikes the eye, and the latter in respect to what strikes the mind.

Great in themselves,
They smile superior of external show. SOMERVILLE.

It was not in the mere parade of royalty that the Mexican potentates exhibited their power. ROBERTSON.

We are dazzled with the splendor of titles, the ostentation of learning, and the noise of victories. SPECTATOR.

SHOWY, GAUDY, GAY.

SHOWY, having or being full of show (v. Show, outside), is mostly an epithet of dispraise; that which is showy has seldom anything to deserve notice beyond that which catches the eye: GAUDY, from the Latin gaudeo, to rejoice, signifies literally full of joy; and is applied figuratively to the exterior of objects, but with the annexed bad idea of being striking to an excess: GAY, on the contrary, which is only a contraction of gaudy, is used in the same sense as an epithet of praise. Some things may be showy, and in their nature properly so; thus the tail of a peacock is showy: artificial objects may likewise be showy, but they will not be preferred by persons of taste: that which is gaudy is always artificial, and is always chosen by the vain, the vulgar, and the ignorant; a maid-servant will bedizen herself with gaudy-colored ribbons. That which is gay is either nature itself, or nature imitated in the best manner: spring is a gay season, and flowers are its gayest accompaniments.

Men of warm imaginations neglect solid and substantial happiness for what is showy and superficial. ADDISON.

The gaudy, babbling, and remorseful day
Is crept into the bosom of the sea. SHAKESPEARE.

Jocund day
Upon the mountain-tops sits gayly dressed. SHAKESPEARE.

SICK, SICKLY, DISEASED, MORBID.

SICK denotes a partial state, SICKLY a permanent state, of the body, a proneness to be sick: he who is sick may be made well; but he who is sickly is seldom really well: all persons are liable to be sick, though few have the misfortune to be sickly: a person may be sick from the effect of cold, violent exercise, and the like; but he is sickly only from constitution.

For aught I see, they are as sick that surfeit
With too much, as they that starve with nothing. SHAKESPEARE.

Both Homer and Virgil were of a very delicate and sickly constitution. WALSH.

Sickly expresses a permanent state of indisposition unless otherwise qualified; but DISEASED expresses a violent state of derangement without specifying its duration; it may be for a time only, or for a permanency: the person, or his constitution, is sickly; the person, or his frame, or particular parts, as his lungs, his inside, his brain, and the like, may be diseased.

Would we know what health and ease are worth, let us ask one that is sickly and in pain, and we have the price. GREW.

They should choose such places as were open to the favorable aspects and influence of the heavens, where there was a well-tempered soil, clear air, pure springs of water, that diseased persons coming from unhealthy places might obtain recovery. BATA.

Sick, sickly, and diseased may all be used in a moral application; MORBID is used in no other, except in a technical sense. Sick denotes a partial state, as before, namely, a state of disgust, and is always associated with the object of the sickness; we are sick of turbulent enjoyments, and seek for tranquillity: sickly and morbid are applied to the habitual state of the feelings or character; a sickly sentimentality, a morbid sensibility: diseased is applied in general to individuals or communities, to persons or to things; a person's mind is in a diseased state when it is under the influence of corrupt passions or principles; society is in a diseased state when it is overgrown with wealth and luxury.

He was not so sick of his master as of his work. L'ESTRANGE.

There affectation, with a sickly mien,
Shows in her cheek the roses of eighteen. POPE.

For a mind diseased with vain longings after unattainable advantages, no medicine can be prescribed. JOHNSON.

While the distempers of a relaxed fibre prognosticate all the morbid force of convulsion in the body of the state, the steadiness of the physician is overpowered by the very aspect of the disease. BURKE.

SICKNESS, ILLNESS, INDISPOSITION.

SICKNESS denotes the state of being sick (v. Sick): ILLNESS that of being ill (v. Evil): INDISPOSITION that of being not well disposed. Sickness denotes the state generally or particularly; illness denotes it particularly: we speak of sickness as opposed to good health; in sickness or in health; but of the illness of a particular person: when sickness is said of the individual, it designates a protracted state; a person may be said to have much sickness in his family. Illness denotes only a particular or partial sickness: a person is said to have had an illness at this or that time, in this or that place, for this or that period. Indisposition is a slight illness, such a one as is capable of deranging him either in his enjoyments or in his business; colds are the ordinary causes of indisposition.

Sickness is a sort of earthly old age; it teaches us a diffidence in our earthly state. POPE.

This is the first letter that I have ventured upon, which will be written, I fear, vacillantis literis; as Tully says, Tyro's letters were after his recovery from an illness. ARTHUR.

It is not, as you conceive, an indisposition of body, but the mind's disease. FORD.

SIGN, SIGNAL.

SIGN and SIGNAL are both derived from the same source (v. Mark, sign), and the latter is but a species of the former. The sign enables us to recognize an object; it is, therefore, sometimes natural: signal serves to give warning; it is always arbitrary. The movements which are visible in the countenance are commonly the signs of what passes in the heart; the beat of the drum is the signal for soldiers to repair to their post. We converse with those who are present by signs; we make ourselves understood by those who are at a distance by means of signals.

The nod that ratifies the will divine,
The faithful, fix'd, irrevocable sign,
This seals thy suit.

POPE.

Then first the trembling earth the signal gave,
And flashing fires enlighten all the cave.

DRYDEN.

SIGNAL, MEMORABLE.

SIGNAL signifies serving as a sign, MEMORABLE signifies worthy to be remembered. They both express the idea of extraordinary, or being distinguished from every other thing: whatever is signal deserves to be stamped on the mind, and to serve as a sign of some property or characteristic; whatever is memorable impresses upon the memory, and refuses to be forgotten: the former applies to the moral character; the latter to events and times: the Scriptures furnish us with many signal instances of God's vengeance against impenitent sinners, as also of his favor toward those who obey his will; the Reformation is a memorable event in the annals of ecclesiastical history.

We find, in the Acts of the Apostles, not only no opposition to Christianity from the Pharisees, but several signal occasions in which they assisted its first teachers.

WOTTON.

That such deliverances are actually afforded, those three memorable examples of Abimelech, Esau, and Balaam sufficiently demonstrate.

SOUTH.

TO SIGNALIZE, DISTINGUISH.

To SIGNALIZE, or make one's self a sign of anything, is a much stronger term than simply to DISTINGUISH; it is in the power of many to do the latter, but few only have the power of effecting the former: the English have always signalized themselves for their unconquerable valor in battle; there is no nation that has not distinguished itself, at some period or another, in war.

The knight of La Mancha gravely recounts to his companion the adventures by which he is to signalise himself.

JOHNSON.

The valued file
Distinguishes the swift, the slow, the subtle.

SHAKESPEARE.

SIGNIFICANT, EXPRESSIVE.

THE SIGNIFICANT is that which serves as a sign; the EXPRESSIVE is that which speaks out or declares; the latter is therefore a stronger term than the former: a look is significant when it is made to express an idea that passes in the mind; but it is expressive when it is made to express a feeling of the whole mind or heart: looks are but occasionally significant, but the countenance may be habitually expressive. Significant is applied in an indifferent sense, according to the nature of the thing signified; but expressive is always applied to that which is good: a significant look may convey a very bad idea; but an expressive countenance always expresses good feeling.

I could not help giving my friend the merchant a significant look upon this occasion.

CUMBERLAND.

Through her expressive eyes her soul distinctly spoke.

LITTLETON.

The distinction between these words is the same when applied to things as to persons: a word is significant of whatever it is made to signify, but a word is expressive according to the force with which it conveys an idea. The term significant, in this case, simply explains the nature; but the epithet expressive characterizes it as something good: technical terms are significant only of the precise ideas which belong to the art; most languages have some terms which are peculiarly expressive, and consequently adapted for poetry.

Common life is full of this kind of significant expressions, by knocking, beckoning, frowning, and pointing.

HOLDER.

The English, madam, particularly what we call the plain English, is a very copious and expressive language.

RICHARDSON.

SIGNIFICATION, MEANING, IMPORT,
SENSE.

THE SIGNIFICATION (v. To express) is that which is signified to another; the MEANING is that which the person means to express: this latter word, therefore, is properly used in connection with the person meaning.

A lie consists in this, that it is a false signification knowingly and voluntarily used. SOUTH.

When beyond her expectation I hit upon her meaning, I can perceive a sudden cloud of disappointment spread over her face. JOHNSON.

The signification of a word is that which it is made to signify, and the meaning is that which it is meant to express: in this sense, therefore, we may indifferently say the proper, improper, metaphorical, general, etc., signification or meaning of words; but, in reference to individuals, meaning is more proper than signification, as to convey a meaning, to attach a meaning to a word, and not to convey or attach a signification.

It was very frequent to dedicate their enemy's armor and hang it in their temples, but the Lacedæmonians were forbidden this custom, which perhaps may be the meaning of Cleomenes's reply.

On the other hand, it is more appropriate to say a literal signification than a literal meaning.

The use of the word minister is brought down to the literal signification of it, a servant; for now to serve and to minister, servile and ministerial, are terms equivalent. SOUTH.

There is also this further distinction between signify and mean, that the latter is applied in its proper sense to things as well as words.

What means this shouting? SHAKESPEARE.

IMPORT, from im or in and porto, to carry, signifying that which is carried or conveyed to the understanding, is most allied to signification, inasmuch as it is applied to single words. The signification may include the whole or any part of what is understood by a word; the import is the whole that is comprehended under a word. The signification of words may be learned by definition, but their full import can be collected only from examples.

To draw near to God is an expression of awful and mysterious import. BLAIR.

SENSE (v. Feeling), signifying that which is perceived by the senses, is most nearly allied to the word meaning, inasmuch as they both refer to the mind of the individual; but the sense being that which is rational and consistent with sense, is that which is taken or admitted abstractedly.

Satan, in tempting our Lord, separated the word "stone" from its metaphorical meaning, to change the sense of the promise and promote his own malicious intentions. JOHNS.

It is no hard matter for witty men to put perverse senses on Scripture to favor their heretical doctrines. SHAKESPEARE.

TO SIGNIFY, IMPLY.

SIGNIFY, v. To express. IMPLY, from the Latin implico, to fold in, signifies to fold or involve an idea in any object.

These terms may be employed either as respects actions or words. In the first case signify is the act of the person making known by means of a sign, as we signify our approbation by a look; imply marks the value or force of the action; our assent is implied in our silence.

When applied to words or marks, signify denotes the positive and established act of the thing; imply is its relative act: a word signifies whatever it is made literally to stand for; it implies that which it stands for figuratively or morally. The term house signifies that which is constructed for a dwelling; the term residence implies something superior to a house. A cross, thus, +, signifies addition in arithmetic or algebra; a long stroke, thus —, with a break in the text of a work, implies that the whole sentence is not completed. It frequently happens that words which signify nothing particular in themselves may be made to imply a great deal by the tone, the manner, and the connection.

Words signify not immediately and primarily things themselves, but the conceptions of the mind concerning things. SOUTH.

Pleasure implies a proportion and agreement to the respective states and conditions of men. SOUTH.

TO SIGNIFY, AVAIL.

SIGNIFY (v. To signify) is here employed with regard to events of life, and their relative importance. AVAIL (v. To avail) is never used otherwise. That which a thing signifies is what it contains; if it signifies nothing, it contains nothing, and is worth nothing; if it signifies much, it contains much, or is worth much. That which avails produces; if it avails nothing, it produces nothing, is of no use; if it avails much, it produces or is worth much. We consider the end as to its signification, and the means as to their avail. Although it is of little or no signification to a man what becomes of his remains, yet no one can be reconciled to the idea of leaving them to be exposed to contempt; words are but too often of little avail to curb the unruly wills of children.

As for wonders, what signifieth telling us of them? CUMBERLAND.

What avail a parcel of statutes against gaming, when they who make them conspire together for the infraction of them? CUMBERLAND.

SILENCE, TACITURNITY.

THE Latins have the two verbs sileo and taceo: the former of which is interpreted by some to signify to cease to speak; and the latter not to begin to speak; others maintain the direct contrary. According to the present use of the words, SILENCE expresses less than TACITURNITY: the silent man seldom speaks, the taciturn man will not speak at all. The Latins designated the most profound silence by the epithet of tacitura silentia.

Taciturnity is always of some duration, arising either from necessity or from a particular frame of mind.

Pythagoras enjoined his scholars an absolute silence for a long novitiate. I am far from approving such a taciturnity; but I highly approve the end and intent of Pythagoras's injunction. EARL OF CHATHAM.

I have talked more already than I have formerly done in three visits. You remember my taciturnity, never to be forgotten by those who knew me. COWPER.

Silence always supposes something occasional that is adopted to suit the convenience of the party.

Silence is the perfectest herald of joy: I were but little happy, if I could say how much. SHAKESPEARE.

SILENT, TACIT.

SILENT (v. Silence) characterizes either the person or the thing: a person is silent as opposed to one that talks; a place is silent as opposed to one that is noisy. TACIT (v. Silence) characterizes only the act of the person; a person gives a tacit consent, or there was a tacit agreement between the parties.

The people beheld the violence of their conduct in silent fright, internally disapproving, yet not daring to avow their detestation. GOLDSMITH.

In elective governments there is a tacit covenant that the king of their own making shall make his makers princes. L'ESTRANGE.

SILENT, DUMB, MUTE, SPEECHLESS.

NOT speaking is the common idea included in the signification of these terms, which differ either in the cause or the circumstance: SILENT (v. Silence) is altogether an indefinite and general term, expressing little more than the common idea. We may be silent because we will not speak, or we may be silent because we cannot speak; but in distinction from the other terms it is always employed in the former case. DUMB, from the German dumm, stupid or idiotic, denotes a physical incapacity to speak: hence persons are said to be born dumb; they may likewise be dumb from temporary physical causes, as from grief, shame, and the like, a person may be struck dumb. MUTE, in Latin mutus, Greek μωτος, from μωω, to shut, signifies a shut mouth, a temporary disability to speak from arbitrary and incidental causes: hence the office of mutes, or of persons who engage not to speak for a certain time; and, in like manner, persons are said to be mute who dare not give utterance to their thoughts.

But silent, breathing rage, resolv'd and skill'd
By mutual aid to fix a doubtful field,
Swift march the Greeks. POPE.

The truth of it is, half the great talkers in the nation would be struck dumb were this fountain of discourse (party lies) dried up. ADDISON.

Long mute he stood, and, leaning on his staff,
His wonder witness'd with an idiot laugh. DRYDEN.

SPEECHLESS, or void of speech, denotes a physical incapacity to speak from incidental causes; as when a person falls down speechless in an apoplectic fit, or in consequence of a violent contusion.

But who can paint the lover as he stood,
Pierc'd by severe amazement, hating life,
Speechless, and fix'd in all the death of woe? THOMSON.

The terms silent, mute, and dumb are also applied to things as well as persons, the former two in the sense of not sending forth a sound; as the silent grove, a mute tongue, or a mute letter: dumb, in the sense of being without words; as dumb show.

And just before the confines of the wood,
The gliding Lethe leads her silent flood.

DRYDEN.

'Tis listening fear and dumb amazement all.

THOMSON.

Mute was his tongue, and upright stood his hair.

DRYDEN.

SIMILE, SIMILITUDE, COMPARISON.

SIMILE and SIMILITUDE are both drawn from the Latin similis, like: the former signifying the thing that is like, the latter either the thing that is like, or the quality of being like: in the former sense only it is to be compared with simile, when employed as a figure of speech or thought; everything is a simile which associates objects together on account of any real or supposed likeness between them; but a similitude signifies a prolonged or continued simile. The latter may be expressed in a few words, as when we say the godlike Achilles; but the former enters into minute circumstances of COMPARISON, as when Homer compares any of his heroes fighting and defending themselves against multitudes to lions who are attacked by dogs and men. Every simile is more or less a comparison, but every comparison is not a simile: the latter compares things only as far as they are alike, but the former extends to those things which are different: in this manner, there may be a comparison between large things and small, although there can be no good simile.

There are also several noble similes and allusions in the first book of Paradise Lost.

ADDISON.

Such as have a natural bent to solitude (to carry on the former similitude) are like waters which may be forced into fountains.

Pope.

Your image of worshipping once a year in a certain place, in imitation of the Jews, is but a comparison and simile non est idem.

JOHNSON.

SIMPLE, SINGLE, SINGULAR.

SIMPLE, in Latin simplex or sine plic, without a fold, is opposed to the complex, which has many folds, or to the compound, which has several parts involved or connected with each other. SINGLE and SINGULAR (v. One) are opposed, one to double, and the other to multifarious. We may speak of a simple circumstance as independent of anything; of a single instance or circumstance as unaccompanied by any other; and a singular instance as one that rarely has its like. In the moral application to the person, simplicity, as far as it is opposed to duplicity in the heart, can never be excessive: but when it lies in the head, so that it cannot penetrate the folds and doublings of other persons, it is a fault. Singleness of heart and intention is that species of simplicity which is altogether to be admired: singularity may be either good or bad according to circumstances; to be singular in virtue is to be truly good; but to be singular in manner is affectation, which is at variance with genuine simplicity, if not directly opposed to it.

Nothing extraneous must cleave to the eye in the act of seeing; its bare object must be as naked as truth, as simple and unmixed as sincerity.

SOUTH.

Mankind with other animals compare,
Single, how weak and impotent they are!

JENYNS.

From the union of the crowns to the Revolution in 1688, Scotland was placed in a political situation the most singular and most unhappy.

ROBERTSON.

SIMPLE, SILLY, FOOLISH.

THE SIMPLE (v. Simple), when applied to the understanding, implies such a contracted power as is incapable of combination; SILLY, which is but a variation of simple, and FOOLISH, i. e., like a fool, rise in sense upon the former, signifying either the perversion or the total deficiency of understanding; the behavior of a person may be silly who from any excess of feeling loses his sense of propriety; the conduct of a person will be foolish who has no judgment to direct himself. Country people may be simple owing to their want of knowledge; children will be silly in company if they have too much liberty given to them; there are some persons who never acquire wisdom enough to prevent them from committing foolish errors.

And had the simple natives
 Obserr'd his sage advice,
 Their wealth and fame some years ago
 Had reach'd above the skies.

SWIFT.

Two gods a stilly woman have undone.

DRYDEN.

Virgil justly thought it a foolish figure for a grave man to be overtaken by death, while he was weighing the cadence of words and measuring verses.

WALSH.

SIMULATION, DISSIMULATION.

SIMULATION, from similis, is the making one's self like what one is not; and DISSIMULATION, from dissimilis, unlike, is the making one's self appear unlike what one really is. The hypocrite puts on the semblance of virtue to recommend himself to the virtuous; the disssembler conceals his vices when he wants to gain the simple or ignorant to his side.

Simulation is a pretence of what is not, and dissimulation is a concealment of what is.

TATLER.

He would never suffer any man to depart from him with an opinion that he was inclined to gratify him, when in truth he was not holding that dissimulation to be the worst sort of lying.

CLARENDON.

SINCERE, HONEST, TRUE, PLAIN.

SINCERE (v. Candid) is here the most comprehensive term: HONEST (v. Honesty), TRUE, and PLAIN (v. Even) are but modes of sincerity.

Sincerity is a fundamental characteristic of the person; honesty is but a part of sincerity, it denotes simply the absence of intentional or fraudulent concealment; we look for a sincere friend to tell us everything; we look for an honest companion who will speak without disguise; truth is a characteristic of sincerity, for a sincere friend is a true friend; but sincerity is, properly speaking, only a mode of truth. Sincere and honest are personal characteristics; true is a characteristic of the thing, as a sincere man, an honest confession, a true statement.

The more sincere you are, the better it will fare with you at the great day of account. In the mean time give us leave to be sincere too in condemning heartily what we disapprove.

WATERLAND.

He never applies to the passions or prejudices of his audience: when they listen with attention and honest minds, he never fails of carrying his point.

ADDISON.

Fear not my truth; the moral of my wit
 Is plain and true.

SHAKESPEARE.

A sincere man must needs be plain, because plainness consists in an unvarnished style; and the sincere man will always adopt that mode of speech which expresses his sentiments most truly; but a person may be occasionally plain in his speech who is not so from sincerity. The plain, whether it respects the language or the conduct, is that which is divested of everything extraneous or artificial, and so far plainness is an auxiliary to truth, by enabling the truth to be better seen.

Poetical ornaments destroy that character of truth and plainness which ought to characterize history.

REYNOLDS.

SITUATION, CONDITION, STATE, PRE-DICAMENT, FLIGHT, CASE.

SITUATION (v. Place) is said generally of objects as they respect others; CONDITION (v. Condition), as they respect themselves: our situation consists of those external circumstances in respect of property, honor, liberty, and the like, which affect our standing in society generally. Whatever affects our person immediately is our condition: a person who is unable to pay a sum of money to save himself from a prison is in a bad situation: a traveller who is left in a ditch robbed and wounded is in a bad condition.

The man who has a character of his own is little changed by varying his situation.

MRS. MONTAGUE.

It is indeed not easy to prescribe a successful manner of approach to the distressed or necessitous, whose condition subjects every kind of behavior equally to miscarriage.

JOHNSON.

Situation and condition are said of that which is contingent and changeable, the latter still more so than the former; STATE, from sto, signifying that position in which one stands, is said of that which is comparatively stable or established. A tradesman is in a good situation who is in the way of carrying on a good trade: his affairs are in a good state if he is enabled to answer every demand and to keep up his credit. Hence it is that we speak of the state of health and the state of the mind, not the situation or condition, because the body and mind are considered as to their general frame, and not as to any relative or particular circumstances; so likewise a state of infancy, a state of guilt, a state of innocence, and the like; but not either a situation or a condition.

Your situation is an odd one; the duchess is your treasurer, and Mr. Pope tells me you are the duke's. SWIRT.

Patience itself is one virtue by which we are prepared for that state in which evil shall be no more. JOHNSON.

When speaking of bodies, there is the same distinction in the terms as in regard to individuals. An army may be either in a situation, a condition, or a state. An army that is on service may be in a critical situation with respect to the enemy and its own comparative weakness; it may be in a deplorable condition if it stand in need of provisions and necessities: an army that is at home will be in a good or bad state, according to the regulations of the commander-in-chief. Of a prince who is threatened with invasion from foreign enemies, and with a rebellion from his subjects, we should not say that his condition, but his situation, was critical. Of a prince, however, who like Alfred was obliged to fly, and to seek safety in disguise and poverty, we should speak of his hard condition: the state of a prince cannot be spoken of, but the state of his affairs and government may; hence, likewise, state may with most propriety be said of a nation: but situation seldom, unless in respect to other nations, and condition never. On the other hand, when speaking of the poor, we seldom employ the term situation, because they are seldom considered as a body in relation to other bodies: we mostly speak of their condition as better or worse, according as they have more or less of the comforts of life; and of their state as regards their moral habits.

No situation could be more unfavorable than that in which it (the army) found itself. GOLDSMITH.

And oh! what man's condition can be worse Than his whom plenty starves, and blessings curse?

The beggars but a common fate deplore,
The rich poor man's emphatically poor. COWLEY.

Relate what Latium was;
Declare the past and present state of things. DRYDEN.

These terms may likewise be applied to inanimate objects; and, upon the same grounds, a house is in a good situation as respects the surrounding objects; it is in a good or bad condition as respects the painting, and exterior altogether; it is in a bad state as respects the beams, plaster, roof, and interior structure altogether. The hand of a watch is in a different situation every hour; the watch itself may be in a bad condition if the wheels are clogged with dirt; but in a good state if the works are altogether sound and fit for service.

We have been admiring the wonderful strength of this place both by nature and art; it is certainly the happiest situation that can be imagined. BAYDENE.

Six of the houses of her ancestors were in ruins. The church of Skipton, in consequence of the damage it had sustained during the siege of the castle, was in little better condition.

There are many remains of antiquity in this city, indeed most of them are in a very ruinous state. WHITAKER.

Situation and condition are either permanent or temporary. The PREDICAMENT, from the Latin predico, to assert or declare, signifies the committing one's self by an assertion; and, when applied to circumstances, it expresses a temporary embarrassed situation occasioned by an act of one's own: hence we always speak of bringing ourselves into a predicament. PLIGHT, contracted from the Latin placatus, participle of placo, to fold, signifies any circumstance in which one is disagreeably entangled; and CASE (v. Case) signifies anything which may befall us, or into which we fall, mostly, though not necessarily, contrary to our inclination. Those latter two terms, therefore, denote a species of temporary condition, for they both express that which happens to the object itself, without reference to any other. A person is in an unpleasant situation who is shut up in a stage-coach with disagreeable company. He is in an awkward predicament when, in attempting to please one friend, he displeases another. He may be in a wretched plight if he is overturned in a stage at night, and at a distance from any habitation. He will be in evil case if he is compelled to put up with a spare and poor diet.

Satan beheld their plight,
And to his mates thus in derision call'd.

MILTON.

The offender's life lies in the mercy
Of the duke only, 'gainst all other voice,
In which predicament I say thou stand'st.

SHAKESPEARE.

Our case is like that of a traveller upon the Alps who should fancy that the top of the next hill must end his journey because it terminates his prospect.

ADDISON.

SIZE, MAGNITUDE, GREATNESS, BULK.

SIZE, from the Latin cisus and cardo,
to cut, signifying that which is cut or framed according to a certain proportion,
is a general term including all manner
of dimension or measurement; MAGNI-
TITUDE, from the Latin magnitudo, answering literally to the English word GREAT-NESS, is employed in science or in an abstract sense to denote some specific measurement; greatness is an unscientific term applied in the same sense to objects in general: size is indefinite, it never characterizes anything either as large or small; but magnitude and greatness always suppose something great; and BULK (v. Bulky) denotes a considerable degree of greatness: things which are diminutive in size will often have an extraordinary degree of beauty, or some other adventitious perfection to compensate the deficiency; astronomers have classed the stars according to their different magnitudes; greatness has been considered as one source of the sublime; bulk is that species of greatness which destroys the symmetry, and consequently the beauty,
of objects.

Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size.

DRYDEN.

Then form'd the moon
Globose, and every magnitude of stars.

MILTON.

Awe is the first sentiment that rises in the mind at the view of God's greatness.

BLAIR.

His huge bulk on seven high volumes roll'd.

SKETCH, OUTLINES.

A SKETCH may form a whole; OUT-
LINES are but a part: the sketch may comprehend the outline, and some of the particulars; outline, as the term bespeaks, comprehend only the line on the exterior: the sketch, in drawing, may serve as a landscape, as it presents some of the features of a country; but the outline serve only as bounding lines, within which the sketch may be formed. So in the moral application, we speak of the sketches

of countries, characters, manners, and the like, which serve as a description; but of the *outline*s of a plan, of a work, a project, and the like, which serve as a basis on which the subordinate parts are to be formed: barbarous nations present us
with rude sketches of nature; an abridgment is little more than the *outline*s of a larger work.

In few, to close the whole,
The moral muse has shadow'd out a sketch
Of most our weakness needs believe or do.

YOUNG.

This is the outline of the fable.

SKIN, HIDE, PEEL, RIND.

SKIN, which is in German schin, Swedish skinn, Danish skind, probably connected with the Greek σκηνος, a tent or covering, is the term in most general use;
it is applicable both to human creatures
and to animals: HIDE, in Saxon hyd,
German haut, Low German huth, Latin
cutis, from the same root as the Greek κευθειν, to hide, cover, is used only for the skins of large animals: we speak of the skins of birds or insects; but of the hides
of oxen or horses and other animals,
which are to be separated from the body
and converted into leather. Skin is equally applied to the inanimate and the animate world; but PEEL, in German fell,
etc., Latin pellis, a skin, in Greek πελλος
or φλοιος, bark, which is from φλωω, to burst or crack, because bark is easily broken, and RIND, in all probability changed from round, signifying that which goes round and envelops, belong only to inanimate objects: the skin is generally said of that which is interior,
in distinction from the exterior, which is the peel: an orange has both its peel and its thin skin underneath; an apple, a pear, and the like, has a peel. The peel is a soft substance on the outside; the rind is generally interior, and of a harder substance: in regard to a stick, we speak of its peel and its inner skin; in regard to a tree, we speak of its bark and its rind: hence, likewise, the term rind
is applied to cheese, and other incrusted substances that envelop bodies.

The priest on skins of offerings takes his ease,
And nightly visions in his slumbers sees.

DRYDEN

The body is covered with a strong hide exactly resembling leather.

PENNANT.

On pippins' russet peel.

COWPER.

As when the stock and grafted twig combin'd,
Shoot up the same and wear a common rind.

ADDISON.

SLACK, LOOSE.

SLACK, in Saxon slacc, Low German slack, French lache, Latin laxus, and LOOSE, in Saxon laes, both from the Hebrew halats, to make free or loose, differ more in application than in sense: they are both opposed to that which is close bound; but slack is said only of that which is tied, or that with which anything is tied; while loose is said of any substances, the parts of which do not adhere closely: a rope is slack in opposition to the tight rope, which is stretched to its full extent; and in general cords or strings are said to be slack which fail in the requisite degree of tightness; but they are said to be loose in an indefinite manner, without conveying any collateral idea: thus the string of an instrument is denominated slack rather than loose; on the other hand, loose is said of many bodies to which the word slack cannot be applied: a garment is loose, but not slack; the leg of a table is loose, but not slack.

The vein in the arm is that which Aretæus commonly opens; and he gives a particular caution in this case to make a slack compression, for fear of producing a convulsion. ARBUTHNOT.

War wearied hath perform'd what war can do,
And to disorder'd rage let loose the reins.

MILTON.

In the moral application, that which admits of additional activity is denominated slack; and that which fails in consistency and close adherence is loose: trade is slack, or a person's zeal, etc., becomes slack; but an engagement is loose, and principles are loose.

Nor were it just, would he resume that shape,
That slack devotion should his thunder 'scape.

WALLER.

Nor fear that he who sits so loose to life,
Should too much shun its labors and its strife.

DENHAM.

TO SLANT, SLOPE.

SLANT is probably a variation of leaned, and SLOPE of slip, expressive of a sideward movement or direction: they are the same in sense, but different in application: slant is said of small bodies only; slope is said indifferently of all bodies, large and small: a book may be made to slant by lying in part on another book on a desk or a table; but a piece of ground is said to slope.

Justling or push'd with winds, rude in their shock,
Fire the slant lightning.

MILTON.

Its uplands sloping deck the mountain's side.

GOLDENITZ.

TO SLEEP, SLUMBER, DOZE, DROWSE, NAP.

SLEEP, in Saxon slæpan, low German slap, German schlaf, is supposed to come from the low German slap or slack, slack, because sleep denotes an entire relaxation of the physical frame. SLUMBER, in Saxon slumeran, etc., is but an intensive verb of schlammern, which is a variation from the preceding slæpan, etc. DOZE, in low German duzen, in all probability comes from the same root as the Latin dormio, to sleep. DROWSE is a variation of doze. NAP is in all probability a variation of nod and nod.

Sleep is the general term, which designates in an indefinite manner that state of the body to which all animated beings are subject at certain seasons in the course of nature; to slumber is to sleep lightly and softly; to doze is to incline to sleep, or to begin sleeping; to nap is to sleep for a time: every one who is not indisposed sleeps during the night; those who are accustomed to wake at a certain hour of the morning commonly slumber only after that time; there are many who, though they cannot sleep in a carriage, will yet be obliged to doze if they travel in the night; in hot climates the middle of the day is commonly chosen for a nap.

From carelessness it shall fall into a slumber,
and from a slumber it shall settle into a deep and long sleep.

SOUTH.

There was no sleeping under his roof; if he happened to doze a little, the jolly cobbler waked him.

L'ESTRANGE.

He drowzed upon his couch.

SOUTH.

And see! delighted, down he drops, secure
Of sweet refreshment, ease without annoy,
A luscious noonday nap.

SHERIDAN.

SLEEPY, DROWSY, LETHARGIC.

SLEEPY (v. To sleep) expresses either a temporary or a permanent state:

DROWSY, which comes from the low German druosen, and is a variation of dose (v. To sleep), expresses mostly a temporary state; LETHARGIC, from lethargy, in Latin lethargia, Greek ληθαργια, compounded of ληθη, forgetfulness, and αργος, swift, signifying a proneness to forgetfulness or sleep, describes a permanent or habitual state.

Sleepy, as a temporary state, expresses also what is natural or seasonable; drowsiness expresses an inclination to sleep at unseasonable hours; it is natural to be sleepy at the hour when we are accustomed to retire to rest; it is common to be drowsy when sitting still after dinner. Sleepiness, as a permanent state, is an infirmity to which some persons are subject constitutionally; lethargy is a disease with which people, otherwise the most wakeful, may be occasionally attacked.

She wak'd her sleepy crew,
And, rising hasty, took a short adieu. DAYDEN.
Drowsy am I, and yet can rarely sleep. SIDNEY.

Too long Jove lull'd us in lethargic charms,
But now in peals of thunder calls to arms. DAYDEN.

TO SLIP, SLIDE, GLIDE.

SLIP is in low German slipen, Latin labor, to slip, and libo, to pour, Greek λειβουαι, to pour down as water does, and the Hebrew salap, to turn aside. SLIDE is a variation of slip, and GLIDE of slide.

To slip is an involuntary, and slide a voluntary, motion: those who go on the ice in fear will slip; boys slide on the ice by way of amusement. To slip and slide are lateral movements of the feet; but to glide is the movement of the whole body, and just that easy motion which is made by slipping, sliding, flying, or swimming: a person glides along the surface of the ice when he slides; a vessel glides along through the water.

A skilful dancer slips willingly, and makes a seeming stumble that you may think him in great danger. DAYDEN.

Thessander bold, and Sthenelus their guide,
And dire Ulysses down the cable slide. DAYDEN.

And softly let the running waters glide. DAYDEN.

In the moral and figurative application, a person slips who commits unintentional errors; he slides into a course of life who wittingly, and yet without difficulty, falls into the practice and habits which are recommended; he glides through life if he pursues his course smoothly and without interruption.

Every one finds that many of the ideas which he desired to retain have irretrievably slipped away. JOHNSON.

Nor could they have slid into those brutish immoralities of life had they duly manured those first practical notions and dictates of right reason. SOUTH.

If one of mean affairs
May plod it in a week, why may not I Glide thither in a day? SHAKESPEARE.

SLOW, DILATORY, TARDY, TEDIOUS.

SLOW is doubtless connected with sloth and slide, which kind of motion when walking is the slowest and the laziest. DILATORY, from the Latin de-fero, dilatatus, to defer, signifies prone to defer. TARDY, from the Latin tardus, signifies literally slow. TEDIOUS, from the Latin tadium, weariness, signifies causing weariness.

Slow is a general and unqualified term applicable to the motion of any object, or to the motions and actions of persons in particular, and to their dispositions also; dilatory relates to the disposition only of persons: we are slow in what we are about; we are dilatory in setting about a thing. Slow is applied to corporeal or mental actions; a person may be slow in walking, or slow in conceiving; tardy is applicable to mental actions; we are tardy in our proceedings or our progress; we are tardy in making up accounts or in concluding a treaty. We may be slow with propriety or not, to our own inconvenience or that of others; when we are tedious we are always so improperly: "To be slow and sure" is a vulgar proverb, but a great truth; by this we do ourselves good, and inconvenience no one; but he who is tedious is slow to the annoyance of others: a prolix writer must always be tedious, for he keeps the reader long in suspense before he comes to the conclusion of a period.

The powers above are slow
In punishing, and should not we resemble them? DAYDEN.

A dilatory temper is unfit for a place of trust. ADDISON.

The swains and tardy neat-herds came, and last
Menaicas, wet with beating winter-mast.

DRYDEN.

Her sympathizing lover takes his stand
High on th' opponent bank, and ceaseless sings
The teditious time away.

THOMSON.

TO SMEAR, DAUB.

To SMEAR is literally to do over with smear, in Saxon smear, German schmeer, in Greek μυρο, a salve. To DAUB, from do and ub, über, over, signifies literally to do over with anything unseemly, or in an unsightly manner.

To smear in the literal sense is applied to such substances as may be rubbed like grease over a body; if said of grease itself, it may be proper, as coachmen smear the coach-wheels with tar or grease; but if said of anything else, it is an improper action, and tends to disfigure, as children smear their hands with ink, or smear their clothes with dirt. To smear and daub are both actions which tend to disfigure; but we smear by means of rubbing over; we daub by rubbing, throwing, or any way covering over: thus a child smears the window with his finger, or he daubs the wall with dirt.

Smear'd as she was with black Gorgonian blood,
The fury sprang above the Stygian flood.

DRYDEN.

He's honest, though daub'd with the dust of the mill.

CUNNINGHAM.

By a figurative application, smear is applied to bad writing, or whatever is soiled or contaminated, and daub to bad painting, or to whatever is executed coarsely or clumsily: indifferent writers who wish to excel are fond of retouching their letters until they make their performance a sad smear; bad artists, who are injudicious in the use of their pencil, load their paintings with color, and convert them into daubs.

Why had I not, with charitable hand,
Took up a beggar's issue at my gates?
Who, smear'd thus, and mir'd with infamy,
I might have said no part of it is mine.

SHAKESPEARE.

In truth the age demanded nothing correct,
nothing complete; capable of tasting the power of Dryden's numbers, and the majesty of Knel-ler's heads, it overlooked doggerel and daubing.

WALFORD.

SMELL, SCENT, ODOR, PERFUME, FRAGRANCE.

SMELL and melt are in all probability connected together, because smells arise from the evaporation of bodies. SCENT, changed from sent, comes from the Latin sentio, to perceive or feel. ODOR, in Latin odor, comes from oloo, in Greek ὀζω, to smell. PERFUME, compounded of per or pro, and fumo or fumus, a smoke or vapor, that is, the vapor that issues forth. FRAGRANCE, in Latin fragrantia, comes from fragro, anciently frago, that is, to perfume or smell like the fraga or strawberry.

Smell and scent are said either of that which receives, or that which gives the smell; the odor, the perfume, and fragrance, of that which communicates the smell. In the first case, smell is said generally of all living things without distinction; scent is said only of such animals as have this peculiar faculty of tracing objects by their smell: some persons have a much quicker smell than others, and some have an acuter smell of particular objects than they have of things in general: dogs are remarkable for their quickness of scent, by which they can trace their masters and other objects at an immense distance; other animals are gifted with this faculty to a surprising degree, which serves them as a means of defence against their enemies.

Next in the nostrils she doth use the smell;

As God the breath of life in them did give,
So makes he now his power in them to dwell,
To judge all airs, whereby we breathe and live.

DAVID.

Its (the dog's) scent is exquisite, when his nose is moist.

PENNAUT.

In the second case, smell and scent are compared with odor, perfume, and fragrance, either as respects the objects communicating the smell, or the nature of the smell which is communicated. Smell is indefinite in its sense, and universal in its application; scent, odor, perfume, and fragrance are species of smell: every object is said to smell which acts on the olfactory nerves; flowers, fruits, woods, earth, water, and the like, have a smell; scent is most commonly applied to the smell which proceeds from animal bodies; the odor is said of that which is artificial or extraneous; the perfume and fragrance of that which is natural: the burning of things produces an odor; the perfume and fragrance arises from flowers or sweet-smelling herbs, spices, and the like. The terms smell and odor do not specify the exact nature of that which issues from bodies; they may both be either pleasant or unpleasant; but smell, if taken in certain connections, signifies a bad smell, and odor signifies that which is sweet: meat which is kept too long will have a smell, that is, of course, a bad smell; the odors from a sacrifice are acceptable, that is, the sweet odors ascend to heaven. Perfume is properly a wide-spreading smell, and when taken without any epithet signifies a pleasant smell; fragrance never signifies anything but what is good; it is the sweetest and most powerful perfume: the perfume from flowers and shrubs is as grateful to one sense as their colors and conformation are to the other; the fragrance from groves of myrtle and orange trees surpasses the beauty of their fruits or foliage.

All sweet smells have joined with them some earthy or crude odors. BACON.

Then curses his conspiring feet, whose acents Betrays that safety which their swiftness lent. DENHAM.

So flowers are gathered to adorn a grave,
To lose their freshness among bones and rottenness,
And have their odors stifled in the dust. ROWE.

At last a soft and solemn breathing sound
Rose like a steam of rich distilled perfumes. MILTON.

Soft vernal fragrance clothed the flow'ring earth. MASON.

TO SOAK, DRENCH, STEEP.

SOAK is a variation of suck. DRENCH is a variation of drink. STEEP, in Saxon steapan, etc., from the Hebrew satep, signifies to overflow or overwhelm.

The idea of communicating or receiving a liquid is common to these terms. A person's clothes are soaked in rain when the water has penetrated every thread; he himself is drenched in the rain when it has penetrated, as it were, his very body; drench, therefore, in this case only expresses the idea of soak in a stronger manner. To steep is a species of soaking employed as an artificial process; to soak is, however, a permanent action by which hard things are rendered soft; to steep is a temporary action by which soft bodies become penetrated with a liquid: thus salt meat requires to be soaked; fruits are steeped in brandy.

Drill'd through the sandy stratum, every way
The waters with the sandy stratum rise,
And clear and sweeten as they soak along. THOMSON.

And deck with fruitful trees the fields around,
And with refreshing waters drench the ground. DRYDEN.

O sleep, O gentle sleep,
Nature's soft nurse! how have I frighted thee,
That thou no more wilt weigh my eyelids down,
And sleep my senses in forgetfulness? SHAKESPEARE.

SOBER, GRAVE.

SOBER (v. Abstinent) expresses the absence of all exhilaration of spirits: GRAVE (v. Grave) expresses a weight in the intellectual operations which makes them proceed slowly. Sobriety is therefore a more natural and ordinary state for the human mind than gravity: it behooves every man to be sober in all situations; but those who fill the most important stations of life must be grave. Even in our pleasures we may observe sobriety, which keeps us from every unseemly ebullition of mirth; but on particular occasions, where the importance of the subject ought to weigh on the mind, it becomes us to be grave. At a feast we have need of sobriety; at a funeral we have need of gravity.

Now came still evening on, and twilight gray
Had in her sober liv'ry all things clad. MILTON.

So spake the cherub, and his graves rebuke,
Severe in youthful beauty, added grace
Invincible. MILTON.

Sobriety extends to many more objects than gravity; we must be sober in our thoughts and opinions, as well as in our outward conduct and behavior; but we can be grave, properly speaking, only in our looks and our outward deportment.

He had just sentiments of the dignity of human nature in him, and a universal charity for it in others; not measuring the wisdom he studied by the subtilty and curiosity of speculation, but by a sober and due government of his own actions. LLOYD.

Skull'd in the globe and sphere, he gravely stands,
And with his compass measures seas and lands. DRYDEN.

SOCIAL, SOCIABLE.

SOCIAL, from socius, a companion, signifies belonging or allied to a companion, having the disposition of a companion; SOCIABLE, from the same, signifies able or fit to be a companion; the former is an active, the latter a passive quality: social people seek others; sociable people are sought for by others. It is possible for a man to be social, and not sociable; to be sociable, and not social: he who draws his pleasures from society without communicating his share to the common stock of entertainments is social, but not sociable; men of a taciturn disposition are often in this case; they receive more than they give: he, on the contrary, who has talents to please company, but not the inclination to go into company, may be sociable, but is seldom social; of this description are humorists who go into company to gratify their pride, and stay away to indulge their humor.

Social friends

Attun'd to happy unison of soul. THOMSON.

To make man mild, and sociable to man,

To cultivate the wild licentious savage

With wisdom, discipline. ADDISON.

Social and sociable are likewise applicable to things, with a similar distinction; social intercourse is that intercourse which men have together for the purposes of society; social pleasures are what they enjoy by associating together: a path or a carriage is denominated sociable which encourages the association of many.

Absolute solitude is not good for us; the social affections must be cherished. BEATTIE.

Sciences are of a sociable disposition, and flourish best in the neighborhood of each other.

BLACKSTONE.

SOCIETY, COMPANY.

SOCIETY (v. Association) and COMPANY (v. Association) here express either the persons associating, the act of associating, or the state of being associated. In either case society is a general, and company a particular, term; as respects persons associating, society comprehends either all the associated part of mankind, as when we speak of the laws of society, the well-being of society; or it is said only of a particular number of individuals associated, in which latter case it comes nearest to company, and differs from it only as to the purpose of the association. A society is always formed for some solid purpose, as the Humane Society; and a company is always brought together for pleasure or profit, as has already been observed. Good sense teaches us the necessity of conforming to the rules of the society to which we belong: good-breeding prescribes to us to render ourselves agreeable to the company of which we form a part.

I am here, at present, quite alone, which comes nearest to the happiness one finds in the society of those one loves best. MRS. MONTAGU.

Knowledge of men and manners, and conversation of the best company of both sexes, is necessary. DRYDEN.

When expressing the abstract action of associating, the term society is even more general and indefinite than before; it expresses that which is common to mankind; and company that which is peculiar to individuals. The love of society is inherent in our nature; it is weakened or destroyed only by the vice of our constitution, or the derangement of our system: every one naturally likes the company of his own friends and connections in preference to that of strangers. Society is a permanent and habitual act; company is only a particular act suited to the occasion: it behooves us to shun the society of those from whom we can learn no good, although we may sometimes be obliged to be in their company. The society of intelligent men is desirable for those who are entering life; the company of facetious men is agreeable in travelling.

Unhappy he, who from the first of joys,

Society, cut off, is left alone

Amid this world of death.

THOMSON.

Company, though it may relieve a man from his melancholy, cannot secure him from his conscience. SOUTH.

SOFT, MILD, GENTLE, MEEK.

SOFT, in Saxon soft, German sanzf, comes most probably from the Saxon sib, Gothic sef, Hebrew sabbath, rest. MILD, in Saxon milde, milide, German, etc., milde, is connected with our melt and milk, the Latin mollis, Greek μελιος, μελισσω, to soothe with soft words, and μελι, honey, etc. GENTLE, v. Gentle. MEEK, like the Latin mitis, may in all probability come from the Greek μῖν, to make less, signifying to make one's self small, to be humble.

All these terms denote the absence of an unpleasant action, sometimes also a positively pleasant action, and sometimes a positive readiness to yield to the action of other bodies. Soft is taken in these different senses, as a soft pressure or tread which is not easily felt or heard, and a soft substance that yields readily to the touch or pressure. Mild and gentle are mostly taken in the sense of not acting with an unpleasant force; as mild cheese, or mild fruits, gentle motion. Meek is taken in the passive sense of not resisting force to force. The first three terms have a physical and moral application; the latter only a moral application. Soft is applied to such objects as act pleasantly in point of strength on the ear or the eye; as a soft voice, a soft light; or pleasantly in point of smoothness on the feeling; as a soft cushion, a soft skin. Mild and gentle are applied to objects that act not unpleasantly on the senses; as mild beer, not too strong either for the palate or the body; mild air, that is, not unpleasantly cold; gentle exercise, gentle motion, not violent or excessive in degree; so a gentle stream, and a gentle rain. These terms are, agreeably to this distinction, applied to the same objects; a soft voice, soft music, as that which is positively pleasant; a gentle voice is one not loud.

And ever against eating cares,
Lap me in soft Lydian airs. MILTON.
Close at mine ear one called me forth to walk,
With gentle voice. MILTON.

A soft air or climate is positively pleasant; a mild air or climate is simply without any undue cold; a gentle wind is opposed to one that is boisterous.

Soft stillness, and the night,
Become the touches of sweet harmony. SHAKESPEARE.

Such as were permitted soon went forward to the milder climates. GOLDSMITH.

As when the woods by gentle winds are stirr'd. DRYDEN.

Soft is sometimes applied to motion in the purely negative sense; as a soft step, i. e., one made without great pressure of the foot; a gentle motion is one that is made slowly, not quick. It is necessary to tread softly when no noise is to be made; and to move gently when one is ill.

Pray you tread softly, that the blind mole may not Hear a foot fall. SHAKESPEARE.

How inevitably does immoderate laughter end in a sigh, which is only nature's recovering itself after a force done to it; but the religious pleasure of a well-disposed mind moves gently, and therefore constantly. SOUTH.

So likewise when these terms are applied to objects that act on the moral feelings, they admit of a similar distinction. Words are either soft, mild, or gentle; soft words are calculated to soften or diminish the angry feeling of others. The proverb says, "A soft answer turneth away wrath." A reproof is mild, inasmuch as it does not wound the feelings; a censure, or admonition, or a reproach, is gentle, inasmuch as it is free from asperity. So likewise punishments are mild that inflict little pain; means of coercion are gentle that are not violent. Manners are soft, mild, and gentle, but softness in this case is not always commendable. Too much softness in the manners of a man is inconsistent with manly firmness. Mildness and gentleness are more generally commendable. Mild manners are peculiarly becoming in superiors, or those who have the power of controlling others, provided they do not interfere with good order. Gentle manners are becoming in all persons who take a part in social life. Softness of manner may likewise be assumed, but mildness and gentleness are always genuine; the former arising from the temper, the latter either from the temper or from good-breeding, of which it is the greatest mark.

"It is not by the sword, nor by strength of arm," replied Valeria, "that we are to prevail. These belong not to us. Soft moving words must be our weapons." HOOKE.

Though he used very frankly to deny, yet the manner of it was so gentle and obliging, and his condescension such to inform the persons whom he could not satisfy, that few departed from him with ill will or ill wishes. CLARENDON.

When these terms are employed as characteristics of the person or his disposition, they are comparable with meek, which is used only in this sense. Soft,

as far as it denotes a susceptibility of soft or tender emotions, may and ought to exist in both sexes; but it ought to be the peculiar characteristic of the female sex; mildness, as a natural gift, may disqualify a man for command, unless it be tempered by firmness and discretion. Gentleness, as a part of the character, is not so much to be recommended as gentleness from habit.

And much he blames the softness of his mind,
Obnoxious to the charms of womankind.

DRYDEN.

She had all the courage and liberality of the other sex, united to the devotion, order, and economy (perhaps not all the softness) of her own.

WHITAKER.

He united in a most remarkable degree the seemingly repugnant characters of the mildest of men, and the most vehement of orators.

MACKINTOSH.

Let no complaisance, no gentleness of temper, no weak desire of pleasing on your part, no wheedling, coaxing, nor flattery on other people's, make you recede one jot from any point that reason and prudence have bid you pursue.

CHESTERFIELD.

Meekness denotes the forbearance to use force, even in cases of peculiar provocation: in those who are called upon to direct or command it may be carried to an excess.

A yielding timid meekness is always abused and insulted by the unjust and the unfeeling, but meekness, when sustained by the fortiter in re, is always respected and commonly successful.

CHESTERFIELD.

Gentle, mild, and meek are likewise applied to animals: the former to designate that easy flow of spirits which fits them for being guided in their movements, and the latter to mark that passive temper that submits to every kind of treatment, however harsh, without an indication even of displeasure. A horse is gentle, as opposed to one that is spirited; the former is devoid of that impetus in himself to move, which renders the other ungovernable: the lamb is a pattern of meekness, and yields to the knife of the butcher without a struggle or a groan.

How meek, how patient, the mild creature lies,
What softness in its melancholy face,
What dumb-complaining innocence appears!

THOMSON.

They (the Arabian mares) are less vicious, of a gentler nature, and not so apt to neigh.

GOLDSMITH.

SOLICITATION, IMPORTUNITY.

SOLICITATION is general; IMPORTUNITY is particular: it is importunate or troublesome solicitation. Solicitation is itself indeed that which gives trouble to a certain extent, but it is not always unreasonable: there may be cases in which we may yield to the solicitations of friends, to do that which we have no objection to be obliged to do; but importunity is that solicitation which never ceases to apply for that which it is not agreeable to give. We may sometimes be urgent in our solicitations of a friend to accept some proffered honor; the solicitation, however, in this case, although it may even be troublesome, yet it is sweetened by the motive of the action: the importunity of beggars is often a politic means of extorting money from the passerger.

Although the devil cannot compel a man to sin, yet he can follow a man with continual solicitations.

SOUTH.

The torment of expectation is not easily to be borne when the heart has no rival engagements to withdraw it from the importunities of desire.

JOHNSON.

SOLITARY, SOLE, ONLY, SINGLE.

ALL these terms are more or less opposed to several or many. SOLITARY and SOLE, both derived from solus, alone or whole, signify one left by itself; the former mostly in application to particular sensible objects, the latter in regard mostly to moral objects: a solitary shrub expresses not only one shrub, but one that has been left to itself: the sole cause or reason signifies that reason or cause which stands unsupported by anything else. ONLY, that is, only, signifying the quality of unity, does not include the idea of desertion or deprivation, but it comprehends that of want or deficiency: he who has only one shilling in his pocket means to imply that he wants more, or ought to have more. SINGLE, which is an abbreviation of singular (v. Simple), signifies simply one or more detached from others, without conveying any other collateral idea: a single sheet of paper may be sometimes more convenient than a double one; a single shilling may be all that is necessary for the present purpose: there may be single ones, as well as a single one; but the other terms exclude the idea of there being anything else. A solitary act of generosity is not sufficient to characterize a man as generous: with most criminals the sole ground of their defence rests upon their not having learned to know and do better: harsh language and severe looks are not the only means of correcting the faults of others: single instances of extraordinary talents now and then present themselves in the course of an age.

The cattle in the fields and meadows green,
Those rare and solitary, these in flocks.

MILTON.

All things are but insipid to a man, in comparison of that one which is the sole minion of his fancy.

SOUTH.

Thy fear
Will save us trial, what the least can do,
Single against the wicked.

MILTON.

In the adverbial form, solely, only, and singly are employed with a similar distinction. The disasters which attend an unsuccessful military enterprise are seldom to be attributed solely to the incapacity of the general: there are many circumstances both in the natural and moral world which are to be accounted for only by admitting a providence as presented to us in Divine revelation: there are many things which men could not effect singly that might be effected by them conjointly.

You knew my father well, and in him me,
Left solely heir to all his lands.

SHAKESPEARE.

The practice of virtue is attended not only with present quiet and satisfaction, but with comfortable hope of a future recompense.

NELSON.

They tend to the perfection of human nature,
and to make men singly and personally good.

TILLOTSON.

SOLITARY, DESERT, DESOLATE.

SOLITARY, v. Alone. DESERT is the same as deserted. DESOLATE, in Latin desolatus, signifies made solitary.

All these epithets are applied to places, but with different modifications of the common idea of solitude which belongs to them. Solitary simply denotes the absence of all beings of the same kind: thus a place is solitary to a man where there is no human being but himself; and it is solitary to a brute, when there are no brutes with which it can hold society. Desert conveys the idea of a place made solitary by being shunned, from its unfitness as a place of residence; all deserts are places of such wildness as seem to frighten away almost all inhabitants. Desolate conveys the idea of a place made solitary, or bare of inhabitants, and all traces of habitation, by violent means: desolation is solitude coupled with wretchedness; every country may become desolate which is exposed to the inroads of a ravaging army, and a person may be desolate who feels himself unable to associate with others.

The first time we behold the hero (Ulysses), we find him disconsolately sitting on the solitary shore, sighing to return to Ithaca.

WHARTON.

A peopled city made a desert place.

DRYDEN.

Supporting and supported, polish'd friends
And dear relations mingle into bliss;

But this the rugged savage never felt,
E'en desolate in crowds.

THOMSON.

TO SOLVE, RESOLVE.

SOLVE and RESOLVE both come from the Latin solvo, in Greek λυω, in Hebrew sal, to loosen.

Between solve and resolve there is no considerable difference either in sense or application: the former seems merely to speak of unfolding in a general manner that which is wrapped up in obscurity; to resolve is rather to unfold it by the particular method of carrying one back to first principles; we solve a problem, and resolve a difficulty.

He would solve a high dispute
With conjugal caresses.

MILTON.

Something yet of doubt remains,

Which only thy solution can resolve.

MILTON.

SOME, ANY.

SOME, in Saxon sum, connected with the word sum, signifying a collected or specified quantity, is altogether restrictive in its sense: ANY, from a one, is altogether universal and indefinite. Some applies to one particular part in distinction from the rest: any to every individual part without distinction. Some think this, and others that: any person might believe if he would; any one can conquer his passions who calls in the aid of religion. In consequence of this distinction in sense, some can only be used in particular affirmative propositions; but any, which is equivalent to all, may be either in negative, interrogative, or hypothetical propositions: some say so: does any one believe it? He will not give to any.

*Some to the shores do fly,
Some to the woods, or whither fear advis'd.*

DANIEL.

He is a path, if any be misled,

He is a robe, if any naked be,

If any chanc'd to hunger, he is bread,

If any be a bondsman, he is free. FLETCHER.

SOON, EARLY, BETIMES.

ALL these words are expressive of time; but SOON respects some future period in general; EARLY, or ere, before, and BETIMES, or by the time, before a given time, respect some particular period at no great distance. A person may come soon or early; in the former case he may not be long in coming from the time that the words are spoken; in the latter case he comes before the time appointed. He who rises soon does nothing extraordinary; but he who rises early or betimes exceeds the usual hour considerably. Soon is said mostly of particular acts, and is always dated from the time of the person speaking, if not otherwise expressed; come soon signifies after the present moment: early and betimes, if not otherwise expressed, have always respect to some specific time appointed; come early will signify a visit, a meeting, and the like; do it betimes will signify before the thing to be done is wanted: in this manner, both are employed for the actions of youth. An early attention to religious duties will render them habitual and pleasing; we must begin betimes to bring the stubborn will into subjection.

But soon, too soon / the lover turns his eyes;
Again she falls—again she dies—she dies.

POPE.

Pope not being sent early to school, was taught to read by an aunt. JOHNSON.

Happy is the man who betimes acquires a relish for holy solitude. HOSAN.

SORRY, GRIEVED, HURT.

SORRY and GRIEVED are epithets somewhat differing from their primitives sorrow and grief (v. Affliction), inasmuch as they are applied to ordinary subjects. We speak of being sorry for anything, however trivial, which concerns ourselves; but we are commonly grieved for that which concerns others. I am sorry that I was not at home when a person called upon me; I am grieved that it is not in my power to serve a friend who stands in need. Both these terms respect only that which we do ourselves: HURT (v. To displease and To injure) respects that which is done to us, denoting painful feeling from hurt or wounded feelings; we are hurt at being treated with disrespect.

The ass, approaching next, confess'd
That in his heart he lov'd a jest;
One fault he hath, is sorry for't,
His ears are half a foot too short.

SWIFT.

The mimic ape began to chatter,
How evil tongues his name bespatter;
He saw, and he was grieved to see't,
His seal was sometimes indiscreet.

SWIFT.

No man is hurt, at least few are so, by bearing his neighbor esteemed a worthy man.

BLAIR.

SOUL, MIND.

THESE terms, or the equivalents to them, have been employed by all civilized nations to designate that part of human nature which is distinct from matter. The SOUL, however, from the German seele, etc., and the Greek ψαυ, to live, like the anima of the Latin, which comes from the Greek ανεμος, wind or breath, is represented to our minds by the subtlest or most ethereal of sensible objects, namely, breath or spirit, and denotes properly the quickening or vital principle. MIND, on the contrary, from the Greek μυος, which signifies strength, is that sort of power which is closely allied to, and in a great measure dependent upon, corporeal organization: the former is, therefore, the immortal, and the latter the mortal, part of us; the former connects us with angels, the latter with brutes; in the former we distinguish consciousness and will, which is possessed by no other created being that we know of; in the latter we distinguish nothing but the power of receiving impressions from external objects, which we call ideas, and which we have in common with the brutes. Poets and philosophers speak of the soul in the same strain, as the active and living principle.

Man's soul in a perpetual motion flows,
And to no outward cause that motion owes.

DENHAM.

In bashful coyness, or in maiden pride,
The soft return conceal'd, save when it stole
In sidelong glances from her downcast eyes,
Or from her swelling soul in stifled sighs.

THOMSON.

The soul consists of many faculties, as the understanding, and the will, with all the senses, both outward and inward; or, to speak more philosophically, the soul can exert herself in many different ways of action.

ADDISON.

The ancients, though unaided by the light of Divine revelation, yet represented the soul as a distinct principle. The Psyche of the Greeks, which was the name they gave to the human soul, was feigned to be one of their incorporeal or celestial beings. The anima of the Latins was taken precisely in the modern sense of the soul, by which it was distinguished from the animus or mind. Thus the Emperor Adrian is said on his dying bed to have addressed his soul in words which clearly denote what he thought of its independent existence:

Animula vagula, blandula,
Quæ nunc abibis in loca?
Hospes comesque corporis,
Fallidula, rigida, undula,
Nec (ut soles) dabis Joca!

The mind, being considered as an attribute to the soul, is taken sometimes for one faculty, and sometimes for another; as for the understanding, when we say a person is not in his right mind.

I am a very foolish fond old man;
I fear I am not in my perfect mind.

SHAKESPEARE.

Sometimes for the intellectual power:

I thought the eternal mind
Had made us masters.

DRYDEN.

Or for the intellectual capacity:

We say that learning's endless, and blame fate
For not allowing life a longer date;
He did the utmost bounds of knowledge find,
He found them not so large as was his mind.

COWLEY.

Or for the imagination or conception.

In the judgment of Aristotle and Bacon, the true poet forms his imitations of nature after a model of ideal perfection, which perhaps has no existence but in his own mind.

BEATTIE.

Sometimes the word mind is employed to denote the operations of the thinking faculty, the thoughts or opinions:

The ambiguous god,
In these mysterious words his mind express'd;
Some truths revealed, in terms involved the rest.

DRYDEN.

The earth was not of my mind,
If you suppose as fearing you it shook.

SHAKESPEARE.

Or the will, choice, determination, as in the colloquial phrase, to have a mind to do a thing.

All the arguments to a good life will be very insignificant to a man that hath a mind to be wicked, when remission of sins may be had on such cheap terms.

TILLOTSON.

Our question is, whether all be sin which is done without direction by Scripture, and not whether the Israelites did at any time amiss by following their own minds without asking counsel of God.

HOOKE.

Sometimes it stands for the memory, as in the familiar expressions to call to mind, put in mind, etc.

The king knows their disposition; a small touch will put him in mind of them.

BACON.

These, and more than I to mind can bring,
Menalcas has not yet forgot to sing.

DRYDEN.

They will put him in mind of his own waking thoughts, ere these dreams had as yet made their impressions on his fancy.

ATTENBURY.

A wholesome law, time out of mind,
Had been confirm'd by fate's decree.

SWIFT.

Lastly, the mind is considered as the seat of all the faculties:

Every faculty is a distinct taste in the mind, and hath objects accommodated to its proper relish.

ADDISON.

And also of the passions or affections.

E'en from the body's purity, the mind
Receives a secret sympathetic aid.

THOMSON.

This word, being often used for the soul giving life, is attributed abusively to madmen when we say that they are of a distracted mind, instead of a broken understanding; which word mind we use also for opinion, as I am of this or that mind; and sometimes for men's conditions or virtues, as he is of an honest mind, or a man of a just mind; sometimes for affection, as I do this for my mind's sake, etc.

RALEIGH.

The soul being the better part of a man, is taken for the man's self; as Horace says, in allusion to his friend Virgil, "et serves animæ dimidium mææ;" hence the term is figuratively extended, in its application, to denote a human being:

The moral is the case of every soul of us.

L'ESTRANGE.

It is a republic; there are in it a hundred bourgeois, and about a thousand souls.

ADDISON.

The poor soul sat singing by a sycamore-tree.

SHAKESPEARE.

Or the individual in general.

Join voices, all ye living souls. Ye birds
That singing up to heaven-gate ascend
Bear on your wings and in your notes his praise.
MILTON.

Also, what is excellent, the essential or principal part of a thing, the spirit.

Thou son, of this great world both eye and soul.
MILTON.

He has the very soul of bounty. SHAKESPEARE.
There is some soul of goodness in things evil,
Would men observingly distil it out.
SHAKESPEARE.

SOUND, SANE, HEALTHY.

SOUND and SANE, in Latin sanus, comes probably from sanguis, the blood, because in that lies the seat of health or sickness. HEALTHY, v. Healthy.

Sound is extended in its application to all things that are in the state in which they ought to be, so as to preserve their vitality; thus, animals and vegetables are said to be sound when in the former there is nothing amiss in their breath, and in the latter in their root. By a figurative application, wood and other things may be said to be sound when they are entirely free from any symptom of decay; sane is applicable to human beings, in the same sense, but with reference to the mind; a sane person is opposed to one that is insane.

He hath a heart as sound as a bell, and his tongue is the clapper: for what his heart thinks his tongue speaks. SHAKESPEARE.

How pregnant sometimes his replies are,
A happiness that often madness hits on,
Which santity and reason could not be
So prosperously delivered of. SHAKESPEARE.

The mind is also said to be sound when it is in a perfect state to form right opinions.

But Capys, and the rest of sounder mind,
The fatal present to the flames design'd.
DRYDEN.

Healthy expresses more than either sound or sane; we are healthy in every part, but we are sound in that which is essential for life; he who is sound may live, but he who is healthy enjoys life.

But the course of succession (to the crown) is the healthy habit of the British constitution.
BURKE.

SOUND, TONE.

SOUND, in Latin sonus, and TONE, in Latin tonus, may probably both come from the Greek φωνή, from φάω, to stretch or exert, signifying simply an exertion of the voice; and that is connected with the Hebrew shaon, a noise.

Sound is that which issues from any body, so as to become audible; tone is a species of sound which is produced from particular bodies: a sound may be accidental; we may hear the sounds of waters or leaves, of animals or men: tones are those particular sounds or modulations of sound, which are made either to express a particular feeling or to produce harmony; a sheep will cry for its lost young in a tone of distress; an organ is so formed as to send forth the most solemn tones.

The sounds of the voice, according to the various touches which raise them, form themselves into an acute or grave, quick or slow, loud or soft, tone.
HUME.

SPACE, ROOM.

SPACE is in Latin spatium, Greek σπαδιον, Æol. σπαδιον, a race-ground. ROOM is in Saxon, etc., rum, Hebrew ramah, a wide place.

These are both abstract terms, expressive of that portion of the universe which is supposed not to be occupied by any solid body: space is a general term, which includes within itself that which infinitely surpasses our comprehension; room is a limited term, which comprehends those portions of space which are artificially formed: space is either extended or bounded; room is always a bounded space: the space between two objects is either natural, incidental, or designedly formed; the room is that which is the fruit of design, to suit the convenience of persons: there is a sufficient space between the heavenly bodies to admit of their moving without confusion; the value of a house essentially depends upon the quantity of room which it affords: in a row of trees there must always be vacant spaces between each tree; in a coach there will be only room for a given number of persons.

The man of wealth and pride
Takes up a space that many poor supplied.
GOLDSMITH.

For the whole world, without a native home,
Is nothing but a prison of a larger room.
COWLEY.

Space is only taken in the natural sense; room is also employed in the moral application: in every person there is ample room for amendment or improvement.

He was incapable of laying traps for discourse, or putting other people's conversation aside to make room for his own. CUMBERLAND.

TO SPEAK, SAY, TELL.

SPEAK, in Saxon specan, is probably changed from the German sprechen, and connected with brechen, to break, the Latin precor, to pray, and the Hebrew barek, to bless. SAY, in Saxon seegan, German sagen, Latin seco or sequor, changed into dico, and Hebrew shach, to speak or say. TELL, in Saxon taellan, low German telan, etc., is probably an onomatopoeia in language.

To speak may simply consist in uttering an articulate sound; but to say is to communicate some idea by means of words: a child begins to speak the moment it opens its lips to utter any acknowledged sound; but it will be some time before it can say anything: a person is said to speak high or low, distinctly or indistinctly; but he says that which is true or false, right or wrong: a dumb man cannot speak; a fool cannot say anything that is worth hearing: we speak languages, we speak sense or nonsense, we speak intelligibly or unintelligibly; but we say what we think at the time.

He that questioneth much shall learn much, and content much, for he shall give occasion to those whom he asketh to please themselves in speaking. BACON.

He possessed to admiration that rare faculty of always saying enough, and not too much, on any subject. CUMBERLAND.

In an extended sense, speak may refer as much to sense as to sound; but then it applies only to general cases, and say to particular and passing circumstances of life: it is a great abuse of the gift of speech not to speak the truth; it is very culpable in a person to say that he will do a thing and not to do it.

In what I now shall say of him, I have spoken the truth conscientiously. CUMBERLAND.

To say and tell are both the ordinary actions of men in their daily intercourse; but say is very partial, it may comprehend single unconnected sentences, or even single words: we may say yes or no; but we tell that which is connected, and which forms more or less of a narrative. To say is to communicate that which passes in our own minds, to express our ideas and feelings as they rise; to tell is to communicate events or circumstances respecting ourselves or others: it is not good to let children say foolish things for the sake of talking; it is still worse for them to be encouraged in telling everything they hear: when every one is allowed to say what he likes and what he thinks, there will commonly be more speakers than hearers; those who accustom themselves to tell long stories impose a tax upon others, which is not repaid by the pleasure of their company.

Say, Yorke (for sure, if any, thou canst tell), What virtue is, who practise it so well? JENYNS.

TO SPEAK, TALK, CONVERSE, DISCOURSE.

THE idea of communicating with, or communicating to, another, by means of signs, is common in the signification of all these terms: to SPEAK (v. To speak) is an indefinite term, specifying no circumstance of the action; we may speaking only one word or many; but TALK, which is but a variation of tell (v. To speak), is a mode of speaking, namely, for a continuance: we may speaking from various motives; we talk for pleasure; we CONVERSE (v. Conversation) for improvement, or intellectual gratification: we speaking with or to a person; we talk commonly to others; we converse with others. Speaking a language is quite distinct from writing it: those who think least talk most: conversation is the rational employment of social beings, who seek by an interchange of sentiments to purify the affections, and improve the understanding.

Falsehood is a speaking against our thoughts. SOUTH.

Talkers are commonly vain, and credulous withal: for he that talketh what he knoweth, will also talk what he knoweth not. BACON.

Words learned by rote a parrot may rehearse, But talkings is not always to converse. COWPER.
Go, therefore, half this day, as friend with friend, Converse with Adam. MILTON.

Conversation is the act of many together; DISCOURSE, in Latin discursus, expressing properly an examining or deliberating upon, like talk, may be the act of one addressing himself to others; parents and teachers discourse with young people on moral duties.

Let thy discourses be such, that thou mayst give Profit to others, or from them receive. DEWEHAM.

SPECIAL, SPECIFIC, PARTICULAR.

SPECIAL, in Latin specialis, signifies belonging to the species; SPECIFIC, in Latin specificus, from species, a species, and facio, to make, signifies making a species; PARTICULAR, belonging to a particle or small part. The special is that which comes under the general; the particular is that which comes under the special: hence we speak of a special rule; but a particular case. Particular and specific are both applied to the properties of individuals; but particular is said of the contingent circumstances of things, specific of their inherent properties: every plant has something particular in itself different from others, it is either longer or shorter, weaker or stronger; but its specific property is that which it has in common with its species: particular is, therefore, the term adapted to loose discourse; specific is a scientific term which describes things minutely.

God claims it as a special part of his prerogative to have the entire disposal of riches. SOUTH.

Every state has a particular principle of happiness, and this principle may in each be carried to a mischievous excess. GOLDENITH.

The imputation of being a fool is a thing which mankind, of all others, is the most impatient of, it being a blot upon the prime and specific perfection of human nature. SOUTH.

The same may be said of particularize and specify: we particularize for the sake of information; we specify for the sake of instruction: in describing a man's person and dress we particularize if we mention everything singly which can be said upon it; in delineating a plan it is necessary to specify time, place, distance, materials, and everything else which may be connected with the carrying it into execution.

St. Peter doth not specify what these waters were. BURNET.

The numbers I particularize are about thirty-six millions. BURKE.

TO SPEND, EXHAUST, DRAIN.

SPEND, contracted from expend, in Latin expendo, to pay away, signifies to give from one's self. EXHAUST, from the Latin exhaustio, to draw out, signifies to draw out all that there is. DRAIN, a variation of draw, signifies to draw dry.

The idea of taking from the substance of anything is common to these terms; but to spend is to deprive it in a less degree than to exhaust, and that in a less degree than to drain: every one who exerts himself, in that degree spends his strength; if the exertions are violent he exhausts himself; a country which is drained of men is supposed to have no more left. To spend may be applied to that which is either external or inherent in a body; exhaust to that which is inherent; drain to that which is external of the body in which it is contained: we may speak of spending our wealth, our resources, our time, and the like; but of exhausting our strength, our vigor, our voice, and the like; of draining, in the proper application, a vessel of its liquid, or, in the improper application, draining a treasury of its contents: hence arises this further distinction, that to spend and to exhaust may tend, more or less, to the injury of a body; but to drain may be to its advantage. Inasmuch as what is spent or exhausted may be more or less essential to the soundness of a body, it cannot be parted with without diminishing its value, or even destroying its existence; as when a fortune is spent it is gone, or when a person's strength is exhausted he is no longer able to move: on the other hand, to drain, though a more complete evacuation, is not always injurious, but sometimes even useful to a body; as when the land is drained of a superabundance of water.

Your tears for such a death in vain you spend, Which straight in immortality shall end. DEWEHAM.

Many of our provisions for ease or happiness are exhausted by the present day. JOHNSON.

Teaching is not a flow of words nor the draining of an hour-glass. SOUTH.

TO SPEND, OR EXPEND, WASTE, DIS-SIPATE, SQUANDER.

SPEND and EXPEND are variations from the Latin expendo; but spend implies simply to turn to some purpose, or make use of; to expend carries with it likewise the idea of exhausting; and WASTE, moreover, comprehends the idea of exhausting to no good purpose: we spend money when we purchase anything with it; we expend it when we lay it out in large quantities, so as essentially to diminish its quantity: individuals spend what they have; government expends vast sums in conducting the affairs of a nation; all persons waste their property who have not sufficient discretion to use it well: we spend our time, or our lives, in any employment; we expend our strength and faculties upon some arduous undertaking; we waste our time and talents in trifles.

Then, having spent the last remains of light,
They give their bodies due repose at night.

DRYDEN.

The King of England wasted the French king's country, and thereby caused him to spend such sums of money as exceeded the debt.

HAYWARD.

What numbers, guiltless of their own disease,
Are snatch'd by sudden death, or waste by slow degrees!

JENYNS.

DISSIPATE, in Latin dissipatus, from dissipo, that is dis and cipo, in Greek σῑψω, to scatter, signifies to scatter different ways, that is, to waste by throwing away in all directions: SQUANDER, which is a variation of wander, signifies to make to run wide apart. Both these terms, therefore, denote modes of wasting; but the former seems peculiarly applicable to that which is wasted in detail upon different objects, and by a distraction of the mind; the latter respects rather the act of wasting in the gross, in large quantities, by planless profusion: young men are apt to dissipate their property in pleasures; the open, generous, and thoughtless are apt to squander their property.

He pitted man, and much he pitted those Whom falsely smiling fate has curs'd with means
To dissipate their days in quest of joy.

ARMSTRONG.

To how many temptations are all, but especially the young and gay, exposed, to squander their whole time amidst the circles of levity.

BLAIR.

SPIRITUOUS, SPIRITED, SPIRITUAL,
GHOSTLY.

SPIRITUOUS signifies having spirit as a physical property, after the manner of spirituous liquors: SPIRITED is applicable to the animal spirits of either men or brutes; a person or a horse may be spirited.

The spirituous and benign matter most apt for generation.

SMITH.

Dryden's translation of Virgil is noble and spirited.

JOHNSON.

What is SPIRITUAL is after the manner of a spirit, and what is GHOSTLY is like a ghost: although originally the same in meaning, the former being derived from the Latin spiritus, and the latter from the German geist, and both signifying what is not corporeal, yet they have acquired a difference of application. Spiritual objects are mostly distinguished from those of sense.

Virginity is better than the married life; not that it is more holy, but that it is a freedom from cares, an opportunity to spend more time in spiritual employments.

JEREMY TAYLOR.

Hence it is that the spiritual is opposed to the temporal.

She loves them as her spiritual children, and they reverence her as their spiritual mother, with an affection far above that of the fondest friend.

LAW.

Thou art reverend
Touching thy spiritual function, not thy life.

SHAKESPEARE.

Ghostly is more immediately opposed to the carnal or the secular, and is a term, therefore, of more solemn import.

The grace of the Spirit is much more precious than worldly benefits, and our ghostly evils of greater importance than the harm which the body feeleth.

HOOKE.

To deny me the ghostly comfort of my chaplains seems a greater barbarity than is ever used by Christians.

KING CHARLES.

SPREAD, SCATTER, DISPERSE.

SPREAD (v. To spread) applies equally to divisible or indivisible bodies; we spread our money on the table, or we may spread a cloth on the table: but SCATTER, like shatter, is a frequentative of shake (v. To shake), and is applicable to divisible bodies only; we scatter corn on the ground. To spread may be an act of design or otherwise, but mostly the former; as when we spread books or papers before us: scatter is mostly an act without design; a child scatters the papers on the floor. When taken, however, as an act of design, it is done without order; but spread is an act done in order; thus hay is spread out to dry, but corn is scattered over the land.

All in a row
Advancing broad, or wheeling round the field,
They spread their breathing harvest to the sun.
THOMSON.

Each leader now his scatter'd force conjoins.

POPE.

Things may spread in one direction, or at least without separation; but they DISPERSE (v. To dispel) in many directions, so as to destroy the continuity of bodies: a leaf spreads as it opens in all its parts, and a tree also spreads as its branches increase; but a multitude disperses, an army disperses. Between scatter and disperse there is no other difference than that one is immethodical and often involuntary, the other systematic and intentional: flowers are scattered along a path which accidentally fall from the hand; a mob is dispersed by an act of authority: sheep are scattered along the hills; religious tracts are dispersed among the poor: the disciples were scattered as sheep without a shepherd, after the delivery of our Saviour into the hands of the Jews; they dispersed themselves, after his ascension, over every part of the world.

The stately trees fast spread their branches.

MILTON.

Shall funeral eloquence her colors spread,
And scatter roses on the wealthy dead?

YOUNG.

Straight to the tents the troops dispersing bend.

POPE.

TO SPREAD, EXPAND, DIFFUSE.

SPREAD, in Saxon spredan, low German spredan, high German spreiten, is an intensive of breit, broad, signifying to stretch wide. EXPAND, in Latin expando, compounded of ex and pando, to open, and the Greek φαίνω, to show or make appear, signifies to open out wide. DIFFUSE, v. Diffuse.

To spread is the general, the other two are particular terms. To spread may be said of anything which occupies more space than it has done, whether by a direct separation of its parts, or by an accession to the substance; but to expand is to spread by means of extending or unfolding the parts: a mist spreads over the earth; a flower expands its leaves: a tree spreads by the growth of its branches; the opening bud expands when it feels the genial warmth of the sun. Diffusion is that process of spreading which consists literally in pouring out in different ways.

See where the winding vale its lavish'd stores
Irriguous spreads.

THOMSON.

As from the face of heaven the shatter'd clouds
Tumultuous rove, th' interminable sky
Sublimer swells, and o'er the world expands
A purer azure.

THOMSON.

His head above the floods he gently reared,
And, as he rose, his golden horns appear'd;
That on the forehead shone divinely bright,
And o'er the banks diffused a yellow light.

ADDISON.

Spread and expand are used likewise in a moral application; diffuse is seldom used in any other application: spread is here, as before, equally indefinite as to the mode of the action; everything spreads, and it spreads in any way; but expansion is that gradual process by which an object opens or unfolds itself after the manner of a flower. Evils spread, and reports spread; the mind expands, and prospects expand; knowledge diffuses itself, or cheerfulness is diffused throughout a company.

About this time the heresy of Wickliffe, or Lollardism, as it was called, began to spread.

GOLDSMITH.

Man in society is like a flower
Blown in its native bud: 'tis then alone
His faculties expanded in full bloom,
Shine forth.

COWPER.

A chief renown'd in war,
Whose race shall bear aloft the Latin name,
And through the conquered world diffuse our fame.

DRYDEN.

TO SPREAD, CIRCULATE, PROPAGATE, DISSEMINATE.

To SPREAD (v. To spread, expand) is said of any object material or spiritual; the rest are mostly employed in the moral application. To spread is to extend to an indefinite width; to CIRCULATE is to spread within a circle: thus news spreads through a country; but a story circulates in a village, or from house to house, or a report is circulated in a neighborhood.

Love would between the rich and needy stand,
And spread heaven's bounty with an equal hand.

WALLER.

Our God, when heaven and earth he did create,
Form'd man, who should of both partecipe:
If our lives' motions theirs must imitate,
Our knowledge, like our blood, must circulate.
DENHAM.

Spread and circulate are the acts of persons or things; PROPAGATE and DISSEMINATE are the acts of persons only. The thing spreads and circulates, or it is spread and circulated by some one; it is always propagated and disseminated by some one. Propagate, from the Latin propago, a breed, and disseminate, from semen, a seed, are here figuratively employed as modes of spreading, according to the natural operations of increasing the quantity of anything which is implied in the first two terms. What is propagated is supposed to generate new subjects: as when doctrines, either good or bad, are propagated among the people so as to make them converts: what is disseminated is supposed to be sown in different parts; thus principles are disseminated among youth.

He shall extend his propagated sway
Beyond the solar year, without the starry way.
DRYDEN.

Nature seems to have taken care to disseminate her blessings among the different regions of the world.
ADDISON.

SPRING, FOUNTAIN, SOURCE.

SPRING denotes that which springs; the word, therefore, carries us back to the point from which the water issues. FOUNTAIN, in Latin fons, from fundo, to pour out, signifies that from which anything is poured, and comprehends in it a collection or certain quantity of water, both natural and artificial: and SOURCE, in the Latin of the Middle Ages surgicia, is obviously from surgo, to rise, and carries us back to the place whence the water takes its rise. Springs are to be found by digging a sufficient depth in all parts of the earth: in mountainous countries, and also in the East, we read of fountains which form themselves, and supply the surrounding parts with refreshing streams: the sources of rivers are mostly to be traced to some mountain.

It has so many springs breaking out of the sides of the hills, and such vast quantities of wood to make pipes, that it is no wonder they are so well stocked with fountains. ADDISON.

Fast by a brook or fountain's murmuring stream.
BEATTIE.

I forgot to mention that we passed the source of the famous cold river Il Fiume Freddo: it rises at once out of the earth a large stream.
BYRDONE.

These terms are all used in a figurative sense: spring is taken for that which is always flowing; fountain for that which contains an abundant supply for a stream; and source for the channel through which from the commencement any event comes to pass.

The heart of the citizen is a perennial spring of energy to the State.
BURKE.

Eternal King! the author of all being,
Fountain of light, thyself invisable. MILTON.

These are thy blessings, industry! rough power!
Yet the kind source of every gentle art.
THOMSON.

TO, SPRING, START, STARTLE, SHRINK.

THE idea of a sudden motion is expressed by all these terms, but the circumstances and mode differ in all; SPRING (v. To spring) is indefinite in these respects, and is therefore the most general term. To spring and START, which is in all probability an intensive of stir, may be either voluntary or involuntary movements, but the former is mostly voluntary, and the latter involuntary; a person springs out of bed, or one animal springs upon another; a person or animal starts from a certain point to begin running, or starts with fright from one side to the other. To STARTLE, which is a frequentative of start, is always an involuntary action; a horse starts by suddenly flying from the point on which he stands; but if he startles he seems to fly back on himself and stops his course; to spring and start, therefore, always carry a person farther from a given point; but startle and SHRINK, which is probably an intensive of sink, signifying to sink into itself, are movements within one's self; startling is a sudden convulsion of the frame which makes a person to stand in hesitation whether to proceed or not; shrinking is a contraction of the frame within itself; any sudden and unexpected sound makes a person startle; the approach of any frightful object makes him shrink back; spring and start are mostly employed only in the proper sense of corporeal movements: startle and shrink are employed in regard to the movements of the mind as well as the body.

Death wounds to cure; we fall, we rise, we reign,
Spring from our fetters, and fasten in the skies.
YOUNG.

A shape within the wat'ry gleam appear'd,
Bending to look on me: I started back,
It started back.
MILTON.

'Tis listening fear and dumb amazement,
When to the startled eye the sudden glance
Appears far south, eruptive through the cloud.
THOMSON.

There is a horror in the scene of a ravaged country which makes nature shrink back at the reflection.
HERRING.

TO SPRINKLE, BEDEW.

TO SPRINKLE is a frequentative of spring, and denotes either an act of nature or design: to BEDEW is to cover with dew, which is an operation of nature.
By sprinkling, a liquid falls in sensible drops upon the earth; by bedewing, it covers by imperceptible drops: rain besprinkles the earth; dew bedews it.

The prince with living water sprinkled o'er
His limbs and body.
DAYDEN.

The silver streams, which from this spring increase,
Bedew all Christian hearts with drops of peace.
BEAUMONT.

So likewise, figuratively, things are sprinkled with flour; the cheeks are bedewed with tears.

Wings he wore
Of many a colored plume, sprinkled with gold.
MILTON.

And all the while salt tears bedewed the bearers' cheeks.
SPENSER.

TO SPROUT, BUD.

SPROUT, in Saxon sproutan, low German sprouten, is doubtless connected with the German spritzen, to spurt, spreit-en, to spread, and the like. To BUD is to put forth buds; the noun bud is a variation from button, which it resembles in form. To sprout is to come forth from the stem; to bud, to put forth in buds.

The sprouting leaves that saw you here,
And call'd their fellows to the sight.
COWLEY.

Noble objects are to the mind what sunbeams are to a bud or flower; they open or unfold, as it were, the leaves of it, put it upon exerting and spreading every way, and call forth all those powers that lie hid and locked up in it.

ATTENBURY.

SPURIOUS, SUPPOSITITIOUS, COUNTERFEIT.

SPURIOUS, in Latin spurius, or Greek σπουδαῖον, that is, one conceived by a woman, because the ancients called the female spurius; hence, one who is of uncertain origin on the father's side is termed spurious. SUPPOSITITIOUS, from suppose, signifies to be supposed or conjectured, in distinction from being positively known. COUNTERFEIT, c.
To imitate.

All these terms are modes of the false;
the former two indirectly, the latter directly: whatever is uncertain that might be certain, and whatever is conjectural that might be conclusive, are by implication false; that which is made in imitation of another thing, so as to pass for it as the true one, is positively false.
Hence, the distinction between these terms, and the ground of their applications. An illegitimate offspring is said to be spurious in the literal sense of the word, the father in this case being always uncertain; and any offspring which is termed spurious falls necessarily under the imputation of not being the offspring of the person whose name they bear.
In the same manner an edition of a work is termed spurious which comes out under a false name, or a name different from that in the title-page: supposititious expresses more or less of falsehood, according to the nature of the thing. A supposititious parent implies little less than a directly false parent; but in speaking of the origin of any person in remote periods of antiquity, it may be merely supposititious or conjectural from the want of information. Counterfeit re-spectes rather works of art which are exposed to imitation: coin is counterfeit which bears a false stamp, and every invention which comes out under the sanction of the inventor's name is likewise a counterfeit if not made by himself or by his consent.

Being to take leave of England, I thought it very handsome to take my leave also of you, and my dearly honored mother, Oxford; otherwise both of you may have just grounds to cry me up:
you for a forgetful friend, she for an ungrateful son, if not some spurious issue.
HOWELL.

The fabulous tales of early British history, supposititious treatises and charters, are the proofs on which Edward founded his title to the sovereignty of Scotland.

ROBERTSON.

Words may be counterfeit,
False coin'd, and current only from the tongue,
Without the mind.

SOUTHERN.

TO SPURT, SPOUT.

To SPURT and SPOUT are, like the German spritzen, variations of spreiten, to spread (v. To spread), and springen, to spring (v. To arise); they both express the idea of sending forth liquid in small quantities from a cavity; the former, however, does not always include the idea of the cavity, but simply that of springing up; the latter is, however, confined to the circumstance of issuing forth from some place; dirt may be spurred from the face by means of kicking it up; or blood may be spurred out of a vein when it is opened, water out of the mouth, and the like; but a liquid spouts out from a pipe. To spurt is a sudden action arising from a momentary impetus given to a liquid either intentionally or incidentally; the beer will spurt from a barrel when the vent-peg is removed; to spout is a continued action produced by a perpetual impetus which the liquid receives equally from design or accident; the water spouts out from a pipe which is denominated a spout, or it will spout out from any cavity in the earth, or in a rock which may resemble a spout; a person may likewise spout water in a stream from his mouth.

Far from the parent stream it boils again
Fresh into day, and all the glittering hill
Is bright with spouting rills.

THOMSON.

If from the puncture of a lancet, the manner
Of the spurring out of the blood will show it.

WISEMAN.

Hence the figurative application of these terms; any sudden conceit which compels a person to an eccentric action is a spurt, particularly if it springs from ill-humor or caprice; a female will sometimes take a spurt and treat her intimate friends very coldly, either from a fancied offence or a fancied superiority; to spout, on the other hand, is to send forth a stream of words in imitation of the stream of liquid, and is applied to those who affect to turn speakers, or who recite in an affected manner.

His skill in coachmanship or driving chaise,
In bliking tavern bills, and spouting plays.

COWPER.

STAFF, STAY, PROP, SUPPORT.

FROM STAFF in the literal sense (v. Staff) comes staff in the figurative application: anything may be denominated a staff which holds up after the manner of a staff, particularly as it respects persons; bread is said to be the staff of life; one person may serve as a staff to another.

It would much please him,
That of his fortunes you would make a staff
To lean upon.

SHAKESPEARE.

The staff serves in a state of motion; the STAY and PROP are employed for objects in a state of rest: the stay makes a thing stay for the time being, it keeps it in its place; it is equally applied to persons and things: we may be a stay to a person who is falling by letting his body rest against us; in the same manner buttresses against a wall, and shores against a building, serve the purpose of stays while they are repairing. For the same reason that part of a female's dress which serves as a stay to the body is denominated stays: the prop keeps a thing up for a permanency; every pillar on which a building rests is a prop; whatever, therefore, requires to be raised from the ground and kept in that state may be set upon props. SUPPORT (v. To hold, keep) is a general term, and in its most general sense comprehends all the others as species: whatever supports, that is, bears the weight of an object, is a support, whether in a state of motion like a staff, or in a state of rest like a stay or prop.

Their trees serve as so many stays for their vines, which hang like garlands from tree to tree.

ADDISON.

Whate'er thy many fingers can entwine,
Proves thy support, and all its strength is thine;
Tho' nature gave not legs, it gave thee hands,
By which thy prop, thy prouder cedar stands.

DENHAM.

Staff, stay, and prop are applied figuratively in the sense of a support, with a similar distinction between them.

Hope is a lover's staff; walk hence with that,
And manage it against despairing thought.

SHAKESPEARE.

If hope precarious, and of things when gain'd
Of little moment and as little stay,
Can sweeten toils, and dangers into joys,
What then that hope which nothing can defeat?

YOUNG.

Support is applied in the proper sense to moral as well as sensible objects: hope is the support of the mind under the most trying circumstances; religion, as the foundation of all our hopes, is the best and surest support under affliction.

I could not but reflect upon the greatness of his grief for the loss of one who has ever been a support to him under all other afflictions.

ADAMSON.

STAFF, STICK, CRUTCH.

STAFF, in low German staff, etc., in Latin stipes, in Greek στυψ, comes from στυψω, stipo, to fix. STICK signifies that which can be stuck in the ground. CRUTCH, as changed from cross, is a staff or stick which has a crossbar at the top.

The ruling idea in a staff is that of firmness and fixedness; it is employed for leaning upon: the ruling idea in the stick is that of sharpness with which it can penetrate; it is used for walking and ordinary purposes: the ruling idea in the crutch is its form, which serves the specific purpose of support in case of lameness; a staff can never be small, but a stick may be large; a crutch is in size more of a staff than a common stick.

"You are going, my boy," cried I, "to London on foot, in the manner Hooker, your great ancestor, travelled there before you: take from me the same horse that was given him by the good Bishop Jewel, this staff."

GOLDSMITH.

He thrust a stick into the crevices of the rock.

BYRDONE.

Propp'd on his crutch, he drags with many a groan

The load of life, yet dreads to lay it down.

BROWNE.

TO STAGGER, REEL, TOTTER.

STAGGER is in all probability a frequentative from the German steigen, and the Greek στροχυν, to go, signifying to go backward and forward. To REEL signifies to go like a reel in a winding manner. TOTTER is most probably connected with the German sittern, to tremble, because to totter is a tremulous action.

All these terms designate an involuntary and an unsteady motion; they vary both in the cause and the mode of the action; staggering and reeling are occasioned either by drunkenness or sickness; tottering is purely the effect of weakness, particularly the weakness of old age: a drunken man always staggers as he walks; one who is giddy reels from one part to another: to stagger is a much less degree of unsteadiness than to reel; for he who staggers is only thrown a little out of the straight path, but he who reels altogether loses his equilibrium; reeling is commonly succeeded by falling. To stagger and reel are said as to the carriage of the whole body; but totter has particular reference to the limbs; the knees and the legs totter, and consequently the footsteps become tottering. In an extended application, the mountains may be said to stagger and to reel in an earthquake: the houses may totter from their very bases. In a figurative application, the faith or the resolution of a person staggers when its hold on the mind is shaken, and begins to give way; a nation or a government will totter when it is torn by intestine convulsions.

Nathless, it bore his foe not from his cell,
But made him stagger as he were not well.

SPENCER.

The clouds, commix'd
With stars, swift gliding sweep along the sky:
All nature reels.

THOMSON.

Troy nods from high, and totters to her fall.

DRYDEN.

TO STAIN, SOIL, SULLY, TARNISH.

STAIN, v. Flemish. SOIL and SULLY, from the French souiller, signifying to smear with dirt. TARNISH, in French ternir, probably from the Latin terere, to bruise.

All these terms imply the act of diminishing the brightness of an object; but the term stain denotes something grosser than the other terms, and is applied to inferior objects: things which are not remarkable for purity or brightness may be stained, as hands when stained with blood, or a wall stained with chalk; nothing is sullied or tarnished but what has some intrinsic value; a fine picture or piece of writing may be easily soiled by a touch of the finger; the finest glass is the soonest tarnished: hence, in the moral application, a man's life may be stained by the commission of some gross immorality: his honor may be sullied, or his glory tarnished.

Thou, rather than thy justice should be stained,
Didst stain the cross.

YOUNG.

I cannot endure to be mistaken, or suffer my purer affections to be sodded with the odious attributes of covetousness and ambitious falsehood.

LORD WENTWORTH.

Oaths would debase the dignity of virtue, Else I could swear by him, the power who clothed The sun with light, and gave you starry host Their chaste unsullied lustre.

FRANCIS.

I am not now what I once was; for, since I parted from thee, fate has tarnished my glories.

TRAPP.

TO STAND, STOP, REST, STAGNATE.

To STAND, in German stehen, etc., Latin sto, Greek στημι, to stand, Hebrew sat, to settle. STOP, in Saxon stoppan, etc., conveys the ideas of pressing, thickening, like the Latin stipa, and the Greek στυβη; whence it has been made in English to express immovability. REST, v. Esse. STAGNATE, in Latin stagnatus, participle of stagnare, comes from stagnum, a pool, and that either from sto, to stand, because waters stand perpetually in a pool, or from the Greek στυγος, an enclosure, because a pool is an enclosure for waters.

The absence of motion is expressed by all these terms; stand is the most general of all the terms: to stand is simply not to move; to stop is to cease to move: we stand either for want of inclination or power to move; but we stop from a disinclination to go on: to rest is to stop from an express dislike to motion; we may stop for purposes of convenience, or because we have no farther to go, but we rest from fatigue.

The leaders having charge from you to stand, Will not go off until they hear you speak.

SHAKESPEARE.

He seemed as if he wished to stop, but was impelled forward by an invisible power.

HAWKSWORTH.

Thither let us tend

From off the tossing of these fiery waves, Then rest, if any rest can harbor there.

SHAKESPEARE.

To stagnate is only a species of standing as respects liquids; water may both stand and stagnate; but the former is a temporary, the latter a permanent stand: water stands in a puddle, but it stagnates in a pond or in any confined space.

Where Ufens glides along the lowly lands, Or the black water of Poyntins skinds.

DRYDEN.

The water which now rises must all have stagnated.

WOODWARD.

All these terms admit of an extended application; business stands still, or there is a stand to business; a mercantile house stops, or stops payment; an affair rests undecided, or rests in the hands of a person; trade stagnates.

Whither can we run,

Where make a stand?

DRYDEN.

I am afraid, should I put a stop now to this design, now that it is so near being completed, I shall find it difficult to resume it.

MELMOTH'S PLINY.

Who rests of immortality assur'd Is safe, whatever ills are here endur'd.

JENYNS.

The soul, deprived of those ventilations of passions which arise from social intercourse, is reduced to a state of stagnation.

BRATTLE.

STATE, REALM, COMMONWEALTH.

THE STATE is that consolidated part of a nation in which lies its power and greatness. The REALM, from royume, a kingdom, is any state whose government is monarchical. The COMMONWEALTH is the grand body of a nation, consisting both of the government and people, which forms the commonweal, welfare, or wealth.

The ruling idea in the sense and application of the word state is that of government in its most abstract sense; affairs of State may either respect the internal regulations of a country, or they may respect the arrangements of different states with each other. The term realm is employed for the nation at large, but confined to such nations as are monarchical and aristocratical; peers of the realm sit in the English Parliament by their own right. The term commonwealth refers rather to the aggregate body of men and their possessions, than to the government of a country: it is the business of the minister to consult the interests of the commonwealth.

No man that understands the State of Poland and the United Provinces will be able to range them under any particular names of government that have been invented.

TEMPLE.

Then Saturn came, who fled the power of Jove, Robb'd of his realms, and banished from above.

DRYDEN.

Civil dissension is a viperous worm,

That gnaws the bowels of the commonwealth.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO STICK, CLEAVE, ADHERE.

STICK is in Saxon stican, low German steken, Latin stigo, Greek στυγω, to prick, Hebrew stock, to press. CLEAVE, in Saxon cleofen, low German kliven, Danish klæve, is connected with our words glue and lime, in Latin gluten, Greek κόλλα, lime. ADHERE, v. To attach.

These terms all express the being joined to a body so as not to part from it without an effort. Stick, which is the general and familiar expression, denotes a junction more or less close: things may stick very slightly, so as to come off with the smallest touch, or things may be made to stick together so fast that they cannot be separated; wetted paper may stick for a time, and by means of glue may stick firmly.

The green caterpillar breedeth in the inward parts of roses not blown where the dew sicketh.
BACON.

What sticks may stick in any manner, but what adheres, when said of natural bodies, adheres by the sticking on the outer surface: a foot sticks in the mud; wax adheres to the fingers. Adhesion, denot-ing a property of matter, is a scientific term.

Why, therefore, may not the minute parts of other bodies, if they be conveniently shaped for adhesion, stick to one another, as well as to this spirit? BOTLE.

Cleave is seldomer used than either of the other terms, but always implies a close adhesion produced by some particular cause.

See! how the mould, as loath to leave
So sweet a burden, still doth cleave. WALLER.

Stick and adhere may also be applied figuratively, with the like distinction.

Adieu, then, O my soul's far better part;
Thy image sticks so close
That the blood follows from my rearing heart.
DRYDEN.

That there's a God from nature's voice, is clear;
And yet what errors to this truth adhere!
JENYNS.

As the act of conscious agents, stick is,
as before, the familiar expression, whether applied to material or spiritual objects; a person may stick with his body or his mind to anything: in both cases it is an act of determination or perseverance.

The boys were gaudily dressed, and made a pretty appearance. We were surprised to see how well they stuck on (their horses).
BRYDGE.

A person cleaves or adheres to an object, in the former case out of feeling, in the latter case from principle: a drowning man will cleave to anything by which he can be saved; a conscientious man adheres to the truth.

Gold and his gains no more employ his mind,
But, driving o'er the billows with the wind,
Cleaves to one faithful plank, and leaves the rest behind. ROWE.

He showed his firm adherence to it (religion).
ADDISON.

TO STIFLE, SUPPRESS, SMOTHER.

STIFLE is a frequentative of stuff, in Latin stipo, and Greek στυφω, to make tight or close. SUPPRESS, v. To repress.
SMOTHER, as a frequentative of smut or smoke, signifies to cover with smut or smoke.

Stifle and smother in their literal sense will be more properly considered under the article of Suffocate, etc. (v. To suffocate); they are here taken in a moral application. The leading idea in all these terms is that of keeping out of view:
stifle is applicable to the feelings only;
suppress to the feelings or to outward circumstances; smother to outward circumstances only: we stifle resentment; we suppress anger: the former is an act of some continuance; the latter is the act of the moment: we stifle our resentment by abstaining to take any measures of retaliation; we suppress the rising emotion of anger, so as not to give it utterance or even the expression of a look.
It requires time and powerful motives to stifle, but only a single effort to suppress;
nothing but a long course of vice can enable a man to stifle the admonitions and reproaches of conscience; a sense of prudence may sometimes lead a man to suppress the joy which an occurrence produces in his mind. In regard to outward circumstances, we say that a book is suppressed by the authority of government; that vice is suppressed by the exertions of those who have power: an affair is smothered so that it shall not become generally known, or the fire is smothered under the embers.

Art, brainless art! our furious charioteer
(For nature's voice unstifled would recall),
Drives headlong to the precipice of death.
YOUNG.

They foresaw the violence with which this indignation would burst out after being so long suppressed.

ROBERTSON.

Great and generous principles not being kept up and cherished, but smothered in sensual delights, God suffers them to sink into low and inglorious satisfaction.

TO STIR, MOVE.

STIR is in German stören, old German stiren or steren, Latin turbo, Greek rupßn or θουβñ, trouble or tumult. MOVE, v. Motion.

Stir is here a specific, move a generic term: we may move in any manner, but to stir is to move so as to disturb the rest and composure either of the body or mind; the term stir is therefore mostly employed in cases where any motion, however small, is a disturbance: a soldier must not stir from the post which he has to defend; atrocious criminals or persons raving mad are bound hand and foot, that they may not stir.

At first the groves are scarcely seen to stir.

THOMSON.

I've read that things inanimate have mov'd,
And as with living souls have been inform'd,
By magic numbers and persuasive sounds.

CONGREVE.

STOCK, STORE.

STOCK, from stick, stock, stow, and stuff, signifies any quantity laid up. STORE, in Welsh stor, comes from the Hebrew salar, to hide.

The ideas of wealth and stability being naturally allied, it is not surprising that stock, which expresses the latter idea, should also be put for the former, particularly as the abundance here referred to serves as a foundation, in the same manner as stock in the literal sense does to a tree. Store likewise implies a quantity; but, agreeable to the derivation of the word, it implies an accumulated quantity. Any quantity of materials which is in hand may serve as a stock for a given purpose; thus a few shillings with some persons may be their stock in trade: any quantity of materials brought together for a given purpose may serve as a store; thus the industrious ant collects a store of grain for the winter. The stock is that which must increase of itself; it is the source and foundation of industry: the store is that which we must add to occasionally; it is that from which we draw in time of need. By a stock we gain riches; by a store we guard against want.

Prodigal men

Feel not their own stock wasting. B. JONSON.

He left great store of arms. CLARENDON.

The same distinction subsists between these words in their moral application; he who wishes to speak a foreign language must have a stock of familiar words; stores of learning are frequently lost to the world for want of means and opportunity to bring them forth to public view.

He had thereby an opportunity to gain a new stock of reputation and honor. CLARENDON.

It will not suffice to rally all one's little utmost into one's discourse, which can constitute a divine. Any man would then quickly be drained; and his short stock would serve but for one meeting in ordinary converse; therefore these must be store, plenty, and a treasure, lest he turn broker in divinity.

SOUTH.

As verbs, to stock and to store both signify to provide; but the former is a provision for the present use, and the latter for some future purpose: a tradesman stocks himself with such articles as are most salable; a fortress or a ship is stored: a person stocks himself with patience, or stores his memory with knowledge.

Finding his country pretty well stocked with inhabitants, he instituted a poll. POTTER.

To store the vessel let the care be mine. POPE.

STORY, TALE.

THE STORY (v. Anecdote) is either an actual fact or something feigned; the TALE (v. Fable) is always feigned: stories are circulated respecting the accidents and occurrences which happen to persons in the same place; tales of distress are told by many merely to excite compassion. When both are taken for that which is fictitious, the story is either an untruth, or falsifying of some fact, or it is altogether an invention; the tale is always an invention. As an untruth, the story is commonly told by children; and as a fiction, the story is commonly made for children: the tale is of deeper invention, formed by men of mature understanding, and adapted for persons of mature years.

Meantime the village rouses up the fire,
While well attested, and as well believed,
Heard solemn, goes the goblin story round.

THOMSON.

He makes that pow'r to trembling nations known,
But rarely this, not for each vulgar end,
As superstitious idle fables pretend. JENYNS.

STRAIGHT, RIGHT, DIRECT.

STRAIGHT, from the Latin strictus, participle of stringo, to tighten or bind, signifies confined, that is, turning neither to the right nor left. Straight is applied, therefore, in its proper sense, to corporeal objects; a path which is straight, is kept within a shorter space than if it were curved. RIGHT and DIRECT, from the Latin rectus, regulated or made as it ought, are said of that which is made by the force of the understanding, or by an actual effort, what one wishes it to be: hence, the mathematician speaks of a right line, as the line which lies most justly between two points, and has been made the basis of mathematical figures; and the moralist speaks of the right opinion, as that which has been formed by the best rule of the understanding; and, on the same ground, we speak of a direct answer, as that which has been framed so as to bring soonest and easiest to the point desired.

Truth is the shortest and nearest way to our end, carrying us thither in a straight line.

TILLOTSON.

Then from pole to pole

He views in breadth, and, without longer pause,
Down right into the world's first region throws
His flight precipitant. MILTON.

There be that are in nature faithful and sincere, and plain and direct, not crafty and involved. BACON.

STRAIN, SPRAIN, STRESS, FORCE.

STRAIN and SPRAIN are without doubt variations of the same word, namely, the Latin stringo, to pull tight, or to stretch; they have now, however, a distinct application: to strain is to extend beyond its ordinary length by some extraordinary effort; to sprain is to strain so as to put out of its place, or extend to an injurious length: the ankle and the wrist are liable to be sprained by a contusion; the back and other parts of the body may be strained by over-exertion.

In all pain there is a deformity by a solution of continuity, as in cutting, or by a tendency to solution, as in convulsions and strains. GAY.

Should the big last extend the shoe too wide,
The sudden turn may stretch the swelling vein,
Thy cracking joint unhinge or ankle sprain.

GAY.

Strain and STRESS are kindred terms, as being both variations of stretch and stringo; but they differ now very considerably in their application: figuratively we speak of straining a nerve, or straining a point, to express making great exertions, even beyond our ordinary powers; and morally we speak of laying a stress upon any particular measure or mode of action, signifying to give a thing importance: the strain (v. Stress) may be put for the course of sentiment which we express, and the manner of expressing it; the stress (v. Stress) may be put for the efforts of the voice in uttering a word or syllable: a writer may proceed in a strain of panegyric or invective; a speaker or a reader lays a stress on certain words by way of distinguishing them from others. To strain is properly a species of FORCING; we may force in a variety of ways, that is, by the exercise of force upon different bodies, and in different directions; but to strain is to exercise force by stretching or prolonging bodies; thus to strain a cord is to pull it to its full extent; but we may speak of forcing any hard substance in, or forcing it out, or forcing it through, or forcing it from a body: a door or a lock may be forced by violently breaking them; but a door or a lock may be strained by putting the hinges or the spring out of their place. So, likewise, a person may be said to force himself to speak, when by a violent exertion he gives utterance to his words; but he strains his throat or his voice when he exercises the force on the throat or lungs so as to extend them. Force and stress, as nouns, are in like manner comparable when they are applied to the mode of utterance; we must use a certain force in the pronunciation of every word; this, therefore, is indefinite and general; but the stress is that particular and strong degree of force which is exerted in the pronunciation of certain words.

There was then (before the fall) no poring, no struggling with memory, no straining for invention. SOUTH.

Was ever any one observed to come out of a tavern fit for his study, or indeed for anything requiring stress? SOUTH.

Oppose not rage, while rage is in its force.

SHAKESPEARE.

STRAIT, NARROW.

STRAIT, in Latin strictus, participle of stringo, to bind close, signifies bound tight, that is, brought into a small compass: NARROW, which is a variation of near, expresses a mode of nearness or closeness. Strait is a particular term; narrow is general: straitness is an artificial mode of narrowness; a coat is strait which is made to compress a body within a small compass: narrow is either the artificial or the natural property of a body; as a narrow ribbon, or a narrow leaf. That which is strait is so by the means of other bodies, as a piece of water confined close on each side by land is called a strait: whatever is bounded by sides that are near each other is narrow; thus a piece of land whose prolonged sides are at a small distance from each other is narrow.

They are afraid to meet her if they have missed the church, but then they are more afraid to see her, if they are laced as strait as they can possibly be. LAW.

No narrow frith
He had to pass. MILTON.

The same distinction applies to these terms in their moral or extended use.

A faithless heart, how despicably small,
Too strait aught great or generous to receive! YOUNG.

Men should accustom themselves by the light of particulars to enlarge their minds to the amplitude of the world, and not reduce the world to the narrowness of their minds. BACON.

STRANGER, FOREIGNER, ALIEN.

STRANGER, in French étranger, Lat. in extraneus or extra, in Greek ek, signifies out of, that is, out of another country: FOREIGNER, from foris, abroad, and ALIEN, from alienus, another's, have obviously the same original meaning: they have, however, deviated in their acceptations.

Stranger is a general term, and applies to one not known, or not an inhabitant, whether of the same or another country; foreigner is applied only to strangers of another country; and alien to one who has no political or natural tie. Ulysses, after his return from the Trojan war, was a stranger in his own house; the French are foreigners in England, and the English in France; neither can enjoy, as aliens, the same privileges in a foreign country as they do in their own: the laws of hospitality require us to treat strangers with more ceremony than we do members of the same family, or very intimate friends: the lower orders of the English are apt to treat foreigners with an undeserved contempt; every alien is obliged, in time of war, to have a license for residing in England.

In primitive times the Athenians excluded all strangers, that is, all that were not members of their commonwealth. POTTER.

I am a most poor woman, and a foreigner,
Not born in your dominions. SHAKESPEARE.

Like you, an alien in a land unknown,
I learn to pity woes so like my own. DEYDEN.

Stranger is sometimes taken for one not acquainted with an object, or not experienced in its effects: foreigner is used only in the proper sense; but the epithet foreign sometimes signifies not belonging to an object: alien is applied in its natural sense to that which is unconnected by any tie.

I was no stranger to the original; I had also studied Virgil's design, and his disposition of it. POPE.

All the distinctions of this little life
Are quite cataneous, quite foreign to the man. YOUNG.

To the foster-parent give the care
Of thy superfluous brood; she'll cherish kind
The alien offspring. SOMERVILLE.

STREAM, CURRENT, TIDE.

A FLUID body in a progressive motion is the object described in common by these terms: STREAM is the most general, the other two are but modes of the stream: stream, in Saxon stream, in German strom, is an onomatopœia which describes the prolongation of any body in a narrow line along the surface; a CURRENT, from curro, to run, is a stream running in a particular direction; and a TIDE, from tide, in German zeit, time, is a periodical stream or current. All rivers are streams, which are more or less gentle according to the nature of the ground through which they pass; the force of the current is very much increased by the confinement of any water between rocks, or by means of artificial impediments: the tide is high or low, strong or weak, at different hours of the day; when the tide is high, the current is strongest.

Beneath the hedge or near the stream

A worm is known to stray,
That throws by night a lucid beam
Which disappears by day.

COWPER.

His body is said to have been found some time afterward near Taurominium (about thirty miles distant), it having been observed that what is swallowed up by Charybdis is carried south by the current, and thrown out upon that coast.

BAYDENE.

When in her gulfs the rushing sea subsides,
She drains the ocean with her reluctant tides.

POPE.

From knowing the proper application of these terms, their figurative and moral application become obvious: a stream of air or a stream of light is a prolonged moving body of air or light; so a stream of charity, bounty, and the like, is that which flows in a stream: a current of air is a particular stream of air passing through or between other bodies, as the current of air in a house; so the current of men's minds or opinions, that is, the running in a particular line: the tide being a temporary stream; fashion, or the ruling propensity of the day, may be denominated a tide: it is sometimes vain to attempt to stem the tide of folly, it is therefore wiser to get out of its reach.

When now the rapid stream of eloquence
Bears all before it, passion, reason, sense,
Can its dread thunder or its lightning's force
Derive their essence from a mortal source?

JENYNS.

With secret course, which no loud storms annoy,
Glides the smooth current of domestic joy.

GOLDENITH.

There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which taken at the flood leads on to fortune.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO STRENGTHEN, FORTIFY, INVIGORATE.

STRENGTHEN, from strength, and FORTIFY, from fortis and facio, signify to make strong: INVIGORATE signifies to put in vigor (v. Energy).

Whatever adds to the strength, be it in ever so small a degree, strengthens;
exercise strengthens either body or mind:
whatever gives strength for a particular emergence fortifies; religion fortifies the mind against adversity: whatever adds to the strength, so as to give a positive degree of strength, invigorates; morning exercise in fine weather invigorates.

There is a certain bias toward knowledge in every mind, which may be strengthened and improved.

BUDGELL.

This relation will not be wholly without its use, if those who languish under any part of its sufferings shall be enabled to fortify their patience by reflecting that they feel only those afflictions from which the abilities of Savage could not exempt him.

JOHNSON.

For much the pack

And bask in his invigorating ray.

SOMERVILLE.

STRENUOUS, BOLD.

STRENUOUS, in Latin strenuus, from the Greek σπρηνς, undaunted, untamed, that is, σπρηνς, to be without all rein or control, expresses much more than BOLD (v. Bold); boldness is a prominent idea, but it is only one idea which enters into the signification of strenuousness;
this combines likewise fearlessness, activity, and ardor. An advocate in a cause may be strenuous, or merely bold:
in the former case he omits nothing that can be either said or done in favor of the cause, he is always on the alert, he heeds no difficulties or danger; but in the latter case he only displays his spirit in the undisguised declaration of his sentiments. Strenuous supporters of any opinion are always strongly convinced of the truth of that which they support, and warmly impressed with a sense of its importance; but the bold supporter of an opinion may be impelled rather with the desire of showing his boldness than maintaining his point.

While the good weather continued, I strolled about the country, and made many strenuous attempts to run away from this odious giddiness.

BEATTIE.

Fortune befriends the bold.

DRYDEN.

STRESS, STRAIN, EMPHASIS, ACCENT.

STRESS (v. Strain) and STRAIN (v. Strain) are general both in sense and application; the former still more than the latter: EMPHASIS, from the Greek φαίνω, to appear, signifying making to appear, and ACCENT, in Latin accentus, from canto, to sing, signifying to suit the tune or tone of the voice, are modes of the stress. Stress is applicable to all bodies, the powers of which may be tried by exertion; as the stress upon a rope, upon a shaft of a carriage, a wheel or spring in a machine: the strain is an excessive stress, by which a thing is thrown out of its course; there may be a strain in most cases where there is a stress: but stress and strain are to be compared with emphasis and accent, particularly in the exertion of the voice, in which case the stress is a strong and special exertion of the voice on one word, or one part of a word, so as to distinguish it from another; but the strain is the undue exertion of the voice beyond its usual pitch, in the utterance of one or more words: we lay a stress for the convenience of others; but when we strain the voice it is as much to the annoyance of others as it is hurtful to ourselves. The stress may consist in an elevation of voice, or a prolonged utterance; the emphasis is that species of stress which is employed to distinguish one word or syllable from another: the stress may be accidental; but the emphasis is an intentional stress: ignorant people and children are often led to lay the stress on little and unimportant words in a sentence; speakers sometimes find it convenient to mark particular words, to which they attach a value, by the emphasis with which they utter them. The stress may be casual or regular, on words or syllables; the accent is that kind of regulated stress which is laid on one syllable to distinguish it from another: there are many words in our own language, such as subject, object, present, and the like, where, to distinguish the verb from the noun, the accent falls on the last syllable for the former, and on the first syllable for the latter.

Those English syllables which I call long ones receive a peculiar stress of voice from their acute or circumflex accent, as in quickly, dōwry.

FOSTER.

Singing differs from vociferation in this, that it consists in a certain harmony: nor is it performed with so much straining of the voice.

JAMES.

Emphasis not so much regards the time as a certain grandeur whereby some letter, syllable, word, or sentence is rendered more remarkable than the rest by a more vigorous pronunciation and a long stay upon it.

HOLDER.

The correctness and harmony of English verse depends entirely upon its being composed of a certain number of syllables, and its having the accents of those syllables properly placed.

TEWITT.

In reference to the use of words, these terms may admit of a further distinction; for we may lay a stress or emphasis on a particular point of our reasoning, in the first case, by enlarging upon it longer than on other points; or, in the second case, by the use of stronger expressions or epithets. The strain or accent may be employed to designate the tone or manner in which we express ourselves, that is, the spirit of our discourse: in familiar language, we talk of a person's proceeding in a strain of panegyric, or of censure; but, in poetry, persons are said to pour forth their complaints in tender accents.

After such a mighty stress, so irrationally laid upon two slight, empty words ("self-consciousness" and "mutual consciousness"), have they made anything but the author himself (Sherlock on the Trinity) better understood? SOUTH.

The idle, who are neither wise for this world nor the next, are emphatically called by Doctor Tillotson "fools at large." SPECTATOR.

An assured hope of future glory raises him to a pursuit of a more than ordinary strain of duty and perfection.

For these my tuneful accents will I raise.

DRYDEN.

STRICT, SEVERE.

STRICT, from strictus, bound or confined, characterizes the thing which binds or keeps in control: SEVERE (v. Austere) characterizes in the proper sense the disposition of the person to inflict pain, and in an extended application the thing which inflicts pain. The term strict is, therefore, taken always in the good sense; severe is good or bad, according to circumstances: he who has authority over others must be strict in enforcing obedience, in keeping good order, and a proper attention to their duties; but it is possible to be very severe in punishing those who are under us, and yet very lax in all matters that our duty demands of us.

If a strict hand be kept over children, they will at that age be tractable.

LOCKE.

Lycurgus then, who bow'd beneath the force
Of strictest discipline, severely wise,
All human passions.

THOMSON.

Strict may with propriety be applied to one's self as well as others: severe is applied to one's self, only to denote self-mortification.

He was so strict in the observation of his word and promise as a commander, that he was not to be persuaded to stay in the West when he found it was not in his power to perform his agreement.

CLARENDON.

Those infirmities and that license which he had formerly indulged to himself, he put off with severity.

CLARENDON.

STRIFE, CONTENTION.

STRIFE and CONTENTION, though derived from the verbs strive and contend (v. To strive), have this further distinction, that they are both taken in the bad sense for acts of anger or passion; in this case strife is mostly used for verbal strife, where each party strives against the other by the use of contumelious or provoking expressions; contention is used for an angry striving with others, either in respect to matters of opinion or matters of claim, in which each party seeks to get the better of the other. Strife is the result of a quarrelsome humor; contention, of a restless, selfish, and greedy humor: strife is most commonly to be found in private life; contention but too frequently mingles itself in all the affairs of men.

A solid and substantial greatness of soul looks down with a generous neglect on the censures and applauses of the multitude, and places a man beyond the little noise and strife of tongues.

ADDISON.

Contention bold with iron lungs,
And slander with her hundred tongues. MOORE.

STRIVE, CONTEND, VIE.

STRIVE, in Saxon strafan, Dutch streven, like the Latin strapo, to bustle, comes in all probability from the Hebrew rob, to contend, to prosecute a claim, properly signifying to use an effort. CONTEND, v. To contend. VIE may either be changed from vieu, signifying to look at with the desire to excel, or from the Saxon wigan, to contend with.

To strive is the act of individuals without regard to others; as when a person strives to get a living, or to improve himself; to contend and vie both denote the act of an individual in reference to others; as to contend in a lawsuit, to vie in dress. To strive may sometimes be applied where there is more than one party, as to strive for the mastery; but in this case the efforts of the individual are more distinctly considered than when we speak of contending for a prize; for this reason these words may be applied in precisely the same connection, but still with this distinction.

Mad as the seas and the winds, when both contend
Which is the master.

SHAKESPEARE.

Mad as the winds

When for the empire of the main they strive.

DENHAM.

Striving consists always of some active effort, as when persons strive at the oar; contending may proceed verbally, as when men contend for their opinions; and vying may be indicated by any expression of the wish to put one's self in a state of competition with another; as persons vie with each other in the grandeur of their houses or equipages.

They both seemed to vie with each other in holding out a brilliant example to the rest of the fleet.

CLARKE.

Contend may be used in a moral application, as to contend with difficulties; and vie may be used figuratively, as one flower may be said to vie with another in the beauty of its colors.

One of the most alarming evils with which he had to contend was intestine disaffection.

BISSET.

Shall a form

MASON.

STRONG, ROBUST, STURDY.

STRONG is in all probability a variation of strict, which is in German strenge, because strength is altogether derived from the close texture of bodies. ROBUST, in Latin robustus, from robur, signifies literally having the strength of oak. STURDY, like the word stout, steady (v. Firm), comes in all probability from stehen, to stand, signifying capable of standing.

Strong is here the generic term; the others are specific, or specify strength under different circumstances; robust is a positive and high degree of strength arising from a peculiar bodily make. a man may be strong from the strength of his constitution, from the power which is inherent in his frame; but a robust man has strength both from the size and texture of his body, he has a bone and nerve which is endowed with great power. A little man may be strong, although not robust; a tall, stout man, in full health, may be termed robust. A man may be strong in one part of his body and not in another; he may be stronger at one time, from particular circumstances, than he is at another: but a robust man is strong in his whole body; and, as he is robust by nature, he will cease to be so only from disease.

If thou hast strength, 'twas Heaven that strength bestow'd. POPE.

The huntsman, ever gay, robust, and bold,
Defies the noxious vapor. SOMERVILLE.

Sturdiness lies both in the make of the body and the temper of the mind: a sturdy man is capable of making resistance, and ready to make it; he must be naturally strong, and not of slender make, but he need not be robust: a sturdy peasant presents us with a man who, both by nature and habit, is formed for withstanding the inroads of an enemy.

This must be done, and I would fain see
Mortal so sturdy as to gainsay. HUDIBRAS.

Things as well as persons may be said to be strong, as opposed to the weak; as a strong rope, a strong staff: robust and sturdy are only said of persons, or things personal; as a robust make, a robust habit; a sturdy air, a sturdy stroke.

Full on the ankle fell the ponderous stone,
Burst the strong nerves and crush'd the solid bone. POPE.

Beef may confer robustness on my son's limbs,
but will debilitate his mind. ARBUTHNOT.

Beneath their sturdy strokes the billows roar.
DRYDEN.

STUPID, DULL.

STUPID, in Latin stupidus, from stupere, to be amazed or bewildered, expresses an amazement which is equivalent to a deprivation of understanding: DULL is connected with the German toll and Swedish stolig, mad, and the Latin stultus, simple or foolish, and denotes a simple deficiency. Stupidity in its proper sense is natural to a man, although a particular circumstance may have a similar effect upon the understanding; he who is questioned in the presence of others may appear very stupid in that which is otherwise very familiar to him. Dull is an incidental quality, arising principally from the state of the animal spirits: a writer may sometimes be dull who is otherwise vivacious and pointed; a person may be dull in a large circle, while he is very lively in private intercourse.

A stupid butt is only fit for the conversation of ordinary people. ADDISON.

It is the great advantage of a trading nation that there are very few in it so dull and heavy who may not be placed in stations of life which may give them an opportunity of making their fortunes. ADDISON.

SUAVITY, URBANITY.

SUAVITY is literally sweetness; and URBANITY the refinement of the city, in distinction from the country: inasmuch, therefore, as a polite education tends to soften the mind and the manners, it produces suavity; but suavity may sometimes arise from natural temper, and exist, therefore, without urbanity; although there cannot be urbanity without suavity. By the suavity of our manners we gain the love of those around us; by the urbanity of our manners we render ourselves agreeable companions: hence also arises another distinction, that the term suavity may be applied to other things, as the voice, or the style; but urbanity to manners only.

The suavity of Menander's style might be more to Plutarch's taste than the irregular sublimity of Aristophanes. CUMBERLAND.

The virtue called urbanity by the moralists, or a courtly behavior, consists in a desire to please the company. POPE.

SUBJECT, LIABLE, EXPOSED, OBNOXIOUS.

SUBJECT, in Latin subjectus, participle of subjicio, to cast under, signifies thrown underneath. LIABLE, compounded of lie and able, signifies ready to lie near or lie under. EXPOSED, in Latin expositus, participle of expono, compounded of ex and pono, signifies set out, set within the view or reach. OBNOXIOUS, in Latin obnoxius, compounded of ob and noxium, mischief, signifies in the way of mischief.

All these terms are applied to those circumstances in human life by which we are affected independently of our own choice. Direct necessity is included in the term subject; whatever we are obliged to suffer, that we are subject to; we may apply remedies to remove the evil, but often in vain: liable conveys more the idea of casualties; we may suffer that which we are liable to, but we may also escape the evil if we are careful: exposed conveys the idea of a passive state, into which we may be brought either through our own means or through the instrumentalities of others; we are exposed to that which we are not in a condition to keep off from ourselves; it is frequently not in our power to guard against the evil: obnoxious signifies properly exposed to the mischief of anything; as obnoxious to the multitude, that is, exposed to their resentment: a person may avoid bringing himself into this state, but he cannot avoid the consequences which will ensue from being thus involved. We are subject to disease, or subject to death; this is the irrevocable law of our nature: tender people are liable to catch cold; all persons are liable to make mistakes: a person is exposed to insults who provokes the anger of a low-bred man: a minister sometimes renders himself obnoxious to the people.

When we see our enemies and friends gliding away before us, let us not forget that we are all subject to the general law of mortality.

JOHNSON.

The sinner is not only liable to that disappointment of success which so often frustrates all the designs of men, but liable to a disappointment still more cruel, of being successful and miserable at once.

BLAIR.

On the bare earth expos'd he lies,
With not a friend to close his eyes.

DRYDEN.

On the death of Lord Coventry, his loss was more visible and manifest in his successor, a man extremely obnoxious to the people on the subject of ship-money.

CLARENDON.

Subject, liable, and exposed may be applied to things as well as persons, with a similar distinction: things are subject by nature, as subject to decay; liable by accident, as liable to be broken; exposed by situation, or for want of protection, as exposed to the cutting winds. Obnoxious is said only of persons, or that which is personal.

The devout man aspires after some principles of more perfect felicity, which shall not be subject to change or decay.

BLAIR.

The having two eyes might thus be said to be rather an inconvenience than a benefit; since one eye would answer the purpose of sight as well as two, and be less liable to illusion. But it is otherwise.

GOLDSMITH.

The Spaniard's design by this allegory was to show the many assaults to which the life of man is exposed.

ADDISON.

And much he blames the softness of his mind,
Obnoxious to the charms of womankind.

DRYDEN.

To subject and expose, as verbs, are taken in the same sense: a person sub- jects himself to impertinent freedoms by descending to indecent familiarities with his inferiors; he exposes himself to the derision of his equals by an affectation of superiority.

These feudal services being almost entirely arbitrary, subjected the tenants to many vexations.

ADAM SMITH.

The ancient Grecians seemed to have treated the bodies of their dead enemies in a very indecent manner, exposing them to scorn and ignominy.

POTTER.

SUBJECT, SUBORDINATE, INFERIOR, SUBSERVIENT.

SUBJECT, v. Subject. SUBORDINATE, compounded of sub and order, signifies to be in an order that is under others. INFERIOR, in Latin inferior, comparative of inferus, low, which probably comes from infero, to cast into, because inferiors are cast into places that are low. SUBSERVIENT, compounded of sub and servio, signifies serving under something else.

These terms may either express the relation of persons to persons or things, or of things to things. Subject in the first case respects the exercise of power; subordinate is said of the station and office; inferior, either of a man's outward circumstances, or of his merits and qualifications; subservient, of one's relative services to another, but always in a bad sense. According to the law of nature, a child should be subject to his parents: according to the law of God and man, he must be subject to his prince: the good order of society cannot be rightly maintained unless there be some to act in a subordinate capacity: men of inferior talent have a part to act which, in the aggregate, is of no less importance than that which is sustained by men of the highest endowments: men of no principle or character will be most subservient to the base purposes of those who pay them best. It is the part of the prince to protect the subject, and of the subject to love and honor the prince: it is the part of the exalted to treat the subordinate with indulgence, and of the latter to show respect to those under whom they are placed: it is the part of the superior to instruct, assist, and encourage the inferior; it is the part of the latter to be willing to learn, ready to obey, and prompt to execute. It is not necessary for any one to act the degrading part of being subservient to another.

Contemplate the world as subject to the Divine dominion. BLAIR.

Whether dark presages of the night proceed from any latent power of the soul during her abstraction, or from any operation of subordinate spirits, has been a matter of dispute. ADDISON.

A great person gets more by obliging his inferior than disdaining him. SOUTH.

Wicked spirits may by their cunning carry farther on a seeming confederacy or subserviency to the designs of a good angel. DRYDEN.

In the second instance subject has the same sense as in the preceding article (v. Subject), when taken in the relation of things to things; subordinate designates the degree of relative importance between things; inferior designates every circumstance which can render things comparatively higher or lower; subservient designates the relative utility of things under certain circumstances, but not always in the bad sense. All things in this world are subject to change; matters of subordinate consideration ought to be entirely set out of the question when any grand object is to be obtained: things of inferior value must necessarily sell for an inferior price: there is nothing so insignificant but it may be made subservient to some purpose.

Those countries where there are volcanoes are most subject to earthquakes. GOLDSMITH.

The idea of pain in its highest degree is much stronger than the highest degree of pleasure, and preserves the same superiority through all the subordinate gradations. BURKE.

I can myself remember the time when in respect of music our reigning taste was in many degrees inferior to the French. SHAFTESBURY.

Though a writer may be wrong himself, he may chance to make his errors subservient to the cause of truth. BURKE.

TO SUBJECT, SUBJUGATE, SUBDUE.

SUBJECT signifies to make subject. SUBJUGATE, from jugum, a yoke, signifies to bring under the yoke. SUBDUE, v. To conquer.

Subject is here the generic, the two others specific terms: we may subject either individuals or nations; but we subjugate only nations. We subject ourselves to reproof, to inconvenience, or to the influence of our passions; one nation subjugates another: subjugate and subdue are both employed with regard to nations that are compelled to submit to the conqueror: but subjugate expresses even more than subdue, for it implies to bring into a state of permanent submission; whereas to subdue may be only a nominal and temporary subjection: Cæsar subjugated the Gauls, for he made them subjects to the Roman empire; but Alexander subdued the Indian nations, who revolted after his departure.

Where there is no awe, there will be no subjection. SOUTH.

O fav'rite virgin, that hast warm'd the breast Whose sov'reign dictates subjugate the east. PRIOR.

Thy son (nor is th' appointed season far) In Italy shall wage successful war, Till, after every foe subdu'd, the sun Thrice through the signs his annual race shall run. DRYDEN.

TO SUBSIDE, ABATE, INTERMIT.

SUBSIDE, from the Latin sub and sedo, signifies to settle to the bottom. ABATE, v. Abate. INTERMIT, from the Latin inter and mitto, signifies to leave a space or interval between.

A settlement after agitation is the peculiar meaning of subside. That which has been put into commotion subsides: heavy particles subside in a fluid that is at rest, and tumults are said to subside: a diminution of strength characterizes the meaning of abate; that which has been high in action may abate; the rain abates after it has been heavy; and a man's anger abates: alternate action and rest is implied in the word intermit; whatever is in action may sometimes cease from action; labor without intermission is out of the power of man.

It was not long before this joy subsided in the remembrance of that dignity from which I had fallen. HAWKESWORTH.

But first to Heav'n thy due devotions pay, And annual gifts on Ceres' altar lay, When winter's rage abates. DRYDEN.

Whether the time of intermission be spent in company or in solitude, the understanding is abstracted from the object of inquiry. JOHNSON.

SUBSTANTIAL, SOLID.

SUBSTANTIAL signifies having a substance: SOLID, from solum, the ground, signifies having a firm foundation. The substantial is opposed to that which is thin and has no consistency: the solid is opposed to the liquid, or that which is of loose consistency. All objects which admit of being handled are in their nature substantial; those which are of so hard a texture as to require to be cut are solid. Substantial food is that which has a consistency in itself, and is capable of giving fulness to the empty stomach: solid food is meat in distinction from drink: so substantial beings are such as consist of flesh and blood, and may be touched, in distinction from those which are airy or spiritual; the earth is solid which is so hardened as not to yield to pressure.

Melancholy spectres visit the ruins of monasteries, and frequent the solitary dwellings of the dead. They pass and repass in unsubstantial images along the forsaken galleries. HARTLEY.

A bank was thrown about its rising ground, and, being thus defended from the incursions of the sea, it became firm and solid. GOLDSMITH.

So in the moral application, the substantial is opposed to that which exists in the mind only, and which is frequently fictitious; as a substantial benefit, as distinguished from that which gratifies the mind: the solid is that which rests on reason, and has the properties of durability and reality, as a solid reputation.

Trusting in its own native and substantial worth, Scorns all meretricious ornaments. MILTON.

As the swoln columns of ascending smoke,
So solid swells thy grandeur, pigmy man. YOUNG.

SUCCESSION, SERIES, ORDER.

SUCCESSION, signifying the act or state of succeeding (v. To follow), is a matter of necessity or casualty: things succeed each other, or they are taken in succession either arbitrarily or by design: the SERIES (v. Series) is a connected succession; the ORDER (v. To place), the ordered or arranged succession. We observe the succession of events as a matter of curiosity; we trace the series of events as a matter of intelligence; we follow the order which the historian has pursued as a matter of judgment: the succession may be slow or quick; the series may be long or short; the order may be correct or incorrect. The present age has afforded a quick succession of events, and presented us with a series of atrocious attempts to disturb the peace of society under the name of liberty. The historian of these times needs only pursue the order which the events themselves point out.

We can conceive of time only by the succession of ideas one to another. HAWKSWORTH.

A number of distinct fables may contain all the topics of moral instruction; yet each must be remembered by a distinct effort of the mind, and will not recur in a series because they have no connection with each other. HAWKSWORTH.

In all verse, however familiar and easy, the words are necessarily thrown out of the order in which they are commonly used.

HAWKSWORTH.

SUCCESSIVE, ALTERNATE.

WHAT is SUCCESSIVE follows directly; what is ALTERNATE follows indirectly. A minister preaches successively who preaches every Sunday uninterruptedly at the same hour; but he preaches alternately if he preaches on one Sunday in the morning, and the other Sunday in the afternoon at the same place. The successive may be accidental or intentional; the alternate is always intentional; it may rain for three successive days, or a fair may be held for three successive days: trees are placed sometimes in alternate order, when every other tree is of the same size and kind.

Like leaves on trees, the race of men is found,
Now green in youth, now withering on the ground;

Another race the following spring supplies,
They fall successive, and successive rise. POPE.

The way of singing the psalms alternately, was when the congregation, dividing themselves into two parts, repeated the psalms by courses, verse for verse. BINGHAM.

TO SUFFOCATE, STIFLE, SMOTHER, CHOKER.

SUFFOCATE, in Latin suffocatus, participle of suffoco, compounded of sub and fauz, signifies to constrain or tighten the throat. STIFLE is a frequentative of stuff, that is, to stuff excessively. SMOTHER is a frequentative of smoke. CHOKER is probably a variation of cheek, in Saxon ceac, because strangulation is effected by a compression of the throat under the cheek-bone.

These terms express the act of stopping the breath, but under various circumstances and by various means; suffocation is produced by every kind of means, external or internal, and is therefore the most general of these terms; stifling proceeds by internal means, that is, by the admission of foreign bodies into the passages which lead to the respiratory organs: we may be suffocated by excluding the air externally, as by gagging, confining closely, or pressing violently: we may be suffocated or stified by means of vapors, close air, or smoke. To smother is to suffocate by the exclusion of air externally, as by means of any substance with which one is covered or surrounded; as smoke, dust, and the like: to choke is a mode of stifling by means of large bodies, as by a piece of food lodging in the throat.

A suffocating wind the pilgrim smites
With instant death. THOMSON.

Had the wind driven in our faces we had been in no small danger of stifling by sulphur.

BERKELEY.

Many of them have crammed great quantities of scandal down his throat, others have choked
him with lewdness and ribaldry. SOUTH.

The helpless traveller with wild surprise
Sees the dry desert all around him rise,
And, smothered in the dusty whirlwind, dies.

ADDISON.

To choke, in an extended and figurative sense, is to interrupt the action of any body by the intervention of any foreign substance, as a garden is choked with weeds; to stifle is altogether to put a stop or end to a thing by keeping it down; as to stifle resentment, sighs, etc.: to smother is to choke or prevent free action by covering or surrounding, as good resolutions are smothered by unruly desires or appetites.

Avarice, like some choking weed, teaches the finger to gripe and the hand to oppress.

HARVEY.

When my heart was ready with a sigh to cleave,
I have, with mighty anguish of my soul,
Just at the birth stified this still-born sigh.

SHAKESPEARE.

The love of jealous men breaks out furiously
(when the object of their loves is taken from them), and throws off all mixtures of suspicion which choked and smothered it before.

ADDISON.

SUPERFICIAL, SHALLOW, FLIMSY.

THE SUPERFICIAL is that which lies only at the surface; it is therefore by implication the same as the SHALLOW, which has nothing underneath: shallow being a variation of hollow or empty. Hence a person may be called either superficial or shallow, to indicate that he has not a profundity of knowledge; but, otherwise, superficiality is applied to the exercise of the thinking faculty, and shallowness to its extent. Men of free sentiments are superficial thinkers, although they may not have understandings more shallow than others. Superficial and shallow are applicable to things as well as persons: FLIMSY is applicable to things only. Flimsy most probably comes from flame, that is, flamy, showy, easily seen through. In the proper sense we may speak of giving a superficial covering of paint or color to a body; of a river or piece of water being shallow; of cotton or cloth being flimsy.

It cannot have any extensive, or, if I may so call it, a superficial spread, for then the country would be quickly undermined. GOLDSMITH.

The water in those places is found to grow more shallow. GOLDSMITH.

Those flimsy webs that break as soon as wrought. COWPER.

In the improper sense, a survey or a glance may be superficial which does not extend beyond the superficies of things; a conversation or a discourse may be shallow which does not contain a body of sentiment; and a work or performance may be flimsy which has nothing solid in it to engage the attention.

By much labor we acquire a superficial acquaintance with a few sensible objects. BLAIR.
I know thee to thy bottom; from within
Thy shallow centre to the utmost skin.

DRYDEN.

Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines. POPE.

SURFACE, SUPERFICIES.

SURFACE, compounded of sur, for super, and face, is a variation of the Latin term SUPERFICIES; and yet they have acquired this distinction, that the former is the vulgar, and the latter the scientific term; of course the former has a more indefinite and general application than the latter. A surface is either even or uneven, smooth or rough; but the mathematician always conceives of a plane superficies on which he founds his operations.

Nor to the surface of enlivened earth,
Graceful with hills and dales and leafy woods,
Her liberal tresses, is thy force confined.

THOMSON.

There is neither a straight line nor an exact superficies in all nature. GOLDSMITH.

Surface, in its moral application, is extended to whatever presents itself first to the mind of the observer.

Errors like straws upon the surface flow,
He who would search for pearls must dive below.
DAYDEN.

Superficies may be applied in its proper and definite sense to other objects than those which relate to science.

Those who have undertaken the task of reconciling mankind to their present state frequently remind us that we view only the superficies of life.
JOHNSON.

TO SURROUND, ENCOMPASS, ENVIRON, ENCIRCLE.

SURROUND, in old French surround, signifies, by means of the intensive syllable sur, over, to go all round. ENCOMPASS, compounded of en or in and compass, signifies to bring within a certain compass formed by a circle; so likewise ENVIRON, from the Latin gyrus, and the Greek γυρος, a circle, and also ENCIRCLE, signify to bring within a circle.

Surround is the most literal and general of all these terms, which signify to enclose any object either directly or indirectly. We may surround an object by standing at certain distances all round it; in this manner a person may be surrounded by other persons, and a house surrounded with trees, or an object may be surrounded by enclosing it in every direction, and at every point; in this manner a garden is surrounded by a wall. To encompass is to surround in the latter sense, and applies to objects of a great or indefinite extent: the earth is encompassed by the air, which we term the atmosphere; towns are encompassed by walls. To surround is to go round an object of any form, whether square or circular, long or short; but to environ and to encircle carry with them the idea of forming a circle round an object; thus a town or a valley may be enviromed by hills, a basin of water may be encircled by trees, or the head may be encircled by a wreath of flowers.

But not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of ev'n or morn,
But cloud instead, and ever-during dark
Surrounds me.
MILTON.

Where Orpheus on his lyre laments his love,
With beasts encompass'd, and a dancing grove.
DAYDEN.

Of fighting elements, on all sides round
Environ'd.
MILTON.
As in the hollow breast of Apennine,
Beneath the shelter of encircling hills,
A myrtle rises, far from human eye,
So flourish'd, blooming, and unseen by all,
The sweet Lavinia.
THOMSON.

In an extended or moral sense we are said to be surrounded by objects which are in great numbers and in different directions about us: thus a person living in a particular spot where he has many friends may say he is surrounded by his friends, or enviromed by objects in such manner that he cannot escape from them; so likewise a particular person may say that he is surrounded by dangers and difficulties: but, in speaking of man in a general sense, we should rather say he is encompassed by dangers, which expresses in a much stronger manner our peculiarly exposed condition.

Behold surrounding kings their pow'r combine,
And one capitulate, and one resign.
JOHNSON.
Ah! what is life? With ill encompass'd round,
Amidst our hope fate strikes the sudden wound.
GAY.

TO SUSTAIN, SUPPORT, MAINTAIN.

SUSTAIN, compounded of sus or sub and teneo, to hold, signifies to hold or keep up. SUPPORT, v. To countenance. MAINTAIN, v. To assert.

The idea of keeping up or preventing from falling is common to these terms, which vary either in the mode or object of the action. To sustain and support are frequently passive, maintain is always active. To sustain and support both imply the bearing or receiving the weight of any object, the former in reference to any great weight, the latter to any weight however small.

With labor spent, no longer can he wield
The heavy falchion, or sustain the shield,
O'erwhelm'd with darts.
DAYDEN.
Stooping to support each flower of tender stalk.
MILTON.

Sustain and support may also imply an active exercise of power or means which bring them still nearer to maintain; in this case sustain is an act of the highest power, support of any ordinary power.

The Lord of all, himself through all diffus'd,
Sustains, and is the life of all that lives.
COWPER.

He was a great lover of his country, and of his religion and justice, which he believed would only support it. CLARENDON.

So in bearing up against any opposing force; but support is here an act for the benefit of others; maintain is an act for one's own benefit: as to sustain a shock; to support one another in battle; to maintain one's self in a contest.

Their whole body amounted to but one thousand men, and these were to sustain the shock of an enemy nearly ten times their number. GOLDSMITH.

Mutual interest induced them (the burghers) to support the king, and the king to support them against the lords. ADAM SMITH.

As compass'd with a wood of spears around,
The lordly lion still maintains his ground,
So Turnus fares. DRYDEN.

Existence is said to be sustained under circumstances of weakness or pressure; it is supported by natural means, as the milk of the mother supports the babe; or indirectly by what supplies the means, as to support one's family by labor; what is maintained is upheld by pecuniary means, as to maintain a family, a fleet, etc.

The weakness of age and infancy was sustained by his bounty. JOHNSON.

Toward any who needed support or encouragement, though unknown, if fairly recommended, he was liberal. CLARENDON.

The fleet equipped at Athens was maintained after the manner prescribed by Themistocles till the time of Demosthenes. POTTER.

In the moral application, what presses on the mind is sustained, or supported, with the like distinction: grievous losses or injuries are sustained; afflictions and disappointments supported.

Wrong he sustains with temper, looks on heav'n,
Nor stoops to think his injurer his foe. YOUNG.

When he beheld them melted into tears, he himself appeared quite unmoved, inwardly supported and comforted in that hour of agony. GOLDSMITH.

Things are supported and maintained voluntarily; the former in respect to what is foreign to us, as to support an assumed character, the latter in respect to what belongs to us, as to maintain one's own character.

Ireland was judged to be the proper theatre to support his assumed character. GOLDSMITH.

God values no man more or less in placing him high and low, but every one as he maintains his post. SOUTH.

SYMMETRY, PROPORTION.

SYMMETRY, in Latin symmetria, Greek συμμετρία, from συμ and μετρον, signifies a measure that accords. PROPORTION, in Latin proportio, compounded of pro and portio, signifies every portion or part according with the other, or with the whole.

The signification of these terms is obviously the same, namely, a due admeasurement of the parts to each other and to the whole: but symmetry has now acquired but a partial application to the human body, or to things nicely fitting each other; and proportion is applied to everything which admits of dimensions, and an adaptation of the parts: hence we speak of symmetry of feature; but proportion of limbs, the proportion of the head to the body.

Sensual delights in enlarged minds give way to the sublimer pleasures of reason, which discover the causes and designs, the frame, connection, and symmetry of things. BERKELEY.

The inventors of stuffed hips had a better eye for due proportion than to add to a redundancy, because in some cases it was convenient to fill up a vacuum. CUMBERLAND.

SYMPATHY, COMPASSION, COMMISERATION, CONDOLENCE.

SYMPATHY, from the Greek συμ or συμ, with, and παθος, feeling, has the literal meaning of fellow-feeling, that is, a kindred or like feeling, or feeling in company with another. COMPASSION (v. Pity); COMMISERATION, from the Latin com and miseria, misery; CONDOLENCE, from the Latin con and doleo, to grieve, signify a like suffering, or a suffering in company. Hence it is obvious that, according to the derivation of the words, the sympathy may either be said of pleasure or pain, the rest only of that which is painful. Sympathy preserves its original meaning in its application, for we laugh or cry by sympathy; this may, however, be only a merely physical operation.

You are not young, no more am I; go to, then, there's sympathy: you are merry, so am I: ha! ha! then there's more sympathy. SHAKESPEARE.

Compassion is altogether a moral feeling, which makes us enter into the distresses of others: we may, therefore, sympathize with others, without essentially serving them; but, if we feel compassion, we naturally turn our thoughts toward relieving them.

Their countrymen were particularly attentive to their story, and sympathized with these heroes in all their adventures. ADDISON.

'Mongst those whom honest lives can recommend,
Our justice more compassion should extend. DENHAM.

Sympathy, indeed, may sometimes be taken for a secret alliance or kindred feeling between two objects.

Or sympathy, or some connatural force,
Powerful at greatest distance to unite
With secret amity, things of like kind
By secretest conveyance. MILTON.

That mind and body often sympathize
Is plain: such is this union nature ties. JENYNS.

Compassion is awakened by any sort of suffering, but particularly those which are attributable to our misfortunes; commiseration is awakened by sufferings arising from our faults; condolence is awakened by the troubles of life, to which all are equally liable. Poverty and want excite our compassion; we endeavor to relieve them: a poor criminal suffering the penalty of the law excites our commiseration; we endeavor, if possible, to mitigate his punishment: the loss which a friend sustains produces condolence; we take the best means of testifying it to him.

I am very sorry that her Majesty did not see this assembly of objects, so proper to excite that charity and compassion which she bears to every one who stands in need of it. ADDISON.

Her lowly plight
Immovable, till peace, obtained from fault
Acknowledg'd and deplored, in Adam wrought
Commiseration. MILTON.

Rather than all must suffer, some must die,
Yet nature must condole their misery. DENHAM.

Compassion is the sentiment of one mortal toward another; commiseration is represented as the feeling which our wretchedness excites in the Supreme Being. Compassion may be awakened in persons of any condition; commiseration is awakened toward those who are in an abject state of misery; condolence supposes an entire equality, and is often produced by some common calamity.

The good-natured man is apt to be moved with compassion for those misfortunes and infirmities which another would turn into ridicule. ADDISON.

Then must we those who groan beneath the weight

Of age, disease, or want, commiserate? DENHAM.

Why should I think that all that devout multitude which so lately cried Hosanna in the streets, did not also bear their part in those public condolings (in the crucifixion of our Saviour)? HALL.

SYSTEM, METHOD.

SYSTEM, in Latin systema, Greek συστημα, from συστημι, or συν and ιστημι, to stand together, signifies that which is put together so as to form a whole. METHOD, in Latin methodus, from the Greek μετα and οδος, a way by which anything is effected.

System expresses more than method, which is but a part of system: system is an arrangement of many single or individual objects according to some given rule, so as to make them coalesce; method is the manner of this arrangement, or the principle upon which this arrangement takes place. The term system, however, applies to a complexity of objects; but arrangement, and consequently method, may be applied to everything that is to be put into execution. All sciences must be reduced to system; and without system there is no science: all business requires method; and without method little can be done to any good purpose.

If a better system's thine,
Impart it frankly, or make use of mine. FRANCIS.

The great defect of the Seasons is the want of method, but for this I know not that there was any remedy. JOHNSON.

T.

TO TAKE, RECEIVE, ACCEPT.

TAKE, from the Latin tactum, participle of tango, is as much as to get into one's possession by touching or laying hands on it. RECEIVE, in French recevoir, Latin recipio, from re and capio, signifies to take back; and ACCEPT, from ac or ad and capio, signifies to take for a special purpose.

To take is the general term, receive and accept are modes of taking. To take is an unqualified action; we take whatever comes in the way; we receive only that which is offered or sent: we take a book from a table; we receive a parcel which has been sent; we take either with or without consent; we receive with the consent, or according to the wishes, of another: a robber takes money from a traveller; a person receives a letter from a friend.

Each takes his seat, and each receives his share.
POPE.

To receive is frequently a passive act; whatever is offered or done to another is received; but to accept is an act of choice: many things, therefore, may be received which cannot be accepted; as a person receives a blow or an insult: so in an engagement one may be said to receive the enemy, who is ready to receive his attack; on the other hand, we accept apologies.

Till, seiz'd with shame, they wheel about and face,
Receive their foes, and raise a threat'ning cry;
The Tuscans take their turn to fear and fly.

DRYDEN.

She accepted my apology, and we are again reconciled.
BAYDENE.

Some things are both received and accepted, but with the same distinction. What is given as a present may be both received and accepted, but the inferior receives and the superior accepts. What is received comes to a person either by indirect means, or, if by direct means, it comes as a matter of right; but what is accepted is a matter of favor either on the part of the giver or receiver. Rent in law may be both received and accepted; it is received when it is due from the tenant, but it is accepted if it be received from a tenant after he has broken his contract with his landlord. A challenge may be received contrary to the wishes of the receiver, but it rests with himself whether he will accept it or not.

Unransom'd here receives the spotless fair,
Accept the hecatomb the Greeks prepare.
POPE.

Animals and things, as well as persons, may take; things may receive; but persons only accept. An animal may take what is offered to it; things take whatever attaches to them, but they receive that which by an express effort is given to them. The chameleon is said to take its hue from the surrounding objects; marble receives its polish from the hands of the workman.

The sapless wood, divested of the bark,
Grows fungous, and takes fire at every spark.
COWPER.

The soft settee, one elbow at each end,
And in the midst an elbow it received,
United, yet divided.
COWPER.

TALKATIVE, LOQUACIOUS, GARRULOUS.

TALKATIVE implies ready or prone to talk (v. To speak). LOQUACIOUS, from loquor, to speak or talk, has the same original meaning. GARRULOUS, in Latin garrulus, from garrio, to blab, signifies prone to tell or make known.

These reproachful epithets differ principally in the degree. To talk is allowable, and consequently it is not altogether so unbecoming to be occasionally talkative; but loquacity, which implies an immoderate propensity to talk, is always bad, whether springing from affectation or an idle temper: and garrulity, which arises from the excessive desire of communicating, is a failing that is pardonable only in the aged, who have generally much to tell.

Every absurdity has a champion to defend it;
for error is always talkative.
GOLDSMITH.
Thersites only clamor'd in the throng,
Loquacious, loud, and turbulent of tongue.

Pleas'd with that social sweet garrulity,
The poor disband'd vet'ran's sole delight.
SOMERVILLE.

TASTE, FLAVOR, RELISH, SAVOR.

TASTE comes from the Teutonic tasten, to touch lightly, and signifies either the organ which is easily affected, or the act of discriminating by a light touch of the organ, or the quality of the object which affects the organ; in this latter sense it is closely allied to the other terms. FLAVOR most probably comes from the Latin flō, to breathe, signifying the rarefied essence of bodies which affect the organ of taste. RELISH is derived by Minshew from relēcher, to lick again, signifying that which pleases the palate so as to tempt to a renewal of the act of tasting. SAVOR, in Latin sapor and sapio, to smell, taste, or be sensible, most probably comes from the Hebrew sapah, the mouth or palate, which is the organ of taste.

Taste is the most general and indefinite of all these; it is applicable to every object that can be applied to the organ of taste, and to every degree and manner in which the organ can be affected: some things are tasteless, other things have a strong taste, and others a mixed taste. The flavor is the predominating taste, and consequently is applied to such objects as may have a different kind or degree of taste; an apple may not only have the general taste of apple, but also a flavor peculiar to itself; the flavor is commonly said of that which is good; as a fine flavor, a delicious flavor; but it may designate that which is not always agreeable; as the flavor of fish, which is unpleasant in things that do not admit of such a taste. The relish is also a particular taste; but it is that which is artificial, in distinction from the flavor, which may be the natural property. We find the flavor such as it is; we give the relish such as it should be, or we wish it to be: milk and butter receive a flavor from the nature of the food with which the cow is supplied: sauces are used in order to give a relish to the food that is dressed with them.

What order so contriv'd as not to mix
Tastes not well join'd? MILTON.

Every person remembers how great a pleasure he found in sweets while a child; but his taste growing more obtuse with age, he is obliged to use artificial means to excite it. It is then he is found to call in relishes of salts and aromatics. GOLDSMITH.

The Philippic islands give a flavor to our European bowls. ADDISON.

Savor is a term in less frequent use than the others, but, agreeable to the Latin derivation, it is employed to designate that which smells as well as tastes, a sweet-smelling savor; so likewise, in the moral application, a man's actions or expressions may be said to savor of vanity.

The pleasant savory smell
So quicken'd appetite, that I methought
Could not but taste. MILTON.

Taste and relish may be, moreover, compared as the act or power of tasting or relishing: we taste whatever affects our taste; but we relish that only which pleases our taste: we taste fruits in order to determine whether they are good or bad; we relish fruits as a dessert, or at certain seasons of the day.

When the tongue and the thing to be tasted are extremely dry, no taste ensues. GOLDSMITH.

Were men born with those advantages which they possess by industry, they would probably enjoy them with a blunter relish. GOLDSMITH.

So in the extended or moral application, they are distinguished in the same manner.

Ten thousand thousand precious gifts
My daily thanks employ;
Nor is the least a cheerful heart,
That tastes those gifts with joy. ADDISON.

I love the people,
But do not like to stage me to their eyes,
Though it do well, I do not relish well
Their loud applause. SHAKESPEARE.

TASTE, GENIUS.

TASTE, in all probability from the Latin tactum and tango, to touch, seems to designate the capacity to derive pleasure from an object: GENIUS designates the power we have for accomplishing any object. He who derives particular pleasure from music may be said to have a taste for music; he who makes very great proficiency in the theory and practice of music may be said to have a genius for it. It is obvious, therefore, that we may have a taste without having genius; but it would not be possible to have genius for a thing without having a taste for it: for nothing can so effectually give a taste for any accomplishment as the capacity to learn it, and the susceptibility of all its beauties, which circumstances are inseparable from genius.

The cause of a wrong taste is a defect of judgment. BURKE.

Taste consists in the power of judging, genius in the power of executing. BLAIR.

TAX, DUTY, CUSTOM, TOLL, IMPOST, TRIBUTE, CONTRIBUTION.

THE idea of something given by the people to the government is expressed by all these terms. TAX, in French taxe, Latin taxo, from the Greek τασσω, taíō, to dispose or put in order, signifies what is disposed in order for each to pay. CUSTOM signifies that which is given under certain circumstances, according to custom. DUTY signifies that which is given as a due or debt. TOLL, in Saxon toll, etc., Latin tolonium, Greek τελος, a custom, signifies a particular kind of custom or due.

Tax is the most general of these terms, and applies to or implies whatever is paid by the people to the government, according to a certain estimate: the customs are a species of tax which are less specific than other taxes, being regulated by custom rather than any definite law; the customs apply particularly to what was customarily given by merchants for the goods which they imported from abroad: the duty is a species of tax more positive and binding than the custom, being a specific estimate of what is due upon goods, according to their value; hence it is not only applied to goods that are imported, but also to many other articles inland: toll is that species of tax which serves for the repair of roads and havens, or the liberty to buy or sell at fairs or other places.

The remission of a debt, the taking off a duty, the giving up a tax, the mending a port, or the making a highway, were not looked upon as improper subjects for a coin. ADDISON.

Strabo tells us that Britain bore heavy taxes, especially the customs on the importation of the Gallic trade. ARBUTHNOT.

The same Prusias joined with the Rhodians against the Byzantines, and stopped them from levying the toll on their trade in the Euxine. ARBUTHNOT.

The preceding terms refer to that which is levied by authority on the people; but they do not directly express the idea of levying or paying: IMPOST, on the contrary, signifies literally that which is imposed; and TRIBUTE that which is paid or yielded; the former, therefore, exclude that idea of coercion which is included in the latter. The tax is levied by the consent of many; the impost is imposed by the will of one; and the tribute is paid at the demand of one or a few: the tax serves for the support of the nation; the impost and the tribute serve to enrich a government. Conquerors lay heavy imposts upon the conquered countries; distant provinces pay a tribute to the princes to whom they owe allegiance. CONTRIBUTION signifies the tribute of many in unison, or for the same end; in this general sense it includes all the other terms; for taxes and imposts are alike paid by many for the same purpose; but, as the predominant idea in contribution is that of common consent, it supposes a degree of freedom in the agent which is incompatible with the exercise of authority expressed by the other terms: hence the term is with more propriety applied to those cases in which men voluntarily unite in giving toward any particular object; as charitable contributions, or contributions in support of a war; but it may be taken in the general sense of a forced payment, as in speaking of military contribution.

Taxes and imposts upon merchants seldom do any good to the king's revenue, for that that he wins in the hundred he loseth in the shire. BACON.

The Athenians having barbarously murdered Androgeus, the son of Minos, were obliged by his father to send a novennial or septennial, or, as others write an annual, tribute of seven young men. POTTER.

The Roman officers sometimes took the liberty of raising contributions of their own accord. POTTER.

These words, tax, tribute, and contribution, have an extended application to other objects besides those which are pecuniary: tax, in the sense of what is laid on without the consent of the person on whom it is imposed; tribute, that which is given to another as his due; and contribution, that which is given by one in common with others for some common object.

And levying thus, and with an easy way, A tax of profit from his very play. COWPER.

I pay this tribute without reluctance to the memory of that noble, reverend, learned, and excellent person. BURKE.

The English people are satisfied that the consolations of religion are as necessary as its instructions. They, too, are among the unhappy. They feel personal pain and domestic sorrow. In these they have no privilege, but are subject to pay their full contingent to the contribution levied on mortality. BURKE.

TAX, RATE, ASSESSMENT.

TAX, agreeably to the above explanation (v. Tax), and RATE, from the Latin ratius and reor, to think or estimate, both derive their principal meaning from the valuation or proportion according to which any sum is demanded from the people; but the tax is imposed directly by the government for public purposes, as the land-tax, and the window-tax; and the rate is imposed indirectly for the local purposes of each parish, as the church-rates, and the poor-rates. The tax or rate is a general rule or ratio, by which a certain sum is raised upon a given number of persons; the ASSESSMENT is the application of that rule to the individual.

They (the French noblesse) paid also a land-tax called the twentieth penny. BURKE.

They paid the church and parish rate, And took, but read not, the receipt. PRIDE.

As to the reimbursement, and the other great objects of public credit, no doubt but that a very moderate and proportionate assessment on the citizens would have provided for all. BURKE.

TO TEASE, VEX, TAUNT, TANTALIZE, TORMENT.

TEASE is most probably a frequentative of tear. VEX, v. To displease. TAUNT is probably contracted from tantalize. TANTALIZE, v. To aggravate. TORMENT, from the Latin tormentum and torqueo, to twist, signifies to give pain by twisting or griping.

The idea of acting upon others so as to produce a painful sentiment is common to all these terms; they differ in the mode of the action, and in the degree of the effect. To tease is applied to that which is most trifling; torment to that which is most serious. We are teased by a fly that buzzes in our ears; we are vexed by the carelessness and stupidity of our servants; we are taunted by the sarcasms of others; we are tantalized by the fair prospects which only present themselves to disappear again; we are tormented by the importunities of troublesome beggars. It is the repetition of unpleasant trifles which teases; it is the crossness and perversity of persons and things which vex; it is the contemptuous and provoking behavior which taunts; it is the disappointment of awakened expectations which tantalizes; it is the repetition of grievous troubles which torments. We may be teased and tormented by that which produces bodily or mental pain; we are vexed, taunted, and tantalized only in the mind. Irritable and nervous people are most easily teased; captious and fretful people are most easily vexed or taunted; sanguine and eager people are most easily tantalized: in all these cases the imagination or the bodily state of the individual serves to increase the pain: but persons are tormented by such things as inflict positive pain.

Louisa began to take a little mischievous pleasure in teasing. CUMBERLAND.

To hear you prate would vex a saint. GAY.
Sharp was his voice, which, in the shrillest tone,
Thus with injurious taunts attacks the throne.

Pope.
When the maid (in Sparta) was once sped, she was not suffered to tantalize the male part of the commonwealth. ADDISON.

Truth exerting itself in the searching precepts of self-denial and mortification is tormenting to vicious minds. SOUTH.

TEGUMENT, COVERING.

TEGUMENT, in Latin tegumentum, from tego, to cover, is properly but another word to express the sense of COVERING, yet it is now employed in cases where the term covering is inadmissible. Covering signifies mostly that which is artificial; but tegument is employed for that which is natural: clothing is the covering for the body; the skin of vegetable substances, as seeds, is called the tegument. The covering is said of that which covers the outer surface: the tegument is said of that which covers the inner surface; the pods of some seeds are lined with a soft tegument.

In the nutmeg another tegument is the space between the green pericarpium and the hard shell. RAY.

It is by being naked that he (man) knows the value of covering. GOLDSMITH.

TEMPERAMENT, TEMPERATURE.

TEMPERAMENT and TEMPERATURE are both used to express that state which arises from the tempering of opposite or varying qualities; the temperament is said of animal bodies, and the temperature of the atmosphere. Men of a sanguine temperament ought to be cautious in their diet; all bodies are strongly affected by the temperature of the air.

Without a proper temperament for the particular art which he studies, his utmost pains will be to no purpose. BUTCHER.

Oh happy England, where there is such a rare temperature of heat and cold! HOWELL.

TEMPLE, CHURCH.

THESE words designate an edifice destined for the exercise of religion, but with collateral ideas, which sufficiently distinguish them from each other. The templum of the Latins signified originally an open, elevated spot, marked out by the augurs with their lituus, or sacred wand, whence they could best survey the heavens on all sides: the idea, therefore, of spacious, open, and elevated, enters into the meaning of this word, in the same manner as it does into that of the Hebrew word hichel, derived from hechel, which in the Arabic signifies great and lofty. The Greek vaûc, from vaiw, to inhabit, signifies a dwelling-place, and, by distinction, the dwelling-place of the Almighty; in which sense the Hebrew word is also taken to denote the high and holy place where Jehovah peculiarly dwelleth, otherwise called the holy heavens, Jehovah's dwelling or resting-place; whence St. Paul calls our bodies the temples of God when the Spirit of God dwelleth in us. The Roman poets used the word templum in a similar sense.

Cœli tonitralia templa.

LUCRET.

Qui templa cœli summa sonitu concretit.

TERENTI.

Contremuit templum magnum Jovis altitonantis.

ENNIUS.

The word TEMPLE, therefore, strictly signifies a spacious open place set apart for the peculiar presence and worship of the Divine Being: it is applied with particular propriety to the sacred edifices of the Jews, but may be applied to any sacred place without distinction of religion.

Here we have no temple but the wood, no assembly but horn beasts.

SHAKESPEARE.

CHURCH, in Saxon circe, German, etc., kirche, Greek κυριακός, from κύριος, a lord, signifies literally what belonged to a lord, and by Christians was applied to that which belonged to our Lord and Saviour; as the Lord's Supper, the Lord's-day; and, in a particular manner, as the Lord's House; in which sense it has been retained to the present day. A church is therefore a building consecrated to the Lord, and from the earliest periods of building churches this was done by some solemn ordinance.

That churches were consecrated unto none but the Lord only the very general name chiefly doth sufficiently point out; church doth signify no other than the Lord's House.

HOOKER.

The word church has by a figure of speech been applied to any building consecrated to the service of the true God.

Truth it is, the patriarchs for a great number of years had neither temple nor church to resort unto. The cause was, they were not stayed in any place, but were in a continual peregrination and wandering that they could not conveniently build any church.

BEVERIDGE.

Church, in the sense of a religious assembly, is altogether a different word, bearing no affinity to the word temple.

TEMPORARY, TRANSIENT, TRANSITORY, FLEETING.

TEMPORARY, from tempus, time, characterizes that which is intended to last only for a time, in distinction from that which is permanent; offices depending upon a state of war are temporary, in distinction from those which are connected with internal policy: TRANSIENT, that is, passing, or in the act of passing, characterizes what in its nature exists only for the moment: a glance is transient. TRANSITORY, that is, apt to pass away, characterizes everything in the world which is formed only to exist for a time, and then to pass away; thus our pleasures, and our pains, and our very being, are denominated transitory. FLEETING, which is derived from the verb to fly and flight, is but a stronger term to express the same idea as transitory.

By the force of superior principles the temporary prevalence of passions may be restrained.

JOHNSON.

Any sudden diversion of the spirits, or the justling in of a transient thought, is able to deface the little images of things (in the memory).

SOUTH.

Man is a transitory being.

JOHNSON.

Thus when my fleeting days at last,
Unheeded, silently are past,
Calmly I shall resign my breath,
In life unknown, forgot in death.

SPECTATOR.

TENACIOUS, PERTINACIOUS.

To be TENACIOUS is to hold a thing close, to let it go with reluctance: to be PERTINACIOUS is to hold it out in spite of what can be advanced against it, the prepositive syllable per having an intensive force. A man of a tenacious temper insists on trifles that are supposed to affect his importance; a pertinacious temper insists on everything which is apt to affect his opinions. Tenacity and pertinacity are both foibles, but the former is sometimes more excusable than the latter. We may be tenacious of that which is good, as when a man is tenacious of whatever may affect his honor; but we cannot be pertinacious in anything but our opinions, and that too in cases when they are least defensible. It commonly happens that people are most tenacious of being thought to possess that in which they are most deficient, and most pertinacious in maintaining that which is most absurd. A liar is tenacious of his reputation for truth: sophists, freethinkers, and sceptics are the most pertinacious objectors to whatever is established.

So tenacious are we of the old ecclesiastical modes, that very little alteration has been made in them since the fourteenth or fifteenth century; adhering to our old settled maxim, never entirely, nor at once, to depart from antiquity.

BURKE.

The most pertinacious and vehement demonstrator may be wearied in time by continual negation.

JOHNSON.

TENDENCY, DRIFT, SCOPE, AIM.

TENDENCY, from to tend, denotes the property of tending toward a certain point, which is the characteristic of all these words, but this is applied only to things; and DRIFT, from the verb to drive; SCOPE, from the Greek σκοπεω, to look; and AIM, from the verb to aim (v. Aim), all characterize the thoughts of a person looking forward into futurity, and directing his actions to a certain point. Hence we speak of the tendency of certain principles or practices as being pernicious; the drift of a person's discourse; the scope which he gives himself either in treating of a subject, or in laying down a plan; or a person's aim to excel, or aim to supplant another, and the like. The tendency of many writings in modern times has been to unhinge the minds of men: where a person wants the services of another, whom he dares not openly solicit, he will discover his wishes by the drift of his discourse: a man of a comprehensive mind will allow himself full scope in digesting his plans for every alteration which circumstances may require when they come to be developed: our desires will naturally give a cast to all our aims; and, so long as they are but innocent, they are necessary to give a proper stimulus to exertion.

It is no wonder if a great deal of knowledge, which is not capable of making a man wise, has a natural tendency to make him vain and arrogant.

ADDISON.

This said, the whole audience soon found out his drift.

The convention was summoned in favor of Swift.

SWIFT.

Merit in every rank has the freest scope (in England).

BLAKE.

Each nobler aim, repress'd by long control,
Now sinks at last, or feebly mans the soul.

GOLDSMITH.

TENET, POSITION.

THE TENET is the opinion which we hold in our minds; the POSITION is that which we lay down for others. Our tenets may be hurtful, our positions false. He who gives up his tenets readily evinces an unstable mind; he who argues on a false position shows more tenacity and subtlety than good-sense. The tenets of the different denominations of Christians are scarcely to be known or distinguished; they often rest upon such trivial points: the positions which an author lays down must be very definite and clear when he wishes to build upon them any theory or system.

The occasion of Luther's being first disgusted with the tenets of the Romish Church is known to every one the least conversant with history.

ROBERTSON.

To the position of Tully, that if virtue could be seen she must be loved, may be added, that if truth could be heard, she must be obeyed.

JOHNSON.

TERM, LIMIT, BOUNDARY.

TERM, in Latin terminus, from the Greek τερμα, an end, is the point that ends, and that to which we direct our steps: LIMIT, from the Latin limex, a landmark, is the line which marks: BOUNDARY, from to bound, is the obstacle which interrupts our progress, and prevents us from passing.

We are either carried toward or away from the term; we either keep within limits, or we overstep them; we contract or extend a boundary. The term and the limit belong to the thing; by them it is ended: the boundary is that which is made or conceived by the person bounding. The term is the point that terminates; the limit is either a line or point which marks where to stop; the boundary is a line which includes a space, and points out the extent beyond which one may not pass. The Straits of Gibraltar was the term of Hercules's voyages: it was said, with more eloquence than truth, that the limits of the Roman empire were those of the world: the sea, the Alps, and the Pyrenees are the natural boundaries of France.

Then heav'd the goddess in her mighty hand
A stone, the limits of the neighboring land.

DAYDEN.

But still his native country lies
Beyond the bound'rise of the skies. COTTON.

So likewise in application to moral objects. We mostly reach the term of our prosperity when we attempt to pass the limits which Providence has assigned to human efforts: human ambition often finds a boundary set to its gratification by circumstances which were the most unlooked for, and apparently the least adapted to bring about such important results. We see the term of our evils only in the term of our life: our desires have no limits; their gratification only serves to extend our prospects indefinitely: those only are happy whose fortune is the boundary of their desires.

No term of time this union shall divide.

DAYDEN.

Corruption is a reciprocal to generation; and they two are as nature's two terms or boundaries, and the guides to life and death. BACON.

Providence has fixed the limits of human enjoyment by immovable boundaries. JOHNSON.

TERRITORY, DOMINION.

BOTH these terms respect a portion of country under a particular government; but the word TERRITORY brings to our minds the land which is included; DOMINION conveys to our minds the power which is exercised: the territory speaks of that which is in its nature bounded; dominion may be said of that which is boundless. A petty prince has his territory; the monarch of a great empire has dominions. It is the object of every ruler to guard his territory against the irruptions of an enemy; ambitious monarchs are always aiming to extend their dominions.

The conquered territory was divided among the Spanish invaders, according to rules which custom had introduced. ROBERTSON.

And, while the heroic Pyrrhus shines in arms,
Our wide dominions shall the world o'errun.

TRAPP.

THANKFULNESS, GRATITUDE.

THANKFULNESS, or a fulness of thanks, is the outward expression of a grateful feeling. GRATITUDE, from the Latin gratitudo, is the feeling itself. Our thankfulness is measured by the number of our words; our gratitude is measured by the nature of our actions. A person appears very thankful at the time who afterward proves very ungrateful. Thankfulness is the beginning of gratitude: gratitude is the completion of thankfulness.

He scarcely would give me thanks for what I had done, for fear that thankfulness might have an introduction of reward. SIDNEY.

Shall the commonness and continuance of these exceeding favors abate and enervate our gratitude, which in all reason should mainly increase and confirm it? BARROW.

THEORY, SPECULATION.

THEORY, from the Greek θεωωμαι, to behold, and SPECULATION, from the Latin speculo, to behold, are both employed to express what is seen with the mind's eye. Theory is the fruit of reflection, it serves the purposes of science; practice will be incomplete when the theory is false; speculation belongs more to the imagination; it has therefore less to do with realities: it is that which is rarely to be reduced to practice, and can therefore seldom be brought to the test of experience.

True piety without cessation tost
By theorise, the practice past is lost. DENHAM.
You were the prime object of my speculation. HOWELL.

Hence it arises that theory is contrasted sometimes with the practice, to designate its insufficiency to render a man complete; and speculation is put for that which is fanciful and unreal: a general who is so only in theory will acquit himself miserably in the field; a religionist who is so only in speculation will make a wretched Christian.

True Christianity depends on fact;
Religion is not theory, but act. HARTS.

It is amusing enough to trace the progress of a philosophical fancy let loose in airy speculation. GOLDSMITH.

THEREFORE, CONSEQUENTLY, ACCORDINGLY.

THEREFORE, that is, for this reason, marks a deduction; CONSEQUENTLY,

that is, in consequence, marks a consequence; ACCORDINGLY, that is, according to some thing, implies an agreement or adaptation. Therefore is employed particularly in abstract reasoning; consequently is employed either in reasoning or in the narrative style; accordingly is used principally in the narrative style. Young persons are perpetually liable to fall into error through inexperience; they ought therefore the more willingly to submit themselves to the guidance of those who can direct them: the world is now reduced to a state of little better than moral anarchy; consequently nothing but religion and good government can bring the people back to the use of their sober senses: every preparation was made, and every precaution was taken; accordingly at the fixed hour they proceeded to the place of destination.

If you cut off the top branches of a tree, it will not therefore cease to grow. HUGHES.

Reputation is power; consequently to despise is to weaken. SOUTH.

The pathetic, as Longinus observes, may animate the sublime; but is not essential to it. Accordingly, as he further remarks, we very often find that those who excel most in stirring up the passions very often want the talent of writing in the sublime manner. ADDISON.

THICK, DENSE.

BETWEEN THICK and DENSE there is little other difference, than that the latter is employed to express that species of thickness which is philosophically considered as the property of the atmosphere in a certain condition: hence we speak of thick in regard to hard or soft bodies, as a thick board or thick cotton; solid or liquid, as a thick cheese or thick milk: but the term dense mostly in regard to the air in its various forms, as a dense air, a dense vapor, a dense cloud, and figuratively a dense population.

He from thick films shall purge the visual ray,
And on the sightless eyeballs pour the day. POPE.

I have discovered, by a long series of observations, that invention and elocution suffer great impediments from dense and impure vapors. JOHNSON.

THIN, SLENDER, SLIGHT, SLIM.

THIN, in Saxon thinne, German dünn, Latin tenuis, from tendo, in Greek τενω, to extend or draw out, and the Hebrew taken, to grind or reduce to powder.

SLENDER, SLIGHT, and SLIM are all variations from the German schlank, which are connected with the words slime and sling, as also with the German schlingen, to wind or wreath, and schlange, a serpent, designating the property of length and smallness, which is adapted for bending or twisting. Thin is the generic term, the rest are specific: thin may be said of that which is small and short, as well as small and long; slender is always said of that which is small and long at the same time: a board is thin which wants solidity or substance: a poplar is slender, because its tallness is disproportioned to its magnitude or the dimensions of its circumference. Thinness is sometimes a natural property; slight and slim are applied to that which is artificial: the leaves of trees are of a thin texture; a board may be made slight by continually planing; a paper box is very slim. Thinness is a good property sometimes; thin paper is frequently preferred to that which is thick: slightness and slimness, which is a greater degree of slightness, are always defects; that which is made slight is unfit to bear the stress that will be put upon it; that which is slim is altogether unfit for the purpose proposed: a carriage that is made slight is quickly broken, and always out of repair; paper is altogether too slim to serve the purpose of wood.

Remembrance and reflection, how allied!
What thin partitions sense from thought divide! POPE.

Thinness is a natural property of many bodies, whether solid or fluid; slender and slight have a moral and figurative application.

I have found dulness to quicken into sentiment in a thin ether. JOHNSON.

Very slender differences will sometimes part those whom beneficence has united. JOHNSON.

Friendship is often destroyed by a thousand secret and slight competitions. JOHNSON.

TO THINK, REFLECT, PONDER, MUSE.

THINK, in Saxon thincan, German denken, etc., comes from the Hebrew

dan, to direct, rule, or judge. REFLECT, in Latin reflecto, signifies literally to bend back, that is, to bend the mind back on itself. PONDER, from pondus, a weight, signifies to weigh. MUSE, from musa, a song, signifies to dwell upon with the imagination.

To think is a general and indefinite term; to reflect is a particular mode of thinking; to ponder and muse are different modes of reflecting, the former on grave matters, the latter on matters that interest either the affections or the imagination: we think whenever we receive or recall an idea to the mind; but we reflect only by recalling, not one only, but many ideas: we think if we only suffer the ideas to revolve in succession in the mind; but in reflecting we compare, combine, and judge of those ideas which thus pass in the mind: we think, therefore, of things past, as they are pleasurable or otherwise; we reflect upon them as they are applicable to our present condition: we may think on things past, present, or to come; we reflect, ponder, and muse mostly on that which is past or present. The man thinks on the days of his childhood, and wishes them back; the child thinks on the time when he shall be a man, and is impatient until it is come: the man reflects on his past follies, and tries to profit by experience; he ponders on any serious concern that affects his destiny, and muses on the happy events of his childhood.

No man was ever weary of thinking, much less of thinking that he had done well or virtuously. SOUTH.

I was sitting on a sofa one evening, after I had been caressed by Amurath, and my imagination kindled as I mused. HAWKSWORTH.

TO THINK, SUPPOSE, IMAGINE, BELIEVE, DEEM.

To THINK is here, as in the preceding article, the generic term. It expresses, in common with the other terms, the act of having a particular idea in the mind; but it is indefinite as to the mode and the object of the action. To think may be the act of the understanding, or merely of the imagination: to SUPPOSE and IMAGINE are rather the acts of the imagination than of the understanding. To think, that is, to have any thought or opinion upon a subject, requires reflection; it is the work of time: to suppose and imagine may be the acts of the moment. We think a thing right or wrong; we suppose it to be true or false; we imagine it to be real or unreal. To think is employed promiscuously in regard to all objects, whether actually existing or not, or, if existing, are above our comprehension: to suppose applies to those which are uncertain or precarious; imagine, to those which are unreal. Think and imagine are said of that which affects the senses immediately; suppose is only said of that which occupies the mind. We think that we hear a noise as soon as the sound catches our attention; in certain states of the body or mind we imagine we hear noises which were never made: we think that a person will come to-day, because he has informed us that he intends to do so; we suppose that he will come to-day, at a certain hour, because he came at the same hour yesterday.

If to conceive how anything can be
From shape extracted, and locality,
Is hard: what think you of the Deity? JENTEN.

It is absurd to suppose that while the relations, in which we stand to our fellow-creatures, naturally call forth certain sentiments and affections, there should be none to correspond to the first and greatest of all beings. BLAIR.

How ridiculous must it be to imagine that the clergy of England favor popery, when they cannot be clergymen without renouncing it.

DEVERIDOR.

In regard to moral points, in which case the word DEEM may be compared with the others, to think is a conclusion drawn from certain premises. I think that a man has acted wrong: to suppose is to take up an idea arbitrarily or at pleasure; we argue upon a supposed case, merely for the sake of argument: to imagine is to take up an idea by accident, or without any connection with the truth or reality; we imagine that a person is offended with us, without being able to assign a single reason for the idea; imaginary evils are even more numerous than those which are real: to deem is to form a conclusion; things are deemed hurtful or otherwise in consequence of observation.

We sometimes think we could a speech produce much to the purpose, if our tongues were looser.

COWPER.

It moves me more, perhaps, than fully ought, When some green heads, as void of wit as thought, Suppose themselves monopolists of sense.

COWPER.

An empty house is by the players deemed the most dreadful sign of popular disapprobation.

HAWKSWORTH.

To think and believe are both opposite to knowing or perceiving; but think is a more partial action than believe: we think as the thing strikes us at the time; we believe from a settled deduction: hence it expresses much less to say that I think a person speaks the truth, than that I believe that he speaks the truth. I think from what I can recollect that such and such were the words, is a vague mode of speech, not admissible in a court of law as positive evidence: the natural question which follows upon this is, do you firmly believe it? to which whoever can answer in the affirmative, with the appearance of sincerity, must be admitted as a testimony. Hence it arises that the word can only be employed in matters that require but little thought in order to come to a conclusion; and believe is applicable to things that must be admitted only on substantial evidence. We are at liberty to say that I think, or I believe that the account is made out right; but, we must say, that I believe, not think, that the Bible is the word of God.

They think that they (the objectors) do not believe it (the Gospel) who do not take care that it should be preached to the poor.

BURKE.

DRYDEN.

THOUGHTFUL, CONSIDERATE, DELIBERATE.

THOUGHTFUL, or full of thinking (v. To think, reflect); CONSIDERATE, or ready to consider (v. To consider, reflect); and DELIBERATE, ready to deliberate (v. To consult), rise upon each other in their signification: he who is thoughtful does not forget his duty; he who is considerate pauses, and considers properly what is his duty; he who deliberates, considers deliberately. It is a recommendation to a subordinate person to be thoughtful in doing what is wished of him: it is the recommendation of a confidential person to be considerate, as he has often to judge according to his own discretion; it is the recommendation of a person who is acting for himself in critical matters to be deliberate. There is this further distinction in the word deliberate, that it may be used in the bad sense to mark a settled intention to do evil: young people may sometimes plead in extenuation of their guilt that their misdeeds do not arise from deliberate malice.

Men's minds are in general inclined to levity, much more than to thoughtful melancholy.

BLAIR.

TILLOTSON.

There is a vast difference between sins of infirmity and those of presumption, as vast as between inadvertency and deliberation.

SOUTH.

THREAT, MENACE.

THREAT is of Saxon origin; MENACE is of Latin extraction. They do not differ in signification; but, as is frequently the case, the Saxon is the familiar term, and the Latin word is employed only in the higher style. We may be threatened with either small or great evils; but we are menaced only with great evils. One individual threatens to strike another: a general menaces the enemy with an attack. We are threatened by things as well as persons: we are menaced by persons only (or things personified): a person is threatened with a look: he is menaced with a prosecution by his adversary.

SOMERVILLE.

TIME, SEASON.

TIME is here the generic term; it is taken either for the whole or the part: SEASON is any given portion of time. We speak of time when the simple idea of time only is to be expressed; as the time of the day, or the time of the year; the season is spoken in reference to some circumstances; the year is divided into four parts, called the seasons, according to the nature of the weather: hence it is that in general that time is called the season which is suitable for any particular purpose; youth is the season for improvement. It is a matter of necessity to choose the time; it is an affair of wisdom to choose the season.

You will often want religion in times of most danger. CHATHAM.

Piso's behavior toward us in this season of affliction has endeared him to us. MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

TIME, PERIOD, AGE, DATE, ERA, EPOCH.

TIME (v. Time) is, as before, taken either for time in general, or time in particular; all the other terms are taken for particular portions of time. In the sense of a particular portion of time, the word time is applied generally and indefinitely.

There is a time when we should not only number our days, but our hours. YOUNG.

Time included within any given points is termed a PERIOD, from the Greek περίοδος, signifying a course, round, or any revolution: thus, the period of day, or of night, is the space of time comprehended between the rising and setting, or setting and rising of the sun; the period of a year comprehends the space which, according to astronomers, the earth requires for its annual revolution. So, in an extended and moral application, we have stated periods in our life for particular things: during the period of infancy a child is in a state of total dependence on its parents; a period of apprenticeship has been appointed for youth to learn different trades.

Some experiment would be made how by art to make plants more lasting than their ordinary period, as to make a stalk of wheat last a whole year. BACON.

The period is sometimes taken not only for the space of time included between two points of time, but sometimes for the terminating point; in this sense, to put a period to a thing is to terminate its existence, to destroy it.

But the last period, and the fatal hour, Of Troy is come. DENHAM.

The AGE is the period comprehended within the life of one man, or of numbers living at the same time, and consequently refers to what is done by men living within that period: hence we speak of the different ages that have existed since the commencement of the world, and characterize this or that age by the particular degrees of vice or virtue, genius, and the like, for which it is distinguished.

The story of HANAN only shows us what human nature has too generally appeared to be in every age. BLAIR.

The date is properly the point of time which is marked on a writing, either to show the time when it was written, as the date of a letter, or to show when any contract is to be performed, or thing done, as the date of a bill of exchange. As the date in the first case shows when anything has been done, the word date may be applied generally to the time of any past event, as a thing of late date, or early date; so of a thing out of date, which is so long gone by as that the date of it is not known.

This mountain was formed by the first eruption that destroyed the country of Mel Passi, and is of a very old date. BRYDSON.

As the date in the second case shows how long it will be before a thing is to be done, as a bill of short date shows that it has but a short time to run, so the term date may be applied to the duration of any event.

Plantations have one advantage in them which is not to be found in most other works, as they give a pleasure of a more lasting date. ADDISON.

ERA, in Latin era, probably from æs, brass, signifying coin with which one computes; and EPOCH, from the Greek εποχή, from επεχω, to stop, signifying a resting-place; both refer to points of time that are in some manner marked or distinguished; but the former is more commonly employed in the literal sense for points of computation in chronology, as the Christian era; the latter is indefinitely employed for any period distinguished by remarkable events: the captivity of the Jews is an epoch in the history of that nation. The terms may also be figuratively employed in the latter sense, as an eventful era.

That period of the Athenian history which is included within the era of Pisistratus, and the death of Menander the comic poet, may justly be styled the literary age of Greece. CUMBERLAND.

The institution of this library (by Pisistratus) forms a signal epocha in the annals of literature. CUMBERLAND.

TIMELY, SEASONABLE.

THE same distinction exists between the epithets TIMELY and SEASONABLE as between time and season in the preceding article. The former signifies within the time, that is, before the time is past; the latter according to the season, or what the season requires. A timely notice prevents that which would otherwise happen; a seasonable hint seldom fails of its effect because it is seasonable. We must not expect to have a timely notice of death, but must be prepared for it at any time; an admonition to one who is on a sick-bed is very seasonable, when given by a minister or a friend. The opposites of these terms are untimely or ill-timed and unseasonable: untimely is directly opposed to timely, signifying before the time appointed; as an untimely death: but ill-timed is indirectly opposed, signifying in the wrong time; as an ill-timed remark.

It imports all men, especially bad men, to think on the judgment, that by a timely repentance they may prevent the woful effects of it.

SOUTH.

What you call a bold, is not only the kindest, but the most seasonable proposal you could have made.

LOCKE.

TIME-SERVING, TEMPORIZING.

TIME-SERVING and TEMPORIZING are both applied to the conduct of one who adapts himself servilely to the time and season; but a time-server is rather active, and a temporizer passive. A time-server avows those opinions which will serve his purpose: the temporizer forbears to avow those which are likely for the time being to hurt him. The former acts from a desire of gain, the latter from a fear of loss. Time-servers are of all parties, as they come in the way: temporizers are of no party, as occasion requires. Sycophant courtiers must always be time-servers: ministers of state are frequently temporizers.

Ward had complied during the late times, and held in by taking the covenant: so he was hated by the high men as a time-server. BURNET.

Feeble and temporizing measures will always be the result, when men assemble to deliberate in a situation where they ought to act.

ROBERTSON.

TORMENT, TORTURE.

TORMENT (v. To tease) and TORTURE both come from torqueo, to twist, and express the agony which arises from a violent twisting or gripping of any part; but the latter, which is more immediately derived from the verb, expresses much greater violence and consequent pain than the former. Torture is an excess of torment. We may be tormented by a variety of indirect means; but we are mostly said to be tortured by the direct means of the rack, or similar instrument. Torment may be permanent: torture is only for a time, or on certain occasions. It is related in history that a person was once tormented to death, by a violent and incessant beating of drums in his prison; the Indians practice every species of torture upon their prisoners; whence the application of these terms to moral objects. A guilty conscience may torment a man all his life: the horrors of an awakened conscience are a torture to one who is on his death-bed.

Yet in his empire o'er thy abject breast,
His flames and torments only are express'd.

TRADE, COMMERCE, TRAFFIC, DEALING.

TRADE, in Italian tratto, Latin tracto, to treat, signifies the transaction of business. COMMERCE, v. Intercourse. TRAFFIC, in French traffique, Italian traffico, compounded of tra or trans and facio, signifies to make to pass over from hand to hand. DEALING, from the verb to deal, in German theilen, to divide, signifies to get together in parts according to a certain ratio, or at a given price.

The leading idea in trade is that of carrying on business for purposes of gain; the rest are but modes of trade; commerce is a mode of trade by exchange: traffic is a sort of personal trade, a sending from hand to hand; dealing is a bargaining or calculating kind of trade. Trade is either on a large or small scale; commerce is always on a large scale: we may trade retail or wholesale; we always carry on commerce by wholesale: trade is either within or without the country; commerce is always between different countries: there may be a trade between two towns; but there is a commerce between England and America, between France and Germany: hence it arises that the general term trade is of inferior import when compared with commerce. The commerce of a country, in the abstract and general sense, conveys more to our mind, and is a more noble expression, than the trade of the country, as the merchant ranks higher than the tradesman, and a commercial house than a trading concern. Trade may be altogether domestic, and between neighbors; the traffic is that which goes backward and forward between any two or more points: in this manner there may be a great traffic between two towns or cities, as between London and the capitals of the different countries. Trade may consist simply in buying and selling according to a stated valuation; dealings are carried on in matters that admit of a variation: hence we speak of dealers in wool, in corn, seeds, and the like, who buy up portions of these goods, more or less, according to the state of the market.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO TRANSFIGURE, TRANSFORM, METAMORPHOSE.

TRANSFIGURE is to make to pass over into another figure; TRANSFORM and METAMORPHOSE is to put into another form: the former being said only of spiritual beings, and particularly in reference to our Saviour; the other two terms being applied to that which has a corporeal form.

Transformation is commonly applied to that which changes its outward form; in this manner a harlequin transforms himself into all kinds of shapes and likenesses. Metamorphosis is applied to the form internal as well as external, that is, to the whole nature; in this manner Ovid describes, among others, the metamorphoses of Narcissus into a flower, and Daphne into a laurel: with the same idea we may speak of a rustic being metamorphosed, by the force of art, into a fine gentleman.

We have of this gentleman a piece of the transfiguration, which I think is held a work second to none in the world.

STEELE.

A lady's shift may be metamorphosed into billets-doux, and come into her possession a second time.

ADDISON.

Can a good intention, or rather a very wicked one so misalled, transform perjury and hypocrisy into merit and perfection?

SOUTH.

TREACHEROUS, TRAITOROUS, TREASONABLE.

THESE epithets are all applied to one who betrays his trust; but TREACHEROUS (v. Faithless) respects a man's private relations; TRAITOROUS, his public relation to his prince and his country: he is a treacherous friend, and a traitorous subject. We may be treacherous to our enemies as well as our friends, for nothing can lessen the obligation to be faithful in keeping a promise; we may be traitorous to our country by abstaining to lend that aid which is in our power. Traitorous and TREASONABLE are both applicable to subjects: but the former is extended to all public acts; the latter only to those which affect the supreme power: a soldier is traitorous who goes over to the side of the enemy against his country; a man is guilty of treasonable practices who meditates the life of the king, or aims at subverting his government: a man may be a traitor under all forms of government: but he can be guilty of treason only in a monarchical state.

This very charge of folly should make men cautious how they listen to the treacherous proposals which come from their own bosom.

SOUTH.

PRIDEAUX.

TO TREASURE, HOARD.

THE idea of laying up carefully is common to these verbs; but to TREASURE is to lay up for the sake of preserving; to HOARD, to lay up for the sake of accumulating; we treasure up the gifts of a friend; the miser hoards up his money: we attach a real value to that which we treasure; a fictitious value to that which is hoarded. To treasure is used either in the proper or improper sense; to hoard only in the proper sense; we treasure a book on which we set particular value, or we treasure the words or actions of another in our recollection; the miser hoards in his coffers whatever he can scrape together.

Fancy can combine the ideas which memory has treasured.

HAWKSWORTH.

Hoards ev'n beyond the miser's wish abound.

GOLDSMITH.

TREATMENT, USAGE.

TREATMENT implies the act of treating, and USAGE that of using: treatment may be partial or temporary; but usage is properly employed for that which is permanent or continued: a passer-by may meet with ill-treatment; but children and domestics are liable to meet with ill-usage. All persons may meet with treatment from others with whom they casually come in connection; but usage is applied more properly to those who are more or less in the power of others: children may receive good or ill usage from those who have the charge of them, servants from their masters, or wives from their husbands.

By promises of more indulgent treatment, if they would unite with him (Cortes) against their oppressors, he prevailed on the people to supply the Spanish camp with provisions. ROBERTSON.

If we look farther into the world, we shall find this usage (of our Saviour from his own) not so very strange; for kindred is not friendship.

SOUTH.

TREMBLING, TREMOR, TREPIDATION.

ALL these terms are derived from the very same source (v. Agitation), and designate a general state of agitation: TREMBLING is not only the most familiar but also the most indefinite term of the three; TREPIDATION and TREMOR are species of trembling. Trembling expresses any degree of involuntary shaking of the frame, from the affection either of the body or the mind; cold, nervous affections, fear, and the like, are the ordinary causes of trembling: tremor is a slight degree of trembling, which arises mostly from a mental affection; when the spirits are agitated, the mind is thrown into a tremor by any trifling incident: trepidation is more violent than either of the two, and springs from the defective state of the mind; it shows itself in the action, or the different movements of the body, rather than in the body; those who have not the requisite composure of mind to command themselves on all occasions are apt to do what is required of them with trepidation.

And with unmanly tremblings shook the car.

Pope.

The ferocious insolence of Cromwell, the rugged brutality of Harrison, and the general trepidation of fear and wickedness (in the rebel parliament), would make a picture of unexampled variety.

JOHNSON.

Laughter is a vent of any sudden joy that strikes upon the mind, which being too volatile and strong, breaks out in this tremor of the voice.

STEELE.

Trembling and tremulous are applied as epithets, either to persons or things; a trembling voice evinces trepidation of mind, a tremulous voice evinces a tremor of mind: notes in music are sometimes trembling; the motion of the leaves of trees is tremulous.

And rend the trembling, unresisting prey. Pope.

As thus th' effulgence tremulous I drank,
With cherish'd gaze. THOMSON.

TRIFLING, TRIVIAL, PETTY, FRIVOLOUS, FUTILE.

TRIFLING, TRIVIAL, both come from trivium, a common place of resort where three roads meet, and signify common. PETTY, in French petit, little, in Latin putus, a boy or minion, is probably connected with the Hebrew pethi, foolish. FRIVOLOUS, in Latin frivulus, comes in all probability from frio, to crumble into dust, signifying reduced to nothing. FUTILE, in Latin futilis, from futio, to pour out, signifies cast away as worthless.

All these epithets characterize an object as of little or no value: trifling and trivial differ only in degree; the latter denoting a still lower degree of value than the former. What is trifling or trivial is that which does not require any consideration, and may be easily passed over as forgotten: trifling objections can never weigh against solid reason; trivial remarks only expose the shallowness of the remarker: what is petty is beneath our consideration, it ought to be disregarded and held cheap; it would be a petty consideration for a minister of state to look to the small savings of a private family: what is frivolous and futile is disgraceful for any one to consider; the former in relation to all the objects of our pursuit or attachment, the latter only in regard to matters of reasoning; dress is a frivolous occupation when it forms the chief business of a rational being; the objections of freethinkers against revealed religion are as futile as they are mischievous.

We exceed the ancients in doggerel humor, burlesque, and all the trivial arts of ridicule.

ADDISON.

There is scarcely any man without some favorite trifle which he values above greater attainments; some desire of petty praise which he cannot patiently suffer to be frustrated.

JOHNSON.

It is an endless and frivolous pursuit to act by any other rule than the care of satisfying our own minds.

STEELE.

Out of a multiplicity of criticisms by various hands, many are sure to be futile.

COWPER.

TROOP, COMPANY.

In a military sense, a TROOP is among the horse what a COMPANY is among the foot; but this is only a partial acceptance of the terms. Troop, in French troupe, Spanish tropa, Latin turba, signifies an indiscriminate multitude; company (v. To accompany) is any number joined together, and bearing each other company: hence we speak of a troop of hunters, a company of players; a troop of horsemen, a company of travellers.

Still may the dog the wandering troops constrain
Of airy ghosts, and vex the guilty train.

DRYDEN.

Go, carry Sir John Falstaff to the Fleet;
Take all his company along with him.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO TROUBLE, DISTURB, MOLEST.

WHATEVER uneasiness or painful sentiment is produced in the mind by outward circumstances is effected either by TROUBLE (v. Affliction), by DISTURBANCE (v. Commotion), or by MOLESTATION (v. To inconvenience). Trouble is the most general in its application; we may be troubled by the want of a thing, or troubled by that which is unsuitable: we are disturbed and molested only by that which actively troubles. Pecuniary wants are the greatest troubles in life; the perverseness of servants, the indisposition or ill behavior of children, are domestic troubles: but the noise of children is a disturbance, and the prospect of want disturbs the mind. Trouble may be permanent; disturbance and molestation are temporary, and both refer to the peace which is destroyed; a disturbance ruffles or throws out of a tranquil state; a molestation burdens or bears hard either on the body or the mind: noise is always a disturbance to one who wishes to think or to remain in quiet; talking, or any noise, is a molestation to one who is in an irritable frame of body or mind.

Ulysses was exceedingly troubled at the sight of his mother (in the Elysian fields). ADDISON.
No buzzing sounds disturb their golden sleep.

DRYDEN.

All use those arms which nature has bestow'd,
Produce their tender progeny, and feed
With care parental, whilst that care they need.
In these lov'd offices completely blest,
No hopes beyond them, nor vain fears molest.

JENNYS.

TROUBLESOME, IRKSOME, VEXATIOUS.

THESE epithets are applied to the objects which create trouble or vexation.

IRKSOME is compounded of irk and some, from the German ärger, vexation, which probably comes from the same root as the Greek ἀργός. TROUBLE-SOME (v. To afflict) is here, as before, the generic term; irksome and VEXTIOUS are species of the troublesome: what is troublesome creates either bodily or mental pain; what is irksome creates a mixture of bodily and mental pain; and what is vexatious creates purely mental pain. What requires great exertion, or a too long continued exertion or exertions, coupled with difficulties, is troublesome: in this sense the laying in stores for the winter is a troublesome work for the ants, and compiling a dictionary is a troublesome labor to the compiler: what requires any exertion which we are unwilling to make, or interrupts the peace which we particularly long for, is irksome; in this sense giving and receiving of visits is irksome to some persons; travelling is irksome to others: what comes across our particular wishes, or disappoints us in a particular manner, is vexatious; in this sense the loss of a prize which we had hoped to gain may be vexatious.

The incursions of troublesome thoughts are often violent and importunate. JOHNSON.

For not to irksome toil, but to delight he made us. MILTON.

The pensive goddess has already taught
How vain is hope, and how vexatious thought. PRIOR.

TRUTH, VERACITY.

TRUTH belongs to the thing; VERACITY to the person: the truth of the story is admitted upon the veracity of the narrator.

I shall think myself obliged for the future to speak always in truth and sincerity of heart. ADDISON.

Many relations of travellers have been slighted as fabulous, till more frequent voyages have confirmed their veracity. JOHNSON.

TRY, TEMPT.

To TRY (v. To attempt) is to call forth one's ordinary powers; to TEMPT (v. To attempt) is a particular species of trial: we try either ourselves or others; we tempt others: we try a person only in the path of his duty; but we may tempt him to depart from his duty: it is necessary to try the fidelity of a servant before you place confidence in him; it is wicked to tempt any one to do that which we should think wrong to do ourselves; our strength is tried by frequent experiments; we are tempted, by the weakness of our principles, to give way to the violence of our passions.

League all your forces then, ye pow'rs above,
Join all, and try the omnipotence of Jove. POPE.
Still the old sting remain'd, and men began
To tempt the serpent, as he tempted men. DENHAM.

TUMULTUOUS, TUMULTUARY.

TUMULTUOUS signifies having tumult; TUMULTUARY, disposed for tumult: the former is applied to objects in general; the latter to persons only: in tumultuous meetings the voice of reason is the last thing that is heard; it is the natural tendency of large and promiscuous assemblies to become tumultuary.

But oh, beyond description happiest he
Who ne'er must roll on life's tumultuous sea. PRIOR.

With tumultuary but irresistible violence, the Scotch insurgents fell upon the churches in that city (Perth). ROMERSON.

TUMULTUOUS, TURBULENT, SEDITIOUS, MUTINIOUS.

TUMULTUOUS (v. Bustle) describes the disposition to make a noise; those who attend the play-houses, particularly the lower orders, are frequently tumultuous: TURBULENT marks a hostile spirit of resistance to authority; when prisoners are dissatisfied they are frequently turbulent: SEDITIONOUS marks a spirit of resistance to government; in republics the people are often disposed to be seditious: MUTINIOUS marks a spirit of resistance against officers either in the army or navy; a general will not fail to quell the first risings of a mutinous spirit. Electioneering mobs are always tumultuous; the young and the ignorant are so averse to control that they are easily led by the example of an individual to be turbulent; among the Romans the people were in the habit of holding seditious meetings, and sometimes the soldiery would be mutinous.

Many civil broils and tumultuous rebellions they overcame, by reason of the continual presence of their king, whose only presence oftentimes constrains the unruly people from a thousand evil occasions. SPENSER.

Men of ambitious and turbulent spirits, that were dissatisfied with privacy, were allowed to engage in matters of state. BENTLEY.

Very many of the nobility in Edinburgh at that time did not appear yet in this seditious behavior. CLARENDON.

Lend me your guards, that, if persuasion fail,
Force may against the mutinous prevail. WALLER.

TURGID, TUMID, BOMBASTIC.

TURGID and TUMID both signify swollen, but they differ in their application: turgid is most commonly applied to what swells by a physical process, as a turgid vessel; tumid, from the Greek τυμος, the mind, is said of that which seems to swell like the mind inflated with pride, as the tumid waves, denoting an unnatural or unusual swelling.

A bladder moderately filled with air and strongly tied, held near the fire, grew turgid and hard. BOTLE.

So high as heav'd the tumid hills, so low
Down sunk a hollow bottom, broad and deep. MILTON.

They are both applied to words. BOMBASTIC, from bombast, a kind of cotton, signifying puffed up like cotton, is figuratively applicable to words only; but the bombastic includes the sentiments expressed; turgidity is confined mostly to the mode of expression. A writer is turgid, who expresses a simple thought in lofty language: a person is bombastic who deals in large words and introduces high sentiments in common discourse.

The turgidness of a young scribbler might please his magnificent spirit, always upon stilts. WARBURTON.

By his endeavoring too much to set out his bare collections in an affected and bombastic style, they are much neglected. A. WOOD.

Tumid is rather applied to single words than to the style.

Although such expressions may seem tumid and aspiring, yet cannot I scruple to use seeming hyperboles in mentioning felicities, which make the highest hyperboles but seeming ones. BOYLE.

TO TURN, BEND, TWIST, DISTORT, WRING, WREST, WRENCH.

TURN is in French tourner, Greek ροπειν, to turn, and ροπος, a turner's wheel.

BEND, v. Bend. TWIST is in Saxon ge-twistan, and German zweyen, to double, from zwey, two. DISTORT, in Latin distortus, participle of distorqueo, compounded of dis and torqueo, signifies to turn violently aside.

To turn signifies in general to put a thing out of its place in an uneven line; to bend, and the rest, are species of turning: we turn a thing by moving it from one point to another; thus we turn the earth over: to bend is simply to change its direction; thus a stick is bent, or a body may bend its direction to a certain point: to twist is to bend many times, to make many turns: to distort is to turn or bend out of the right course; thus the face is distorted in convulsions. To WRING is to twist with violence; thus linen which has been wetted is wrung: to WREST or WRENCH is to separate from a body by means of twisting; thus a stick may be wrested out of the hand, or a hinge wrenched off the door.

Yet still they find a future task remain,
To turn the soil, and break the clods again. DRYDEN.

Some to the house,
The fold, and dairy, hungry bend their flight. THOMSON.

But let not on thy hook the tortur'd worm,
Convulsive, twist in agonizing folds. THOMSON.

We saw their stern, distorted looks from far. DRYDEN.

Our bodies are unhappily made the weapons of sin; therefore we must, by an austere course of duty, first wring these weapons out of its hands. SOUTH.
She wrench'd the jav'lin with her dying hands. DRYDEN.

The same distinction holds good in the figurative or moral application: we turn a person from his design; we bend the will of a person; we twist the meaning of words to suit our purposes; we distort them so as to give them an entirely false meaning; we wring a confession from one; or wrest the meaning of a person's words.

Strong passion dwells on that object which has seized and taken possession of the soul; it is too much occupied and filled by it to turn its view aside. BLAIR.

Men will not bend their wits to examine whether things wherewith they have been accustomed be good or evil. HOOKER.

Something must be distorted beside the intent of the sovereign inditer. PRACHAM.

To swing this sentence, to swear thereby out of men's hands the knowledge of God's doctrines, is without all reason.

ASCHAN.

DEMMAN.

TURN, BENT.

THESE words are only compared here in the figurative application, as respects the state of a person's inclination: the TURN is, therefore, as before, indefinite as to the degree; it is the first rising inclination: BENT is a positively strong turn, a confirmed inclination; a child may early discover a turn for music or drawing; but the real bent of his genius is not known until he has made a proficiency in his education, and has had an opportunity of trying different things: it may be very well to indulge the turn of mind; it is of great importance to follow the bent of the mind as far as respects arts and sciences.

I need not tell you how a man of Mr. Rowe's turn entertained me.

POPE.

I know the bent of your present attention is directed toward the eloquence of the bar.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF PLINY.

TO TURN, WIND, WHIRL, TWIRL, WRITHE.

TO TURN (v. To turn) is, as before, the generic term; the rest are but modes of turning; WIND is to turn a thing round in a regular manner; WHIRL, to turn it round in a violent manner; TWIRL, to turn it round in any irregular and unmeaning way; WRITHE, to turn round in convolution within itself. A worm seldom moves in a straight line; it is, therefore, always turning: sometimes it lies, and sometimes it writhes in agony: a wheel is whirled round by the force of gunpowder: a top is twirled by a child in play.

How has this poison lost its wonted ways?
It should have burned its passage, not have linger'd

In the blind labyrinths and crooked turnings
Of human composition.

DRYDEN.

Here run before us, there retreat behind.

HIGGINS.

THOMSON.

Man is but man, inconstant still, and various;
There's no to-morrow in him like to-day;

Perhaps the atoms, whirling in his brain,
Make him think honestly this present hour;
The next, a swarm of base, ungrateful thoughts
May mount aloft.

DRYDEN.

I had used my eye to such a quick succession
Of objects, that, in the most precipitate twirl, I

STEELE.

Dying, he bellow'd out his dread remorse,
And writhe'd with seeming anguish of the soul.

UNBELIEF, INFIDELITY, INCREDULITY.

UNBELIEF (v. Belief) respects matters in general; INFIDELITY (v. Faithful) is unbelief as respects Divine revelation; INCREDULITY is unbelief in ordinary matters. Unbelief is taken in an indefinite and negative sense; it is the want of belief in any particular thing that may or may not be believed. The term unbelief does not of itself convey any reproachful meaning; it signifies properly a general disposition not to believe.

Were its revelations important, I should be less inclined to unbelief.

BEATTIE.

We may be unbelievers in indifferent as well as the most important matters, but the term unbeliever taken absolutely means one who disbelieves sacred truths.

One gets by heart a catalogue of title-pages and editions; and immediately, to become conspicuous, declares that he is an unbeliever.

ADDISON.

Infidelity is a more active state of mind; it supposes a violent and total rejection of that which ought to be believed: incredulity is also an active state of mind, in which we refuse belief in matters that may or may not be rejected. The Jews are unbelievers in the mission of our Saviour; the Turks are infidels, inasmuch as they do not believe in the Bible: Deists and Atheists are likewise infidels, inasmuch as they set themselves up against Divine revelation; well-informed people are always incredulous of stories respecting ghosts and apparitions.

Belief and profession will speak a Christian but very faintly, when thy conversation proclaims thee an infidel.

SORCE.

The youth hears all the predictions of the aged with obstinate incredulity.

JOHNSON.

TO UNCOVER, DISCOVER, DISCLOSE.

TO UNCOVER, like DISCOVER, implies to take off the covering; but the former refers mostly to an artificial, material, and occasional covering; the latter to a natural, moral, and habitual covering: plants are uncovered, that they may receive the benefit of the air: they are discovered to gratify the researches of the botanist.

We should uncover our nakedness by throwing off that Christian religion which has hitherto been our boast and comfort. BURKE.

Since, you know, you cannot see yourself so well as by reflection, I, your glass, will modestly discover to yourself That of yourself which you know not of. SHAKESPEARE.

To discover and DISCLOSE (v. To publish) both signify to lay open, but they differ in the object and manner of the action: to discover is to remove the covering which hides a thing from view, whether it be there by accident or design; to disclose is to open that which has been closed: as many things may be covered which are not closed, such things may, by drawing aside the covering, be discovered: a country is properly discovered, or a plant growing in some heretofore unknown place may be discovered; whatever is disclosed must have been previously closed or enclosed in some other body; as to disclose the treasures which lie buried in the earth.

Go, draw aside the curtains, and discover The several caskets to this noble prince. SHAKESPEARE.

The shells being broken, struck off, and gone, the stone included in them is thereby disclosed and set at liberty. WOODWARD.

So in the figurative or moral application, a plot may be discovered, but a secret which lies deep in the bosom may be disclosed.

He shall never, by any alteration in me, discover my knowledge of his mistake. POPE.

If I disclose my passion, Our friendship's at an end: if I conceal it, The world will call me false. ADDISON.

UNDER, BELOW, BENEATH.

UNDER, like hind in behind, and the German unter, hinter, etc., are all connected with the preposition in, implying the relation of enclosure. BELOW denotes the state of being low; and BENEATH, from the German nieder, and the Greek νεφθ or εμφθ, downward, has the same original signification. It is evident, therefore, from the above, that the preposition under denotes any situation of retirement or concealment; below, any situation of inferiority or lowness; and beneath, the same, only in a still greater degree. We are covered or sheltered by that which we stand under; we excel or rise above that which is below us; we look down upon that which is beneath us: we live under the protection of government; the sun disappears when it is below the horizon; we are apt to tread upon that which is altogether beneath us.

All sublimary comforts imitate the changeableness, as well as feel the influence, of the planet they are under. SOUTH.

Our minds are here and there, below, above; Nothing that's mortal can so quickly move. DENHAM.

How can anything better be expected than rust and canker, when men will rather dig their treasure from beneath than fetch it from above? SOUTH.

UNDERSTANDING, INTELLECT, INTELLIGENCE.

UNDERSTANDING (v. To conceive), being the Saxon word, is employed to describe a familiar and easy power or operation of the mind in forming distinct ideas of things. INTELLECT (v. Intellect) is employed to mark the same operation in regard to higher and more abstruse objects. The understanding applies to the first exercise of the rational powers: it is therefore aptly said of children and savages that they employ their understandings on the simple objects of perception; a child uses his understanding to distinguish the dimensions of objects, or to apply the right names to the things that come before his notice.

By understanding, I mean that faculty whereby we are enabled to apprehend the objects of knowledge, generals as well as particulars, absent things as well as present, and to judge of their truth or falsehood, good or evil. WILKINS.

Intellect, being a matured state of the understanding, is most properly applied to the efforts of those who have their powers in full vigor: we speak of understanding as the characteristic distinction between man and brute; but human beings are distinguished from each other by the measure of their intellect. We may expect the youngest children to employ an understanding according to the opportunities which they have of using their senses; we are gratified when we see great intellect in the youth whom we are instructing.

The light within us is (since the fall) become darkness; and the understanding, that should be eyes to the blind faculty of the will, is blind itself. SOUTH.

All those arts and inventions which vulgar minds gaze at, the ingenious pursue, and all admire, are but the relics of an intellect defaced with sin and time. SOUTH.

Intellect and INTELLIGENCE are derived from the same word; but intellect is applied merely to human power, and intelligence to the spiritual power of higher beings; as the intelligence of angels: so, when applied to human beings, it is taken in the most abstract sense for the intellectual power: hence we speak of intelligence as displayed in the countenance of a child whose looks evince that he has exerted his intellect, and thereby proved that it exists.

Silent as the ecstatic bliss
Of souls, that by intelligence converse. OTWAY.

UNDETERMINED, UNSETTLED, UNSTEADY, WAVERING.

UNDETERMINED (v. To determine) is a temporary state of the mind; UNSETTLED is commonly more lasting; we are undetermined in the ordinary concerns of life; we are unsettled in matters of opinion; we may be undetermined whether we shall go or stay; we are unsettled in our faith or religious profession.

Undetermined and unsettled are applied to particular objects; UNSTEADY and WAVERING are habits of the mind: to be unsteady is, in fact, to be habitually unsettled in regard to all objects. An unsettled character is one that has no settled principles: an unsteady character has an unfitness in himself to settle. Undetermined describes one uniform state of mind, namely, the want of determination: wavering describes a changeable state, namely, the state of determining variously at different times. Undetermined is always taken in an indifferent, wavering mostly in a bad, sense: we may frequently be undetermined from the nature of the case, which does not present motives for determining; but a person is mostly wavering, from a defect in his character, in cases where he might determine. A parent may with reason be undetermined as to the line of life which he shall choose for his son: men of soft and timid characters are always wavering in the most trivial, as well as the most important, concerns of life.

We suffer the last part of life to steal from us in weak hopes of some fortuitous occurrence or drowsy equilibrations of undetermined counsel. JOHNSON.

Uncertain and unsettled as Cicero was, he seems fired with the contemplation of immortality. PEARCE.

You will find soberness and truth in the proper teachers of religion, and much unsteadiness and vanity in others. EARL WESTWORTH.

Yet such, we find, they are as can control
The servile actions of our wavering soul. PRIOR.

TO UNFOLD, UNRAVEL, DEVELOP.

To UNFOLD is to open that which has been folded; to UNRAVEL is to open that which has been ravelled or tangled; to DEVELOP is to open that which has been wrapped in an envelope. The application of these terms therefore to moral objects is obvious: what has been folded and kept secret is unfolded; in this manner a hidden transaction is unfolded, by being related circumstantially: what has been entangled in any mystery or confusion is unravelling: in this manner a mysterious transaction is unravelling, if any circumstance is fully accounted for: what has been wrapped up so as to be entirely shut out from view is developed; in this manner the plot of a play or novel, or the talent of a person, is developed.

And to the sage-instructing eye unfold
The various twine of light. THOMSON.

You must be sure to unravel all your designs to a jealous man. ADDISON.

The character of Tiberius is extremely difficult to develop. CUMBERLAND.

UNHAPPY, MISERABLE, WRETCHED.

UNHAPPY is literally not to be happy; this is the negative condition of many who might be happy if they pleased. MISERABLE, from miserere, to pity, is to deserve pity; that is, to be positively and extremely unhappy: this is the lot only of a comparatively few: WRETCHED, from our word wreck, the Saxon wrecca, an exile, and the like, signifies cast away or abandoned; that is, particularly miserable, which is the lot of still fewer. As happiness lies properly in the mind, unhappy is taken in the proper sense, with regard to the state of the feelings; but is figuratively extended to the outward circumstances which occasion the painful feelings; we lead an unhappy life, or are in an unhappy condition: as that which excites the compassion of others must be external, and the state of abandonment must of itself be an outward state, miserable and wretched are properly applied to the outward circumstances which cause the pain, and improperly to the pain which is occasioned. We can measure the force of these words, that is to say, the degree of unhappiness which they express, only by the circumstance which causes the unhappiness. An unhappy man is indefinite; as we may be unhappy from slight circumstances, or from those which are important; a child may be said to be unhappy at the loss of a plaything; a man is unhappy who leads a vicious life: miserable and wretched are more limited in their application; a child cannot be either miserable or wretched and he who is so has some serious cause, either in his own mind or in his circumstances, to make him so: a man is miserable who is tormented by his conscience; a mother will be wretched who sees her child violently torn from her.

Such is the fate unhappy women find,
And such the curse entail'd upon our kind.

UNIMPORTANT, INSIGNIFICANT, IMMATERIAL, INCONSIDERABLE.

THE want of importance, of consideration, of signification, and of matter or substance, is expressed by these terms. They differ, therefore, principally according to the meaning of the primitives; but they are so closely allied that they may be employed sometimes indifferently. UNIMPORTANT regards the consequences of our actions: it is unimportant whether we use this or that word in certain cases: INCONSIDERABLE and INSIGNIFICANT respects those things which may attract notice: the former is more adapted to the grave style, to designate the comparative low value of things; the latter is a familiar term which seems to convey a contemptuous meaning: in a description, we may say that the number, the size, the quantity, etc., is inconsiderable; in speaking of persons, we may say they are insignificant in stature, look, talent, station, and the like; or, speaking of things, an insignificant production, or an insignificant word: IMMATERIAL is a species of the unimportant, which is applied only to familiar subjects; it is immaterial whether we go to-day or to-morrow; it is immaterial whether we have a few or many.

UNLESS, EXCEPT.

UNLESS, which is equivalent to if less, if not, or if one fail, is employed only for the particular case; but EXCEPT has always a reference to some general rule, of which an exception is hereby signified: I shall not do it unless he ask me; no one can enter except those who are provided with tickets.

BLACKSTONE.

If a wife continues in the use of her jewels till her husband's death, she shall afterward retain them against his executors and administrators, and all other persons except creditors.

BLACKSTONE.

UNOFFENDING, INOFFENSIVE, HARMLESS.

UNOFFENDING denotes the act of not offending: INOFFENSIVE, the property of not being disposed or apt to offend: HARMLESS, the property of being void of harm. Unoffending expresses, therefore, only a partial state; inoffensive and harmless mark the disposition and character. A child is unoffending as long as he does nothing to offend others; but he may be offensive if he discover an unamiable temper, or has unpleasant manners: a creature is inoffensive that has nothing in itself that can offend; but that is harmless which has neither the will nor the power to harm. Domestic animals are frequently very inoffensive; it is a great recommendation of a quack medicine to say that it is harmless.

The unoffending royal little ones were not only condemned to languish in solitude and darkness, but their bodies left to perish with disease.

UNRULY, UNGOVERNABLE, REFRACTORY.

UNRULY marks the want of disposition to be ruled; UNGOVERNABLE, an absolute incapacity to be governed: the former is a temporary or partial error, the latter is an habitual defect in the temper: a volatile child will be occasionally unruly; any child of strong passions will become ungovernable by excessive indulgence: we say that our wills are unruly and our tempers are ungovernable. REFRACTORY, from the Latin refringo, to break open, marks the disposition to break everything down before it: it is the excess of the unruly with regard to children: the unruly is, however, negative; but the refractory is positive: an unruly child objects to be ruled; a refractory child sets up a positive resistance to all rule; an unruly child may be altogether silent and passive; a refractory child always commits himself by some act of intemperance in word or deed: he is unruly, if in any degree he gives trouble in the ruled; he is refractory, if he refuses altogether to be ruled.

GOLDSMITH.

UNSEARCHABLE, INSCRUTABLE.

THESE terms are both applied to things set above the understanding of man, but not altogether indifferently; for that which is UNSEARCHABLE is not set at so great a distance from us as that which is INSCRUTABLE: for that which is searched is in common concerns easier to be found than that which requires a scrutiny. The ways of God are all to us finite creatures more or less unsearchable; but the mysterious plans of Providence, as frequently evinced in the affairs of men, are altogether inscrutable.

Things else by me unsearchable, now heard
With wonder. MILTON.

To expect that the intricacies of science will be pierced by a careless glance, is to expect a particular privilege; but to suppose that the maze is inscrutable to diligence, is to enchain the mind in voluntary shackles. JOHNSON.

UNSPEAKABLE, INEFFABLE, UNUTTERABLE, INEXPRESSIBLE.

UNSPEAKABLE and INEFFABLE, from the Latin for, to speak, have precisely the same meaning; but the unspeakable is said of objects in general, particularly of that which is above human conception, and surpasses the power of language to describe; as the unspeakable goodness of God: INEFFABLE is said of such objects as cannot be painted in words with adequate force; as the ineffable sweetness of a person's look: UNUTTERABLE and INEXPRESSIBLE are extended in their signification to that which is incommunicable by signs from one being to another; thus grief is unutterable which it is not in the power of the sufferer by any sounds to bring home to the feelings of another; grief is inexpressible which is not to be expressed by looks, or words, or any signs. Unutterable is therefore applied only to the individual who wishes to give utterance; inexpressible may be said of that which is to be expressed concerning others: our own pains are unutterable; the sweetness of a person's countenance is inexpressible.

The vast difference of God's nature from ours makes the difference between them so unspeakably great. SOUTH.

The evil which lies lurking under a temptation is intolerable and inexpressible. SOUTH.

UNTRUTH, FALSEHOOD, FALSITY, LIE.

UNTRUTH is an untrue saying; FALSEHOOD and LIE are false sayings: untruth of itself reflects no disgrace on the agent; it may be unintentional or not: a falsehood and a lie are intentional false sayings, differing only in degree as to the guilt of the offender: a falsehood is not always spoken for the express intention of deceiving, but a lie is uttered only for the worst of purposes. Some persons have a habit of telling falsehoods from the mere love of talking: those who are guilty of bad actions endeavor to conceal them by lies. Children are apt to speak untruths for want of understanding the value of words: travellers, from a love of exaggeration, are apt to introduce falsehoods into their narrations: it is the nature of a lie to increase itself to a tenfold degree; one lie must be backed by many more.

Falsehood is also used in the abstract sense for what is false. FALSITY is never used but in the abstract sense, for the property of the false. The former is general, the latter particular, in the application: the truth or falsehood of an assertion is not always to be distinctly proved; the falsity of any particular person's assertion may be proved by the evidence of others.

Above all things tell no untruth, no, not even in trifles. SIR HENRY SYDNEY.

Many temptations to falsehood will occur in the disguise of passions too specious to fear much resistance. JOHNSON.

Probability does not make any alteration either in the truth or falsity of things. SOUTH.

The nature of a lie consists in this, that it is a false signification knowingly and voluntarily used. SOUTH.

UNWORTHY, WORTHLESS.

UNWORTHY is a term of less reproach than WORTHLESS; for the former signifies not to be worthy of praise or honor; the latter signifies to be without all worth, and consequently in the fullest sense bad. It may be a mark of modesty or humility to say that I am an unworthy partaker of your kindness; but it would be folly and extravagance to say that I am a worthless partaker of your kindness. There are many unworthy members in every religious community; but every society that is conducted upon proper principles will take care to exclude worthless members. In regard to one another, we are often unworthy of the distinctions or privileges we enjoy; in regard to our Maker, we are all unworthy of his goodness, for we are all worthless in his eyes.

Since in dark sorrow I my days did spend,
Till now disdaining his unworthy end. DENHAM.

The school of Socrates was at one time deserted by everybody except Æschines, the parasite of the tyrant Dionysius, and the most worthless man living. CUMBERLAND.

USAGE, CUSTOM, PRESCRIPTION.

THE USAGE is what one has been long used to do; CUSTOM (v. Custom) is what one generally does; PRESCRIPTION is what is prescribed by usage to be done. The usage acquires force and sanction by dint of time; the custom acquires sanction by the frequency of its being done or the numbers doing it; the prescription acquires force by the authority which prescribes. Hence it arises that customs vary in every age, but that usage and prescription supply the place of written law.

With the national assembly of France, possession is nothing, law and usage are nothing. BURKE.

For, since the time of Saturn's holy reign,
His hospitable customs we retain. DRYDEN.

If in any case the shackles of prescription could be wholly shaken off, on what occasion should it be expected but in the selection of lawful pleasure? JOHNSON.

UTILITY, USE, SERVICE, AVAIL.

UTILITY and USE both come from utor. SERVICE, from the Latin servio, to employ or make use of. AVAIL, from a or ad and vail, in French valoir, and Latin valeo, signifies strength for a given purpose or to a given end.

All these terms imply fitness to be employed to advantage (v. Advantage, Benefit). Utility is applied in a general sense to what may be usefully employed: use to that which is actually so employed; things are said to be of general utility, or a thing is said to be of a particular use.

Those things which have long gone together are confederate, whereas new things piece not so well; but, though they help by their utility, yet they trouble by their inconformity. BACON.

The Greeks in the heroic age seem to have been unacquainted with the use of iron. ROBERTSON.

The word use refers us to the employment of things generally, and the advantage derived from such use; service, the particular state or capacity of a thing to be usefully employed. It is most proper, therefore, to say that prayers and entreaties are of use; but in speaking of tools, weapons, and the like, to say they are of service. Prudence forbids us to destroy anything that may be of use; economy enjoins upon us not to throw aside anything as long as it is fit for service.

A man with great talents but void of discretion is like Polyphemus in the fable, strong and blind, endued with an irresistible force, which for want of sight is of no use to him. ADDISON.

Perhaps it might be of service to these people (hypochondriacs) to wear some electric substance next their skin, to defend the nerves and fibres from the damp of non-electric air. BAYDENE.

All the preceding terms are taken absolutely: AVAIL is a term of relative import; it respects the circumstances under which a thing may be fit or otherwise to be employed with efficacy. When entreaties are found to be of no avail, females sometimes try the force of tears.

What does it avail, though Seneca had taught as good morality as Christ himself from the mount? CUMBERLAND.

TO UTTER, SPEAK, ARTICULATE, PRONOUNCE.

UTTER, from out, signifies to put out; that is, to send forth a sound: this, therefore, is a more general term than SPEAK, which is to utter an intelligible sound. We may utter a groan; we speak words only, or that which is intended to serve as words. To speak, therefore, is only a species of utterance; a dumb man has utterance, but not speech. ARTICULATE and PRONOUNCE are modes of speaking; to articulate, from articulum, a joint,

is to pronounce distinctly the letters or syllables of words; which is the first effort of a child beginning to speak. It is of great importance to make a child articulate every letter when he first begins to speak or read. To pronounce, from the Latin pronuncio, to speak out loud, is a formal mode of speaking. A child must first articulate the letters and the syllables, then he pronounces or sets forth the whole word; this is necessary before he can speak to be understood.

At each word that my destruction utter'd
My heart recoiled. OTWAY.

What you keep by you, you may change and mend,
But words once spoke can never be recall'd. WALLER.

The torments of disease can sometimes only be signified by groans or sobs, or inarticulate ejaculations. JOHNSON.

Speak the speech, I pray you, as I pronounced it to you. SHAKESPEARE.

V.

VACANCY, VACUITY, INANITY.

VACANCY and VACUITY both denote the space unoccupied, or the abstract quality of being unoccupied. INANITY, from the Latin inania, denotes the abstract quality of emptiness, or of not containing anything: hence the former terms vacancy and vacuity are used in an indifferent sense; inanity always in a bad sense: there may be a vacancy in the mind, or a vacancy in life, which we may or may not fill up as we please; but inanity of character denotes the want of the essentials that constitute a character.

There are vacuities in the happiest life, which it is not in the power of the world to fill. BLAIR.

When I look up and behold the heavens, it makes me scorn the world and the pleasures thereof, considering the vanity of these and the inanity of the other. HOWELL.

VAIN, INEFFECTUAL, FRUITLESS.

THESE epithets are all applied to our endeavors; but the term VAIN (v. Idle) is the most general and indefinite; the other terms are particular and definite. What we aim at, as well as what we strive for, may be vain; but INEFFECTUAL, that is, not effectual (v. Effective), and FRUITLESS, that is, without fruit, signifying not producing the desired fruit of one's labor, refer only to the termination or value of our labors. When the object aimed at is general in its import, it is common to term the endeavor vain when it cannot attain this object: it is vain to attempt to reform a person's character until he is convinced that he stands in need of reformation; when the means employed are inadequate for the attainment of the particular end, it is usual to call the endeavor ineffectual; cool arguments will be ineffectual in convincing any one inflamed with a particular passion: when labor is specifically employed for the attainment of a particular object, it is usual to term it fruitless if it fail: peace-makers will often find themselves in this condition, that their labors will be rendered fruitless by the violent passions of angry opponents.

Nature aloud calls out for balmy rest,
But all in vain. GENTLEMAN.

After many fruitless overtures, the Inca, despairing of any cordial union with a Spaniard, attacked him by surprise with a numerous body. ROBERTSON.

Thou thyself with scorn
And anger wouldst resent the offer'd wrong,
Though ineffectual found. MILTON.

VALUABLE, PRECIOUS, COSTLY.

VALUABLE signifies fit to be valued; PRECIOUS, having a high price; COSTLY, costing much money. Valuable expresses directly the idea of value; precious and costly express the same idea indirectly: on the other hand, that which is valuable is only said to be fit or deserving of value; but precious and costly denote that which is highly valuable, according to the ordinary measure of valuing objects, that is, by the price they bear; hence, the latter two express the idea much more strongly than the former.

Remote countries cannot convey their commodities by land to those places, when on account of their rarity they are desired and become valuable. ROBERTSON.

It is no improper comparison that a thankful heart is like a box of precious ointment. HOWELL.

The king gave him all the duke's rich furs, and much of his costly household stuff. LLOYD.

They are similarly distinguished in their moral application: a book is valuable according to its contents, or according to the estimate which men set upon it, either individually or collectively. The Bible is the only precious book in the world that has intrinsic value, that is, set above all price. There are many costly things, which are only valuable to the individuals who are disposed to expend money upon them.

What an absurd thing it is to pass over all the valuable parts of a man, and fix our attention on his infirmities! ADDISON.

Two other precious drops that ready stood
Each in their crystal sluice, he, ere they fell,
Kiss'd as the gracious signs of sweet remorse. MILTON.

Christ is sometimes pleased to make the profession of himself costly. SOUTH.

VALUE, WORTH, RATE, PRICE.

VALUE, from the Latin valeo, to be strong, respects those essential qualities which constitute its strength. WORTH, in German worth, from währen, to perceive, signifies that good which is experienced or felt to exist in a thing. RATE, v. Proportion. PRICE, in Latin pretium, from the Greek πρᾶσις, to sell, signifies what a thing is sold for.

Value is a general and indefinite term, applied to whatever is conceived to be good in a thing: the worth is that good only which is conceived or known as such. The value, therefore, of a thing is as variable as the humors and circumstances of men; it may be nothing or something very great in the same object at the same time in the eyes of different men. The worth is, however, that value which is acknowledged; it is therefore something more fixed and permanent: we speak of the value of external objects which are determined by taste; but the worth of things as determined by rule. The value of a book that is out of print is fluctuating and uncertain; but its real worth may not be more than what it would fetch for waste paper. The rate and price are the measures of that value or worth; the former in a general, the latter in a particular application to mercantile transactions. Whatever we give in exchange for another thing, whether according to a definite or an indefinite estimation, that is said to be done at a certain rate; thus we purchase pleasure at a dear rate, when it is at the expense of our health: price is the rate of exchange estimated by coin or any other medium: hence price is a fixed rate, and may be figuratively applied in that sense to moral objects; as, when health is expressly sacrificed to pleasure, it may be termed the price of pleasure.

Life has no value as an end, but means.
An end deplorable! A means divine. YOUNG.

Pay
No moment, but in purchase of its scotch:
And what it's scotch ask death-beda. YOUNG.

If you will take my humor as it runs, you shall have hearty thanks into the bargain for taking it off at such a rate.

EARL OF SHAFESBURY.

The soul's high price
Is writ in all the conduct of the skies. YOUNG.

TO VALUE, PRIZE, ESTEEM.

To VALUE is in the literal sense to fix a value on a thing. PRIZE, signifying to fix a price, and ESTEEM (v. Esteem), are both modes of valuing.

To value is to set any value, real or supposititious, relative or absolute, on a thing: in this sense men value gold above silver, or an appraiser values goods. To value may either be applied to material or spiritual subjects, to corporeal or mental actions: prize and esteem are taken only as mental actions; the former in reference to sensible or moral objects, the latter only to moral objects: we may value books according to their market price, or we may value them according to their contents; we prize books only for their contents, in which sense prize is a much stronger term than value; we also prize men for their usefulness to society; we esteem their moral characters.

The prize, the beauteous prize, I will resign,
So dearly valu'd, and so justly mine. POPE.

Nothing makes women esteemed by the opposite sex more than chastity; whether it be that we always prize those most who are hardest to come at, or that nothing besides chastity, with its collateral attendants, fidelity and constancy, gives a man a property in the person he loves.

ADDISON.

VARIATION, VARIETY.

VARIATION denotes the act of varying (v. To change); VARIETY denotes the quality of varying, or the thing varied. The astronomer observes the variations in the heavens; the philosopher observes the variations in the climate from year to year. Variety is pleasing to all persons, but to none so much as the young and the fickle: there is an infinite variety in every species of objects, animate or inanimate.

The idea of variation (as a constituent in beauty), without attending so accurately to the manner of variation, has led Mr. Hogarth to consider angular figures as beautiful. BURKE.

As to the colors usually found in beautiful bodies, it may be difficult to ascertain them, because in the several parts of nature there is an infinite variety. BURKE.

VENAL, MERCENARY.

VENAL, from the Latin venalis, signifies salable or ready to be sold, which, applied as it commonly is to persons, is a much stronger term than MERCENARY (v. Mercenary). A venal man gives up all principle for interest; a mercenary man seeks his interest without regard to principle: venal writers are such as write in favor of the cause that can promote them to riches or honors; a servant is commonly a mercenary, who gives his services according as he is paid: those who are loudest in their professions of political purity are the best subjects for a minister to make venal; a mercenary spirit is engendered in the minds of those who devote themselves exclusively to trade.

The minister, well pleas'd at small expense,
To silence so much rude impertinence,
With squeeze and whisper yields to his demands,
And on the venal list enroll'd he stands.

JENYNS.

For their assistance they repair to the Northern steel, and bring in an unnatural, mercenary crew. SCOTT.

VENIAL, PARDONABLE.

VENIAL, from the Latin venia, pardon or indulgence, is applied to what may be tolerated without express disparagement to the individual, or direct censure; but the PARDONABLE is that which may only escape severe censure, but cannot be allowed: garrulity is a venial offence in old age; levity in youth is pardonable in single instances.

While the clergy are employed in extirpating mortal sins, I should be glad to rally the world out of indecencies and venial transgressions.

CUMBERLAND

The weaknesses of Elizabeth were not confined to that period of life when they are more pardonable.
ROBERTSON.

VERBAL, VOCAL, ORAL.

VERBAL, from verbum, a word, signifies after the manner of a spoken word; ORAL, from os, a mouth, signifies by word of mouth; and VOCAL, from vox, the voice, signifies by the voice: the former two of these words are used to distinguish the speaking from writing; the latter to distinguish the sounds of the voice from any other sounds, particularly in singing: a verbal message is distinguished from one written on a paper, or in a note; oral tradition is distinguished from that which is handed down to posterity by means of books; vocal music is distinguished from instrumental; vocal sounds are more harmonious than those which proceed from any other bodies.

Among all the Northern nations, shaking of hands was held necessary to bind the bargain, a custom which we still retain in many verbal contracts.
BLACKSTONE.

Forth came the human pair,
And join'd their vocal worship to the choir
Of creatures wanting voice.
MILTON.

In the first ages of the world instruction was commonly oral.
JOHNSON.

VEAXATION, MORTIFICATION, CHAGRIN.

VEAXATION (v. To displease) springs from a variety of causes, acting unpleasantly on the inclinations or passions of men; MORTIFICATION (v. To humble) is a strong degree of veaxation, which arises from particular circumstances acting on particular passions: the loss of a day's pleasure is a veaxation to one who is eager for pleasure; the loss of a prize, or the circumstance of coming into disgrace where we expected honor, is a mortification to an ambitious person. Veaxation arises principally from our wishes and views being crossed; mortification, from our pride and self-importance being hurt; CHAGRIN, in French chagrin, from aigrir, and the Latin acer, sharp, signifying a sharp point, arises from a mixture of the two; disappointments are always attended with more or less of veaxation, according to the circumstances which give pain and trouble; an exposure of our poverty may be more or less of a mortification, according to the value which we set on wealth and grandeur; a refusal of a request will produce more or less of chagrin, as it is accompanied with circumstances more or less mortifying to our pride.

Poverty is an evil complicated with so many circumstances of uneasiness and veaxation, that every man is studious to avoid it.
JOHNSON.

I am mortified by those compliments which were designed to encourage me.
POPE.

It was your purpose to balance my chagrin at the inconsiderable effect of that essay, by representing that it obtained some notice.
HILL.

VIEW, SURVEY, PROSPECT.

VIEW (v. To look), and SURVEY, compounded of vey or view and sur, over, mark the act of the person, namely, the looking over a thing with more or less attention: PROSPECT, from the Latin prospectus and prospicio, to see before, designates the thing seen. We take a view or survey; the prospect presents itself: the view is of an indefinite extent; the survey is always comprehensive in its nature. Ignorant people take but narrow views of things; men take more or less enlarged views, according to their cultivation: the capacious mind of a genius takes a survey of all nature. The view depends altogether on the train of a person's thoughts; the prospect is set before him, it depends upon the nature of the thing: our views of advancement are sometimes very fallacious; our prospects are very delusive; both occasion disappointment: the former is the keener, as we have to charge the miscalculation upon ourselves. Sometimes our prospects depend upon our views, at least in matters of religion; he who forms erroneous views of a future state has but a wretched prospect beyond the grave.

With inward view
Thence on the ideal kingdom swift she turns
Her eye.
THOMSON.
Fools view but part, and not the whole survey.
So crowd existence all into a day.
JENYNS.
No land so rude but looks beyond the tomb
For future prospects in a world to come.
JENYNS.

VIEW, PROSPECT, LANDSCAPE.

VIEW and PROSPECT (v. View, prospect), though applied here to external objects of sense, have a similar distinction as in the preceding article. The view is not only that which may be seen, but that which is actually seen; the prospect is that which may be seen; hence the term view is mostly coupled with the person viewing, although a prospect exists continually, whether seen or not: hence we speak of our view being intercepted, but not our prospect intercepted; a confined or bounded view, but a lively or dreary prospect, or the prospect clears up or extends.

Ye noble few ! who here unbending stand
Beneath life's pressure, yet bear up awhile,
And what your bounded view, which only saw
A little part, deemed evil, is no more. THOMSON.

The great eternal scheme,
Involving all, and in a perfect whole
Uniting as the prospect wider spreads
To reason's eye refin'd, clears up apace.

THOMSON.

View is an indefinite term; it may be said either of a number of objects or of a single object, of a whole or of a part: prospect is said only of an aggregate number of objects: we may have a view of a town, of a number of scattered houses, of a single house, or of the spire of a steeple; but the prospect comprehends that which comes within the range of the eye. View may be said of that which is seen directly or indirectly; prospect only of that which directly presents itself to the eye: hence a drawing of an object may be termed a view, although not a prospect. View is confined to no particular objects; prospect mostly respects rural objects; and LANDSCAPE respects no others. Landscape, landskip, or landshape, denote any portion of country which is in a particular form: hence the landscape is a species of prospect. A prospect may be wide, and comprehend an assemblage of objects both of nature and art; but a landscape is narrow, and lies within the compass of the naked eye: hence it is also that landscape may be taken for the drawing of a landscape, and consequently for a species of view: the taking of views or landscapes is the last exercise of the learner in drawing.

Thus was this place
A happy rural seat of various views. MILTON.
Now skies and seas their prospect only bound.

DRYDEN.

So lovely seem'd
That landscape, and of pure now purer air
Meets his approach. MILTON.

VIOLENT, FURIOUS, BOISTEROUS, VEHEMENT, IMPETUOUS.

VIOLENT signifies having force (v. Force). FURIOUS signifies having fury (v. Anger). BOISTEROUS in all probability comes from bestir, signifying ready to bestir or come into motion. VEHEMENT, in Latin vehemens, compounded of veho and mens, signifies carried away by the mind or the force of passion. IMPETUOUS signifies having an impetus.

Violent is here the most general term, including the idea of force or violence, which is common to them all; it is as general in its application as in its meaning. When violent and furious are applied to the same objects, the latter expresses a higher degree of the former: a furious whirlwind is violent beyond measure. Violent and boisterous are likewise applied to the same objects; but the boisterous refers only to the violence of the motion or noise: hence we say that a wind is violent, inasmuch as it acts with great force upon all bodies; it is boisterous, inasmuch as it causes the great motion of bodies: impetuous, like boisterous, is also applied to bodies moving with great violence.

Probably the breadth of it (the passage between Scylla and Charybdis) is greatly increased by the violent impetuosity of the current.

DRYDEN.

The furious pard,
Cow'd and subdu'd, flies from the face of man.

SOMERVILLE.

Ye too, ye winds ! that now begin to blow
With boisterous sweep, I raise my voice to you.

THOMSON.

The central waters round impetuous rush'd.

THOMSON.

These terms are all applied to persons, or what is personal, with a similar distinction: a man is violent in his opinions, violent in his measures, violent in his resentments; he is furious in his anger, or has a furious temper; he is vehement in his affections or passions, vehement in love, vehement in zeal, vehement in pursuing an object, vehement in expression: violence transfers itself to some external object on which it acts with force; but vehemence respects that species of violence which is confined to the person himself: we may dread violence, because it is always liable to do mischief; we ought to suppress our vehemence, because it is injurious to ourselves: a violent partisan renders himself obnoxious to others; a man who is vehement in any cause puts it out of his own power to be of use. Impetuosity is rather the extreme of violence or vehemence: an impetuous attack is an excessively violent attack; an impetuous character is an excessively vehement character. Boisterous is said of the manner and the behavior rather than the mind.

This gentleman, among a thousand others, is a great instance of the fate of all who are carried away by party-spirit of any side; I wish all violence may succeed as ill. FORD.

If there be any use of gesticulation, it must be applied to the ignorant and rude, who will be more affected by vehemence than delighted by propriety. JOHNSON.

But there a power steps in and limits the arrogance of raging passions and furious elements. BURKE.

Is there a passion whose impetuous force
Disturbs the human breast, and breaking forth
With sad eruptions deals destruction round,
But, by the magic strains of some soft air,
Is harmonized to peace? COWPER.

They in this examination, of which there is printed an account not unentertaining, behaved with the boisterousness of men elated with recent authority. JOHNSON.

VISION, APPARITION, PHANTOM, SPECTRE, GHOST.

VISION, from the Latin visus, seeing or seen, signifies either the act of seeing or thing seen: APPARITION, from appear, signifies the thing that appears. As the thing seen is only the improper signification, the term vision is never employed but in regard to some agent: the vision depends upon the state of the visual organ; the vision of a person whose sight is defective will frequently be fallacious; he will see some things double which are single, long which are short, and the like.

He clasps his lens, if haply they may see,
Close to the part where vision ought to be,
But finds that, though his tubes assist the sight,
They cannot give it, or make darkness light. COWPER.

In like manner, if the sight be miraculously impressed, his vision will enable him to see that which is supernatural: hence it is that vision is either true or false, according to the circumstances of the individual; and a vision, signifying a thing seen, is taken for a supernatural exertion of the vision: apparition, on the contrary, refers us to the object seen; this may be true or false, according to the manner in which it presents itself. Joseph was warned by a vision to fly into Egypt with his family; Mary Magdalene was informed of the resurrection of our Saviour by an apparition: feverish people often think they see visions; timid and credulous people sometimes take trees and poets for apparitions.

Visions and inspirations some expect
Their course here to direct. COWLEY.
Full fast he flies, and dares not look behind him,
Till out of breath he overtakes his fellows,
Who gather round and wonder at the tale
Of horrid apparition. BLAIR.

PHANTOM, from the Greek φαντασμα, to appear, is used for a false apparition, or the appearance of a thing otherwise than what it is; thus the ignis fatuus, vulgarly called Jack-o'-Lantern, is a phantom. SPECTRE, from specio, to behold, and GHOST, from geist, a spirit, are the apparitions of immaterial substances. The spectre is taken for any spiritual being that appears; but ghost is taken only for the spirits of departed men who appear to their fellow-creatures: a spectre is sometimes made to appear on the stage; ghosts exist mostly in the imagination of the young and the ignorant.

The phantoms which haunt a desert are want,
and misery, and danger. JOHNSON.

Rous'd from their slumbers,
In grim array the grisly spectres rise. BLAIR.

The lonely tower
Is also shunn'd, whose mournful chambers hold,
So night-struck fancy dreams, the yelling ghost. THOMSON.

VOTE, SUFFRAGE, VOICE.

VOTE, in Latin votum, from voveo, to vow, is very probably from vox, a voice, signifying the voice that is raised in supplication to heaven. SUFFRAGE, in Latin suffragium, is in all probability compounded of sub and frango, to break out or declare for a thing. VOICE is here figuratively taken for the voice that is raised in favor of a thing.

The vote is the wish itself, whether expressed or not; a person has a vote, that is, the power of wishing; but the suffrage and the voice are the wish that is expressed; a person gives his suffrage or his voice. The vote is the settled and fixed wish, it is that by which social concerns in life are determined; the suffrage is a vote given only in particular cases; the voice is the declared opinion or wish, expressed either by individuals or the public at large. The vote and voice are given either for or against a person or thing; the suffrage is commonly given in favor of a person: in all public assemblies the majority of votes decide the question; members of Parliament are chosen by the suffrages of the people; in the execution of a will, every executor has a voice in all that is transacted.

The popular vote
Inclines here to continue. MILTON.

Reputation is commonly lost, because it never was deserved; and was conferred at first, not by the suffrage of criticism, but by the fondness of friendship. JOHNSON.

That something's ours when we from life depart,
This all conceive, all feel it at the heart;
The wise of learn'd antiquity proclaim
This truth; the public voice declares the same. JENTINA.

W.

TO WAIT, WAIT FOR, AWAIT, LOOK FOR, EXPECT.

WAIT, WAIT FOR, AWAIT, in German warten, which is an intensive of währen, to see or look, and EXPECT, from the Latin ex, out of, and specto, to behold, both signify originally the same thing as LOOK FOR, i. e., to look with concern for a thing.

All these terms express the action of the mind when directed to future matters of personal concern to the agent. Wait, wait for, and await, differ less in sense than in application, the former two being in familiar use, and the latter only in the grave style: these words imply the looking simply toward an object in a state of suspense or still regard; as to wait until a person arrives, or wait for his arrival; and await the hour of one's death, that is, to keep the mind in readiness for it.

Wait till thy being shall be unfolded. BLAIR.
Not less resolv'd, Antenor's valiant heir
Confronts Achilles, and awaits the war. POPE.

Wait and wait for refer to matters that are remote and obscure in the prospect, or uncertain in the event; await may be applied to that which is considered to be near at hand and probable to happen, and in this sense it is clearly allied to look for and expect, the former of which expresses the acts of the eye as well as the mind, the latter, the act of the mind only, in contemplating an object as very probable or even certain. It is our duty patiently to await the severest trials when they threaten us. When children are too much indulged and caressed, they are apt to look for a repetition of caresses at inconvenient seasons; it is in vain to look for or expect happiness from the conjugal state, when it is not founded on a cordial and mutual regard.

This said, he sat, and expectation held
His looks suspense, awaiting who appeared
To second, or oppose, or undertake
The perilous attempt. MILTON.

If you look for a friend in whose temper there is not to be found the least inequality, you look for a pleasing phantom. BLAIR.

We are not to expect from our intercourse with others, all that satisfaction we fondly wish. BLAIR.

WAKEFUL, WATCHFUL, VIGILANT.

WE may be WAKEFUL without being WATCHFUL; but we cannot be watchful without being wakeful. Wakefulness is an affair of the body, and depends upon the temperament; watchfulness is an affair of the will, and depends upon the determination: some persons are more wakeful than they wish to be; few are as watchful as they ought to be. VIGILANCE, from the Latin vigil, and the Greek αγαλλος, αγαλλιαω, to be on the alert, expresses a high degree of watchfulness: a sentinel is watchful who on ordinary occasions keeps good watch; but it is necessary for him, on extraordinary occasions, to be vigilant, in order to detect whatever may pass. We are watchful only in the proper sense of watching; but we may be vigilant in detecting moral as well as natural evils.

Music shall wake her that hath power to charm
Pale sickness, and avert the stings of pain:
Can raise or quell our passions, and becalm
In sweet oblivion the too wakeful sense. FLETCHER.

He who remembers what has fallen out, will be watchful against what may happen. SOUTH.

TO WANDER, TO STROLL, RAMBLE,
ROVE, ROAM, RANGE.

WANDER, in German wandern, is a frequentative of wenden, to turn, signifying to turn frequently. To STROLL is probably an intensive of to roll, that is, to go in a planless manner. RAMBLE, from the Latin re and ambulo, is to walk backward and forward; and ROVE is probably a contraction of ramble. ROAM is connected with our word room, space, signifying to go in a wide space, and the Hebrew rom, to be violently moved backward and forward. RANGE, from the noun range, a rank, row, or extended space, signifies to go over a great space.

The idea of going in an irregular and free manner is common to all these terms. To wander is to go in no fixed path; to stroll is to wander out of a path that we had taken. To wander may be an involuntary action; a person may wander to a great distance, or for an indefinite length of time; in this manner a person wanders who has lost himself in a wood: to stroll is a voluntary action, limited at our discretion; thus when a person takes a walk, he sometimes strolls from one path into another as he pleases: to ramble is to wander without any object, and consequently with more than ordinary irregularity; in this manner he who sets out to take a walk, without knowing or thinking where he shall go, rambles as chance directs: to rove is to wander in the same planless manner, but to a wider extent; a fugitive who does not know his road roves about the country in quest of some retreat: to roam is to wander from the impulse of a troubled mind; in this manner a lunatic who has broken loose may roam about the country; so likewise a person who travels about, because he cannot rest in quiet at home, may also be said to roam in quest of peace: to range is the contrary of to roam; as the former indicates a disordered state of mind, the latter indicates composure and fixedness; we range within certain limits, as the hunter ranges the forest, the shepherd ranges the mountains.

But far about they wander from the grave
Of him, whom his ingentle fortune urg'd
Against his own sad breast to lift the hand
Of impious violence. THOMSON.

TO WANT, NEED, LACK.

To be without is the common idea expressed by these terms; but to WANT is to be without that which contributes to our comfort, or is an object of our desire; to NEED is to be without that which is essential for our existence or our purposes; to LACK, which is probably a variation from lack, and a term not in frequent use, expresses little more than the general idea of being without, unaccompanied by any collateral idea. From the close connection which subsists between desiring and want, it is usual to consider what we want as artificial, and what we need as natural and indispensable: what one man wants is a superfluity to another; but that which is needed by one is in like circumstances needed by all: tender people want a fire when others would be glad not to have it; all persons need warm clothing and a warm house in the winter.

To be rich is to have more than is desired, and more than is wanted. JOHNSON.

The old from such affairs are only freed,
Which vig'rous youth and strength of body need. DENHAM.

To want and need may extend indefinitely to many or all objects; to lack, or be deficient, is properly said of a single object; we may want or need everything; we lack one thing, we lack this or that; a rich man may lack understanding, virtue, or religion; he who wants nothing is a happy man; he who needs nothing may be happy if he wants no more than he has; for then he lacks that which alone can make him happy, which is contentment.

Of his creation, when he life began,

WATERMAN, BOATMAN, FERRYMAN.

THESE three terms are employed for persons who are engaged with boats ; but the term WATERMAN is specifically applied to such whose business it is to let out their boats and themselves for a given time ; the BOATMAN may use a boat only occasionally for the transfer of goods ; a FERRYMAN uses a boat only for the conveyance of persons or goods across a particular river or piece of water.

Bubbles of air working upward from the very bottom of the lake, the waterman told us that they are observed always to rise in the same places. ADDISON.

Now nearer to the Stygian lake they draw,
Whom from the shore the surly boatman saw. DRYDEN.

So forth they rowed ; and that ferryman,
With his stiffe oars, did brush the sea so strong
That the hoarse waters from his frigot ran. SPENSER.

WAVE, BILLOW, SURGE, BREAKER.

WAVE, from the Saxon waegan, and German wiegen, to weigh or rock, is applied to water in an undulating state ; it is, therefore, the generic term, and the rest are specific terms : those waves which swell more than ordinarily are termed BILLOWS, which is derived from bulge or bilge, and German baly, the paunch or belly : those waves which rise higher than usual are termed SURGES, from the Latin surgo, to rise : those waves which dash against the shore, or against vessels, with more than ordinary force, are termed BREAKERS.

The wave behind impels the waves before. POPE.
I saw him beat the billows under him,
And ride upon their backs. SHAKESPEARE.
He flies aloft, and with impetuous roar,
Pursues the foaming surges to the shore. DRYDEN.

Now on the mountain wave on high they ride,
Then downward plunge beneath th' involving tide,
Till one who seems in agony to strive,
The whirling breakers heave on shore alive. FALCONER.

WAY, MANNER, METHOD, MODE, COURSE, MEANS.

ALL these words denote the steps which are pursued from the beginning to the completion of any work. The WAY is both general and indefinite ; it is either taken by accident or chosen by design : the MANNER and METHOD are species of the way chosen by design. Whoever attempts to do that which is strange to him, will at first do it in an awkward way ; the manner of conferring a favor is often more than the favor itself ; experience supplies men in the end with a suitable method of carrying on their business.

The ways of Heaven are dark and intricate.

My mind is taken up in a more melancholy manner. ATTERBURY.

Men are willing to try all methods of reconciling guilt and quiet. JOHNSON.

The method is said of that which requires contrivance ; the MODE, of that which requires practice and habitual attention ; the former being applied to matters of art, and the latter to mechanical actions : the master has a good method of teaching to write ; the scholar has a good or bad mode of holding his pen. The COURSE and the MEANS are the way which we pursue in our moral conduct : the course is the course of measures which are adopted to produce a certain result ; the means collectively for the course which lead to a certain end : in order to obtain legal redress, we must pursue a certain course in law ; law is one means of gaining redress, but we do wisely, if we can, to adopt the safer and pleasanter means of persuasion and cool remonstrance.

Modes of speech, which owe their prevalence to modish folly, die away with their inventors. JOHNSON.

All your sophisters cannot produce anything better adapted to preserve a rational and manly freedom than the courses that we have pursued. BURKE.

The most wonderful things are brought about in many instances by means the most absurd and ridiculous. BURKE.

WEAK, FEEBLE, INFIRM.

WEAK, in Saxon woac, Dutch weak, German schwach, is in all probability an intensive of weich, soft, which comes from weichen, to yield, and this from bewegen, to move. FEEBLE, probably contracted from failable. INFIRM, v. Debility.

The Saxon term weak is here, as it usually is, the familiar and universal term; feeble is suited to a more polished style; infirm is only a species of the weak: we may be weak in body or mind; but we are commonly feeble and infirm only in the body: we may be weak from disease, or weak by nature, it equally conveys the gross idea of a defect: but the term feeble and infirm are qualified expressions for weakness: a child is feeble from its infancy; an old man is feeble from age; the latter may likewise be infirm in consequence of sickness. We pity the weak, but their weakness often gives us pain; we assist the feeble when they attempt to walk; we support the infirm when they are unable to stand. The same distinction exists between weak and feeble in the moral use of the words: a weak attempt to excuse a person conveys a reproachful meaning; but the feeble efforts which we make to defend another may be praiseworthy, although feeble.

You, gallant Vernon I saw
The miserable scene; you pitying saw;
To infant weakness sunk the warrior's arm.

THOMSON.

nishes me.

ATTENBURY.

TO WEAKEN, ENFEEBLE, DEBILITATE,
ENERVATE, INVALIDATE.

TO WEAKEN is to make weak (v. Weak), and is, as before, the generic term: to ENFEEBLE is to make feeble (v. Weak): to DEBILITATE is to cause debility (v. Debility): to ENERVATE is to unnerve; and to INVALIDATE is to make not valid or strong: all of which are but modes of weakening applicable to different objects. To weaken may be either a temporary or permanent act when applied to persons; enfeeble is permanent, either as to the body or the mind: we may be weakened suddenly by severe pain; we are enfeebled in a gradual manner, either by the slow effects of disease or age. To weaken is either a particular or a complete act; to enfeeble, to debilitate, and enervate are properly partial acts: what enfeebles deprives of vital or essential power; what debilitates may lessen power in one particular, though not in another; the severe exercise of any power, such as the memory or the attention, will tend to debilitate that faculty: what enervates acts particularly on the nervous system; it relaxes the frame, and unfits the person for action either of body or mind. To weaken is said of things as well as persons; to invalidate is said of things only: we weaken the force of an argument by an injudicious application; we invalidate the claim of another by proving its informality in law.

No article of faith can be true which weakens the practical part of religion.

WEARISOME, TIRESOME, TEDIOUS.

WEARISOME (v. To weary) is the general and indefinite term; TIRESOME (v. To weary), and TEDIOUS, causing tedium, a specific form of wearisomeness: common things may cause weariness; that which acts painfully is either tiresome or tedious; but in different degrees the repetition of the same sounds will grow tiresome; long waiting in anxious suspense is tedious: there is more of that which is physical in the tiresome, and mental in the tedious.

All weariness presupposes weakness, and consequently every long, importune, wearisome petition is truly and properly a force upon him that is pursued with it.

TO WEARY, TIRE, JADE, HARASS.

TO WEARY is a frequentative of wear, that is, to wear out the strength. To TIRE, from the French tirer and the Latin traho, to draw, signifies to draw out the strength. To JADE is the same as to goad. HARASS, v. Distress.

Long exertion wearies; a little exertion will tire a child or a weak man; forced exertions jade; painful exertions, or exertions coupled with painful circumstances, harass: the horse is jaded who is forced on beyond his strength; the soldier is harassed who in his march is pressed on by a pursuing enemy. We are wearied with thinking when it gives us pain to think any longer; we are tired of our employment when it ceases to give us pleasure; we are jaded by incessant attention to business; we are harassed by perpetual complaints which we cannot redress.

WEIGHT, HEAVINESS, GRAVITY.

WEIGHT, from to weigh, is that which a thing weighs. HEAVINESS, from heavy and heave, signifies the abstract quality of the heavy, or difficult to heave. GRAVITY, from the Latin gravis, likewise denotes the same abstract quality.

Weight is indefinite; whatever may be weighed has a weight, whether large or small: heaviness and gravity are the property of bodies having a great weight. Weight is only opposed to that which has or is supposed to have no weight, that is, what is incorporeal or immaterial; for we may speak of the weight of the lightest conceivable bodies, as the weight of a feather: heaviness is opposed to lightness; the heaviness of lead is opposed to the lightness of a feather. Weight lies absolutely in the thing; heaviness is relatively considered with respect to the person: we estimate the weight of things according to a certain measure; we estimate the heaviness of things by our feelings. Gravity is that species of weight which is scientifically considered as inherent in certain bodies; the term is therefore properly scientific.

Universally a body plunged in water loses as much of its weight as is equal to the weight of a body of water of its own bulk. GOLDENITH.

The object is concerning the heaviness of several bodies, or the proportion that is required between any weight and the power which may raise it. WILKINS.

Of all bodies considered within the confines of a fluid there is a twofold gravity, true and absolute. QUINCT.

WEIGHT, BURDEN, LOAD.

WEIGHT, v. Weight. BURDEN, from bear, signifies the thing borne. LOAD, in German laden, low German and Dutch laeyen, is connected with our word lay, laid, signifying to lay on or in anything.

The term weight is here considered in common with the other terms, in the sense of a positive weight: by which it is allied to the word burden: the weight is said either of persons or things; the burden more commonly respects persons; the load may be said of either: a person may sink under the weight that rests upon him; a platform may break down from the weight upon it: a person sinks under his burden or load; a cart breaks down from the load. The weight is abstractedly taken for what has weight, without reference to the cause of its being there; burden and load have respect to the person or thing by which they are produced; accident produces the weight; a person takes a burden upon himself, or has it imposed upon him; the load is always laid on: it is not proper to carry any weight that exceeds our strength; those who bear the burden expect to reap the fruit of their labor; he who carries loads must be contented to take such as are given him.

On the tops of the highest mountains, where the air is so pure and refined, and where there is not that immense weight of gross vapors pressing upon the body, the mind acts with greater freedom. BRYDENE.

Camels have their provender Only for bearing burdens, and sore blows For sinking under them. SOMERVILLE.

His barns are stor'd, And groaning saddles bend beneath their load. SOMERVILLE.

In the moral application these terms mark the pain which is produced by a pressure; but the weight and load rather describe the positive severity of the pressure; the burden respects the temper and inclinations of the sufferer; the load is in this case a very great weight: a minister of state has a weight on his mind at all times, from the heavy responsibility which attaches to his station; one who labors under strong apprehensions or dread of an evil has a load on his mind; any sort of employment is a burden to one who wishes to be idle; and time unemployed is a burden to him who wishes to be always in action.

With what oppressive weight will sickness, disappointment, or old age fall upon the spirits of that man who is a stranger to God! BLAIR.

Indebted and discharg'd; what burden then?
MILTON.

How a man can have a quiet and cheerful mind under a burden and load of guilt, I know not, unless he be very ignorant. RAY.

WELL-BEING, WELFARE, PROSPERITY, HAPPINESS.

WELL-BEING may be said of one or many, but more of a body; the well-being of society depends upon a due subordination of the different ranks of which it is composed. WELFARE, or faring well, from the German fahren, to go, respects the good condition of an individual; a parent is naturally anxious for the welfare of his child. Well-being and welfare consist of such things as more immediately affect our existence: PROSPERITY, which comprehends both well-being and welfare, includes likewise all that can add to the enjoyments of man. The prosperity of a state, or of an individual, therefore, consists in the increase of wealth, power, honors, and the like; as outward circumstances more or less affect the HAPPINESS of man: happiness is, therefore, often substituted for prosperity; but it must never be forgotten that happiness properly lies only in the mind, and that consequently prosperity may exist without happiness; but happiness, at least as far as respects a body of men, cannot exist without some portion of prosperity.

Have freethinkers been authors of any inventions that conduce to the well-being of mankind?
BERKELEY.

The author is here only showing the providential issue of the passions, and how by God's gracious disposition they are turned away from their natural bias to promote the happiness of mankind. WARBURTON.

WHOLE, ENTIRE, COMPLETE, TOTAL, INTEGRAL.

WHOLE excludes subtraction; ENTIRE excludes division; COMPLETE excludes deficiency: a whole orange has had nothing taken from it; an entire orange is not yet cut; and a complete orange is grown to its full size: it is possible, therefore, for a thing to be whole and not entire: and to be both, and yet not complete: an orange cut into parts is whole while all the parts remain together, but it is not entire; it may be whole as distinguished from a part, entire as far as it has no wound or incision in it; but it may not be a complete orange if it is defective in its growth. Whole is applied to everything of which there may be a part actually or in imagination; as the whole line, the whole day, the whole world: entire is applied only to such things as may be damaged or injured, or is already damaged to its fullest extent; as an entire building, or entire ruin: complete is applied to that which does not require anything further to be done to it; as a complete house, a complete circle, and the like.

The whole island produces corn only sufficient to support its inhabitants for five months, or little more. BAYDENE.

And oft, when unobserv'd,
Steal from the barn a straw, till soft and warm,
Clean and complete, their habitation grows. THOMSON.

This (model) is the more remarkable, as it is entire in those parts where the statue is maintained. ADDISON.

TOTAL, from totus, the whole, has the same signification, but only a limited application; as a total amount, or a total darkness, as distinguished from a partial amount, or a partial degree of darkness.

They set and rise,
Least total darkness should by night regain Possession. MILTON.

So also in application to moral objects.

INTEGRAL, from integer, entire, has the same signification, but is applied now to parts or numbers not broken.

Nothing passes in the accounts of God for repentance but a change of life; ceasing to do evil, and doing good, are the two great integral parts of this duty. SOUTH.

WICKED, INQUITOUS, NEFARIOUS.

WICKED (v. Bad) is here the generic term; INQUITOUS, from iniquus, unjust, signifies that species of wickedness which consists in violating the law of right between man and man; NEFARIOUS, from the Latin nefas, wicked or abominable, is that species of wickedness which consists in violating the most sacred obligations. The term wicked, being indefinite, is commonly applied in a milder sense than iniquitous; and iniquitous than nefarious: it is wicked to deprive another of his property unlawfully, under any circumstances; but it is iniquitous if it be done by fraud and circumvention; and nefarious if it involves any breach of trust; any undue influence over another, in the making of his will, to the detriment of the rightful heir, is iniquitous; any underhand dealing of a servant to defraud his master is nefarious.

In the corrupted currents of this world,
Offence's gilded hand may shove by justice;
And oft 'tis seen, the wicked prize itself
Buys out the law. SHAKESPEARE.

PRIDEAUX.

That unhallowed villany nefariously attempted upon our agent. MILTON.

TO WILL, WISH.

THE WILL is that faculty of the soul which is the most prompt and decisive; it immediately impels to action: the WISH is but a gentle motion of the soul toward a thing. We can will nothing but what we can effect; we may wish for many things which lie above our reach. The will must be under the entire control of reason, or it will lead a person into every mischief: wishes ought to be under the direction of reason; or otherwise they may greatly disturb our happiness.

A good inclination is but the first rude draught of virtue; but the finishing strokes are from the will. SOUTH.

The wishing of a thing is not properly the willing of it; it imports no more than an idle, unoperative complacency in, and desire of, the object. SOUTH.

WILLINGLY, VOLUNTARILY, SPONTANEOUSLY.

To do a thing WILLINGLY is to do it with a good will; to do a thing VOLUNTARILY is to do it of one's own accord: the former respects one's willingness to comply with the wishes of another; we do what is asked of us; it is a mark of good-nature: the latter respects our freedom from foreign influence; we do that which we like to do; it is a mark of our sincerity. It is pleasant to see a child do his task willingly; it is pleasant to see a man voluntarily engage in any service of public good. SPONTANEOUSLY is but a mode of the voluntary, applied, however, more commonly to inanimate objects than to the will of persons: the ground produces spontaneously, when it produces without culture; and words flow spontaneously which require no effort on the part of the speaker to produce them. If, however, applied to the will, it bespeaks in a stronger degree the totally unbiassed state of the agent's mind: the spontaneous effusions of the heart are more than the voluntary services of benevolence. The willing is opposed to the unwilling, the voluntary to the mechanical or involuntary, the spontaneous to the reluctant or the artificial.

Food not of angels, yet accepted so,
As that more willingly thou couldst not seem,
At Heav'n's high feasts t' have fed. MILTON.

Thoughts are only criminal when they are first chosen, and then voluntarily continued.

JOHNSON.

JENTIS.

WISDOM, PRUDENCE.

WISDOM, from wissen, to know, is the general term; it embraces the whole of practical knowledge: PRUDENCE (v. Prudent) is a branch of wisdom. Wisdom directs all matters present or to come. Prudence, which acts by foresight, directs what is to come. Rules of conduct are framed by wisdom, and it is the part of prudence to apply these rules to the business of life.

Two things speak much the wisdom of a nation: good laws, and a prudent management of them. STILLINGFLEET.

WIT, HUMOR, SATIRE, IRONY, BURLESQUE.

WIT, like wisdom, according to its original, from wissen, to know, signifies knowledge, but it has so extended its meaning as to signify that faculty of the mind by which knowledge or truth is perceived, and in a more limited sense the faculty of discovering the agreements or disagreements of different ideas. Wit, in this latter sense, is properly a spontaneous faculty, and is, as it were, a natural gift: labored or forced wit is no wit. Reflection and experience supply us with wisdom; study and labor supply us with learning; but wit seizes with an eagle eye that which escapes the notice of the deep thinker, and elicits truths which are in vain sought for with any severe effort.

Wit lies most in the assemblage of ideas, and putting those together with quickness and variety. ADDISON.

In a true piece of wit all things must be, Yet all things there agree. COWLEY.

HUMOR is a species of wit which flows out of the humor of a person. Wit, as distinguished from humor, may consist of a single brilliant thought: but humor runs in a vein; it is not a striking, but an equable and pleasing, flow of wit. Of this description of wit Mr. Addison has given us the most admirable specimens in his writings, who knew best how to explain what wit and humor was, and to illustrate it by his practice.

For sure by wit is chiefly meant Applying well what we invent: What humor is not, all the tribe Of logic-mongers can describe: Here nature only acts her part, Unhelp'd by practice, books, or art. SWIFT.

There is a kind of nature, a certain regularity of thought, which must discover the writer (of humor) to be a man of sense at the same time that he appears altogether given up to caprice. ADDISON.

Humor may likewise display itself in actions as well as words, whereby it is more strikingly distinguished from wit, which displays itself only in the happy expression of happy thoughts.

I cannot help remarking that sickness which often destroys both wit and wisdom, yet seldom has power to remove that talent which we call humor. Mr. Wycherley showed his in his last compliment paid to his young wife, when he made her promise, on his dying bed, that she would not marry an old man again. POPE.

SATIRE, from satyr, probably from sat and ira, abounding in anger, and IRONY, from the Greek εἰρωνία, simulation and dissimulation, are personal and censorious sorts of wit; the first of which openly points at the object, and the second in a covert manner takes its aim.

The ordinary subjects of satire are such as excite the greatest indignation in the best tempers. ADDISON.

In writings of humor, figures are sometimes used of so delicate a nature, that it shall often happen that some people will see things in a direct contrary sense to what the author and the majority of the readers understand them: to such the most innocent irony may appear irreligion. CAMBRIDGE.

BURLESQUE is rather a species of humor than direct wit, which consists in an assemblage of ideas extravagantly discordant. The satire and irony are the most ill-natured kinds of wit; burlesque stands in the lowest rank.

One kind of burlesque represents mean persons in the accoutrements of heroes. ADDISON.

WONDER, ADMIRE, SURPRISE, ASTONISH, AMAZE.

WONDER, in German wundern, etc., is in all probability a variation of wonder; because wonder throws the mind off its bias. ADMIRE, from the Latin miror, and the Hebrew marah, to look at, signifies looking at attentively. SURPRISE, compounded of sur and prise, or the Latin prehendo, signifies to take on a sudden. ASTONISH, from the Latin attonitus, and tonitru, thunder, signifies to strike as it were with the overpowering noise of thunder. AMAZE signifies to be in a maze, so as not to be able to collect one's self.

That particular feeling which anything unusual produces on our minds is expressed by all these terms, but under various modifications. Wonder is the most indefinite in its signification or application, but it is still the least vivid sentiment of all: it amounts to little more than a pausing of the mind, a suspension of the thinking faculty, an incapacity to fix on a discernible point in an object that rouses our curiosity: it is that state which all must experience at times, but none so much as those who are ignorant: they wonder at everything, because they know nothing. Admiration is wonder mixed with esteem or veneration: the admirer suspends his thoughts, not from the vacancy, but the fulness of his mind: he is riveted to an object which for a time absorbs his faculties: nothing but what is great and good excites admiration, and none but cultivated minds are susceptible of it: an ignorant person cannot admire, because he cannot appreciate the value of anything. Surprise and astonishment both arise from that which happens unexpectedly; they are species of wonder differing in degree, and produced only by the events of life: the surprise, as its derivation implies, takes us unawares; we are surprised if that does not happen which we calculate upon, as the absence of a friend whom we looked for; or we are surprised if that happens which we did not calculate upon; thus we are surprised to see a friend returned whom we supposed was on his journey: astonishment may be awakened by similar events which are more unexpected and more unaccountable: thus we are astonished to find a friend at our house whom we had every reason to suppose was many hundred miles off; or we are astonished to hear that a person has got safely through a road which we conceived to be absolutely impassable.

The reader of the Seasons wonders that he never saw before what Thomson shows him.

JOHNSON.

With eyes insatiate and tumultuous joy,
Beholds the presents, and admires the boy.

DEYDEN.

So little do we accustom ourselves to consider the effects of time, that things necessary and certain often surprise us like unexpected contingencies.

JOHNSON.

I have often been astonished, considering that the mutual intercourse between the two countries (France and England) has lately been very great, to find how little you seem to know of us.

BURKE.

Surprise may for a moment startle; astonishment may stupefy and cause an entire suspension of the faculties; but amazement has also a mixture of perturbation. We may be surprised and astonished at things in which we have no particular interest: we are mostly amazed at that which immediately concerns us.

Amazement seizes all; the gen'ral cry
Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die.

DEYDEN.

WONDER, MIRACLE, MARVEL, PRODIGY, MONSTER.

WONDER is that which causes wonder (v. Wonder). MIRACLE, in Latin miraculum, and miror, to wonder; comes from the Hebrew merah, seen, signifying that which strikes the sense. MARVEL is a variation of miracle. PRODIGY, in Latin prodigium, from prodigo, or procul and ago, to launch forth, signifies the thing launching forth. MONSTER, in Latin monstrum, comes from monco, to advise or give notice; because among the Romans any unaccountable appearance was considered as an indication of some future event.

Wonders are natural: miracles are supernatural. The whole creation is full of wonders; the Bible contains an account of the miracles which happened in those days. Wonders are real; marvels are often fictitious; prodigies are extravagant and imaginary. Natural history is full of wonders; travels abound in marvels or in marvellous stories, which are the inventions either of the artful or the ignorant and credulous: ancient history contains numberless accounts of prodigies. Wonders are agreeable to the laws of nature; they are wonderful only as respects ourselves: monsters are violations of the laws of nature. The production of a tree from a grain of seed is a wonder; but the production of a calf with two heads is a monster.

His wisdom such as once it did appear.

Three kingdoms' wonder, and three kingdoms' fear.

DENHAM.

Murder, though it have no tongue, will speak

With most marvellous organ.

SHAKESPEARE.

Ill omens may the guilty tremble at,

Make every accident a prodigy.

And monsters frame where nature never err'd.

LEE.

WORD, TERM, EXPRESSION.

WORD is here the generic term; the other two are specific. Every TERM and EXPRESSION is a word; but every word is not denominated a term or expression. Language consists of words; they are the connected sounds which serve for the communication of thought. Term, from terminus, a boundary, signifies any word that has a specific or limited meaning; expression (v. To express) signifies any word which conveys a forcible meaning. Usage determines words; science fixes terms; sentiment provides expressions. The purity of a style depends on the choice of words; the precision of a writer depends upon the choice of his terms; the force of a writer depends upon the aptitude of his expressions. The grammarian treats on the nature of words; the philosopher weighs the value of scientific terms; the rhetorician estimates the force of expressions.

As all words in few letters live,
Thou to few words all sense dost give. COWLEY.

The use of the word minister is brought down to the literal signification of it, a servant; for now to serve and to minister, servile and ministerial, are terms equivalent. SOUTH.

A maxim, or moral saying, naturally receives this form of the antithesis, because it is designed to be engraven on the memory, which it recalls more easily by the help of such contrasted expressions. BLAIR.

WORK, LABOR, TOIL, DRUDGERY, TASK.

WORK, in Saxon weorc, Greek εργον, Hebrew areg, is the general term, as including that which calls for the exertion of our strength: LABOR (v. To labor) differs from it in the degree of exertion required; it is hard work: TOIL, probably connected with till, expresses a still higher degree of painful exertion: DRUDGERY (v. Servant) implies a mean and degrading work. Every member of society must work for his support, if he is not in independent circumstances: the poor are obliged to labor for their daily subsistence; some are compelled to toil incessantly for the pittance which they earn: drudgery falls to the lot of those who are the lowest in society. A man wishes to complete his work; he is desirous of resting from his labor; he seeks for a respite from his toil; he submits to drudgery.

The masters encourage it, they think it gives them spirits, and makes the work go on more cheerfully. BRYDGE.

But sometimes virtue starves while vice is fed;
What then is the reward of virtue? bread;
That vice may merit: 'tis the price of toil,
The knave deserves it when he tills the soil. POK.

In childhood the mind and body are both nimble but not strong; they can skip and frisk about with wonderful agility, but hard labor spoils them both. COWPER.

With the unwearied application of a plodding French painter, who draws a shrimp with the most minute exactness, he had all the genius of one of the first masters. Never, I believe, were such talents and drudgery united. COWPER.

TASK, in French tasche, Italian tassa, probably from the Greek τασσω, to order, is a work imposed by others, and consequently more or less burdensome.

Relieves me from my task of servile toil
Daily in the common prison, else enjoined me. MILTON.

Sometimes taken in the good sense for that which one imposes on one's self.

No happier task these faded eyes pursue,
To read and weep is all they now can do. POPE.

WRITER, PENMAN, SCRIBE.

WRITER is an indefinite term; every one who writes is called a writer; but none are PENMEN but such as are expert at their pen. Many who profess to teach writing are themselves but sorry writers: the best penmen are not always the best teachers of writing. The SCRIBE is one who writes for the purpose of copying; he is, therefore, an official writer.

The copying of books for the use of religious houses or common sale, was a business in those days that employed many people; some writers far exceeded others in that art. MASSEY.

Our celebrated penman, Peter Bales, among his other excellences in writing, is said to have improved the art of cryptography. MASSEY.

The office of scribe, a secretary or public writer, was an honorable post among the Jews. MASSEY.

Writer and penman have an extended application to one who writes his own compositions; the former is now used for an author or composer, as the writer of a letter, or the writer of a book (v. Writer); the latter for one who pens down anything worthy of notice for the use of the public.

My wife had scarcely patience to hear me to the end, but rallied against the writer with unrestrained resentment. GOLDSMITH.

The descriptions which the Evangelists give, show that both our blessed Lord and the holy penmen of his story were deeply affected. ATTERBURY.

Scribe may be taken for one who performs, as it were, the office of writing for another.

My master being the scribe to himself should write the letter. SHAKESPEARE.

WRITER, AUTHOR.

WRITER refers us to the act of writing; AUTHOR to the act of inventing. There are therefore many writers, who are not authors; but there is no author of books who may not be termed a writer: compilers and contributors to periodical works are properly writers, though not always entitled to the name of authors. Poets and historians are properly termed authors rather than writers.

Many writers have been witty, several have been sublime, and some few have even possessed both these qualities separated. WARBURTON.

An author has the choice of his own thoughts and words, which the translator has not. DRYDEN.

Y.

YOUTHFUL, JUVENILE, PUERILE.

YOUTHFUL signifies full of youth, or in the complete state of youth: JUVENILE, from the Latin juvenis, signifies the same; but PUERILE, from puer, a boy, signifies literally boyish. Hence the first two terms are taken in an indifferent sense; but the latter in a bad sense, or at least always in the sense of what is suitable to a boy only: thus we speak of youthful vigor, youthful employments, juvenile performances, juvenile years, and the like: but puerile objections, puerile conduct, and the like. We expect nothing from a youth but what is juvenile; we are surprised and dissatisfied to see what is puerile in a man.

Choræbus then, with youthful hopes beguill'd,
Swoll'n with success, and of a daring mind,
This new invention fatally design'd. DRYDEN.

It would be unreasonable to expect much from the immaturity of juvenile years. JOHNSON.

Sometimes juvenile is taken in the bad sense when speaking of youth in contrast with men, as juvenile tricks.

Raw juvenile writers imagine that, by pouring forth figures often, they render their compositions warm and animated. BLAIR.

And puerile may be taken in the indifferent sense for what belongs to a boy.

After the common course of puerile studies, he was put an apprentice to a brewer. JOHNSON.

ASSUMPTION, PRESUMPTION, ARROGANCE (vide also p. 97).

ASSUMPTION, the act of assuming (v. To appropriate). PRESUMPTION, from presume, in Latin presumo, from præ, before, and sumo, to take, signifies to take beforehand, to take for granted. ARROGANCE, v. To appropriate.

Assumption is a person's taking upon himself to act a part which does not belong to him. Presumption is the taking a place which does not belong to him. Assumption has to do with one's general conduct; presumption relates to matters of right and precedence. A person may be guilty of assumption by giving commands when he ought to receive them, or by speaking when he ought to be silent: he is guilty of presumption in taking a seat which is not fit for him. Assumption arises from self-conceit and self-sufficiency, presumption from self-importance. Assumption and presumption both denote a taking to one's self merely, arrogance claiming from others. A person is guilty of assumption and presumption for his own gratification only, without any direct intentional offence to others; but a man cannot be arrogant, be guilty of arrogance, without direct offence to others. The arrogant man exacts deference and homage from others; his demands are as extravagant as his mode of making them is offensive. Children are apt to be assuming, low people to be presuming; persons among the higher orders, inflated with pride and bad passions, are apt to be arrogant.

Arrogant in prosperity, abject in adversity, he (John) neither conciliated affection in the one, nor excited esteem in the other. LINGARD.

TO COMPEL, IMPEL, CONSTRAIN, RESTRAIN.

To COMPEL and IMPEL are both derived from the verb pello, to drive; the former, by the force of the preposition com, is to drive to any particular action or for a given purpose; but the latter, from the preposition in or in, into, is to force into action generally. A person, therefore, is compelled by outward circumstances, but he is impelled from within: he is compelled by another to go farther than he wished, he is impelled by curiosity to go farther than he intended. CONSTRAIN and RESTRAIN are both from stringo, to bind or oblige. The former, by force of the con or com, to force in a particular manner, or for a particular purpose; the latter by the re, back or again, is to keep back from anything. To constrain, like to compel, is to force to act; to restrain to prevent from acting. Constrain and compel differ only in the degree of force used, constrain signifying a less degree of force than compel. A person who is compelled has no choice whatever left to him; but when he is only constrained, he may do it or not at discretion.

He was compelled by want to attendance and solicitation. JOHNSON.

We cannot avoid observing the homage which the world is constrained to pay to virtue. BLAIR.

Constraint is put on the actions or movements of the body only, restraint on the movements of both body and mind: a person who is in a state of constraint shows his want of freedom in the awkwardness of his movements; he who is in a state of restraint may be unable to move at all. Constraint arises from that which is inherent in the person, restraint is imposed upon him (v. CONSTRAINT, p. 255).

DELUSION, ILLUSION (vide also p. 419).

BOTH these words, being derived from the Latin ludo (v. To deceive), are applied to such matters as act upon the imagination; but delude, by the force of the preposition de, signifies to carry away from the right line, to cause to deviate into error; while illude, from the preposition il, in, in or upon, signifies simply to act on the imagination. The former is therefore taken in a bad sense, but the latter in an indifferent sense. A deranged person falls into different kinds of delusions: as when he fancies himself poor while he is very rich, or that every one who comes in his way is looking at him, or having evil designs against him, and the like; but there may be optical illusions, when an object is made to appear brighter or larger than it really is.

Who therefore seeks in these
True wisdom, finds her not, or by delusion
Far worse, her false resemblance only meets. YOUNG.

While the fond soul,
Wrapt in gay visions of unreal bliss,
Still paints the illusory form. THOMSON.

TO MENTION, NOTICE.

MENTION, from mens, mind, signifies here to bring to mind. NOTICE (v. To mark). These terms are synonymous only inasmuch as they imply the act of calling things to another person's mind. We mention a thing in direct terms: we notice it indirectly, or in a casual manner; we mention that which may serve as information; we notice that which may be merely of a personal or incidental nature. One friend mentions to another what has passed at a particular meeting: in the course of conversation he notifies or calls to the notice of his companion the badness of the road, the wideness of the street, or the like.

The great critic I have before mentioned, though a heathen, has taken notice of the sublime manner in which the lawgiver of the Jews has described the creation. ADDISON.

some elevated place, is agreeable to be looked at, or to be looked from. The faulty position of a letter in writing sometimes spoils the whole performance.

COWPER.

MILTON.

Prince Cesarini has a palace in a pleasant situation, and set off with many beautiful walks.

ADDISON.

By varying the position of my eye, and moving it nearer to, or farther from, the direct beam of the sun's light, the color of the sun's reflected light constantly varied upon the speculum as it did upon my eye.

NEWTON.

Situation and position, when applied to persons, are similarly distinguished; the situation is that in which a man finds himself, either with or without his own choice; the position is that in which he is placed without his own choice.

A situation in which I am as unknown to all the world as I am ignorant of all that passes in it would exactly suit me.

COWPER.

Every step in the progression of existence changes our position with respect to the things about us.

JOHNSON.

Place, situation, and station have an extended signification in respect to men in civil society, that is, either to their circumstances or actions; POST has no other sense when applied to persons. Place is as indefinite as before; it may be taken for that share which we personally have in society either generally, as when every one is said to fill a place in society; or particularly for a specific share of its business, as to fill a place under government: situation is that kind of place which specifies either our share in its business, but with a higher import than the general term place, or a share in its gains and losses, as the prosperous or adverse situation of a man: a station is that kind of place which denotes a share in its relative consequence, power, and honor; in which sense every man holds a certain station; the post is that kind of place in which he has a specific share in the duties of society; the situation comprehends many duties; but the post includes properly one duty only; the word being figuratively employed from the post or particular spot which a soldier is said to occupy. A clerk in a counting-house fills a place: a clergyman holds a situation by virtue of his office; he is in the station of a gentleman by reason of his education, as well as his situation: a faithful minister will always consider that his post where good is to be done.

These two sorts of men (rich and poor) move in the same direction, though in a different place. They both move with the order of the universe.

BURKE.

Though this is a situation of the greatest ease and tranquillity in human life, yet this is by no means fit to be the subject of all men's petitions to God.

ROGERS.

It has been my fate to be engaged in business much and often, by the stations in which I have been placed.

ATTENBURY.

I will never, while I have health, be wanting to my duty in my post.

ATTENBURY.

TO PLACE, DISPOSE, ORDER.

To PLACE is to assign a place (v. Place) to a thing; to DISPOSE is to place according to a certain rule; to ORDER is to place in a certain order. To place is an unqualified act both as to the manner and circumstances of the action; to dispose is a qualified act, it is qualified as to the manner; the former is an act of expediency or necessity; the latter is an act of judgment or discretion. Things are often placed from the necessity of being placed in some way or another: they are disposed so as to appear to the best advantage. We may place a single object, but it is necessary that there should be several objects to be disposed. One places a book on a shelf, or disposes a number of books according to their sizes on different shelves.

If I have a wish that is prominent above the rest, it is to see you placed to your satisfaction near me.

SHAKESPEARE.

And last the relics by themselves dispose,
Which in a brazen urn the priests enclose.

DRYDEN.

To order and dispose are both taken in the sense of putting several things in some order, but dispose may be simply for the purpose of order and arrangement; ordering, on the other hand, comprehends command as well as regulation. Things are disposed in a shop to the best advantage, or in the moral application, the thoughts are disposed; a man orders his family, or a commander orders the battle.

PLAYFUL, GAMESOME, SPORTIVE.

PLAYFUL, or full of play, GAMESOME, having game, or a disposition to game, and SPORTIVE, disposed to sport, are taken in a sense similar to the primitive (v. Play). Playful is applicable to youth or childhood, when there is the greatest disposition to play. Gamesome and sportive are applied to persons of maturer years; the former in the bad sense, and the latter in the good sense. A person may be said to be gamesome who gives into idle jests, or sportive who indulges in harmless sport.

He is scandalized at youth for being lively, and childhood at being playful. ADDISON.

Bellial in like gamesome mood. MILTON.

I am not in a sportive humor now;
Tell me, and dally not, where is the money?
SHAKESPEARE.

PLEASURE, JOY, DELIGHT, CHARM.

PLEASURE, from the Latin placeo, to please or give content, is the generic term, involving in itself the common idea of the other terms. JOY, v. Glad. DELIGHT, in Latin deliciae, from delicio, to allure, signifies what allures the mind.

Pleasure is a term of most extensive use; it embraces one grand class of our feelings and sensations, and is opposed to nothing but pain, which embraces the second class or division: joy and delight are but modes or modifications of pleasure, differing as to the degree, and as to the objects or sources. Pleasure, in its peculiar acceptation, is smaller in degree than either joy or delight, but in its universal acceptation it defines no degree: the term is indifferently employed for the highest as well as the lowest degree: whereas joy and delight can be employed only to express a positively high degree. Pleasure is produced by any or every object; everything by which we are surrounded acts upon us more or less to produce it; we may have pleasure either from without or from within: pleasure from the gratification of our senses, from the exercise of our affections, or the exercise of our understandings; pleasures from our own selves, or pleasures from others: but joy is derived from the exercise of the affections; and delight either from the affections or the understanding. In this manner we distinguish the pleasures of the table, social pleasures, or intellectual pleasures; the joy of meeting an old friend; or the delight of pursuing a favorite object.

Pleasures are either transitory or otherwise: joy is in its nature commonly short of duration, it springs from particular events; it is pleasure at high tide, but it may come and go as suddenly as the events which caused it; one's joy may be awakened and damped in quick succession. Delight is not so fleeting as joy, but it may be less so than simple pleasure; delight arises from a state of outward circumstances which is naturally more durable than that of joy; but it is a state seldomer attainable and not so much at one's command as pleasure.

My young men have the pleasure of hearing themselves praised by those who are in years.

ADDISON.

While he who virtue's radiant course has run,
Descends like a serenely setting sun;
His thoughts triumphant heav'n alone employs,
And hope anticipates his future joys. JENYNS.
Vain are all sudden sallies of delight,
Convulsions of a weak distemper'd joy. YOUNG.

Pleasure, joy, and delight are likewise employed for the things which give pleasure, joy, or delight. CHARM (v. Attraction) is used only in the sense of what charms, or gives a high degree of pleasure; but not a degree equal to that of joy or delight, though greater than of ordinary pleasure; pleasure intoxicates; the joys of heaven are objects of a Christian's pursuit; the delights of matrimony are lasting to those who are susceptible of true affection; the charms of rural scenery never fail of their effect whenever they offer themselves to the eye.

That every day has its pains and sorrows is universally experienced; but if we look impartially about us, we shall find that every day has likewise its pleasures and its joys. JOHNSON.

Before the day of departure (from the country)
a week is always appropriated for the payment and reception of ceremonial visits, at which nothing can be mentioned but the delights of London. JOHNSON.

When thus creation's charms around combine,
Amid the store should thankless pride repine?

GOLDSMITH.

PLENTIFUL, PLENTEOUS, ABUNDANT, COPIOUS, AMPLE.

PLENTIFUL and PLENTEOUS, signifying the presence of plenty, plenitude, or fulness, differ only in use: the former being mostly employed in the familiar, the latter in the grave style. Plenty fills; ABUNDANCE, in Latin abundantia, from abundo, to overflow, compounded of the intensive ab and undo, a wave, signifying literally overflowing, does more, it leaves a superfluity; as that, however, which fills suffices as much as that which flows over, the term abundance is often employed promiscuously with that of plenty; we can indifferently say a plentiful harvest, or an abundant harvest. Plentiful is, however, a more familiar term than abundant: we say, therefore, most commonly, a plenty of provisions; a plenty of food; a plenty of corn, wine, and oil: but an abundance of words; an abundance of riches; an abundance of wit or humor. In certain years fruit is plentiful, and at other times grain is plentiful; in all cases we have abundant cause for gratitude to the Giver of all good things.

The resty knaves are overrun with ease,
As plenty ever is the nurse of faction. ROWE.
And God said, let the waters generate
Reptile with spawn abundant, living soul.
MILTON.

COPIOUS, in Latin copiosus, from copia, or con and opes, wealth, signifying having a store, and AMPLE (v. Ample) are modes either of plenty or abundance: the former is employed in regard to what is collected or brought into one point; the term ample is employed only in regard to what may be narrowed or expanded; a copious stream of blood, or a copious flow of words, equally designate the quantity which is collected together, as an ample provision, an ample store, an ample share, marks that which may at pleasure be increased or diminished.

Smooth to the shelving brink a copious flood
Rolls fair and placid. THOMSON.

Peaceful beneath primeval trees, that cast
Their ample shade o'er Niger's yellow stream,
Leans the huge elephant, wisest of brutes.
THOMSON.

TO PLUNGE, DIVE.

PLUNGE is but a variation of pluck, pull, and the Latin pello, to drive or force forward. DIVE is but a variation of dip, which is, under various forms, to be found in the Northern languages.

One plunges sometimes in order to dive; but one may plunge without diving, and one may dive without plunging: to plunge is to dart head-foremost into the water: to dive is to go to the bottom of the water, or toward it: it is a good practice for bathers to plunge into the water when they first go in, although it is not advisable for them to dive; ducks frequently dive into the water without ever plunging. Thus far they differ in their natural sense; but in the figurative application they differ more widely: to plunge, in this case, is an act of rashness: to dive is an act of design: a young man hurried away by his passions will plunge into every extravagance when he comes into possession of his estate: people of a prying temper seek to dive into the secrets of others.

The French plunged themselves into these calamities they suffer, to prevent themselves from settling into a British constitution. BURKE.

How he did seem to dive into their hearts
With humble and familiar courtesy.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO POISE, BALANCE.

POISE is in French poide, a weight, and peser, to weigh. BALANCE is in French balance, from the Latin bilanz, or bis and lanx, a pair of scales.

To poise is properly to keep the weight from pressing on either side; to balance is to keep the balance even. The idea of bringing into an equilibrium is common to both terms, but a thing is poised as respects itself; it is balanced as respects other things; a person poises a plain stick in his hand when he wants it to lie even; he balances the stick if it has a particular weight at each end: a person may poise himself, but he balances others: when not on firm ground, it is necessary to poise one's self; when two persons are situated one at each end of a beam, they may balance one another. In the moral application they are similarly distinguished.

Some evil, terrible and unforeseen,
Must sure ensue to poise the scale against
This vast profusion of exceeding pleasure.

ROWE.

This, oh! this very moment let me die,
While hopes and fears in equal balance lie.

scarcely admit of comparison: the possessor of a house is naturally the master of the house; and, in general, whatever a man possesses that he has in his power, and is consequently master of; but we may have, legally, the right of possessing a thing over which we have actually no power of control: in this case, we are nominally possessor, but virtually not master. A minor, or insane person, may be both possessor and proprietor of that over which he has no control; a man is, therefore, on the other hand, appropriately denominated master, not possessor of his actions.

I am convinced that a poetic talent is a blessing to its possessor. SEWARD.

Death! great proprietor of all! 'tis thine
To tread out empire and to quench the stars.

YOUNG.

One cause of the insufficiency of riches (to produce happiness) is, that they very seldom make their owner rich. JOHNSON.

There Cæsar, grac'd with both Minervas, shone,
Cæsar, the world's great master, and his own.

Pope.

POSSIBLE, PRACTICABLE, PRACTICAL.

POSSIBLE, from the Latin possum, to be able, signifies properly to be able to be done: PRACTICABLE, from practice (v. To exercise), signifies to be able to put in practice: hence the difference between possible and practicable is the same as between doing a thing at all, or doing it as a rule. There are many things possible which cannot be called practicable; but what is practicable must, in its nature, be possible. The possible depends solely on the power of the agent; the practicable depends on circumstances: a child cannot say how much it is possible for him to learn until he has tried; schemes have sometimes everything apparently to recommend them to notice but that which is of the first importance, namely, their practicability.

How can we, without supposing ourselves under the constant care of a Supreme Being, give any possible account for that nice proportion which we find in every great city between the deaths and births of its inhabitants? ADDISON.

He who would aim at practicable things should turn upon allaying our pain, rather than removing our sorrow. STEELE.

The practicable is that which may or can be practised; the PRACTICAL is that which is intended for practice: the former, therefore, applies to that which men devise to carry into practice; the latter to that which they have to practise: projectors ought to consider what is practicable; divines and moralists have to consider what is practical. The practicable is opposed to the impracticable; the practical to the theoretical or speculative.

Practical cunning shows itself in political matters. SOUTH.

POVERTY, WANT, PENURY, INDIGENCE, NEED.

POVERTY, which marks the condition of being poor, is a general state of fortune opposed to that of riches.

Poverty is apt to betray a man into envy, riches into arrogance. ADDISON.

Poverty admits of different states or degrees which are expressed by the other terms. WANT, from the verb want, denotes, when taken absolutely, the want of the first necessities, which is a permanent state, and a low state of poverty; but it may sometimes denote an occasional want, as a traveller in a desert may be exposed to want; or it may imply the want of particular things, as when we speak of our wants.

Want is a bitter and a hateful good,
Because its virtues are not understood;
Yet many things, impossible to thought,
Have been by need to full perfection brought.

DAVIDEN.

PENURY, in Latin penuria, signifying extreme want, is poverty in its most abject state, which is always supposed to be as permanent as it is wretched, to which those who are already poor are brought, either by misfortune or imprudence.

Thus tender Spenser lived with mean repast,
Content, depress'd by penury, and pined
In foreign realm. S. PHILIPS.

INDIGENCE, in Latin indigentia, from indigeo, and the Greek δεομαι, to want, signifies the state of wanting such things as one has been habituated to, or are suited to one's station, and is properly applied to persons in the superior walks of life.

If we can but raise him above indigence, a moderate share of good-fortune and merit will be

and predominant express this state, in relation to some other which it has superseded or reduced to a state of inferiority. An opinion is said to be prevailing as respects the number of persons by whom it is maintained: a principle is said to be ruling as respects the superior influence which it has over the conduct of men more than any other. Particular disorders are prevalent at certain seasons of the year, when they affect the generality of persons: a particular taste or fashion is predominant which supersedes all other tastes or fashions.

Nor can a man, independently of the overruling influence of God's blessing and care, call himself one penny richer. SOUTH.

The doctrine of not owning a foreigner to be a king was held and taught by the Pharisees, a predominant sect of the Jews. PRIDEAUX.

TO PREVENT, ANTICIPATE.

To PREVENT is literally to come beforehand, and ANTICIPATE to take beforehand: the former is employed for actual occurrences; the latter as much for calculations as for actions: to prevent is the act of a person toward other persons or things; to anticipate is the act of a being either toward himself or another. In this sense God is said to prevent man with his favor by interposing so as to direct his purposes to the right object.

Be careful still to guard thy soul from wrong,
And let thy thought prevent thy hand and tongue. ROWE.

And a man may prevent what is to happen, by causing it to happen before the time.

But I do think it most cowardly and vile,
For fear of what might fail, so to prevent
The time of life. SHAKESPEARE.

We anticipate the happiness which we are to enjoy in future; we anticipate what a person is going to say by saying the same thing before him.

Why should we
Anticipate our sorrows? 'Tis like those
Who die for fear of death. SHAKESPEARE.

These words may also be both taken in the sense of causing a thing not to be done, but with this distinction, that to prevent is to cause a thing not to be done or happen at all, and anticipate is to prevent another from doing it by doing it one's self.

They sent a party of twelve hundred horse and dragoons, under the command of Sir George Chudleigh, to surprise the high-sheriff and principal gentlemen of the county, and thereby to prevent the coming up of any more strength to the king's party. CLARENDON.

I am far from pretending to instruct the profession, or anticipating their directions to such as are under their government. ARBUOTHNOT.

TO PREVENT, OBTIATE, PRECLUDE.

ALL these terms imply the causing something not to take place or exist. To PREVENT (v. To hinder) is to happen before, so as to render the thing impracticable. To OBTIATE, from ob and via, signifies coming in the way so as to render the thing unnecessary or of no value. Prevent applies to events or circumstances in life; obviate to mental acts or objects: bad weather prevents a person setting out according to a certain arrangement; a change of plan obviates every difficulty.

Every disease of age we may prevent,
Like those of youth, by being diligent. DENHAM.

The wind and my unfortunate sprain together, in a great measure prevented our electrical experiments. BRYDENE.

The imputation of folly, if it is true, must be suffered without hope; but that of immorality may be obviated by removing the cause. HAWKSWORTH.

Upon the ministers of the Church it is incumbent, as occasions offer, to explain and illustrate its design and uses to the more unlearned, as well as to obviate the crude exceptions made against its doctrines or language. CLEAVELAND.

To PRECLUDE, from pre and cludo, or claudio, to shut, signifying to shut before or out, to put a stop to by the intervention of something, is, like obviate, applied to mental objects.

The design of subscription being to preserve one uniform tenor of faith, and to preclude diversity of opinion. WATERLAND.

To prevent and preclude are rather the act of the thing than of the person; to obviate is rather the act of the person than of the thing. Circumstances may prevent or preclude anything from happening: a person obviates a difficulty or objection; so, according to this distinction, we may say either to obviate a necessity, or to preclude a necessity for anything, according as this is effected by any person, or by any circumstance.

RADIANCE, from radius, a ray, denotes the emission of rays, and is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to bodies naturally luminous, like the heavenly bodies; and BRILLIANCY (v. Bright) denotes the whole body of light emitted, and may, therefore, be applied equally to natural and artificial light. The radiancy of the sun, moon, and stars constitutes a part of their beauty; the brilliancy of a diamond is frequently compared with that of a star.

Among the crooked lanes, on every hedge,
The glowworm lights his gem, and through the dark

A moving radiance twinkles. THOMSON.

Brilliancy (v. Bright) is applied to objects which shine or glitter like a diamond.

The beauty of the ladies, the richness of their dress, and brilliancy of their jewels, were displayed in the most advantageous manner.

BYRON.

It is also applied figuratively to moral objects.

A circumstance intervened during the pendency of the negotiation to set off the good faith of the company with an additional brilliancy, and to make it sparkle and glow with a variety of splendid faces.

BURKE.

RAPACIOUS, RAVENOUS, VORACIOUS.

RAPACIOUS, in Latin rapax, from rapio, to seize, signifies seizing or grasping anything with an eager desire to have. RAVENOUS, from the Latin rabies, fury, and rapio, to seize, signifies the same as rapacious. VORACIOUS, from voro, to devour, signifies an eagerness to devour.

The idea of greediness, which forms the leading feature in the signification of all these terms, is varied in the subject and the object: rapacious is the quality peculiar to beasts of prey, or what is like beasts of prey: ravenous and voracious are common to all animals when impelled by hunger. The beasts of the forest are rapacious at all times; all animals are more or less ravenous or voracious, as circumstances may make them: the term rapacious applies to the seizing of anything that is eagerly wanted; ravenous applies to the seizing of anything which one takes for one's food: a lion is rapacious when it seizes on its prey: it is ravenous in the act of consuming it. The word ravenous respects the haste with which one eats; the word voracious respects the quantity which one consumes: a ravenous person is loath to wait for the dressing of his food; he consumes it without any preparation: a voracious person not only eats in haste, but he consumes great quantities, and continues to do so for a long time. Abstinence from food for an unusual length will make any healthy creature ravenous; habitual intemperance in eating, or a diseased appetite, will produce voracity.

Rapacious death asserts his tyrant power.

MRS. CARTER.

Again the holy fires on altars burn,
And once again the rae'nous birds return.

DEIDIER.

Ere you remark another's sin,
Bid thy own conscience look within;
Control thy more voracious bill,
Nor for a breakfast nations kill.

GAY.

In an extended sense, rapacity is applied as a characteristic of persons to denote their eagerness to seize anything which falls in their way.

A display of our wealth before robbers is not the way to restrain their boldness, or to lessen their rapacity.

BURKE.

Ravenous denotes an excess of rapacity, and voracious is applied figuratively to moral objects.

So great a hatred hadde the greedie ravenousness of their proconsultes rooted in the hearts of them all.

GOLDING.

So voracious is this humor grown, that it draws in everything to feed upon.

GOVERNMENT OF THE TONGUE.

RAPINE, PLUNDER, PILLAGE.

THE idea of property taken from another contrary to his consent is included in all these terms: but the term RAPINE includes most violence; PLUNDER includes removal or carrying away; PILLAGE, search and scrutiny after a thing. A soldier who makes a sudden incursion into an enemy's country, and carries away whatever comes within his reach, is guilty of rapine: he goes into a house full of property, and carries away much plunder; he enters with the rest of the army into a town, and, stripping it of everything that was to be found, goes away loaded with pillage; mischief and bloodshed attend rapine; loss attends plunder; distress and ruin follow wherever there has been pillage.

Upon the banks
Of Tweed, slow winding thro' the vale, the seat
Of war and rapine once. SOMERVILLE.

Ship-money was pitched upon as fit to be formed by excise and taxes, and the burden of the subjects took off by plunderings and sequestrations. SOUTH.

Although the Eretrians for a time stood resolutely to the defence of their city, it was given up by treachery on the seventh day, and pillaged and destroyed in a most barbarous manner by the Persians. CUMBERLAND.

RARE, SCARCE, SINGULAR.

RARE, in Latin rarius, comes from the Greek apaucos, rare. SCARCE, in Dutch schaers, sparing, comes from scheren, to cut or clip, and signifies cut close. SINGULAR, v. Particular.

Rare and scarce both respect number or quantity, which admit of expansion or diminution: rare is a thinned number; scarce is a quantity cut short. Rare is applied to matters of convenience or luxury; scarce to matters of utility or necessity: that which is rare becomes valuable, and fetches a high price; that which is scarce becomes precious, and the loss of it is seriously felt. The best of everything is in its nature rare; there will never be a superfluity of such things; there are, however, some things, as particularly curious plants or particular animals, which, owing to circumstances, are always rare: that which is most in use will, in certain cases, be scarce; when the supply of an article fails, and the demand for it continues, it naturally becomes scarce. An aloe in blossom is a rarity, for nature has prescribed such limits to its growth as to give but very few of such flowers: the paintings of Raphael, and the former distinguished painters, are daily becoming more scarce, because time will diminish their quantity, although not their value.

A perfect union of wit and judgment is one of the rarest things in the world. BURKE.

When any particular piece of money grew very scarce, it was often recoined by a succeeding emperor. ADDISON.

What is rare will often be singular, and what is singular will often, on that account, be rare: but these terms are not necessarily applied to the same object: fewness is the idea common to both; but rare is said of that of which there might be more; while singular is applied to that which is single, or nearly single, in its kind. The rare is that which is always sought for; the singular is not always that which one esteems: a thing is rare which is difficult to be obtained; a thing is singular for its peculiar qualities, good or bad. Indian plants are many of them rare in England, because the climate will not agree with them: the sensitive plant is singular, as its quality of yielding to the touch distinguishes it from all others.

And it was seated in an island strong,
Abounding all with delicies most rare.

SPENSER.

We should learn, by reflecting on the misfortunes which have attended others, that there is nothing singular in those which befall ourselves. MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

RASHNESS, TEMERITY, HASTINESS, PRECIPITANCY.

RASHNESS denotes the quality of rash, which, like the German rasch, and our word rush, and the Latin ruo, expresses hurried and excessive motion. TEMERITY, in Latin temeritas, from temere, possibly comes from the Greek τημερον, at the moment, denoting the quality of acting by the impulse of the moment. HASTINESS, v. Angry and Cursory. PRECIPITANCY, from the Latin præ and capio, signifies the quality or disposition of taking things before they ought to be taken.

Rashness and temerity have a close alliance with each other in sense; but they have a slight difference which is entitled to notice: rashness is a general and indefinite term, in the signification of which an improper celerity is the leading idea: this celerity may arise either from a vehemence of character, or a temporary ardor of the mind: in the signification of temerity, the leading idea is want of consideration, springing mostly from an overweening confidence, or a presumption of character. Rashness is therefore applied to corporeal actions, as the jumping into a river, without being able to swim, or the leaping over a hedge, without being an expert horseman; temerity is applied to our moral actions, particularly such as require deliberation, and a calculation of consequences. Hastiness and precipitancy are but modes or characteristics of rashness, and consequently employed only in particular cases, as hastiness in regard to our movements, and precipitancy in regard to our measures.

Nature to youth hot rashness doth dispense,
But with cold prudence age doth recompense.

DENHAM.

All mankind have a sufficient plea for some degree of restlessness, and the fault seems to be little more than too much temerity of conclusion in favor of something not experienced. JOHNSON.

And hurry through the woods with hasty step,
Rustling and full of hope.

SOMERVILLE.

As the chemist, by catching at it too soon, lost the philosophical elixir, so precipitancy of our understandings is an occasion of error.

GLANVIL.

RATE, PROPORTION, RATIO.

RATE (v. To estimate) and RATIO, which has the same origin and original meaning as rate, are in sense species of PROPORTION (v. Proportionale): that is, they are supposed or estimated proportions, in distinction from proportions that lie in the nature of things. The first term, rate, is employed in ordinary concerns; a person receives a certain sum weekly at the rate of a certain sum yearly: ratio is applied only to numbers and calculations; as two is to four, so is four to eight, and eight to sixteen; the ratio in this case being double: proportion is employed in matters of science, and in all cases where the two more specific terms are not admissible; the beauty of an edifice depends upon observing the doctrine of proportions; in the disposing of soldiers a certain regard must be had to proportion in the height and size of the men.

At Ephesus and Athens, Anthony lived at his usual rate in all manner of luxury. PRIDEAUX.

The rate of interest (to lenders) is generally in a compound ratio formed out of the inconvenience and the hazard.

BLACKSTONE.

Repentance cannot be effectual but as it bears some proportion to sin.

SOUTH.

RAVAGE, DESOLATION, DEVASTATION.

RAVAGE comes from the Latin rapio, and the Greek ῥαπαίω, signifying a seizing or tearing away. DESOLATION, from solus, alone, signifies made solitary or reduced to solitude. DEVASTATION, in Latin devastatio, from devasto, to lay waste, signifies reducing to a waste or desert.

Ravage expresses less than either desolation or devastation: a breaking, tearing, or destroying is implied in the word ravage; but desolation signifies the entire unpeopling a land, and devastation the entire clearing away of every vestige of cultivation. Torrents, flames, and tempests ravage; war, plague, and famine desolate; armies of barbarians, who inundate a country, carry devastation with them wherever they go.

Beasts of prey retire, that all night long,
Urg'd by necessity, had rang'd the dark,
As if their conscious ravage shunn'd the light,
Asham'd.

THOMSON.

Amid thy bow'r's the tyrant's hand is seen,
And desolation saddens all thy green.

GOLDSMITH.

How much the strength of the Roman republic is impaired, and what dreadful devastation has gone forth into all its provinces!

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

Ravage is employed likewise in the moral application; desolation and devastation only in the proper application to countries. Disease makes its ravages on beauty; death makes its ravages among men in a more terrible degree at one time than at another.

Would one think 'twere possible for love
To make such ravage in a noble soul? ADDISON.

RAY, BEAM.

RAY (v. Gleam) is indefinite in its meaning; it may be said either of a large or small quantity of light: BEAM (v. Gleam) is something positive; it can be said only of that which is considerable. We can speak of rays either of the sun, or the stars, or any other luminous body; but we speak of the beams of the sun or the moon. The rays of the sun break through the clouds; its beams are scorching at noonday. A room can scarcely be so shut up, that a single ray of light shall not penetrate through the crevices; the sea, in a calm moonlight night, presents a beautiful spectacle, with the moon's beams playing on its waves.

The stars emit a shivered ray.

THOMSON.

The modest virtues mingle in her eyes,
Still on the ground dejected, darting all
Their humid beams into the blooming flowers.

THOMSON.

READY, APT, PROMPT.

READY (v. Easy) is in general applied to that which has been intentionally prepared for a given purpose; PROMPT (v. Expedition) is applied to that which is at hand so as to answer the immediate purpose; APT, from aptus, fit, is applied to that which is fit, or from its nature has a tendency to produce effects.

The god himself with ready trident stands
And opens the deep, and spreads the moving sands.
DRYDEN.

Let not the fervent tongue,
Prompt to deceive, with adulation smooth,
Gain on your purpos'd will. THOMSON.

Poverty is apt to betray a man into envy, riches
into arrogance. ADDISON.

When applied as personal characteristics, ready respects the will or understanding, which is prepared for anything; as ready to serve a person, a ready wit; prompt denotes the vigor or zeal which impels to action without delay, or at the moment when wanted; and apt, a fitness to do anything from the habit or temper of the mind.

All things are ready if our minds be so.
SHAKESPEARE.
But in his duty prompt at every call,
He watch'd and wept, he pray'd and felt for all.
GOLDSMITH.

This so eminent industry in making proselytes more of that sex than of the other growth that they are deemed apt to serve as instruments in the cause. HOOKER.

REASONABLE, RATIONAL.

REASONABLE, or accordant with reason, and RATIONAL, having reason, are both derived from the same Latin word ratio, reason, which, from ratus and reor, to think, signifies the thinking faculty. They differ principally according to the different meanings of the word reason. Reasonable is sometimes applied to persons in the general sense of having the faculty of reason.

Human nature is the same in all reasonable creatures. ADDISON.

But more frequently the word rational is used in this abstract sense of reason.

Can anything so probably conduce to the well-being of a rational and social animal as the right exercise of that reason, and of those social affections? HARRIS.

In application to things reasonable and rational both signify according to reason;

but the former is used in reference to the business of life, as a reasonable proposal, wish, etc.; rational to abstract matters, as rational motives, grounds, questions, etc.

Men have no right to what is not reasonable, and to what is not for their benefit. BURKE.

The evidence which is afforded for a future state is sufficient for a rational ground of conduct. BLAIR.

TO REBOUND, REVERBERATE, RECOIL.

To REBOUND is to bound or spring back: a ball rebounds. To REVERBERATE is to verberate or beat back: a sound reverberates when it echoes. To RECOIL is to coil or whirl back: a snake recoils. The two former are used in an improper application, although rarely; but we may say of recoil, that a man's schemes will recoil on his own head.

Honor is but the reflection of a man's own actions shining bright in the face of all about him, and from thence rebounding upon himself.

You seemed to reverberate upon me with the beams of the sun. HOWELL.

Who in deep mines for hidden knowledge toils,
Like guns o'ercharg'd, breaks, misses, or recoils. DENHAM.

TO RECEDE, RETREAT, RETIRE, WITHDRAW, SECEDE.

To RECEDE is to go back; to RETREAT is to draw back; the former is a simple action, suited to one's convenience; the latter is a particular action, dictated by necessity: we recede by an indirect backward movement; we retreat by an indirect backward movement: we recede a few steps in order to observe an object more distinctly; we retreat from the position we have taken in order to escape danger; whoever can advance can recede; but in general those only retreat whose advance is not free: receding is the act of every one; retreating is peculiarly the act of soldiers, or those who make hostile movements.

As the sun recedes, the moon and stars discover themselves. GLANVILLE.

With dread of death to flight or foul retreat. MILTON.

To RETIRE and WITHDRAW originally signify the same as retreat, that is, to draw back or off; but they agree in application mostly with recede, to denote leisurely, and voluntary acts: to recede is to go back from a given spot; but to retire and withdraw have respect to the place or the presence of the persons: we may recede on an open plain; but we retire or withdraw from a room, or from some company. In this application withdraw is the more familiar term: retire may likewise be used for an army; but it denotes a much more leisurely action than retreat: a general retreats, by compulsion, from an enemy; but he may retire from an enemy's country when there is no enemy present.

She from her husband soft withdrew. MILTON.

After some slight skirmishes he retired himself (retired) into the castle of Farnham.

CLARENDON.

Recede, retreat, retire, and withdraw are also used in a moral application; SECEDE is used only in this sense: a person recedes from his engagement, or his pretensions; he retires from business, or withdraws from a society. To secede is a public act; men secede from a religious or political body; withdraw is a private act; they withdraw themselves as individual members from any society.

We were soon brought to the necessity of receding from our imagined equality with our cousins.

JOHNSON.

Retirement from the world's cares and pleasures has been often recommended as useful to repentance.

JOHNSON.

A temptation may withdraw for awhile, and return again.

SOUTH.

BLAIR.

Pisistratus and his sons maintained their usurpations during a period of sixty-eight years, including those of Pisistratus' secessions from Athens.

CUMBERLAND.

RECEIPT, RECEPTION.

RECEIPT comes from receive, in its application to inanimate objects, which are taken into possession. RECEPTION comes from the same verb, in the sense of treating persons at their first arrival: in the commercial intercourse of men, the receipt of goods or money must be acknowledged in writing; in the friendly intercourse of men, their reception of each other will be polite or cold, according to the sentiments entertained toward the individual.

If a man will keep but of even hand, his ordinary expenses ought to be but to half of his receipts.

BACON.

I thank you and Mrs. Pope for my kind reception.

ATTENBURY.

TO RECKON, COUNT OR ACCOUNT, NUMBER.

The idea of esteeming is here common to these terms, which differ less in meaning than in application: RECKON (v. To calculate) is the most familiar; ACCOUNT (v. To calculate) and NUMBER, i. e., to put in the number, are employed only in the grave style: we reckon it a happiness to enjoy the company of a particular friend; we ought to account it a privilege to be enabled to address our Maker by prayer; we must all expect to be one day numbered with the dead.

Reckoning themselves absolved, by Mary's attachment to Bothwell, from the engagements which they had come under when she yielded herself a prisoner, they carried her next evening, under a strong guard, to the castle of Lochleven.

ROBERTSON.

There is no bishop of the Church of England but accounts it his interest, as well as his duty, to comply with this precept of the Apostle Paul to Titus, "These things teach and exhort."

SOUTH.

He whose mind never pauses from the remembrance of his own sufferings may justly be numbered among the most miserable of human beings.

JOHNSON.

TO RECLAIM, REFORM.

RECLAIM, from clamo, to call, signifies to call back to its right place that which has gone astray. REFORM signifies to form anew that which has changed its form: they are allied only in their application to the moral character. A man is reclaimed from his vicious courses by the force of advice or exhortation; he may be reformed by various means, external or internal. A parent endeavors to reclaim a child, but too often in vain; the offender is in general not reformed.

Scotland had nothing to dread from a princess of Mary's character, who was wholly occupied in endeavoring to reclaim her heretical subjects.

ROBERTSON.

A monkey, to reform the times, Resolv'd to visit foreign climes.

GAY.

TO RECLINE, REPOSE.

To RECLINE is to lean back; to REPOSE is to place one's self back: he who

reclines, reposes; but we may recline without reposing: when we recline we put ourselves into a particular position; but when we repose we put ourselves into that position which will be most easy.

For consolation on his friend reclin'd.

FALCONER.

I first awak'd, and found myself reposed.

Under a shade, on flowers.

MILTON.

RECOGNIZE, ACKNOWLEDGE.

RECOGNIZE, in Latin recognoscere, that is, to take knowledge of, or bring to one's own knowledge, is to take cognizance of that which comes again before our notice; to ACKNOWLEDGE (v. To acknowledge) is to admit to one's knowledge whatever comes fresh under our notice: we recognize a person whom we have known before; we recognize him either in his former character, or in some newly assumed character; we acknowledge either former favors, or those which have been just received: princes recognize certain principles which have been admitted by previous consent; they acknowledge the justice of claims which are preferred before them.

When conscience threatens punishment to secret crimes, it manifestly recognizes a Supreme Governor from whom nothing is hidden. BLAIR.

I call it atheism by establishment, when any State, as such, shall not acknowledge the existence of God as the moral governor of the world.

BURKE.

RECORD, REGISTER, ARCHIVE.

RECORD is taken for the thing recorded, or the collection in which a thing is recorded; REGISTER, either for the thing registered, or the place in which it is registered; ARCHIVE, mostly for the place, and sometimes for the thing: records are either historical details or short notices, which serve to preserve the memory of things; registers are but short notices of particular and local circumstances; archives are always connected with the State: every place of antiquity has its records of the different circumstances which have been connected with its rise and progress, and the various changes which it has experienced; in public registers we find accounts of families, and of their various connections and fluctuations; in archives we find all legal deeds and instruments which involve the interests of the nation, both in its internal and external economy. In an extended application of these terms, records contain whatever is to be remembered at ever so distant a period; registers, that which is to serve present purposes; archive, that in which any things are stored.

Though we think our words vanish with the breath that utters them, yet they become records in God's court, and are laid up in his archives as witnesses either for or against us.

GOVERNMENT OF THE TONGUE.

This island, as appeareth by faithful registers of those times, had ships of great content.

BACON.

It may be found in the same archive where the famous compact between magistrate and people, so much insisted on in the vindications of the rights of mankind, is repositied.

WARBURTON.

TO RECOVER, RETRIEVE, REPAIR, RECRUIT.

RECOVER is to get again under one's cover or protection. RETRIEVE, from the French trouver, to find, is to find again. REPAIR, in French reparer, Latin reparo, from re and paro, to make ready or right again, signifies to make a thing good as it was before. RECRUIT, in French recru, from cru, and the Latin creasco, to grow, signifies either to grow or to cause to grow again, as before.

Recover is the most general term, and applies to objects in general; retrieve, repair, and the others are only partial applications: we recover things either by our own means or by casualties; we retrieve and repair by our own efforts only: we recover that which has been taken, or that which has been any way lost; we retrieve that which has passed away or been consumed; we repair that which has been injured; we recruit that which has been diminished: we recover property from those who wish to deprive us of it; we retrieve our misfortunes, or our lost reputation; we repair the damage done to our property; we recruit the strength which has been exhausted: we do not seek after that which we think irrecoverable; we give that up which is irretrievable; we do not labor on that which is irreparable; our power of recruiting depends upon circumstances; he who makes a moderate use of his resources may in general easily recruit himself when they are gone.

The serious and impartial retrospect of our conduct is indisputably necessary to the confirmation or recovery of our virtue. JOHNSON.

Why may not the soul receive
New organs, since ev'n art can these retrieve? JENTRE.

Your men shall be receiv'd, your fleet repair'd. DRYDEN.

With greens and flow'rs recruit their empty lives. DRYDEN.

RECOVERY, RESTORATION.

RECOVERY (v. To recover) is the regaining of any object which has been lost or missing; RESTORATION is the getting back what has been taken away, or that of which one has been deprived. What is recovered may be recovered with or without the use of means; the restoration is effected by foreign agency; that which is lost by accident may be recovered by accident; the restoration of a prince to his throne is mostly effected by his subjects.

This is that fulness of the Gentiles of which St. Paul speaks coincident in time with the recovery of the Jews, and in a great degree the effect of their conversion. HOBBSLEY.

Mr. Morrice and Sir John Granville, whom the General (Monk) trusted with his secret intentions in the arduous affair of the restoration, were at that time taken notice of to be intimate with Mr. Mordaunt. CLARENDON.

In respect to health or other things, recovery signifies, as before, the regaining something; and restoration, the bringing back to its former state.

When the cure was perfected, the names of the diseased persons, together with the manner of their recovery, were registered in the temple. POTTER.

My depressed spirits, on account of Joanna's critical and almost hopeless situation, greatly contributed to prevent the restoration of my health. STREADMAN.

So likewise in the moral application.

Let us study to improve the assistance which this revelation affords for the restoration of our nature and the recovery of our felicity. BLAIR.

RECTITUDE, UPRIGHTNESS.

RECTITUDE is properly rightness, which is expressed in a stronger manner by UPRIGHTNESS: we speak of the rectitude of conduct, or of judgment; of uprightness of mind, or of moral character, which must be something more than straight, for it must be elevated above everything mean or devious.

We are told by Cumberland that rectitude is merely metaphorical, and that as a right line describes the shortest passage from point to point, so a right action effects a good design by the fewest means. JOHNSON.

Who to the fraudulent impostor foul,
In his uprightness, answer thus return'd. MILTON.

TO REDEEM, RANSOM.

REDEEM, in Latin redimo, is compounded of re and emo, to buy off, or back to one's self. RANSOM is in all probability a variation of redeem.

Redeem is a term of general application; ransom is employed only on particular occasions: we redeem persons as well as things; we ransom persons only: we may redeem by labor, or anything which supplies an equivalent to money; we ransom persons with money only: we redeem a watch, or whatever has been given in pawn; we ransom a captive: redeem is employed in the improper application; ransom only in the proper sense: we may redeem our character, redeem our life, or redeem our honor; and in this sense our Saviour redeems repentant sinners; but those who are ransomed only recover their bodily liberty.

Thus in her crime her confidence she plac'd,
And with new treasons would redeem the past. DRYDEN.

A third tax was paid by vassals to the king, to ransom him if he should happen to be taken prisoner. ROBERTSON.

REDRESS, RELIEF.

REDRESS, like address (v. Accost), in all probability comes from the Latin dirigo, signifying to direct or bring back to the former point, is said only with regard to matters of right and justice; RELIEF (v. To help) to those of kindness and humanity: by power we obtain redress: by active interference we obtain a relief: an injured person looks for redress to the government; an unfortunate person looks for relief to the compassionate and kind: what we suffer through the oppression or wickedness of others can be redressed only by those who have the power of dispensing justice; whenever we suffer, in the order of Providence, we may meet with some relief from those who are more favored. Redress applies to public as well as private grievances; relief applies only to private distresses:

under a pretence of seeking redress of grievances, mobs are frequently assembled to the disturbance of the better disposed; under a pretence of soliciting charitable relief, thieves gain admittance into families.

Instead of redressing grievances, and improving the fabric of their state, the French were made to take a very different course. BURKE.

His house was known to all the vagrant train,
He chid their wanderings, but reliev'd their pain.
GOLDSMITH.

TO REDUCE, LOWER.

REDUCE is to bring back or to a given point, i. e., in an extended sense, to bring down; LOWER is to make low or lower, which proves the close connection of these words in their original meaning; it is, however, only in their improper application that they have any further connection. Reduce is used in the sense of lessen, when applied to number, quantity, price, etc.; lower is used in the same sense when applied to price, demands, terms, etc.: the former, however, occurs in cases where circumstances as well as persons are concerned; the latter only in cases where persons act: the price of corn is reduced by means of importation; a person lowers his price or his demand when he finds them too high.

The regular metres then in use may be reduced, I think, to four. TREVITT.

Mr. Locke, Mr. Law, and Mr. Montesquieu, as well as many other writers, seem to have imagined that the increase of gold and silver, in consequence of the discovery of the Spanish West Indies, was the real cause of the lowering of the rate of interest through the greater part of Europe. SMITH.

In the moral application, reduce expresses more than lower; a man is said to be reduced to an abject condition, but to be lowered in the estimation of others; to be reduced to a state of slavery, to be lowered in his own eyes.

I think the low circumstances she was reduced to was a piece of good luck for us. GUARDIAN.

It would be a matter of astonishment to me that any critic should be found proof against the beauties of Agamemnon as to lower its author to a comparison with Sophocles or Euripides.

CUMBERLAND.

TO REFER, RELATE, RESPECT, REGARD.

REFER, from the Latin re and fero, signifies literally to bring back; and RE-

LATE, from the participle latus, of the same verb, signifies brought back: the former is, therefore, transitive, and the latter intransitive. Refer is commonly said of circumstances that carry the memory to events or circumstances; relate is said of things that have a natural connection: the religious festivals and ceremonies of the Roman Catholics have all a reference to some events that happened in the early periods of Christianity; the notes and observations at the end of a book relate to what has been inserted in the text.

Our Saviour's words (in his sermon on the mount) all refer to the Pharisees' way of speaking. SOUTH.

Homer artfully interweaves, in the several succeeding parts of his poem, an account of everything material which relates to his princes. ADDISON.

Refer and relate carry us back to that which may be very distant; but RESPECT and REGARD (v. To esteem) turn our views to that which is near. Whatever respects or regards a thing has a moral influence over it; but the former is more commonly employed than the latter; it is the duty of the magistrates to take into consideration whatever respects the good order of the community; laws respect the general welfare of the community; the due administration of the laws regards the happiness of the individual.

Religion is a pleasure to the mind, as respects practice. SOUTH.

What I have said regards only the vain part of the sex. ADDISON.

RE FORM, REFORMATION.

REFORM has a general application; REFORMATION a particular application: whatever undergoes such a change as to give a new form to an object occasions a reform; when such a change is produced in the moral character, it is termed a reformation: the concerns of a state require occasional reform; those of an individual require reformation. When reform and reformation are applied to the moral character, the former has a more extensive signification than the latter; the term reform conveying the idea of a complete amendment; reformation implying only the process of amending or improving. A reform in one's life and conversation will always be accompanied with a corresponding increase of happiness to the individual; when we observe any approaches to reformation, we may cease to despair of the individual who gives the happy indications.

He was anxious to keep the distemper of France from the least countenance in England, where he was sure some wicked persons had shown a strong disposition to recommend an imitation of the French spirit of reform. BURKE.

Examples are pictures, and strike the senses, nay, raise the passions, and call in those (the strongest and most general of all motives) to the aid of reformation. FORD.

TO REFUSE, DECLINE, REJECT, REPEL, REBUFF.

REFUSE (v. To deny) signifies simply to pour back, that is, to send back, which is the common idea of all these terms. DECLINE, in Latin declino, signifies literally to turn aside; REJECT, from jacio, to throw, to cast back; REPEL, from pello, to drive, to drive back; REBUFF, from buff or puff, to puff one back, or send off with a puff.

Refuse is an unqualified action, it is accompanied with no expression of opinion; decline is a gentle and indirect mode of refusal; reject is a direct mode, and conveys a positive sentiment of disapprobation: we refuse what is asked of us, for want of inclination to comply; we decline what is proposed from motives of discretion; we reject what is offered to us, because it does not fall in with our views; we refuse to listen to the suggestions of our friends; we decline an offer of service; we reject the insinuations of the interested and evil-minded.

But all her arts are still employ'd in vain;
Again she comes, and is refus'd again. DRYDEN.
Why should he then reject a suit so just?

DRYDEN.

Melissa, though she could not boast the apathy of Cato, wanted not the more prudent virtue of Sappho, and gained the victory by declining the contest. JOHNSON.

To refuse is said only of that which passes between individuals; to reject is said of that which comes from any quarter: requests and petitions are refused by those who are solicited; opinions, propositions, and counsels are rejected by particular communities: the king refuses to give his assent to a bill; the Parliament rejects a bill.

Having most affectionately set life and death before them, and conjured them to choose one and avoid the other, he still leaves unto them, as to free and natural agents, a liberty to refuse all his calls, to let his talents lie by them unprofitable. HAMMOND.

The House was then so far from being possessed with that spirit, that the utmost that could be obtained upon a debate upon that petition was that it should not be rejected. CLARENDON.

To repel is to reject with violence; to rebuff is to refuse with contempt, or what may be considered as such. We refuse and reject that which is either offered, or simply presents itself for acceptance: the act may be negative, or not outwardly expressed; we repel and rebuff that which forces itself into our presence, contrary to our inclination: it is in both cases a direct act of force; we repel the attack of an enemy, or we repel the advances of one who is not agreeable; we rebuff those who put that in our way which is offensive. Importunate persons must necessarily expect to meet with rebuffs, and are in general less susceptible of them than others; delicate minds feel a refusal as a rebuff.

If he should choose the right casket, you would refuse to perform your father's will, if you should refuse to accept him. SHAKESPEARE.

Whether it be a divine revelation or no, reason must judge, which can never permit the mind to reject a greater evidence to embrace what is less evident. LOCKE.

Th' unwearied watch their listening leaders keep,
And, couching close, repel invading sleep. POPE.
At length rebuff'd, they leave their mangled prey. DRYDEN.

TO RELATE, RECOUNT, DESCRIBE.

RELATE, in Latin relatus, participle of refero, signifies to bring that to the notice of others which has before been brought to our own notice. RECOUNT is properly to count again, or count over again. DESCRIBE, from the Latin scribo, to write, is literally to write down.

The idea of giving an account of events or circumstances is common to all these terms, which differ in the object and circumstances of the action. Relate is said generally of all events, both of those which concern others as well as ourselves; recount is said particularly of those things in which the recounter has a special interest: those who relate all they hear often relate that which never happened; it is a gratification to an old soldier to recount all the transactions in which he bore a part during the military career of his early youth. We relate events that have happened at any period of time immediate or remote; we recount mostly those things which have been long passed: in recounting, the memory reverts to past scenes, and counts over all that has deeply interested the mind. Travellers are pleased to relate to their friends whatever they have seen remarkable in other countries; the recounting of our adventures in distant regions of the globe has a peculiar interest for all who hear them. We may relate either by writing or by word of mouth; we recount mostly by word of mouth. Relate is said properly of events or that which passes: describe is said of that which exists: we relate the particulars of our journey; and we describe the country we pass through. Personal adventure is always the subject of a relation; the quality and condition of things are those of the description. We relate what happened on meeting a friend; we describe the dress of the parties, or the ceremonies which are usual on particular occasions.

O Muse! the causes and the crimes relate,
What goddess was provok'd, and whence her hate.
DAVIDEN.

To recount Almighty works
What words or tongue of seraph can suffice?
MILTON.

In describing a rough torrent or deluge, the numbers should run easy and flowing. POPE.

RELATION, RECITAL, NARRATION, NARRATIVE.

RELATION, from the verb relate, denotes the act of relating or the thing related. RECITAL, from recite, denotes the act of reciting or the thing recited. NARRATION, from narrate, denotes either the act of narrating or the thing narrated. NARRATIVE, from the same verb, denotes the thing narrated. Relation is here, as in the former paragraph (v. To relate), the general, and the others particular terms. Relation applies to every object which is related, whether of a public or private, a national or an individual nature; history is the relation of national events; biography is the relation of particular lives: recital is the relation or repetition of actual or existing circumstances; we listen to the recital of misfortunes, distresses, and the like. The relation may concern matters of indifference: the recital is always of something that affects the interests of some individual: the pages of the journalist are filled with the relation of daily occurrences which simply amuse in the reading: but the recital of another's woes often draws tears from the audience to whom it is made. Relation and recital are seldom employed but in connection with the object related or recited; narrative is mostly used by itself: hence we say the relation of any particular circumstance; the recital of any one's calamities; but an affecting narrative, or a simple narrative.

Those relations are commonly of most value in which the writer tells his own story. JOHNSON.

Old men fall easily into recitals of past transactions. JOHNSON.

Homer introduces the best instructions in the midst of the plainest narrations. DENHAM.

Therefore by this narratives you now understand the state of the question. BACON.

RELATION, RELATIVE, KINSMAN, KINDRED.

RELATION is here taken to express the person related; it is, as in the former paragraph, the general term both in sense and application; RELATIVE is employed only as respects the particular individual to whom one is related; KINSMAN designates the particular kind of relation, and KINDRED is a collective term comprehending all one's relations, or those who are akin to one. In abstract propositions we speak of relations; a man who is without relations feels himself an outcast in society; in designating one's close and intimate connection with persons we use the term relative; our near and dear relatives are the first objects of our regard: in designating one's relationship and connection with persons, kinsman is preferable; when a man has not any children, he frequently adopts one of his kinsmen as his heir: when the ties of relationship are to be specified in the persons of any particular family, they are denominated kindred; a man cannot abstract himself from his kindred while he retains any spark of human feeling.

You are not to imagine that I think myself discharged from the duties of gratitude only because my relations do not adjust their looks to my expectation.

JOHNSON.

Our friends and relations stand weeping by.

POPE.

Herod put all to death whom he found in Trechoritis of the families and kindred of any of those at Repta.

PRIDEAUX.

TO RELAX, REMIT.

THE general idea of lessening is that which allies these words to each other; but they differ very widely in their original meaning, and somewhat in their ordinary application; RELAX, from the word laz, or loose, signifies to make loose, and in its moral use to lessen anything in its degree of tightness or rigor; to REMIT, from re and mitto, to send back, signifies to take off in part or entirely that which has been imposed; that is, to lessen in quantity. In regard to our attempts to act, we may speak of relaxing in our endeavors, and remitting our labors or exertions; in regard to our dealings with others, we may speak of relaxing in discipline, relaxing in the severity or strictness of our conduct, of remitting a punishment or remitting a sentence. The discretionary power of showing mercy when placed in the hands of the sovereign, serves to relax the rigor of the law; when the punishment seems to be disproportioned to the magnitude of the offence, it is but equitable to remit it.

No more the smith his dusky brow shall clear,
Relax his ponderous strength, and lean to hear.

GOLDSMITH.

How often have I blessed the coming day,
When toil remitting lent its turn to play.

GOLDSMITH.

REMAINS, RELICS.

REMAINS signifies literally what re-mains: RELICS, from the Latin relinquo, to leave, signifies what is left. The former is a term of general and familiar application; the latter is specific. What remains after the use or consumption of anything is termed the remains; what is left of anything after a lapse of years is the relic or relica. There are remains of buildings mostly after a conflagration; there are relics of antiquity in most monasteries and old churches. Remains are of value, or not, according to the circumstances of the case; relics always derive a value from the person to whom they were supposed originally to belong. The remains of a person, that is, what corporally remains of a person after the extinction of life, will be respected by his friend; a bit of a garment that belonged, or was supposed to belong, to some saint, will be a precious relic in the eyes of a superstitious Roman Catholic. All nations have agreed to respect the remains of the dead; religion, under most forms, has given a sacredness to relics in the eyes of its most zealous votaries; the veneration of genins, or the devotedness of friendship, has in like manner transferred itself from the individual himself to some object which has been his property or in his possession, and thus fabricated for itself relics equally precious.

Upon these friendly shores and flow'ry plains,
Which hide Anchises and his blest remains.

DRYDEN.

This church is very rich in relics. ADDISON.

Sometimes the term relics is used to denote what remains after the decay or loss of the rest, which further distinguishes it from the word remains, that simply signifies what is left.

Among the remains of old Rome, the grandeur of the commonwealth shows itself chiefly in works that were either necessary or convenient.

ADDISON.

All those arts, rarities, and inventions which the ingenious pursue, and all admire, are but the reliquies of an intellect defaced with sin and time.

REMARK, OBSERVATION, COMMENT,
NOTE, ANNOTATION, COMMENTARY.

REMARK (v. To notice), OBSERVATION (v. To notice), and COMMENT, in Latin commentum, from commiscescor, to call to mind, are either spoken or written: NOTE, ANNOTATION (v. Note), COMMENTARY, a variation of comment, are always written. Remark and observation, admitting of the same distinction in both cases, have been sufficiently explained in the article referred to: comment is a species of remark which often loses in good-nature what it gains in seriousness; it is mostly applied to particular persons or cases, and more commonly employed as a vehicle of censure than of commendation; public speakers and public performers are exposed to all the comments which the vanity, the envy, and ill-nature of self-constituted critics can suggest; but when not employed in personal cases, it serves for explanation: the other terms are used in this sense only, but with certain modifications; the note is most general, and serves to call the attention to as well as illustrate particular passages in the text: annotations and commentaries are more minute; the former being that which is added by way of appendage; the latter being employed in a general form; as the annotations of the Greek scholiasts, and the commentaries on the sacred writings.

Spence, in his remarks on Pope's Odyssey, produces what he thinks an unconquerable quotation from Dryden's preface to the Æneid, in favor of translating an epic poem into blank verse. JOHNSON.

If the critic has published nothing but rules and observations on criticism, I then consider whether there be a propriety and elegance in his thoughts and words. ADDISON.

Sublime or low, unbended or intense,
The sound is still a comment to the sense.

ROSCOMMON.

The history of the notes (to Pope's Homer) has never been traced. JOHNSON.

I love a critic who mixes the rules of life with annotations upon writers. STEELE.

Memoirs or memorials are of two kinds, whereof the one may be termed commentaries, the other registers. BACON.

TO REPEAT, RECITE, REHEARSE, RECAPITULATE.

THE idea of going over any words, or actions, is common to all these terms. REPEAT, from the Latin repeto, to seek, or go over again, is the general term, including only the common idea. To RECITE, REHEARSE, and RECAPITULATE are modes of repetition, conveying each some accessory idea. To recite is to repeat in a formal manner; to rehearse is to repeat or recite by way of preparation; to recapitulate, from capitulum, a chapter, is to repeat the chapters or principal heads of any discourse. We repeat both actions and words; we recite only words; we repeat single words, or even sounds; we recite always a form of words: we repeat our own words or the words of another; we recite only the words of another: we repeat a name; we recite an ode, or a set of verses.

I could not half those horrid crimes repeat,
Nor half the punishments those crimes have met. DRYDEN.

Whenever the practice of recitation was disused, the works, whether poetical or historical, perished with the authors. JOHNSON.

We repeat for purposes of general convenience; we recite for the convenience or amusement of others; we rehearse for some specific purpose, either for the amusement or instruction of others: we recapitulate for the instruction of others. We repeat that which we wish to be heard; we recite a piece of poetry before a company; we rehearse the piece in private which we are going to recite in public; we recapitulate the general heads of that which we have already spoken in detail. A master must always repeat to his scholars the instruction which he wishes them to remember; Homer is said to have recited his verses in different parts; players rehearse their different parts before they perform in public; ministers recapitulate the leading points in their discourse. To repeat is commonly to use the same words; to recite, to rehearse, and to recapitulate, do not necessarily require any verbal sameness. We repeat literally what we hear spoken by another; but we recite and rehearse events, and we recapitulate in a concise manner what has been uttered in a particular manner. An echo repeats with the greatest possible precision; Homer recites the names of all the Grecian and Trojan leaders, together with the names and account of their countries, and the number of the forces which they commanded; Virgil makes Æneas to rehearse before Dido and her courtiers the story of the capture of Troy, and his own adventures; a judge recapitulates evidence to a jury.

He repeated the question so often that we were obliged to give him a reply. BRYDOK.

The way has been to recite it at the prime or first hour every Lord's-day. WATERLAND.

Now take your turns, ye muses, to rehearse
His friend's complaints, and mighty magic verse. DRYDEN.

The parts of a judge are to direct the evidence to moderate length, repetition, or impertinency of speech, to recapitulate, select, and collate the material points of that which has been said. BACON.

These terms may be applied with equal propriety to words written as to words spoken.

I am always naturally sparing of my letters to my friends, for a reason I think a great one, that it is needless after experience to repeat assurances of friendship. POPE.

The thoughts of gods let Glanville's verse recite,
And bring the scenes of opening fates to light. POPE.

Let Dryden with new rules our state refine,
And his great models form by this design;
But where's a second Virgil to rehearse
Our hero's glories in his epic verse? ROCHESTER.

Hence we see the reason why creeds were no larger nor more explicit, being but a kind of a recapitulation of what the catechumens had been taught before. WATERLAND.

REPENTANCE, PENITENCE, CONTRITION, COMPUNCTION, REMORSE.

REPENTANCE, from re, back, and penitet, to be sorry, signifies thinking one's self wrong for something past: PENITENCE, from the same source, signifies simply sorrow for what is amiss. CONTRITION, from contero, to rub together, is to bruise, as it were, with sorrow; COMPUNCTION, from compungo, to prick thoroughly; and REMORSE, from remordeo, to have a gnawing pain; all express modes of penitence differing in degree and circumstance. Repentance refers more to the change of one's mind with regard to an object, and is properly confined to the time when this change takes place; we therefore, strictly speaking, repent of a thing but once; we may, however, have penitence for the same thing all our lives. Repentance supposes a change of conduct, at least as long as the sorrow lasts; but the term penitence is confined to the sorrow which the sense of guilt occasions to the offender.

This is the sinner's hard lot, that the same thing which makes him need repentance makes him also in danger of not obtaining it. SOUTH.
Heaven may forgive a crime to penitence,
For Heaven can judge if penitence be true. DRYDEN.

Repentance is a term of more general application than penitence, being employed in respect to offences against men as well as against God; penitence, on the other hand, is applicable only to spiritual guilt. Repentance may have respect to our interests here, penitence to our interests hereafter.

But thou, in all thou dost with early cares,
Strive to prevent a fate like theirs,
That sorrow on the end may never wait,
Nor shape repentance, make thee wise too late. ROWE.

Penitence is a general sentiment, which belongs to all men as offending creatures; but contrition, compunction, and remorse are awakened by reflecting on particular offences: contrition is a continued and severe sorrow, appropriate to one who has been in a continued state of peculiar sinfulness: compunction is rather an occasional but sharp sorrow, provoked by a single offence, or a moment's reflection; remorse may be temporary, but it is a still sharper pain awakened by some particular offence of peculiar magnitude and atrocity. The prodigal son was a contrite sinner; the brethren of Joseph felt great compunction when they were carried back with their sacks to Egypt; David was struck with remorse for the murder of Uriah.

His frown was full of terror, and his voice
Shook the delinquent with such fits of awe,
As left him not, till penitence had won
Lost favor back again, and closed the breach. COWPER.

Contrition, though it may melt, ought not to sink or overpower the heart of a Christian. BLAIR.

All men, even the most depraved, are subject more or less to compunctions of conscience. BLAIR.

The heart,
Pierc'd with a sharp remorse for guilt, disclaims
The costly poverty of hecatombs,
And offers the best sacrifice itself. JEFFRY.

REPETITION, TAUTOLOGY.

REPETITION is to TAUTOLOGY as the genus to the species; the latter being a species of repetition. There may be frequent repetition which is warranted by necessity or convenience; but tautology is that which nowise adds to either the sense or the sound. A repetition may, or may not, consist of literally the same words; but tautology, from the Greek rav-roç, the same, and logos, a word, supposes such a sameness in expression as renders the signification the same. In the liturgy of the Church of England there are some repetitions, which add to the solemnity of the worship; in most extemporary prayers there is much tautology, that destroys the religious effect of the whole.

The Psalms, for the excellency of their contents, deserve to be oftener repeated, but that the multitude of them permitteth not any oftener repetition. HOOKER.

That is truly and really tautology where the same thing is repeated, though under never so much variety of expression. SOUTH.

REPREHENSION, REPROOF.

PERSONAL blame or censure is implied by both these terms, but the former is much milder than the latter. By REPREHENSION the personal independence is not so sensibly affected as in the case of REPROOF: people of all ages and stations, whose conduct is exposed to the investigation of others, are liable to reprehension; but children only, or such as are in a subordinate capacity, are exposed to reproof. Reprehension amounts to little more than passing an unfavorable sentence upon the conduct of another: reproof adds to this words more or less severe. The master of a school may be exposed to the reprehension of the parents for any supposed impropriety: his scholars are subject to his reproof.

When a man feels the reprehension of a friend seconded by his own heart, he is easily heated into resentment. JOHNSON.

There is an oblique way of reproof which takes off from the sharpness of it. STEELE.

TO REPRESS, RESTRAIN, SUPPRESS.

To REPRESS is to press back or down: to RESTRAIN is to strain back or down: the former is the general, the latter the specific term: we always repress when we restrain, but not vice versa. Repress is used mostly for pressing down, so as to keep that inward which wants to make its appearance: restraint is an habitual repression by which a thing is kept in a state of lowness; a person is said to repress his feelings when he does not give them vent either by his words or actions; he is said to restrain his feelings when he never lets them rise beyond a certain pitch: good morals as well as good manners call upon us to repress every unseemly expression of joy in the company of those who are not in a condition to partake of our joy; it is prudence as well as virtue to restrain our appetites by an habitual forbearance, that they may not gain the ascendancy.

Philosophy has often attempted to repress insolence by asserting that all conditions are levelled by death. JOHNSON.

He that would keep the power of sin from running out into act, must restrain it from conversing with the object. SCOTT.

To restrain is the act of the individual toward himself; repress may be an act directed to others, as to repress the ardor and impetuosity of youth; to suppress, which is to keep under, or keep from appearing or being perceptible, is also said in respect of ourselves or others: as to repress one's feelings; to suppress laughter, sighs, etc.

After we had landed on the island and walked about four miles through the midst of beautiful plains and sloping woodlands, we at length came to a little hill, on the side of which yawned a horrid cavern, that by its gloom at first struck us with terror, and almost repressed curiosity. GOLDENRITH.

With him Palemon kept the watch at night, In whose sad bosom many a sigh suppress'd Some painful secret of the soul confess'd. FALCONER.

So likewise when applied to external objects; as to repress the impetuosity of the combatants; to suppress a rebellion, information, etc.

Her forwardness was repressed with a frown by her mother or aunt. JOHNSON.

Some, taking dangers to be the only remedy against dangers, endeavored to set up the sedition again, but they were speedily repressed, and thereby the sedition suppressed wholly. HAYWARD.

REPRIEVE, RESPITE.

REPRIEVE comes in all probability from the French reprie, participle of repandre, and the Latin reprehendo, signifying to take back or take off that which has been laid on. RESPITE, in all probability, is changed from respiratus, participle of respiro, signifying to breathe again.

The idea of a release from any pressure or burden is common to these terms; but the reprieve is that which is granted; the respite sometimes comes to us in the course of things: we gain a reprieve from any punishment or trouble which threatens us; we gain a respite from any labor or weight that presses upon us. A criminal gains a reprieve when the punishment of death is commuted for that of transportation; a debtor may be said to obtain a reprieve when, with a prison before his eyes, he gets such indulgence from his creditors as sets him free: there is frequently no respite for persons in a subordinate station, when they fall into the hands of a hard task-master; Sisyphus is feigned by the poets to have been condemned to the toil of perpetually rolling a stone up a hill as fast as it rolled back, from which toil he had no respite.

All that I ask is but a short reprieve,
Till I forget to love and learn to grieve,
Some pause and respite only I require,
Till with my tears I shall have quench'd my fire.
DENHAM.

A little pause for the use of this instrument will not only give some respite and refreshment to the congregation, but may be advantageously employed, either to reflect on what is passed of the service, or prepare our minds for what is to come.
SECKER.

REPROACH, CONTUMELY, OBLOQUY.

THE idea of contemptuous or angry treatment of others is common to all these terms; but reproach is the general, contumely and obloquy are the particular terms. REPROACH (v. To blame) is either deserved or undeserved; the name of Puritan is applied as a term of reproach to such as affect greater purity than others; the name of Christian is a name of reproach in Turkey: CONTUMELY, from contumeo, that is, contra tumeo, signifying to swell up against, is always undeserved; it is the insolent swelling of a worthless person against merit in distress; our Saviour was exposed to the contumely of the Jews: OBLOQUY, from ob and loquor, signifying to speak against or to the disparagement of any one, is always supposed to be deserved or otherwise; it is applicable to those whose conduct has rendered them objects of general censure, and whose name, therefore, has almost become a reproach. A man who uses his power only to oppress those who are connected with him will naturally and deservedly bring upon himself much obloquy.

Has foul reproach a privilege from heav'n?

POPE.

The royal captives followed in the train, amidst the horrid yells, and frantic dances, and infamous contumelies, of the furies of hell.

BURKE.

How often and how soon have the faint echoes of renown slept in silence, or been converted into the clamor of obloquy!

HARVEY.

REPROACHFUL, ABUSIVE, SCURRILOUS.

REPROACHFUL, or full of reproach (v. Reproach), when applied to persons, signifies full of reproaches; when to things, deserving of reproach: ABUSIVE, or full of abuse (v. Abuse), is only applied to the person, signifying using abuse: SCURRILOUS, in Latin scurrilis, from scurra, signifying like a buffoon or saucy jester, is employed as an epithet either for persons or things, in the sense of using scurrility, or after the manner of scurrility. The conduct of a person is reproachful inasmuch as it provokes, or is entitled to, the reproaches of others; the language of a person is reproachful when it abounds in reproaches, or partakes of the nature of a reproach: a person is abusive who indulges himself in abuse or abusive language: and he is scurrilous who adopts scurrility or scurrilous language. When applied to the same object, whether to the person or to the thing, they rise in sense: the reproachful is less than the abusive, and this than the scurrilous: the reproachful is sometimes warranted by the provocation; but the abusive and scurrilous are always unwarrantable; reproachful language may be, and generally is, consistent with decency and propriety of speech: abusive and scurrilous language are outrages against the laws of good-breeding, if not of morality. A parent may sometimes find it necessary to address an unruly son in reproachful terms; or one friend may adopt a reproachful tone to another; none, however, but the lowest orders of men, and those only when their angry passions are awakened, will descend to abusive or scurrilous language.

Honor teaches a man not to revenge a contumelious or reproachful word, but to be above it.

SOUTH.

Thus envy pleads a nat'ral claim

SWIFT.

I am of opinion that if his Majesty had kept aloof from that wash and offscouring of everything that is low and barbarous in the world, it might be well thought unworthy of his dignity to take notice of such scurrility.

BURKE.

TO REPROBATE, CONDEMN.

TO REPROBATE is much stronger than to CONDEMN: we always condemn

when we reprobate, but not vice versa: to reprobate is to condemn in strong and reproachful language. We reprobate all measures which tend to sow discord in society, and to loosen the ties by which men are bound to each other; we condemn all disrespectful language toward superiors. We reprobate only the thing; we condemn the person also: any act of disobedience in a child cannot be too strongly reprobated; a person must expect to be condemned when he involves himself in embarrassments through his own imprudence.

Simulation (according to my Lord Chesterfield) is by no means to be reprobated as a disguise for chagrin or an engine of wit. MACKENZIE.

I see the right, and I approve it, too;
Condemn the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue. TATE.

RESERVE, RESERVATION.

RESERVE and RESERVATION, from servo, to keep, and re, back, both signify a keeping back, but differ as to the object and the circumstance of the action. Reserve is applied in a good sense to anything natural or moral which is kept back to be employed for a better purpose on a future occasion; reservation is an artful keeping back for selfish purposes: there is a prudent reserve which every man ought to keep in his discourse with a stranger; equivocators deal altogether in mental reservation.

A man, whom marks of condescending grace
Teach, while they flatter him, his proper place,
Who comes when called, at a word withdraws,
Speaks with reserve, and listens with applause. COWPER.

There be three degrees of this hiding and veiling a man's self: first, reservation and secrecy; second, dissimulation in the negative; and the third, simulation. BACON.

TO RESERVE, RETAIN.

RESERVE, from the Latin servo, to keep, signifies to keep back. RETAIN, from teneo, to hold, signifies to hold back: they in some measure, therefore, have the same distinction as keep and hold.

To reserve is an act of more specific design; we reserve that which is the particular object of our choice: to retain is a simple exertion of our power; we retain that which is once come in our possession. To reserve is employed only for that which is allowable; we reserve a thing, that is,

keep it back with care for some future purpose: to retain is often an unlawful act; a debtor frequently retains in his hands the money which he has borrowed.

Augustus caused most of the prophetic books to be burned as spurious, reserving only those which bore the name of some of the sibyls for their authors. PRIDEAUX.

They who have restored painting in Germany, not having seen any of those fair relics of antiquity, have retained much of that barbarous method. DRYDEN.

To reserve, whether in the proper or improper application, is employed only as the act of a conscious agent; to retain is often the act of an unconscious agent: we reserve what we have to say on a subject until a more suitable opportunity offers; the mind retains the impressions of external objects by its peculiar faculty, the memory; certain substances are said to retain the color with which they have been dyed.

Conceal your esteem and love in your own breast, and reserve your kind looks and language for private hours. SWIFT.

Whatever ideas the mind can receive and contemplate without the help of the body, it is reasonable to conclude it can retain without the help of the body too. LOCKE.

REST, REMAINDER, REMNANT, RESIDUE.

REST evidently comes from the Latin resto, in this case, though not in the former (v. Ease), signifying what stands or remains back. REMAINDER literally signifies what remains after the first part is gone. REMNANT is but a variation of remainder. RESIDUE, from resido, signifies likewise what remains back.

All these terms express that part which is separated from the other and left distinct: rest is the most general, both in sense and application; the others have a more specific meaning and use: the rest may be either that which is left behind by itself, or that which is set apart as a distinct portion: the remainder, remnant, and residue are the quantities which remain when the other parts are gone. The rest is said of any part, large or small; but the remainder commonly regards the smaller part which has been left after the greater part has been taken. A person may be said to sell some and give away the rest: when a number of hearty persons sit down to a meal, the remainder of the provisions, after all have been satisfied, will not be considerable. Rest is applied either to persons or things; remainder only to things: some were of that opinion, but the rest did not agree to it: the remainder of the paper was not worth preserving.

A last farewell:
For since a last must come, the rest are vain,
Like gasps in death, which but prolong our pain.

DRYDEN.

If he to whom ten talents have been committed has squandered away five, he is concerned to make a double improvement of the remainder.

ROOKER.

Remnant, from the Latin remanens, remaining, is a species of remainder after the greater part has been consumed or wasted: it is, therefore, properly a small remainder, as a remnant of cloth; and metaphorically applied to persons, as a remnant of Israel. A residue is another species of remainder, which resides or keeps back after a distribution or division of anything has taken place; as the residue of a person's property, that which remains undisposed of.

Whatever you take from amusements or indolence will be repaid you a hundred-fold for all the remainder of your days.

EARL OF CHATHAM.

For this, far distant from the Latian coast,
She drove the remnant of the Trojan host.

DRYDEN.

The rising deluge is not stopp'd with dams,
But wisely managed, its divided strength
Is sluiced in channels, and securely drained;
And while its force is spent, and unsupplied,
The residue with mounds may be restrain'd.

SHAKESPEARE.

RESTORATION, RESTITUTION, REPARATION, AMENDS.

RESTORATION is employed in the ordinary application of the verb restore: RESTITUTION, from the same verb, is employed simply in the sense of making good that which has been unjustly taken, or which ought to be restored. Restoration of property may be made by any one, whether it be the person taking it or not: restitution is supposed to be made by him who has been guilty of the injustice. The dethronement of a king may be the work of one set of men, and his restoration that of another; it is the bounden duty of every individual who has committed any sort of injustice to another to make restitution to the utmost of his power.

The strange proceedings of the Long Parliament (called the Rump) gave his lordship hopes that matters began to ripen for the restoration of the royal family.

LOVE.

The justices may, if they think it reasonable, direct restitution of a ratable share of the money given with an apprentice (upon his discharge).

BLACKSTONE.

Restitution and REPARATION are both employed in the sense of undoing that which has been done to the injury of another; but the former respects only injuries that affect the property, and reparation those which affect a person in various ways. He who is guilty of theft or fraud must make restitution by either restoring the stolen article or its full value: he who robs another of his good name, or does any injury to his person, has it not in his power so easily to make reparation.

He restitution to the value makes,
Nor joy in his extorted treasure takes.

SANDYS.

Justice requires that all injuries should be repaired.

JOHNSON.

Reparation and AMENDS (v. Compensation) are both employed in cases where some mischief or loss is sustained; but the term reparation comprehends the idea of the act of repairing, as well as the thing by which we repair; amends is employed only for the thing that will amend or make better: hence we speak of the reparation of an injury; but of the amends by itself. The term reparation comprehends all kinds of injuries, particularly those of a serious nature; the amends is applied only to matters of inferior importance. It is impossible to make reparation for taking away the life of another. It is easy to make amends to any one for the loss of a day's pleasure.

I am sensible of the scandal I have given by my loose writings, and make what reparation I am able.

DRYDEN.

The latter pleas'd; and love (concern'd the most)
Prepar'd th' amends for what by love he lost.

DRYDEN.

RESTORE, RETURN, REPAY.

RESTORE, in Latin restaurare, from the Greek σῴζω, a pale, signifies properly to new pale, that is, to repair by a new paling, and, in an extended application, to make good what has been injured or lost. RETURN signifies properly to turn again, or to send back; and REPAY, to pay back.

The common idea of all these terms is that of giving back. What we restore to another may or may not be the same as what we have taken; justice requires that it should be an equivalent in value, so as to prevent the individual from being in any degree a sufferer: what we return and repay ought to be precisely the same as we have received: the former in application to general objects, the latter in application only to pecuniary matters. We restore upon a principle of equity; we return upon a principle of justice and honor; we repay upon a principle of undeniable right. We cannot always claim that which ought to be restored; but we cannot only claim, but enforce the claim in regard to what is to be returned or repaid: an honest man will be scrupulous not to take anything from another without restoring to him its full value. Whatever we have borrowed we ought to return; and when it is money which we have obtained, we ought to repay it with punctuality. We restore to many as well as to one, to communities as well as to individuals; a king is restored to his crown; or one nation restores a territory to another: we return and repay not only individually, but personally and particularly: we return a book to its owner; we repay a sum of money to him from whom it was borrowed.

When both the chiefs are sunder'd from the fight,
Then to the lawful king restore his right.

DRYDEN.

When any one of our relations was found to be a person of a very bad character, a troublesome guest, or one we desired to get rid of, upon his leaving my house, I ever took care to lend him a riding-coat, or a pair of boots, or sometimes a horse of small value, and I always had the satisfaction to find he never came back to return them.

GOLDSMITH.

As for the hundred pounds to be paid, if you are unable to raise it yourselves, I will advance it, and you shall repay me at your leisure.

GOLDSMITH.

Restore and return may be employed in their improper application, as respects the moral state of persons and things; as a king restores a courtier to his favor, or a physician restores his patient to health: we return a favor; we return an answer or a compliment. Repay may be figuratively employed in regard to moral objects, as an ungrateful person repays kindnesses with reproaches.

She was the only person of our little society that a week did not restore to cheerfulness.

GOLDSMITH.

The swain

Receives his easy food from nature's hand,
And just returns of cultivated land. DRYDEN.

Cæsar, whom fraught with Eastern spoils,
Our heav'n, the just reward of human toils,
Securely shall repay with rights divine.

DRYDEN.

TO RESTRAIN, RESTRICT.

RESTRAIN (v. Coerce) and RESTRICT are but variations from the same verb; but they have acquired a distinct acceptation: the former applies to the desires, as well as the outward conduct; the latter only to the outward conduct. A person restrains his inordinate appetite; or he is restrained by others from doing mischief: he is restricted in the use of his money. To restrain is an act of power; but to restrict is an act of authority or law: the will or the actions of a child are restrained by the parent; but a patient is restricted in his diet by a physician, or any body of people may be restricted by laws.

Tully, whose powerful eloquence awhile
Restrain'd the rapid fate of rushing Rome.

THOMSON.

Though the Egyptians used flesh for food, yet they were under greater restrictions in this particular than most other nations.

JAMES.

RETALIATION, REPRISAL.

RETALIATION, from retaliare, in Latin retaliatum, participle of retalio, compounded of re and talis, such, signifies such again, or like for like. REPRISAL, in French repris, from reprandre, in Latin reprehendo, to take again, signifies to take in return for what has been taken. The idea of making another suffer in return for the suffering he has occasioned is common to these terms; but the former is employed in ordinary cases; the latter mostly in regard to a state of warfare, or to active hostilities. A trick practised upon another in return for a trick is a retaliation; but a reprisal always extends to the capture of something from another, in return for what has been taken. Retaliation is very frequently employed in the good sense for what passes innocently between friends: reprisal has always an unfavorable sense. Goldsmith's poem, entitled the "Retalia- tion," was written for the purpose of retaliating on his friends the humor they had practised upon him; when the quarrels of individuals break through the restraints of the law, and lead to acts of violence on each other's property, reprisals are made alternately by both parties.

Therefore I pray let me enjoy your friendship in that fair proportion, that I desire to return unto you by way of correspondence and retaliation.

HOWELL.

Go publish o'er the plain,
How mighty a proselyte you gain!
How noble a reprisal on the great!

SWIFT.

TO RETARD, HINDER.

To RETARD, from the Latin tardus, slow, signifying to make slow, is applied to the movements of any object forward; as in the Latin "Impetum inimici tardare:" to HINDER (v. To hinder) is applied to the person moving or acting; we retard or make slow the progress of any scheme toward completion; we hinder or keep back the person who is completing the scheme: we retard a thing, therefore, often by hindering the person; but we frequently hinder a person without expressly retarding, and, on the contrary, the thing is retarded without the person being hindered. The publication of a work is sometimes retarded by the hinderances which an author meets with in bringing it to a conclusion; but a work may be retarded through the idleness of printers, and a variety of other causes which are independent of any hinderance. So in like manner a person may be hindered in going to his place of destination; but we do not say that he is retarded, because it is only the execution of an object, and not the simple movements of the person which are retarded.

Nothing has tended more to retard the advancement of science than the disposition in vulgar minds to vilify what they cannot comprehend.

JOHNSON.

The very nearness of an object sometimes retards the sight of it.

SOUTH.

To retard stops the completion of an object only for a time, but to hinder is to stop it altogether.

It is as natural to delay a letter at such a season, as to retard a melancholy visit to a person one cannot relieve.

POPE.

For these thou sayst, raise all the stormy strife,
Which hinder thy repose, and trouble life.

PRIOR.

RETORT, REPARTEE.

RETORT, from re and torqueo, to twist or turn back, to recoil, is an ill-natured reply: REPARTEE, from the word part, signifies a smart reply, a ready taking one's own part. The retort is always in answer to a censure for which one returns a like censure; the repartee is commonly in answer to the wit of another, where one returns wit for wit. In the acrimony of disputes it is common to hear retort upon retort to an endless extent; the vivacity of discourse is sometimes greatly enhanced by the quick repartees of those who take a part in it.

Those who have so vehemently urged the dangers of an active life have made use of arguments that may be retorted upon themselves. JOHNSON.

Henry IV. of France would never be transported beyond himself with choler, but he would pass by anything with some repartee.

HOWELL.

RETRIBUTION, REQUITAL.

RETRIBUTION, from tribuo, to bestow, signifying a bestowing back or giving in return, is a particular term; REQUITAL (v. Reward) is general: the retribution comes from Providence; requital is the act of man: retribution is by way of punishment; requital is mostly by way of reward: retribution is not always dealt out to every man according to his deeds; it is a poor requital for one who has done a kindness to be abused.

Christ substituted his own body in our room, to receive the whole stroke of that dreadful retribution inflicted by the hand of an angry omnipotence.

SOUTH.

Leander was indeed a conquest to boast of, for he had long and obstinately defended his heart, and for a time made as many requittals upon the tender passions of her sex as she raised contributions upon his.

CUMBERLAND.

RETROSPECT, REVIEW, SURVEY.

A RETROSPECT, which signifies literally looking back, from retro, behind, and specio, to behold or cast an eye upon, is always taken of that which is past and distant; REVIEW, which is a view repeated, may be taken of that which is present and before us; every retrospect is a species of review, but every review is not a retrospect. We take a retrospect of our past life in order to draw salutary reflections from all that we have done and suffered; we take a review or a second view of any particular circumstance which is passing before us, in order to regulate our present conduct. The retrospect goes farther by virtue of the mind's power to reflect on itself, and to recall all past images to itself; the review may go forward by the exercise of the senses on external objects. The historian takes a retrospect of all the events which have happened within a given period; the journalist takes a review of all the events that are passing within the time in which he is living.

Believe me, my lord, I look upon you as a spirit entered into another life, where you ought to despise all little views and mean retrospects.

POPE'S LETTERS TO ANTIQUARY.

The retrospect of life is seldom wholly unattended by uneasiness and shame. It too much resembles the review which a traveller takes from some eminence of a barren country.

BLAIR.

The review may be said of the past as well as the present: it is a view not only of what is, but what has been: the SURVEY, which is a looking over at once, from the French sur, upon, and voir, to see, is entirely confined to the present; it is a view only of that which is, and is taken for some particular purpose. We take a review of what we have already viewed, in order to get a more correct insight into it; we take a survey of a thing in all its parts, in order to get a comprehensive view of it, in order to examine it in all its bearings. A general occasionally takes a review of all his army; he takes a survey of the fortress which he is going to besiege or attack.

We make a general review of the whole work, and a general review of nature, that, by comparing them, their full correspondency may appear.

BURNET.

Every man accustomed to take a survey of his own notions will, by a slight retrospection, be able to discover that his mind has undergone many revolutions.

JOHNSON.

TO RETURN, REVERT.

RETURN is the English, and REVERT the Latin: return is therefore used in ordinary cases to denote the coming back to any point of time or place; as to return home, or to return at a certain hour; or to apply again to the same business or employment; as to return to one's writing: to revert is to throw back with one's mind to any object; we may therefore say, to return or revert to any intellectual object, with this distinction, that to return is to go back to the point where one left off treating of any subject; to revert is simply to carry one's mind back to the same object.

To return to the business in hand, the use of a little insight in those parts of knowledge is to accustom our minds to all sorts of ideas.

LOCKE.

It gives me pleasure to find you so often reverting to a subject that most people take so much pains to avoid.

MRS. ROWE.

As the act of an unconscious agent, return is used as before.

One day the soul, supine with ease and fulness, Revels secure, and fondly tells herself The hour of evil can return no more.

ROWE.

Revert signifies either to fall back into the same state, or to fall back by reflection on the same object; all things reverted to their primitive order and regularity.

Whatever lies or legendary tales May taint my spotless deeds, the guilt, the shame, Will back revert on the inventor's head.

SHIRLEY.

TO REVILE, VILIFY.

REVILE, from the Latin vilis, signifies to reflect upon a person, or retort upon him that which is vile: to VILIFY, signifies to make a thing vile, that is, to set it forth as vile. To revile is a personal act, it is addressed directly to the object of offence, and is addressed for the purpose of making the person vile in his own eyes: to vilify is an indirect attack which serves to make the object appear vile in the eyes of others. Revile is said only of persons, for persons only are reviled; but to vilify is said of persons as well as things. To revile is contrary to all Christian duty; it is commonly resorted to by the most worthless, and practised upon the most worthy: to vilify is seldom justifiable; for we cannot vilify without using improper language; it is seldom resorted to but for the gratification of ill-nature.

But chief he gloried with licentious style, To lash the great, and monarchs to revile.

POPE.

There is nobody so weak of invention that cannot make some little stories to vilify his enemy.

ADDISON.

REVISAL, REVISION, REVIEW.

REVISAL, REVISION, and REVIEW all come from the Latin video, to see, and signify looking back upon a thing or looking at it again: the terms revisal and revision are, however, mostly employed in regard to what is written; review is used for things in general. The revisal of a book is the work of the author, for the purposes of correction: the review of a book is the work of the critic, for the purpose of estimating its value. Revisal and revision differ neither in sense nor application, unless that the former is more frequently employed abstractedly from the object revised, and revision mostly in conjunction: whoever wishes his work to be correct, will not spare a revisal; the revision of classical books ought to be intrusted only to men of profound erudition.

There is in your persons a difference and a peculiarity of character preserved through the whole of your actions, that I could never imagine but that this proceeded from a long and careful revisal of your work. LORDS.

A commonplace-book accustoms the mind to discharge itself of its reading on paper, instead of relying on its natural powers of retention aided by frequent revisions of its ideas.

EARL OF CHATHAM.

How enchanting must such a review (of their memorandum-books) prove to those who make a figure in the polite world. HAWKSWORTH.

TO REVIVE, REFRESH, RENOVATE, RENEW.

REVIVE, from the Latin vivo, to live, signifies to bring to life again; to REFRESH, to make fresh again; to RENEW and RENOVATE, to make new again. The restoration of things to their primitive state is the common idea included in these terms; the difference consists in their application. Revive, refresh, and renovate are applied to animal bodies; revive expressing the return of motion and spirits to one who was for the time lifeless; refresh expressing the return of vigor to one in whom it has been diminished; the air revives one who is faint; a cool breeze refreshes one who flags from the heat. Revive and refresh respect only the temporary state of a body; renovate respects the permanent state, that is, the health or powers of a body; one is revived and refreshed after a partial exhaustion; one's health is renovated after having been considerably impaired.

And temper all, thou world-reviving sun,
Into the perfect year. THOMSON.

Nor less thy world, Columbus! drinks, refresh'd,
The lavish moisture of the melting year.

All nature feels the renovating force
Of winter. THOMSON.

Revive is applied likewise in the moral sense; refresh and renovate mostly in the proper sense; renew only in the moral sense. A discussion is said to be revived, or a report to be revived; a clamor is said to be renewed, or entreaties to be renewed: customs are revived which have lain long dormant, and, as it were, dead; practices are renewed that have ceased for a time.

Herod's rage being quenched by the blood of Mariamne, his love to her again revived.

PRIDEAUX.

The last great age, foretold by sacred rhymes,
Renews its finished course. THOMSON.

RICHES, WEALTH, OPULENCE, AFFLUENCE.

RICHES, in German reichthum, from reich, a kingdom, is connected with the Latin rego, to rule; because riches and power are intimately connected.

WEALTH, from well, signifies well-being. OPULENCE, from the Latin opes, riches, denotes the state of having riches. AFFLUENCE, from the Latin ad and fluo, denotes either the act of riches flowing in to a person, or the state of having things flowing in.

Riches is a general term denoting any considerable share of property, but without immediate reference to a possessor; whatever serves to make one rich is denominated riches, inasmuch as it supplies us with the means of getting what is really good; wealth, and the other terms, refer us immediately to outward possessions.

His best companions innocence and health,
And his best riches ignorance of wealth.

GOLDSMITH.

Riches is a condition opposed to poverty; the whole world is divided into rich and poor, and riches are distributed in different degrees; but wealth, opulence,

and affluence all denote a considerable share of riches: wealth is a positive and substantial share of this world's goods, but particularly of money or the precious commodities; it may be taken in the abstract or in application to individuals: opulence consists of any large share in possessions or property generally, as houses, lands, goods, and chattels, and is applicable to the present and actual condition of the individual. Affluence is a term peculiarly applicable to the fluctuating condition of things which flow in in great quantities to a person. We speak of riches as to their effects upon men's minds and manners; it is not every one who knows how to use them: we speak of wealth as it raises a man in the scale of society, and contributes to his weal or well-being: we speak of opulence as the present actually flourishing state of the individual; and of affluence as the temporary condition.

Riches are apt to betray a man into arrogance.
ADDISON.

Seek not in needless luxury to waste
Thy wealth and substance with a spendthrift's haste. ROWE.

Prosperity is often an equivocal word, denoting merely affluence of possession. BLAIR.

Our Saviour did not choose for himself an easy and opulent condition. BLAIR.

Wealth and opulence are applied to communities as well as individuals.

Along the lawn where scatter'd hamlets rose,
Unwieldy wealth and cumb'rous pomp repose.
GOLDSMITH.

Industrious habits in each bosom reign,
And industry begets a love of gain;
Hence all the good from opulence that springs,
With all those ill's superfluous treasure brings,
Are here display'd. GOLDSMITH.

RIDICULE, SATIRE, IRONY, SARCASM.

RIDICULE (v. To deride) has simple laughter in it; SATIRE, in Latin satyr, probably from sat and ira, abounding in anger, has a mixture of ill-nature or severity: the former is employed in matters of a trifling nature; but satire is employed either in personal or grave matters. IRONY, in Greek εἰρωνία, signifying dissimulation, is disguised satire; an ironical seems to praise that which he really means to condemn. SARCASM, from the Greek σαρκασμος, and σαρκίζω, and σαρξ, flesh, signifying biting or nipping satire, so, as it were, to tear the flesh, is bitter and personal satire; all the others may be successfully and properly employed to expose folly and vice; but sarcasm, which is the indulgence only of personal resentment, is never justifiable.

Nothing is a greater mark of a degenerate and vicious age than the common ridicule which passes on this state of life (marriage). ADDISON.

A man resents with more bitterness a satire upon his abilities than his practice. HAWKESWORTH.

The severity of this sarcasm stung me with intolerable rage. HAWKESWORTH.

When Regan (in King Lear) counsels him to ask her sister forgiveness, he falls on his knees and asks her, with a striking kind of irony, how such supplicating language as this becometh him. JOHNSON.

RIGHT, JUST, FIT, PROPER.

RIGHT, in German recht, Latin rectus, signifying upright, not leaning to one side or the other, standing as it ought, is here the general term: the others express modes of right. The right and wrong are defined by the written will of God, or are written in our hearts according to the original constitutions of our nature: the JUST, in Latin justus, from jus, law, signifying according to a rule of right, and the unjust, are determined by the written laws of men; the FIT (v. Fid) and PROPER, in Latin proprius, signifying belonging to a given specific rule, are determined by the established principles of civil society.

Between the right and the wrong there are no gradations: a thing cannot be more right or more wrong; whatever is right is not wrong, and whatever is wrong is not right: the just and unjust, proper and improper, fit and unfit, on the contrary, have various shades and degrees that are not so easily definable by any forms of speech or written rules.

Hear, then, my argument—confess we must
A God there is supremely wise and just.
If so, however things affect our sight,
As sings our bard, whatever is is right. JENYNS.

The right and wrong depend upon no circumstances; what is once right or wrong is always right or wrong, but the just or unjust, proper or improper, are relatively so according to the circumstances of the case: it is a just rule for every man to have that which is his own; but what is just to the individual may be unjust to society. It is proper for every man to take charge of his own concerns; but it would be improper for a man, in an unsound state of mind, to undertake such a charge. Right is applicable to all matters, important or otherwise; just is employed mostly in matters of essential interest; proper is rather applicable to the minor concerns of life. Everything that is done may be characterized as right or wrong: everything done to others may be measured by the rule of just or unjust: in our social intercourse, as well as in our private transactions, fitness and propriety must always be consulted. As Christians, we desire to do that which is right in the sight of God and man; as members of civil society, we wish to be just in our dealings; as rational and intelligent beings, we wish to do what is fit and proper in every action, however trivial.

I'm assured if I be measur'd rightly
Your Majesty hath no just cause to hate me.
SHAKESPEARE.

What is settled by custom, though it be not good, yet at least it is fit; and those things which have long gone together may, as it were, confederate within themselves. BACON.

Visitors are no proper companions in the chamber of sickness. JOHNSON.

RIGHT, CLAIM, PRIVILEGE.

RIGHT signifies in this sense what it is right for one to possess, which is in fact a word of large meaning: for since the right and the wrong depend upon indeterminate questions, the right of having is equally indeterminate in some cases with every other species of right. A CLAIM (v. To ask for) is a species of right to have that which is in the hands of another; the right to ask another for it. The PRIVILEGE (v. Privilege) is a species of right peculiar to particular individuals or bodies.

Right, in its full sense, is altogether an abstract thing which is independent of human laws and regulations; claims and privileges are altogether connected with the establishments of civil society. Liberty, in the general sense, is an unalienable right which belongs to man as a rational and responsible agent; it is not a claim, for it is set above all question and all condition; nor is it a privi- lege, for it cannot be exclusively granted to one being, nor unconditionally be taken away from another.

In ev'ry street a city bard
Rules like an alderman his ward,
His undisputed rights extend
Through all the lane from end to end. SWIFT.

Between right and power there is often as wide a distinction as between truth and falsehood; we have often a right to do that which we have no power to do; and the power to do that which we have no right to do: slaves have a right to the freedom which is enjoyed by creatures of the same species with themselves, but they have not the power to use this freedom as others do. In England men have the power of thinking for themselves as they please; but by the abuse which they make of this power, we see that in many cases they have not the right, unless we admit the contradiction that men have a right to do what is wrong; they have the power, therefore, of exercising this right only because no other person has the power of controlling them. We have often a claim to a thing which is not in our power to substantiate; and, on the other hand, claims are set up in cases which are totally unfounded on any right. Privileges are rights granted to individuals, depending either upon the will of the grantor, or the circumstances of the receiver, or both; privileges are therefore partial rights transferable at the discretion of persons individually or collectively.

Will he not, therefore, of the two evils choose the least, by submitting to a master who hath no immediate claim upon him, rather than to another, who hath already revived several claims upon him? SWIFT.

A thousand bards thy rights disown,
And with rebellious arm pretend
An equal privilege to descend. SWIFT.

RIPE, MATURE.

RIPE is the English, MATURE the Latin word; the former has a universal application both proper and improper; the latter has mostly an improper application. The idea of completion in growth is simply designated by the former term; the idea of moral perfection, as far at least as it is attainable, is marked by the latter: fruit is ripe when it requires no more sustenance from the parent stock;

a judgment is mature which requires no more time and knowledge to render it perfect or fitted for exercise: in the same manner a project may be said to be ripe for execution, or a people ripe for revolt; and, on the contrary, reflection may be said to be mature to which sufficiency of time has been given, and age may be said to be mature which has attained the highest pitch of perfection. Ripeness is, however, not always a good quality; but maturity is always a perfection: the ripeness of some fruit diminishes the excellence of its flavor: there are some fruits which have no flavor until they come to maturity.

So to his crowne, she him restor'd againe,
In which he dyde, made ripe for death by eld.
SPENSER.

Th' Athenian sage, revolving in his mind
This weakness, blindness, madness of mankind,
Foretold that in maturer days, though late,
When time should ripen the decrees of fate,
Some god would light us.
JENYNS.

TO RISE, ISSUE, EMERGE.

To RISE (v. To arise) may either refer to open or enclosed spaces; ISSUE (v. To arise) and EMERGE (v. Emergency) have both a reference to some confined body: a thing may either rise in a body, without a body, or out of a body; but it issues and emerges out of a body. A thing may either rise in a plain or a wood; it issues out of a wood: it may either rise in water or out of the water; it emerges from the water; that which raises out of a thing comes into view by becoming higher: in this manner an air balloon might rise out of a wood; that which issues comes from the very depths of a thing, and comes, as it were, out as a part of it; but that which emerges proceeds from the thing in which it has been, as it were, concealed. Hence, in the moral application, a person is said to rise in life without a reference to his former condition; but he emerges from obscurity: color raises in the face; but words issue from the mouth.

Ye mists and exhalations that now rise,
In honor to the world's great author rise.
MILTON.

Does not the earth quit scores with all the elements
In the noble fruits and productions that issue from it?
SOUTH.

Let earth dissolve, yon ponderous orbs descend,
And grind us into dust, the soul is safe,
The man emerges.
YOUNG.

TO ROT, PUTREFY, CORRUPT.

THE dissolution of bodies by an internal process is implied by all these terms: but the first two are applied to natural bodies only; the last to all bodies, natural and moral. ROT is the strongest of all these terms; it denotes the last stage in the progress of dissolution: PUTREFY expresses the progress toward rottenness; and CORRUPTION the commencement. After fruit has arrived at its maturity, or proper state of ripeness, it rots: meat which is kept too long putrefies: there is a tendency in all bodies to corruption; iron and wood corrupt with time; whatever is made, or done, or wished by men, is equally liable to be corrupt, or to grow corrupt.

Debate destroys despatch, as fruits we see
Rot when they hang too long upon the tree.
DEKHAM.

And draws the copious stream from swampy fens,
Where putrefaction into life ferments.
THOMSON.

After that they again returned beene,
That in that garden planted be agayne
And grow afresh, as they had never seene
Fleshy corruption, nor mortal payne.
SPENSER.

ROUNDNESS, ROTUNDITY.

ROUNDNESS and ROTUNDITY both come from the Latin rotundus and rota, a wheel, which is the most perfectly round body which is formed: the former term is, however, applied to all objects in general; the latter only to solid bodies which are round in all directions: one speaks of the roundness of a circle, the roundness of the moon, the roundness of a tree; but the rotundity of a man's body which projects in a round form in all directions, and the rotundity of a full cheek, or the rotundity of a turnip.

Bracelets of pearls gave roundness to her arms.
PRIOR.

Angular bodies lose their points and asperities
By frequent friction, and approach by degrees to uniform rotundity.
JOHNSON.

ROUTE, ROAD, COURSE.

ROUTE comes in all probability from rotundus, round, and rota, a wheel, signifying the round which one goes. ROAD comes no doubt from ride, signifying the place where one rides, as COURSE, from the Latin cursus (v. Course), signifies the place where one walks or runs.

Route is to road as the species to the genus: a route is a circular kind of road; it is chosen as the circuitous direction toward a certain point: the road may be either in a direct or indirect line; the route is always indirect; the route is chosen only by horsemen, or those who go to a considerable distance; the road may be chosen for the shortest distance; the route and road are pursued in their beaten track; the course is often chosen in the unbeaten track: an army or a company go a certain route; foot-passengers are seen to take a certain course over fields.

Cortes (after his defeat at Mexico) was engaged in deep consultation with his officers concerning the route which they ought to take in their retreat.

ROBERTSON.

At our first sally into the intellectual world, we all march together along one straight and open road.

JOHNSON.

Then to the stream when neither friends nor force,

Nor speed, nor art avail, he shapes his course.

DENHAM.

ROYAL, REGAL, KINGLY.

ROYAL and REGAL, from the Latin rex, a king, though of foreign origin, have obtained more general application than the corresponding English term KINGLY. Royal signifies belonging to a king, in its most general sense; regal, in Latin regalis, signifies appertaining to a king, in its particular application; kingly signifies properly like a king. A royal carriage, a royal residence, a royal couple, a royal salute, royal authority, all designate the general and ordinary appurtenances to a king: regal government, regal state, regal power, regal dignity, denote the peculiar properties of a king: kingly always implies what is becoming a king, or after the manner of a king; a kingly crown is such as a king ought to wear; a kingly mien, that which is after the manner of a king.

He died, and oh! may no reflection shed
Its poisonous venom on the royal dead.

PRIOR.

Jerusalem combin'd must see
My open fault and regal infamy.

PRIOR.

Scipio, you know how Massaniha bears
His kingly port at more than ninety years.

DENHAM.

TO RUB, CHAFE, FRET, GALL.

To RUB is traced, through the medium of the Northern languages, to the Hebrew

rup; it is the generic term, expressing simply the act of bodies moving in contact with and against others; to CHAFE, from the French chauffer, and the Latin calfacere, to make hot, signifies to rub a thing until it is heated: to FRET, like the word fritter, comes from the Latin frico, to rub or crumble, signifying to wear away by rubbing: to GALL, from the noun gall, signifies to make as bitter or painful as gall, that is, to wound by rubbing. Things are rubbed sometimes for purposes of convenience; but they are chafed, fretted, and galled injuriously: the skin is liable to chafe from any violence; leather will fret from the motion of a carriage; when the skin is once broken, animals will become galled by a continuance of the friction. These terms are likewise used in the moral sense, to denote the actions of things on the mind, where the distinction is clearly kept up: we meet with *rub*s from the opposing sentiments of others; the angry humors are chafed; the mind is fretted and made sore by the frequent repetition of small troubles and vexations; pride is galled by humiliations and severe degradations.

A boy educated at home meets with continual *rub*s and disappointments (when he comes into the world).

BEATTIE.

Accoutred as we were, we both plang'd in

SHAKESPEARE.

Who, tho' too little to be seen,
Can tease and gall, and give the spleen. SWIFT.
Foul cank'ring rust the hidden treasure frets,
But gold that's put to use more gold begets.

SHAKESPEARE.

RUPTURE, FRACTURE, FRACTION.

RUPTURE, from rumpo, to break or burst, and FRACTURE or FRACTION, from frango, to break, denote different kinds of breaking, according to the objects to which the action is applied. Soft substances may suffer a rupture; as the rupture of a blood-vessel: hard substances a fracture; as the fracture of a bone.

Th' egg,

Bursting with kindly rupture, forth disclos'd
Its callow young.

MILTON.

We arrived here all safe and well yesterday afternoon, with no worse accident than some fractures in our tackle.

MRS. CARTER.

Fraction is used only in respect to broken numbers, as the fraction of a unit.

Pliny put a round number near the truth rather than a fraction. ARBUTHNOT.

Rupture is also used in an improper application; as the rupture of a treaty.

To be an enemy, and once to have been a friend, does it not embitter the rupture? SOUTH.

RURAL, RUSTIC.

ALTHOUGH both these terms, from the Latin rus, country, signify belonging to the country, yet the former is used in a good, and the latter in a bad or an indifferent sense. RURAL applies to all country objects except man; it is, therefore, always connected with the charms of nature: RUSTIC applies only to persons, or what is personal, in the country, and is, therefore, always associated with the want of culture. Rural scenery is always interesting; but the rustic manners of the peasants have frequently too much that is uncultivated and rude in them to be agreeable; a rural habitation may be fitted for persons in a higher station; but a rustic cottage is adapted only for the poorer inhabitants of the country.

E'en now, methinks, as pondering here I stand,
I see the rural virtues leave the land.

GOLDSMITH.

The freedom and laxity of a rustic life produces remarkable peculiarities of conduct. JOHNSON.

S.

SAFE, SECURE.

SAFE, in Latin salvus, coming from the Hebrew salah, to be tranquil, implies exemption from harm, or the danger of harm; SECURE (v. Certain), the exemption from danger: a person may be safe or saved in the midst of a fire, if he be untouched by the fire; but he is, in such a case, the reverse of secure. In the sense of exemption from danger, safety expresses much less than security: we may be safe without using any particular measures; but none can reckon on any degree of security without great precaution: a person may be very safe on the top of a coach, in the daytime; but if he wish to secure himself, at night, from falling off, he must be fastened.

It cannot be safe for any man to walk upon a precipice, and to be always on the very border of destruction. SOUTH.

No man can rationally account himself secure unless he could command all the chances of the world. SOUTH.

SAGE, SAGACIOUS, SAPIENT.

SAGE and SAGACIOUS are variations from the Latin sagax and sagis, probably from the Persian sag, a dog, sagacity being the peculiar property of a dog. SAPIENT is in Latin sapiens, from sapio, which is either from the Greek σοφος, wise, or, in the sense of tasting, from the Hebrew sephah, the lip.

The first of these terms has a good sense, in application to men, to denote the faculty of discerning immediately, which is the fruit of experience, and very similar to that sagacity in brutes which instinctively perceives a thing without the deductions of reason; sapient is now employed only in regard to animals which are trained up to particular arts; its use, therefore, in respect to human beings, is mostly in the lofty or burlesque style.

So strange they will appear, but so it happen'd
That these most sage Academicians sat
In solemn consultation—on a cabbage.

CUMBERLAND.

Sagacious all to trace the smallest game,
And bold to seize the greatest. YOUNG.

Many a wretch in Bedlam,
Though perhaps among the rout
He wildly flings his filth about,
Still has gratitude and sapience,
To spare the folks that give them ha'pence.

SWIFT.

SAKE, ACCOUNT, REASON, PURPOSE, END.

THESE terms are all employed adverbially, to modify or connect propositions; hence one says, for his SAKE, on his ACCOUNT, for this REASON, for this PURPOSE, and to this END. Sake, which comes from the word to seek, is mostly said of persons; what is done for a person's sake is the same as because of his seeking or at his desire; one may, however, say in regard to things, for the sake of good order, implying what good order requires: account is indifferently employed for persons or things; what is done on a person's account is done in his behalf, and for his interest; what is done on account of indisposition is done in consequence of it, the indisposition being the cause: purpose is properly personal, and refers to that which a person purposes to himself; if we ask, therefore, for what purpose a thing is done, it may be to know something of a person's character and principle: reason and end are applied to things only: we speak of the reason as the thing that justifies: we explain why we do a thing when we say we do it for this or that reason: we speak of the end by way of explaining the nature of the thing: the propriety of measures cannot be known unless we know what end it will answer.

Thou neither dost persuade me to seek wealth
For empire's sake, nor empire to affect
For glory's sake.

SHAKESPEARE.

In matters where his judgment led him to oppose men, on a public account, he would do it vigorously and heartily.

ATTENBURY.

He travelled the world on purpose to converse with the most learned men.

GUARDIAN.

I mark the business from the common eye
For sundry weighty reasons.

SHAKESPEARE.

Others are apt to attribute them to some false end or intention.

ADDISON.

SALUTE, SALUTATION, GREETING.

SALUTE (v. Acceſt) respects the thing; and SALUTATION, which is a variation of salute, respects the person giving the salute: a salute may consist either of a word or an action; salutations pass from one friend to another: the salute may be either direct or indirect; the salutation is always direct and personal; guns are fired by way of a salute: bows are given in the way of a salutation.

He was received on board the Bellerophon respectfully, but without any salute or distinguished honors.

SIR W. SCOTT.

Josephus makes mention of a Manaken, who had the spirit of prophecy, and one time meeting with Herod among his school-fellows, greeted him with this salutation, "Hall, King of the Jews!"

PRIDEAUX.

The salutation is a familiar and ordinary form of courtesy between individuals; GREETING (v. To acceſt) is frequently a particular mode of salutation adopted on extraordinary occasions, indicative of great joy or satisfaction in those who greet.

After the first salutations they began to make inquiries about their absent friends. The greeting which took place between the parties upon their remeeting was general and cordial.

SIR W. SCOTT.

I was harassed by the multitude of eager salutations, and returned the common civilities with hesitation and impropriety.

JOHNSON.

SANGUINARY, BLOODY, BLOOD-THIRSTY.

SANGUINARY, from sanguis, is employed both in the sense of BLOODY, or having blood, and BLOOD-THIRSTY, or thirsting after blood: sanguinary, in the first case, relates only to blood shed, as a sanguinary engagement, or a sanguinary conflict; bloody is used in the familiar application, to denote the simple presence of blood, as a bloody coat, or a bloody sword.

The scene is now more sanguinary and fuller of actors; never was such a confused mysterious civil war as this.

HOWELL.

And from the wound,
Black bloody drops distill'd upon the ground.

DRYDEN.

In the second case, sanguinary is employed to characterize the tempers of persons only; blood-thirsty to characterize the tempers of persons or any other beings: revolutionists will be frequently sanguinary, because they are abandoned to their passions, and follow a lawless course of violence; tigers are by nature the most blood-thirsty of all creatures.

They have seen the French rebel against a mild and lawful monarch with more fury than ever any people has been known to rise against the most illegal usurper or the most sanguinary tyrant.

BURKE.

The Peruvians fought not like the Mexicans, to glut blood-thirsty divinities with human sacrifices.

ROBERTSON.

SAP, UNDERMINE.

SAP signifies the juice which springs from the root of a tree; hence to sap signifies to come at the root of anything by digging: to UNDERMINE signifies to form a mine under the ground, or under whatever is upon the ground: we may sap, therefore, without undermining; and undermine without sapping: we may sap the foundation of a house without making any mine underneath; and in fortifications we may undermine either a mound, a ditch, or a wall, without striking immediately at the foundation: hence, in the moral application, to sap is a more direct and decisive mode of destruction; to undermine is a gradual, and may be a partial action. Infidelity saps the morals of a nation; courtiers undermine one another's interests at court.

With morning drams,
A filthy custom which he caught from thee,
Clean from his former practice, now he saps
His youthful vigor. CUMBERLAND.

To be a man of business is, in other words, to be a plague and spy, a treacherous supplanter and underminer of the peace of families. SOUTH.

TO SATISFY, PLEASE, GRATIFY.

To SATISFY (v. Contentment) is rather to produce pleasure indirectly; to PLEASE (v. Agreeable) is to produce it directly: the former is negative, the latter positive pleasure: as every desire is accompanied with more or less pain, satisfaction, which is the removal of desire, is itself to a certain extent pleasure; but what satisfies is not always calculated to please; nor is that which pleases, that which will always satisfy: plain food satisfies a hungry person, but does not please him when he is not hungry; social enjoyments please, but they are very far from satisfying those who do not restrict their indulgences. To GRATIFY is to please in a high degree, to produce a vivid pleasure: we may be pleased with trifles: but we are commonly gratified with such things as act strongly either on the senses or the affections: an epicure is gratified with those delicacies which suit his taste; an amateur in music will be gratified with hearing a piece of Handel's composition finely performed.

He who has run over the whole circle of earthly pleasures will be forced to complain that either they were not pleasures or that pleasure was not satisfaction. SOUTH.

Did we consider that the mind of man is the man himself, we should think it the most unnatural sort of self-murder to sacrifice the sentiment of the soul to gratify the appetites of the body. STEELE.

TO SATISFY, SATIATE, GLUT, CLOY.

To SATISFY is to take enough: SATIATE is a frequentative, formed from satis, enough, signifying to have more than enough. GLUT, in Latin glutio, from gula, the throat, signifies to take down the throat. Satisfaction brings pleasure; it is what nature demands; and nature, therefore, makes a suitable return: satiety is attended with disgust; it is what appetite demands; but appetite is the corruption of nature, and produces nothing but evil: glutting is an act of intemperance; it is what the inordinate appetite demands; it greatly exceeds the former in degree both of the cause and the consequence: CLOYING is the consequence of glutting. Every healthy person satisfies himself with a regular portion of food; children, if unrestrained, seek to satiare their appetites, and cloy themselves by their excesses; brutes, or men debased into brutes, glut themselves with that which is agreeable to their appetites. So, in the moral application, we satisfy desires in general, or any particular desire; we satiare the appetite for pleasure; one gluts the eyes or the ears by anything that is horrid or painful, or cloys the mind.

The only thing that can give the mind any solid satisfaction is a certain complacency and repose in the good providence of God. HERRICK.

'Twas not enough
By subtle fraud to snatch a single life,
Puny impiety! whole kingdoms fell,
To sate the lust of power. PORTER.

If the understanding be detained by occupations less pleasing, it returns again to study with greater alacrity than when it is glutted with ideal pleasures. JOHNSON.

Religious pleasure is such a pleasure as can never cloy or overwork the mind. SOUTH.

TO SAVE, SPARE, PRESERVE, PROTECT.

To SAVE is to keep or make safe (v. Safe). SPARE, in German sparen, like the Latin parco, comes from the Hebrew parek, to free. PRESERVE, compounded of pre and servo, to keep, signifies to keep off. PROTECT, v. To defend.

The idea of keeping free from evil is the common idea of all these terms, and the peculiar signification of the term save; they differ either in the nature of the evil kept off, or the circumstances of the agent: we may be saved from every kind of evil; but we are spared only from those which it is in the power of another to inflict: we may be saved from falling, or saved from an illness; a criminal is spared from punishment, or we may be spared by Divine Providence in the midst of some calamity.

The plagues destroying those the sword would spare,
 'Tis time to save the few remains of war. POPE.
 Spare my sight the pain
 Of seeing what a world of tears it cost you. DRYDEN.

We may be saved and spared from any evils, great or small; we are preserved and protected only from evils of magnitude: we may be saved either from the inclemency of the weather, or the fatal vicissitudes of life: we may be spared the pain of a disagreeable meeting, or we may be spared our lives; we are preserved from ruin, or protected from oppression. To save and spare apply to evils that are actual and temporary; preserve and protect to those which are possible or permanent: we may be saved from drowning; a person may be preserved from infection, or protected from an attack. To save may be the effect of accident or design; to spare is always the effect of intentional forbearance; to preserve and protect are the effect of a special exertion of power; the latter in a still higher degree than the former: we may be preserved, by ordinary means, from the evils of human life; but we are protected by the government, or by Divine Providence, from the active assaults of those who aim at doing us mischief.

A wondrous ark
 To save himself and household from amid
 A world devote to universal wreck. MILTON.
 Let Cæsar spread his conquests far,
 Less pleas'd to triumph than to spare. JOHNSON.

Cortes was extremely solicitous to preserve the city of Mexico as much as possible from being destroyed. ROBERTSON.
 How poor a thing is man, whom death itself
 Cannot protect from injuries! RANDOLPHE.

To spare and protect refer mostly to personal injuries; save and preserve are said of whatever one keeps from injury on account of its value; as to save one's good name, to preserve one's honor.

Attilius sacrific'd himself to save
 That faith which to his barb'rous foes he gave. DENHAM.
 Then to preserve the fame of such a deed
 For Pythia slain were Pythian games decreed. DRYDEN.

SCARCITY, DEARTH.

SCARCITY (v. Rare) is a generic term to denote the circumstance of a thing being scarce. DEARTH, which is the same as dearth, is a mode of scarcity applied in the literal sense to provisions mostly, as provisions are mostly dear when they are scarce; the word dearth, therefore, denotes scarcity in a high degree: whatever men want, and find it difficult to procure, they complain of its scarcity: when a country has the misfortune to be visited with a famine, it experiences the frightfullest of all dearths.

They drink very few liquors that have not lain in fresco, inasmuch that a scarcity of snow would raise a mutiny at Naples. ADDISON.

I find the dearth at this time very great. Wheat was at four marks the quarter. BURNET.

Dearth is figuratively applied to moral objects; as a dearth of intelligence, of talent, and the like.

The French have brought on themselves that dearth of plot. DRYDEN.

SCHOLAR, DISCIPLE.

SCHOLAR and DISCIPLE are both applied to such as learn from others: but the former is said only of those who learn the rudiments of knowledge; the latter of one who acquires any art or science from the instruction of another: the scholar is opposed to the teacher; the disciple to the master: children are always scholars; adult persons may be disciples. Scholars chiefly employ themselves in the study of words; disciples, as the disciples of our Saviour, in the study of things: we are the scholars of any one under whose care we are placed, or from whom we learn anything, good or bad; we are the disciples only of those who are distinguished, and for the most part in the good sense, though not always so: children are sometimes too apt scholars in learning evil from one another. Philosophers of old had their disciples, and nowadays there are many who have been exalted into that character who have their disciples and followers.

The Romans confessed themselves the scholars of the Greeks. JOHNSON.
 We are not the disciples of Voltaire. BURKE.

SCHOOL, ACADEMY.

THE Latin term schola signifies a loitering-place, a place for desultory conversation or instruction, from the Greek σχολή, leisure; hence it has been extended to any place where instruction is given, particularly that which is communicated to youth. ACADEMY derives its name from the Greek ακαδημία, the name of a public place in Athens, where the philosopher Plato first gave his lectures, which afterward became a place of resort for learned men; hence societies of learned men have since been termed academies. The leading idea in the word SCHOOL is that of instruction given and doctrine received; in the word academy is that of association among those who have already learned: hence we speak in the literal sense of the school where young persons meet to be taught, or in the extended and moral sense of the old and new school, the Pythagorean school, the philosophical school, and the like; but the academy of arts or sciences, the French academy, being members of any academy and the like.

The world is a great school, where deceit, in all its forms, is one of the lessons that is first learned.

BLAIR.

As for other academies, such as those for painting, sculpture, or architecture, we have not so much as heard the proposal.

SHAFTESBURY.

TO SCOFF, GIBE, JEER, SNEER.

SCOFF comes from the Greek σκαπτω, to deride. GIBE and JEER are connected with the words gabble and jabber, denoting an unseemly mode of speech. SNEER is connected with sneeze and nose, the member by which sneering is performed.

Scoffing is a general term for expressing contempt; we may scoff either by gibes, jeers, or sneers; or we may scoff by opprobrious language and contemptuous looks with gibing, jeering, or sneering: to gibe, jeer, and sneer, are personal acts; the gibe and jeer consist of words addressed to an individual: the former has most of ill-nature and reproach in it; the latter has more of ridicule or satire in it; they are both, however, applied to the actions of vulgar or unseemly people, who practise their coarse jokes on others.

Truth from his lips prevail'd with double sway,
And fools who came to scoff remain'd to pray.

GOLDSMITH.

And sneers as learnedly as they,
Like females o'er their morning tea.

SWIFT.

Scoff and sneer are directed either to persons or things, as the object; gibe and

jeer only toward persons; scoff is taken only in the proper sense; sneer derives its meaning from the literal act of sneering: the scoffer speaks lightly of that which deserves serious attention: the sneerer speaks either actually with a sneer, or as it were by implication with a sneer: the scoffers at religion set at naught all thoughts of decorum, they openly avow the little estimation in which they hold it; the sneerers at religion are more sly, but not less malignant; they wish to treat religion with contempt, but not to bring themselves into the contempt they deserve.

The fop sets learning at defiance,
Scoffs at the pedant and the science.

TO SCRUPLE, HESITATE, WAVER.

TO SCRUPLE (v. Conscientious) simply keeps us from deciding; the terms HESITATE (v. To demur) and WAVER, from the word wave, signifying to move backward and forward like a wave, bespeak a fluctuating or variable state of the mind. We scruple simply from motives of doubt as to the propriety of a thing; we hesitate and waver from various motives, particularly such as affect our interests. Conscience produces scruples, fear produces hesitation, irresolution produces wavering: a person scruples to do an action which may hurt his neighbor or offend his Maker; he hesitates to do a thing which he fears may not prove advantageous to him; he wavers in his mind between going or staying, according as his inclinations impel him to the one or the other: a man who does not scruple to say or do as he pleases will be an offensive companion, if not a dangerous member of society: he who hesitates only when the doing of good is proposed, evinces himself a worthless member of society; he who wavers between his duty and his inclination will seldom maintain a long or doubtful contest.

The Jacobins desire a change, and they will have it if they can; if they cannot have it by English cabal, they will make no sort of scruple to have it by the cabal of France. BURKE.

The lords of the congregation did not hesitate a moment whether they should employ their whole strength in one generous effort to rescue their religion and liberty from impending destruction. ROBERTSON.

It is the greatest absurdity to be wavering and unsettled without closing with that side which appears the most safe and probable. ADDISON.

SEAL, STAMP.

SEAL is a specific, STAMP a general term: there cannot be a seal without a stamp; but there may be many stamps where there is no seal. The seal, in Latin sigillum, signifies a signet or little sign, consisting of any one's coat of arms or any device; the stamp is, in general, any impression whatever which has been made by stamping, that is, any impression which is not easily to be effaced. In the improper sense, the seal is the authority; thus, to set one's seal is the same as to authorize, and the seal of truth is any outward mark which characterizes it: but the stamp is the impression by which we distinguish the thing; thus a thing is said to bear the stamp of truth, of sincerity, of veracity, and the like.

Therefore not long in force this charter stood,
Wanting that seal, it must be seal'd in blood.

DENHAM.

Wisdom for parts is madness for the whole.
This stamps the paradox, and gives us leave
To call the wisest weak. YOUNG.

SEAMAN, WATERMAN, SAILOR, MARINER.

ALL these words denote persons occupied in navigation; the SEAMAN, as the word implies, follows his business on the sea; the WATERMAN is one who gets his livelihood on fresh water: the SAILOR and the MARINER are both specific terms to designate the seaman: every sailor and mariner is a seaman; although every seaman is not a sailor or mariner; the former is one who is employed about the laborious part of the vessel; the latter is one who traverses the ocean to and fro, who is attached to the water, and passes his life upon it. Men of all ranks are denominated seamen, whether officers or men, whether in a merchantman or a king's ship: sailor is only used for the common men, or, in the sea phrase, for those before the mast, particularly in vessels of war; hence our sailors and soldiers are spoken of as the defenders of our country: a mariner is an independent kind of seaman who manages his own vessel, and goes on an expedition on his own account; fishermen, and those who trade along the coast, are in a particular manner distinguished by the name of mariners.

Thus the toss'd seaman, after boist'rous storms,
Lands on his country's breast. LEE.

Many a lawyer who makes but an indifferent figure at the bar might have made a very elegant waterman. SOUTH.

Through storms and tempests so the sailor drives. SHIRLEY.

Welcome to me, as to a sinking mariner
The lucky plank that bears him to the shore. LEE.

TO SECOND, SUPPORT.

To SECOND is to give the assistance of a second person; to SUPPORT is to bear up on one's own shoulders. To second does not express so much as to support: we second only by our presence or our word; but we support by our influence, and all the means that are in our power: we second a motion by a simple declaration of our assent to it; we support a motion by the force of persuasion: so likewise we are said always to second a person's views when we give him openly our countenance by declaring our approbation of his measures; and we are said to support him when we give the assistance of our purse, our influence, or any other thing essential for the attainment of an end.

The blasting vollied thunder made all speed,

MILTON.

Impeachments we can best resist,
And ATQ support the civil list. GAY.

SECOND, SECONDARY, INFERIOR.

SECOND and SECONDARY both come from the Latin secundus, changed from sequendus and sequor, to follow, signifying the order of succession: the former simply expresses this order; but the latter

includes the accessory idea of comparative demerit: a person stands second in a list, or a letter is second which immediately succeeds the first; but a consideration is secondary, or of secondary importance, which is opposed to that which holds the first rank. Secondary and INFERIOR both designate some lower degree of a quality: but secondary is only applied to the importance or value of things; inferior is applied generally to all qualities: a man of business reckons everything as secondary which does not forward the object he has in view; men of inferior abilities are disqualified by nature for high and important stations, although they may be more fitted for lower stations than those of greater abilities.

Fond, foolish man! with fear of death surpris'd,
Which either should be wish'd for or despis'd;
This, if our souls with bodies death destroy,
That, if our souls a second life enjoy. DENHAM.

Many, instead of endeavoring to form their own opinions, content themselves with the secondary knowledge which a convenient bench in a coffee-house can supply. JOHNSON.

Who am alone
From all eternity; for none I know
Second to me, or like. MILTON.

Hast thou not made me here thy substitute,
And these inferior far beneath me set? MILTON.

SECRET, HIDDEN, LATENT, OCCULT, MYSTERIOUS.

What is SECRET (v. Clandestine) is so apart or removed away as to be out of observation; what is HIDDEN (v. To conceal) is so covered over as to be altogether concealed: as, a corner may be secret; a hole under ground is hidden.

Ye boys, who pluck the flow'rs and spoil the spring,
Beware the secret snake that shoots a sting. DRYDEN.

The blind laborious mole
In winding mazes works her hidden hole. DRYDEN.

What is secret is known to some one; what is hidden may be known to no one: it rests in the breast of an individual to keep a thing secret; it depends on the course of things if anything remains hidden: every man has more or less of that which he wishes to keep secret; the talent of many lies hidden for want of opportunity to bring it into exercise, as many treasures lie hidden in the earth for want of being discovered and brought to light. A secret may concern only the individual or individuals who hold it, and those from whom it is kept; but that which is hidden may concern all the world: sometimes the success of a transaction depends upon its being kept secret; the stores of knowledge which yet remain hidden may be much greater than those which have been laid open. The LATENT, in Latin latens, lying hid, is the secret or concealed, in cases where it ought to be open: a latent motive is that which a person intentionally, though not justifiably, keeps to himself; the latent cause for any proceeding is that which is not revealed.

The cruelty of this boy, which he had long practised in so secret a manner that no creature suspected it, was at length discovered. COWPER.

Then deeply think, O man! how great thou art,
Pay thyself homage with a trembling heart;
Enter the sacred temple of thy breast,
And gaze and wander there a ravish'd guest:
Gaze on those hidden treasures thou shalt find. YOUNG.

Mem'ry confus'd, and interrupted thought,
Death's harbingers, lie latent in the draught. PRIOR.

OCCULT, in Latin occultus, participle of occulo, compounded of oc or ob and culo or colo, to cover over by tilling or ploughing, that is, to cover over with the earth, or by any natural body, and MYSTERIOUS (v. Dark), are species of the hidden: the former respects that which has a veil naturally thrown over it; the latter respects that mostly which is covered with a supernatural veil: an occult science is one that is hidden from the view of persons in general, which is attainable but by few; occult causes or qualities are those which lie too remote to be discovered by the inquirer: the operations of Providence are said to be mysterious, as they are altogether past our finding out; many points of doctrine in our religion are equally mysterious, as connected with and dependent upon the attributes of the Deity.

Some men have an occult power of stealing on the affections. JOHNSON.

From his vold embrace,
Mysterious heaven! that moment to the ground,
A blackened corse, was struck the beauteous maid. THOMSON.

SECULAR, TEMPORAL, WORLDLY.

SECULAR, in Latin secularis, from seculum, an age or division of time, signifies belonging to time or this life. TEMPORAL, in Latin temporalis, from tempus, time, signifies lasting only for a time. WORLDLY signifies after the manner of the world.

Secular is opposed to ecclesiastical; temporal and worldly are opposed to spiritual or eternal. The idea of the world or the outward objects and pursuits of the world, in distinction from that which is set above the world, is implied in common by all the terms; but secular is an indifferent term, applicable to the allowed pursuits and concerns of men; temporal is used either in an indifferent or a bad sense; and worldly mostly in a bad sense, as contrasted with things of more value. The office of a clergyman is ecclesiastical, but that of a school-master is secular, which is frequently vested in the same hands; the Upper House of Parliament consists of lords spiritual and temporal; worldly interest has a more powerful sway upon the minds of the great bulk of mankind than their spiritual interests.

Some saw nothing in what has been done in France but a firm and temperate exertion of freedom, so consistent with morals and piety, as to make it deserving not only of the secular applause of dashing Machiavellian politicians, but to make it a fit theme for all the devout effusions of sacred eloquence. BURKE.

The ultimate purpose of government is temporal, and that of religion is eternal, happiness. JOHNSON.

Worldly things are of such quality as to lessen upon dividing. GROVE.

SEDULOUS, DILIGENT, ASSIDUOUS.

THE idea of application is expressed by these epithets; but SEDULOUS, from the Latin sedulus and sedeo, signifying sitting close to a thing, is a particular, DILIGENT (v. Active, diligent) is a general term: one is sedulous by habit; one is diligent either habitually or occasionally; a sedulous scholar pursues his studies with a regular and close application; a scholar may be diligent at a certain period, though not invariably so. One is sedulous from a conviction of the importance of the thing; one may be diligent by fits and starts, according to the humor of the moment.

One thing I would offer is, that he would constantly and sedulously read Tully, which will insensibly work him into a good Latin style. LOCKE.

I would recommend a diligent attendance on the courts of justice (to a student for the bar). DUNNING.

ASSIDUOUS and sedulous both express the quality of sitting or sticking close to a thing, but the former may, like diligent, be employed on a partial occasion; the latter is always permanent: we may be assiduous in our attentions to a person; but we are sedulous in the important concerns of life. Sedulous peculiarly respects the quiet employments of life, but may be applied to any pursuit requiring persevering attention; a teacher may be entitled sedulous: diligent respects the active employments; one is diligent at work: assiduity holds a middle rank; it may be employed equally for that which requires active exertion, or otherwise: we may be assiduous in the pursuits of literature, or we may be assiduous in our attendance upon a person, or the performance of any office.

Methinks her sons before me patient stand,
Where the broad ocean leans against the land,
And, sedulous to stop the coming tide,
Lift the tall ramptre's artificial pride. GOLDSMITH.

We flatter ourselves that we shall cultivate with great diligence the arts of peace. JOHNSON.

Man cannot retain through life that respect and assiduity (toward a woman) by which he pleases for a day or a month. JOHNSON.

TO SEE, PERCEIVE, OBSERVE.

SEE, in the German sehen, Greek thaomai, Hebrew sacah or soah, is a general term; it may be either a voluntary or involuntary action: PERCEIVE, from the Latin percipio or per and capio, to take into the mind, is always a voluntary action; and OBSERVE (v. To notice) is an intentional action. The eye sees when the mind is absent; the mind and the eye or other senses perceive in conjunction: hence, we may say that a person sees, but does not perceive: we observe not merely by a simple act of the mind, but by its positive and fixed exertion. We see a thing without knowing what it is; we perceive a thing, and know what it is, but the impression passes away; we observe a thing, and afterward retrace the image of it in our mind. We see a star when the eye is directed toward it; we perceive it move if we look at it attentively; we observe its position in different parts of the heavens. The blind cannot see, the absent cannot perceive, the dull cannot observe. Seeing, as a corporeal action, is the act only of the eye; perceiving and observing are actions in which all the senses are concerned. We see colors, we perceive the state of the atmosphere, and observe its changes.

There plant eyes, all mist from thence
Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight. MILTON.

Sated at length, ere long I might perceive
Strange alteration in me. MILTON.

I doubt not but the same discrimination in the cast of countenances would be discoverable in hares (as in sheep); a circumstance little suspected by those who have not had opportunity to observe it. COWPER.

Seeing sometimes extends further in its application to the mind's operations, in which it has an indefinite sense; but perceive and observe have both a definite sense; we may see a thing distinctly and clearly, or otherwise; we perceive it always with a certain degree of distinctness; and observe it with a positive degree of minuteness: we see the truth of a remark; we perceive the force of an objection; we observe the reluctance of a person. It is further to be observed, however, that, when see expresses a mental operation, it expresses what is purely mental; perceive and observe are applied to such objects as are seen by the senses as well as the mind. We see the light with our eyes, or we see the truth of a proposition with our mind's eye; but we perceive the difference of climate, or we perceive the difference in the comfort of our situation; we observe the motions of the heavenly bodies.

Who is so gross
As cannot see this palpable device,
Yet who so bold but says he see it not,
When such ill dealings must be seen in thought?
SHAKESPEARE.

I perceive these lords
At this encounter do so much admire,
That they devour their reason, and scarce think
Their eyes do offices of truth. SHAKESPEARE.

Every part of your last letter glowed with that warmth of friendship which, though it was by no means new to me, I could not but observe with peculiar satisfaction.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

TO SEEK, SEARCH.

To SEEK and SEARCH (v. To examine) are but variations from the same word, and are both employed in the sense of looking after something that is not in sight: seek applies to that which is near at hand and easily found; search, to that which is remote, hidden, or not to be found without difficulty: to search, therefore, is properly to seek laboriously; we seek a person by simply going to the place where he is supposed to be; search is made from place to place when it is not known where he is: a school-boy seeks birds'-nests; the botanist searches for plants.

I have a venturesome fancy, that shall seek
The squirrel's hoard, and fetch thee thence new nuts. SHAKESPEARE.

Errors, like straws, upon the surface flow;
He who would search for pearls must dive below.
DAYDEN.

These terms may also be applied to moral objects with the same distinction: as to seek peace, knowledge; to search the thoughts, to search into mysteries.

Sweet peace, where dost thou dwell?

I humbly crave,
Let me once know.

I sought thee in a secret cave,
And ask'd if peace were there. HERBERT.

Vain, very vain, my weary search to find
That bliss which only centres in the mind.

GOLDSMITH.

TO SEEM, APPEAR.

THE idea of coming to the view is expressed by both these terms; but the word seem rises upon that of appear. SEEM, from the Latin similis, like, signifies literally to appear like, and is therefore a species of appearance; APPEAR, from the Latin appareo or pareo, and the Greek παραμυ, to be present, signifies to be present, or before the eye. Every object may appear; but nothing seems, except that which the mind admits to appear in any given form. To seem requires some reflection and comparison of objects in the mind one with another; it is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to matters that may be different from what they appear, or of an indeterminate kind: that the sun seems to move is a conclusion which we draw from the exercise of our senses, and comparing this case with others of a similar nature; it is only by a further research into the operations of nature that we discover this to be no conclusive proof of its motion. To appear, on the contrary, is the express act of the things themselves on us; it is, therefore, peculiarly applicable to such objects as make an impression on us: to appear is the same as to present itself: the stars appear in the firmament, but we do not say that they seem; the sun appears dark through the clouds.

Laah'd into foam, the fierce conflicting brine
Seems o'er a thousand raging waves to burn.

THOMSON.

O heav'nly poet! Such thy verse appears,
So sweet, so charming to my ravish'd ears.

DRYDEN.

They are equally applicable to moral as well as natural objects with the above-mentioned distinction. Seem is said of that which is dubious, contingent, or future; appear, of that which is actual, positive, and past. A thing seems strange which we are led to conclude as strange from what we see of it: a thing appears clear when we have a clear conception of it: a plan seems practicable or impracticable; an author appears to understand his subject or the contrary. It seems as if all efforts to reform the bulk of mankind will be found inefficient; it appears, from the long catalogue of vices which are still very prevalent, that little progress has hitherto been made in the work of reformation.

No man had ever a greater power over himself, or was less the man he seemed to be, which shortly after appeared to everybody, when he cared less to keep on the mask. CLARENDON.

SELF-WILL, SELF-CONCEIT, SELF-SUFFICIENCY.

SELF-WILL, signifies the will in one's self: SELF-CONCEIT, conceit of one's self: SELF-SUFFICIENCY, sufficiency in one's self. As characteristics they come very near to each other, but that depravity of the will which refuses to submit to every control either within or without is born with a person, and is among the earliest indications of character; in some it is less predominant than in others, but, if not early checked, it is that defect in our natures which will always prevail; self-conceit is a vicious habit of the mind which is superinduced on the original character; it is that which determines in matters of judgment: a self-willed person thinks nothing of right or wrong; whatever the impulse of the moment suggests, is the motive to action: the self-conceited person is always much concerned about right and wrong, but it is only that which he conceives to be right and wrong; self-sufficiency is a species of self-conceit applied to action: as a self-conceited person thinks of no opinion but his own; a self-sufficient person refuses the assistance of every one in whatever he is called upon to do.

First appetite enlists him truth's sworn foe,
Then obstinate self-will confirms him so.

COWPER.

Nothing so haughty and assuming as ignorance, where self-conceit bids it set up for infallible.

SOUTH.

There, safe in self-sufficient impudence,
Without experience, honesty, or sense,
Unknowing in her interest, trade, or laws,
He vainly undertakes his country's cause.

JENTEN.

SENIOR, ELDER, OLDER.

THESE are all comparatives expressive of the same quality, and differ, therefore, less in sense than in application. SENIOR is employed not only in regard to the extent of age, but also to duration either in office or any given situation: ELDER is employed only in regard to age: an officer in the army is a senior by virtue of having served longer than another; a boy is a senior in a school either by virtue of his age, his standing in the school, or his situation in the class; when, therefore, age alone is to be expressed, elder is more suitable than senior; the elder children or the elder branches of a family are clearly understood to include those who have priority of age.

How can you admit your seniors to the examination or calling of them, not only being inferior in office and calling, but in gifts also?

WHITTOFT.

They bring the comparison of younger daughters conforming themselves in their attire to their elder sisters.

HOOKE.

Senior and elder are both employed as substantives, OLDER only as an adjective: hence we speak of the seniors in a school, or the elders in an assembly; but an older inhabitant, an older family. Elder has only a partial use; older is employed in general cases: in speaking of children in the same family we may say,

the elder son is heir to the estate; he is older than his brother by ten years.

The Spartans to their highest magistrate
The name of elder did appropriate. DENHAM.

Since oft
Man must compute that age he cannot feel,
He scarce believes he's older for his years.
YOUNG.

SENSE, JUDGMENT.

SENSE (v. Feeling) signifies in general the faculty of feeling corporeally or perceiving mentally; in the latter case it is synonymous with JUDGMENT, which is a special operation of the mind. The sense is that primitive portion of the understanding which renders an account of things; and the judgment that portion of the reason which selects or rejects from this account. The sense is, so to speak, the reporter which collects the details, and exposes the facts; the judgment is the judge that passes sentence upon them. According to the strict import of the terms, the judgment depends upon the sense, and varies with it in degree. He who has no sense has no judgment; and he who loses sense loses judgment: since sense supplies the knowledge of things, and judgment pronounces upon them, it is evident that there must be sense before there can be judgment.

Then is the soul a nature, which contains
The power of sense within a greater power.
DAVID.

His apprehension was keen and ready; his judgment deep and sound; his reason clear and comprehensive; his method and elocution elegant and easy. LIFE OF LORD ELLSMERE.

On the other hand, sense may be so distinguished from judgment, that there may be sense without judgment, and judgment without sense: sense is the faculty of perceiving in general; it is applied to abstract science as well as general knowledge: judgment is the faculty of determining, that is, of determining mostly in matters of practice. By sense the mind perceives by an immediate act, by the judgment it arrives at conclusions by a process. It is the lot of many, therefore, to have sense in matters of theory, who have no judgment in matters of practice; while others, on the contrary, who have nothing above common sense will have a soundness of judgment that is not to be surpassed. Nay, further, it is possible for a man to have good sense, and yet not a solid judgment: as they are both natural faculties, men are gifted with them as variously as with every other faculty. By good sense a man is enabled to discern, as it were, intuitively, that which requires another of less sense to ponder over and study; by a solid judgment a man is enabled to avoid those errors in conduct which one of a weak judgment is always falling into. There is, however, this distinction between sense and judgment, that the deficiencies of the former may be supplied by diligence and attention; but a defect in the latter is not so easily to be supplied by efforts of one's own. A man may improve his sense in proportion as he has the means of information; but the judgment once matured rarely makes any advances toward improvement afterward.

There's something previous ev'n to taste: 'tis
sense,
Good sense, which only is the gift of heav'n,
And, though no science, fairly worth the seven;
A light within yourself you must perceive,
Jones and Le Notre have it not to give. POPE.

In all instances where our experience of the past has been extensive and uniform, our judgment concerning the future amounts to certainty.
BRATTLE.

The words sense and judgment are frequently employed without any epithets to denote a positively large share of these faculties.

The fox, in deeper cunning vers'd,
The beauties of her mind rehears'd,
And talk'd of knowledge, taste, and sense,
To which the fair have vast pretence. MOORE.

To speak without flattery, few have like use of learning, or like judgment in learning, as I have observed in your lordship. BACON.

As epithets, sensible and judicious both denote the possession of these faculties in a high degree, but in their application they are distinguished as above. A writer or a speaker is said to be sensible; a friend, or an adviser, to be judicious. Sense displays itself in the conversation or the communication of one's ideas; judgment in the propriety of one's actions. A sensible man may be an entertaining companion, but a judicious man in any post of command is an inestimable treasure. Sensible remarks are always calculated to please and interest sensible people; judicious measures have a sterling value in themselves that is appreciated according to the importance of the object. Hence it is obvious that to be sensible is a desirable thing, but to be judicious is an indispensable requisite in those who have to act a part.

I have been tired with accounts from sensible men furnished with matters of fact which have happened within their own knowledge.

ADDISON.

Your observations are so judicious, I wish you had not been so sparing of them.

SIR W. JONES.

SENSIBLE, SENSITIVE, SENTIENT.

ALL these epithets, which are derived from the same source (v. To feel), have obviously a great sameness of meaning, though not of application. SENSIBLE and SENSITIVE both denote the capacity of being moved to feeling: SENTIENT implies the very act of feeling. Sensible expresses either a habit of the body and mind, or only a particular state referring to some particular object: a person may be sensible of things in general, or sensible of cold, sensible of injuries, sensible of the kindnesses which he has received from an individual. Sensitive signifies always an habitual or permanent quality; it is the characteristic of objects: a sensitive creature implies one whose sense is by distinction quickly to be acted upon; a sensitive plant is a peculiar species of plants, marked for the property of having sense or being sensible of the touch.

And, with affection wondrous sensible,
He wrung Bassanio's hand, and so they parted.

SHAKESPEARE.

Those creatures live more alone whose food,
and therefore prey, is upon other sensitive creatures.

TEMPLE.

Sensible and sensitive have always a reference to external objects; but sentient expresses simply the possession of feeling or the power of feeling, and excludes the idea of the cause. Hence, the terms sensible and sensitive are applied only to persons or corporeal objects: but sentient, which conveys the most abstract meaning, is applicable to men and spirits; sentient beings, taken absolutely, may include angels as well as men; it is restricted in its meaning by the context only.

If circumspection and caution are a part of wisdom, when we work only upon inanimate matter, surely they become a part of duty too, when the subject of our demolition and construction is not brick and mortar, but sentient beings, by the sudden alteration of whose condition and habits multitudes may be rendered miserable. BURKE.

SENSIBLE, PERCEPTIBLE.

THESE epithets are here applied not to the persons capable of being impressed, but to the objects capable of impressing: in this case SENSIBLE (v. To feel) applies to that which acts on the senses merely; PERCEPTIBLE (v. To see), to that which acts on the senses in conjunction with the mind. All corporeal objects are naturally termed sensible, inasmuch as they are sensible to the eye, the ear, the nose, the touch, and the taste; particular things are perceptible, inasmuch as they are to be perceived or recognized by the mind. Sometimes sensible signifies discernible by means of the senses, as when we speak of a sensible difference in the atmosphere, and in this case it comes nearer to the meaning of perceptible; but the latter always refers more to the operation of the mind than the former: the difference between colors is said to be scarcely perceptible when they approach very near to each other; so likewise the growth of a body is said not to be perceptible when it cannot be marked from one time to another by the difference of state.

I have suffered a sensible loss, if that word is strong enough to express the misfortune which has deprived me of so excellent a man.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

What must have been the state into which the Assembly has brought your affairs, that the relief afforded by so vast a supply has been hardly perceptible?

BURKE.

SENSUALIST, VOLUPTUARY, EPICURE.

THE SENSUALIST lives for the indulgence of his senses: the VOLUPTUARY (from voluptas, pleasure) is devoted to his pleasures, and, as far as these pleasures are the pleasures of sense, the voluptuary is a sensualist: the EPICURE, from Epicurus, is one who makes the pleasures of sense his god, and in this sense he is a sensualist and a voluptuary. In the application of these terms, however, the sensualist is one who is a slave to the grossest appetites; the voluptuary is one who studies his pleasures so as to make them the most valuable to himself; the epicure is a species of voluptuary who practises more than ordinary refinement in the choice of his pleasures.

Let the sensualist satisfy himself as he is able; he will find that there is a certain living spark within which all the drink he can pour in will never be able to quench. SOUTH.

To fill up the drawing of this personage, he conceived a voluptuary, who in his person should be bloated and blown up to the size of a Silenus; lazy, luxurious, in sensuality a satyr, in intemperance a bacchanalian. CUMBERLAND.

What epicure can be always plying his palate? SOUTH.

SENTENCE, PROPOSITION, PERIOD, PHRASE.

SENTENCE, in Latin sententia, is but a variation of sentiment (v. Opinion). PROPOSITION, v. Proposal. PERIOD, in Latin periodus, Greek περίοδος, from περί, about, and οδός, way, signifies the circuit or round of words which renders the sense complete. PHRASE, from the Greek φράσις, to speak, signifies the words uttered.

The sentence consists of any words which convey sentiment: the proposition consists of the thing set before the mind, that is, either our own minds or the minds of others; hence the term sentence has more special regard to the form of words, and the proposition to the matter contained: they are both used technically or otherwise: the former in grammar and rhetoric; the latter in logic. The sentence is simple and complex; the proposition is universal or particular. Period and phrase, like sentence, are forms of words, but they are solely so, whereas the sentence depends on the connection of ideas by which it is formed: we speak of sentences either as to their structure or their sentiment; hence the sentence is either grammatical or moral: but the period regards only the structure; it is either well or ill turned: the term phrase denotes the character of the words; hence it is either vulgar or polite, idiomatic or general: the sentence must consist of at least two words to make sense; the phrase may be a single word or otherwise.

Some expect in letters pointed sentences and forcible periods. JOHNSON.

Chrysippus, laboring how to reconcile these two propositions, that all things are done by fate, and yet that something is in our own power, cannot extricate himself. HAMMOND.

Disastrous words can best disaster show,
In angry phrase the angry passions glow.

ELPHINSTONE.

TO SENTENCE, DOOM, CONDEMN.

To SENTENCE, or pass sentence, is to give a final opinion or decision which is to influence the fate of an object. CONDEMN, from damnare, a loss, is to pass such a sentence as shall be to the hurt of an object. DOOM, in Saxon dom, a judgment, comes from deman, to judge or deem.

When these terms are taken in the juridical sense, to sentence is indefinite as to the quantum of punishment, it may be great or small; a criminal may be *sentence*d to a mild or severe punishment: to condemn and doom are always employed to denote a severe punishment, and the latter still severer than the former. A person is condemned to the galleys, to transportation for life, or to death; he is doomed to eternal misery.

At the end of the tenth book, the poet joins this beautiful circumstance, that they offered up their penitential prayers on the very place where their judge appeared to them when he pronounced their sentence. ADDISON.

It so happened, by one of the judges withdrawing upon a sudden fit of the stone, the court was divided, one half for the condemning him, and the other half that he was not guilty.

CLARENDON.

To sentence is always the act of some conscious agent; but to condemn and doom may be the effect of circumstances, or brought about by the nature of things. A person is always *sentence*d by some one to suffer in consequence of his conduct; he is condemned or doomed, either by his misfortune or his fault, to suffer whatever circumstances impose upon him; immoral writers are justly condemned to oblivion or infamy; or persons may be condemned by their hard lot to struggle through life for a bare living; and some are doomed by a still harder lot to penury and wretchedness.

Liberty (Thomson's "Liberty") called in vain upon her votaries to read her praises; her praises were condemned to harbor spiders and gather dust. JOHNSON.

Even the abridger, compiler, and translator, though their labors cannot be ranked with those of the diurnal biographer, yet must not be rashly doomed to annihilation. JOHNSON.

To sentence is to pass sentence in the judicial sense only; but the noun sentence is taken in the sense of a judgment, and has likewise a moral as well as a judicial application, in which latter case it admits of a further comparison with condemna or condemnation. The sentence is a formal and the condemnation an informal judgment: the sentence may be favorable or unfavorable; the condemnation is always unfavorable: critics pronounce their sentence on the merits or demerits of a work; the public may condemn a measure in any manner by which they make their sentiments known. To doom, which signifies only to determine the fate of a person, is not allied to the other terms in their moral application.

Let him set out some of Luther's works, that by them we may pass sentence upon his doctrines. ATTENBURY.

This practice being intended only to honor Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, who hath risen upon us to enlighten us with that doctrine of salvation, to which we then declare our adherence, it ought not to be condemned as superstition. SECKER.

SENTENTIOUS, SENTIMENTAL.

SENTENTIOUS signifies having or abounding in sentences or judgments; SENTIMENTAL, having sentiment (v. Opinion). Books and authors are termed sententious; but travellers, society, intercourse, correspondence, and the like, are characterized as sentimental. Moralists, whose works and conversation abound in moral sentences, like Dr. Johnson's, are termed sententious; novelists and romance writers, like Mrs. Radcliffe, are properly sentimental. Sententious books always serve for improvement; sentimental works, unless they are of a superior order, are in general hurtful.

His (Mr. Ferguson's) love of Montequien and Tacitus has led him into a manner of writing too short-winded and sententious. GRAY.

In books, whether moral or amusing, there are no passages more captivating than those delicate strokes of sentimental morality which refer our actions to the determination of feeling. MACKENZIE.

SENTIMENT, SENSATION, PERCEPTION.

SENTIMENT and SENSATION are obviously derived from the same source (v. To feel). PERCEPTION, from perceive (v. To see), expresses the act of perceiving, or the impressions produced by perceiving.

The impressions which objects make upon the person are designated by all these terms; but the sentiment has its seat in the heart, the sensation is confined to the senses, and the perception rests in the understanding. Sentiments are lively, sensations are grateful, perceptions are clear. Gratitude is a sentiment the most pleasing to the human mind; the sensation produced by the action of electricity on the frame is generally unpleasant; a nice perception of objects is one of the first requisites for perfection in any art.

I am framing every possible pretence to live hereafter according to my own taste and sentiments. MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

Diversity of constitution or other circumstances vary the sensations, and to them Java pepper is cold. GLANVILLE.

Matter hath no life nor perception, and is not conscious of its own existence. BENTLEY.

The sentiment extends to manners, and renders us alive to the happiness or misery of others as well as our own; it is that by which men are most nearly allied to each other: the sensation is purely physical, and the effect of external objects upon either the body or the mind: perceptions carry us into the district of science; they give us an interest in all the surrounding objects as intellectual observers. A man of spirit or courage receives marks of honor, or affronts, with very different sentiments from the poltroon: he who bounds his happiness by the present fleeting existence must be careful to remove every painful sensation: we judge of objects as complex or simple according to the number of perceptions which they produce in us.

Alike to council or the assembly came,
With equal souls and sentiments the same. POPE.

When we describe our sensations of another's sorrows in condolence, the customs of the world scarcely admit of rigid veracity. JOHNSON.

When first the trembling eye receives the day,
External forms on young perception play. LANGHORNE.

TO SEPARATE, SEVER, DISJOIN, DETACH.

TO SEPARATE (v. To abstract) is the general term: whatever is united or joined in any way may be separated, be the junction natural or artificial; but to SEVER, which is but a variation of separate, is a mode of separating natural bodies, or bodies naturally joined: we may separate in part or entirely; we sever entirely: we separate with or without violence; we sever with violence only: we may separate papers which have been pasted together, or fruits which have grown together; but the head is severed from the body, or a branch from the trunk.

Can a body be inflammable from which it would puzzle a chemist to separate an inflammable ingredient? BOTTLE.

To mention only that species of shell-fish that grow to the surface of several rocks, and immediately die upon their being severed from the place where they grow. ADDISON.

To separate may be said of things which are only remotely connected; DIS-JOIN, signifying to destroy a junction, is said of that which is intimately connected so as to be joined: we separate as convenience requires; we may separate in a right or a wrong manner; we mostly disjoin things which ought to remain joined: we separate syllables in order to distinguish them; but they are sometimes disjoined in writing by an accidental erasure. To DETACH, signifying to destroy a contact, has an intermediate sense between separate and disjoin, applying to bodies which are neither so loosely connected as the former, nor so closely as the latter: we separate things that directly meet in no point; we disjoin those which may meet in many points; we detach those things which meet in one point only.

Our Saviour did not separate from the Jewish Church, though the Scribes and Pharisees, who ruled in ecclesiastical matters at that time, had perverted the law. BENNETT.

In times and regions, so disjoined from each other that there can scarcely be imagined any communication of sentiments, has prevailed a general and uniform expectation of propitiating God by corporeal austerities. JOHNSON.

The several parts of it are detached one from the other, and yet join again one cannot tell how. POPE.

Separate, sever, and detach may be applied to mental as well as corporeal objects; persons may be separated from each other by diversity of interests or opinions; they may be severed from each other when their affections are estranged toward each other; they may be detached from each other by circumstances after having been attached by any tie.

They (the French Republicans) never have abandoned, and never will abandon, their old steady maxim of separating the people from their government. BURKE.

Better I were distract,
So should my thoughts be severed from my griefs. SHAKESPEARE.

As for the detached rhapsodies which Lycergus in more early times brought with him out of Asia, they must have been exceedingly imperfect. CUMBERLAND.

SEQUEL, CLOSE.

SEQUEL is a species of CLOSE; it is that which follows by way of termination; but the close is simply that which closes, or puts an end to anything. There cannot be a sequel without a close, but there may be a close without a sequel. A story may have either a sequel or a close; when the end is detached from the beginning so as to follow, it is a sequel; if the beginning and end are uninterrupted, it is simply a close. When a work is published in distinct parts, those which follow at the end may be termed the sequel: if it appears all at once, the concluding pages are the close.

Oh let me say no more;
Gather the sequel by what went before. SHAKESPEARE.

A tale should be judicious, clear, succinct,
The language plain, and incidents well link'd;
Tell not as new what everybody knows,
And, new or old, still hasten to a close. COWPER.

SERIES, COURSE.

A SERIES, in Latin series, from sero, to bind or connect, is applied to things which are connected with each other, simply in order of time or number. COURSE, in Latin curvus, from curro, to run, signifying the line formed or the direction taken in running, applies to things which are so connected together as to form, as it were, a line; a series of events are such as follow in order of time; a series of numbers of any work are such as follow in numerical order; a course of events are such as tend to the same end; a course of lectures, such as are delivered on the same subject.

You may believe me I shall never forget from whom this long series of applications took its rise. BRATTLE.

If it be asked what is the improper expectation which it is dangerous to indulge, experience will answer, that it is an expectation that requires the common course of things to be changed.

JOHNSON.

SERVANT, DOMESTIC, MENIAL, DRUDGE.

In the term SERVANT is included the idea of the service performed: in the term DOMESTIC, from domus, a house, is included the idea of one belonging to the house or family: in the word MENIAL, from manus, the hand, is included the idea of labor; and the term DRUDGE, that of drudgery. We hire a servant at a certain rate, and for a particular service; we are attached to our domestics according to their assiduity and attention to our wishes; we employ as a menial one who is unfit for a higher employment; and a drudge in any labor, however hard and disagreeable.

A servant dwells remote from all knowledge of his lord's purposes. SOUTH.

Montezuma was attended by his own domestics, and served with his usual state. ROBERTSON.

Some were his (King Charles's) own menial servants, and ate bread at his table before they lifted up their heel against him. SOUTH.

He who will be vastly rich must resolve to be a drudge all his days. SOUTH.

SERVITUDE, SLAVERY, BONDAGE.

SERVITUDE expresses less than SLAVERY, and this less than BONDAGE.

Servitude, from servio, conveys simply the idea of performing a service without specifying the principle upon which it is performed. Among the Romans, servus signified a slave, because all who served were literally slaves, the power over the person being almost unlimited. The mild influence of Christianity has corrected men's notions with regard to their rights as well as their duties, and established servitude on the just principle of a mutual compact, without any infraction on that most precious of all human gifts, personal liberty. Slavery, which marks a condition incompatible with the existence of this invaluable endowment, is a term odious to the Christian ear: it had its origin in the grossest state of society; the word being derived from the German slave, or Slavonians, a fierce and intrepid people who made a long stand against the Germans, and, being at last defeated, were made slaves. Slavery, therefore, includes not only servitude, but also the odious circumstance of the entire subjection of one individual to another. Bondage, from to bind, denotes the state of being bound, that is, slavery in its most aggravated form, in which, to the loss of personal liberty, is added cruel treatment; the term is seldom applied in its proper sense to any persons but the Israelites in Egypt. In a figurative sense, we speak of being a slave to our passions, and under the bondage of sin, in which cases the terms preserve precisely the same distinction.

It is fit and necessary that some persons in the world should be in love with a splendid servitude. SOUTH.

So different are the geniuses which are formed under Turkish slavery and Grecian liberty.

ADDISON.

Our cage

We make a choir, as doth the prison'd bird,
And sing our bondage freely. SHAKESPEARE.

The same distinction exists between the epithets servile and slavish, which are employed only in the moral application. He who is servile has the mean character of a servant, but he is still a free agent; but he who is slavish is bound and fettered in every possible form.

That servile path thou nobly dost decline,
Of tracing word by word, and line by line.
Those are the labor'd births of slavish brains,
Not the effect of poetry, but pains. DENHAM.

SHADK, SHADOW.

SHADE and SHADOW, in German schatten, are in all probability connected with the word shine, show (v. To show, etc.). Both these terms express that darkness which is occasioned by the sun's rays being intercepted by any body; but shade simply expresses the absence of the light, and shadow signifies also the figure of the body which thus intercepts the light. Trees naturally produce a shade, by means of their branches and leaves: and wherever the image of the tree is reflected on the earth that forms its shadow. It is agreeable in the heat of summer to sit in the shade; the constancy with which the shadow follows the man has been proverbially adopted as a simile for one who clings close to another.

Welcome, ye shades! ye bowery thickets, hail!
THOMSON.

At every step,
Solemn and slow, the shadows blacker fall,
And all is awful listening gloom around.
THOMSON.

In the moral application they are more widely distinguished in their signification. As a shade implies darkness, so to be in the shade is the same as to be in obscurity; as the shadow is but a reflection or appearance, so, in the moral sense, the shadow of a thing is that which is opposed to the substance.

The pious prince then seeks the shade
Which hides from sight the pious maid.
DRYDEN.

As a man he has hardly left him the shadow
of a good quality.
COWPER.

TO SHAKE, TREMBLE, SHUDDER, QUIVER, QUAKE.

SHAKE, SHUDDER (in the German schütteln, schütten), QUIVER, and QUAKE, in the Latin quatio, cutio, and the Italian scussere, are all derived from one common original; TREMBLE comes from the Latin tremō.

To shake is a generic term, the rest are but modes of shaking: to tremble is to shake from an inward cause, or what appears to be so: in this manner a person trembles from fear, from cold, or weakness; and a leaf which is imperceptibly agitated by the air is also said to tremble: to shudder is to tremble violently: to quiver and to quake are both, to tremble quickly; but the former denotes rather a vibratory motion, as the point of a spear when thrown against wood; the latter a quick motion of the whole body, as in the case of bodies that have not sufficient consistency in themselves to remain still.

Under his burning wheels
The steadfast empyrean shook throughout,
All but the throne itself of God.
MILTON.

The trembling pilot, from his rudder torn,
Was headlong hurli'd.
DRYDEN.

He said, and hurli'd against the mountain side
His quivering spear.
DRYDEN.

That seem'd to tremble evermore and quake.
SPENSER.

TO SHAKE, AGITATE, TOSS.

SHAKE, v. To shake. AGITATE, in Latin agito, is a frequentative of ago, to drive, that is, to drive different ways. TOSS is probably contracted from torsi, perfect of torqueo, to whirl.

A motion more or less violent is signified by all these terms, which differ both in the manner and the cause of the motion. Shake is indefinite, it may differ in degree as to the violence; to agitate and toss rise in sense upon the word shake: a breeze shakes a leaf, a storm agitates the sea, and the waves toss a vessel to and fro: large and small bodies may be shaken; large bodies are agitated: a handkerchief may be shaken; the earth is agitated by an earthquake. What is shaken and agitated is not removed from its place; but what is tossed is thrown from place to place. A house may frequently be shaken, while the foundation remains good; the waters are most agitated while they remain within their bounds; but a ball is tossed from hand to hand.

An unwholesome blast of air, a cold, or a surfeit, may shake in pieces a man's hardy fabric.
SOUTH.

I found the magnetical needle greatly agitated
near the summit of the mountain.
BRYDGE.

Toss'd all the day in rapid circles round,
Breathless I fell.
POPE.

To shake and toss are the acts either of persons or things; to agitate is the act of things when taken in the active sense. A person shakes the hand of another, or the motion of a carriage shakes persons in general, and agitates those who are weak in frame: a child tosses his food about; or the violent motion of a vessel tosses everything about which is in it. To shake arises from external or internal causes; we may be shaken by others, or shake ourselves from cold: to agitate and toss arise always from some external action, direct or indirect; the body may be agitated by violent concussion from without, or from the action of perturbed feelings; the body may be tossed by various circumstances, and the mind may be tossed to and fro by the violent action of the passions. Hence the propriety of using the terms in the moral application. The resolution is shaken, as the tree is by the wind; the mind is agitated like troubled waters; a person is tossed to and fro in the ocean of life, as the vessel is tossed by the waves.

Not my firm faith
Can by his hand be shaken or seduc'd.

MILTON.

We all must have observed that a speaker agitated with passion, or an actor who is indeed strictly an imitator, are perpetually changing the tone and pitch of their voice, as the sense of their words varies.

SIR W. JONES.

Your mind is loosing on the sea,
There where your argosies
Do overpeer the petty traffickers.

SHAKESPEARE.

SHARP, ACUTE, KEEN.

THE general property expressed by these epithets is that of sharpness, or an ability to cut. The term SHARP, in German, etc., scharf, from scheren, to cut, is generic and indefinite; the two others are modes of sharpness differing in the circumstance or the degree: the ACUTE (v. Acute) is not only more than sharp in the common sense, but signifies also sharp-pointed: a knife may be sharp; but a needle is properly acute. Things are sharp that have either a long or a pointed edge; but the KEEN (v. Acute) is applicable only to the long edge; and that in the highest degree of sharpness: a common knife may be sharp; but a razor or a lancet are properly said to be keen. These terms preserve the same distinction in their figurative use. Every pain is sharp which may resemble that which is produced by cutting; it is acute when it resembles that produced by piercing deep: words are said to be sharp which have any power in them to wound; they are keen when they cut deep and wide.

Be sure you avoid as much as you can to inquire after those that have been sharp in their judgments toward me.

EARL OF STRAFFORD.

Wisdom's eye

Acute for what? To spy more miseries. Young.
To this great end keen instinct stings him on.

YOUNG.

TO SHINE, GLITTER, GLARE, SPARKLE, RADIATE.

SHINE, in Saxon schinean, German scheinen, is in all probability connected with the words show, see, etc. GLITTER and GLARE are variations from the German gleissen, glänzen, etc., which have a similar meaning. To SPARKLE signifies to produce sparks; and spark is in Saxon spærce, low German and Dutch spark. To RADIATE is to produce rays, from the Latin radius, a ray.

The emission of light is the common idea conveyed by these terms. To shine expresses simply this general idea: glitter and the other verbs include some collateral idea in their signification. To shine is a steady emission of light; to glitter is an unsteady emission of light, occasioned by the reflection on transparent or bright bodies: the sun and moon shine whenever they make their appearance; but a set of diamonds glitter by the irregular reflection of the light on them; or the brazen spire of a steeple glitters when the sun in the morning shines upon it. This is the same in the improper as the proper application.

Yet something shines more glorious in his word,
His mercy this.

WALLER.

The happiness of success glittering before him
withdraws his attention from the atrociousness of the guilt.

JOHNSON.

Shine specifies no degree of light; it may be barely sufficient to render itself visible, or it may be a very strong degree of light: glare, on the contrary, denotes the highest possible degree of light: the sun frequently glares when it shines only at intervals; and the eye also glares.

This glorious morning star was not the transitory light of a comet, which shines and glares for awhile, and then presently vanishes into nothing.

SOUTH.

Against the capitol I met a lion,
Who glar'd upon me, and went surly by
Without annoying me.

SHAKESPEARE.

To shine is to emit light in a full stream; but to sparkle is to emit it in small portions; and to radiate is to emit it in long lines. The fire sparkles in the burning of wood; or the light of the sun sparkles when it strikes on knobs or small points; or the eye sparkles: the sun radiates when it seems to emit its light in rays.

His eyes so sparkled with a lively flame.

DRYDEN.

Now had the sun withdrawn his radiant light.

DRYDEN.

SHOCK, CONCUSSION.

SHOCK denotes a violent shake or agitation; CONCUSSION, a shaking together. The shock is often instantaneous, but does not necessarily extend beyond the act of the moment; the concussion is permanent in its consequences, it tends to derange the system. Hence the different application of the terms: the shock may affect either the body or the mind; the concussion affects properly only the body, or corporeal objects: a violent and sudden blow produces a shock at the moment it is given; but it does not always produce a concussion: the violence of a fall will, however, sometimes produce a concussion in the brain, which in future affects the intellect.

He stood the shock of a whole host of foes.

ADDISON.

How can that concussion of atoms be capable of begetting those internal and vital affections, that self-consciousness, and those other powers and energies that we feel in our minds, seeing they only strike upon the outward surfaces? They cannot inwardly pervade one another; they cannot have any penetration of dimensions and conjunction of substance.

BENTLEY.

As shock conveys no idea of separation, only of impression, it is equally applicable to the mind and the body. Sudden news of an exceedingly painful nature will often produce a shock on the mind; but time mostly serves to wear away the effect which has been produced.

It is inconceivable how any such man, that hath stood the shock of an eternal duration without corruption or alteration, should after be corrupted or altered.

HALL.

TO SHOOT, DART.

To SHOOT and DART, in the proper sense, are clearly distinguished from each other, as expressing different modes of sending bodies to a distance from a given point. From the circumstances of the actions arise their different application to other objects in the improper sense; as that which proceeds by shooting goes forth from a body unexpectedly, and with great rapidity; so, in the figurative sense, a plant shoots up that comes so unexpectedly as not to be seen; a star is said to shoot in the sky, which seems to move in a shooting manner from one place to another.

Tell, how like a tall old oak, how learning shoots To heaven her branches, and to hell her roots.

DENHAM.

From a similarity in the form of rays, lightning, etc., to darts, they are figuratively said to be darted.

I'll safe at distance to his god he prays,
The god who darts around the world his rays.

POPE.

SHORT, BRIEF, CONCISE, SUCCINCT, SUMMARY.

SHORT, in French court, German kurz, Latin curtus, Greek kurros, is the generic, the rest are specific terms: everything which admits of dimensions may be short, as opposed to the long, that is, either naturally or artificially; the rest are species of artificial shortness, or that which is the work of art: hence it is that material, as well as spiritual, objects may be termed short: but the BRIEF, in Latin brevis, in Greek βραχυς, CONCISE, in Latin concisus, signifying cut into a small body, SUCCINCT, in Latin succinctus, participle of succingo, to tuck up, signifying brought within a small compass, and SUMMARY (v. Abridgment) are intellectual or spiritual only. We may term a stick, a letter, or a discourse, short; but we speak of brevis only in regard to the mode of speech; conciseness and succinctness as to the matter of speech; summary as to the mode either of speaking or acting: the brief is opposed to the prolix; the concise and succinct to the diffuse; the summary to the circumstantial or ceremonious. It is a matter of comparatively little importance whether a man's life be long or short; but it deeply concerns him that every moment be well spent: brevis of expression ought to be consulted by speakers, even more than by writers; conciseness is of peculiar advantage in the formation of rules for young persons; and succinctness is a requisite in every writer who has extensive materials to digest; a summary mode of proceeding may have the advantage of saving time, but it has the disadvantage of incorrectness, and often of injustice.

The widest excursions of the mind are made by short flights frequently repeated.

JOHNSON.

Premeditation of thought and brevis of expression are the great ingredients of that reverence that is required to a pious and acceptable prayer.

TO SHOW, OR SHEW, POINT OUT,
MARK, INDICATE.

SHOW, in German schauen, etc., Greek θεαται, from the Hebrew shoah, to look upon, is here the general term, and the others specific: the common idea included in the signification of them all is that of making a thing visible to another. To show is an indefinite term; one shows by simply setting a thing before the eyes of another: to POINT OUT, to fix a point upon a thing, is specific; it is to show some particular point by a direct and immediate application to it: we show a person a book when we put it into his hands; but we point out the beauties of its contents by making a point upon them, or accompanying the action with some particular movement, which shall direct the attention of the observer in a specific manner. Many things, therefore, may be shown which cannot be pointed out: a person shows himself, but he does not point himself out; towns, houses, gardens, and the like, are shown; but single things of any description are pointed out.

If I do feign,
Oh let me in my present wildness die,
And never live to show the incredulous world
The noble change that I have purposed.

SHAKESPEARE.

I shall do justice to those who have distinguished themselves in learning, and point out their beauties.

ADDISON.

To show and point out are direct personal acts; to MARK (v. Mark, impression), i. e., to put a mark on, is an indirect means of making a thing visible or observable: a tradesman marks the prices of the articles which he sets forth in his shop.

Were they allowed first to show what they really are, I am persuaded they would not be half so bad.

BYTONE.

When her eyes began to fail, she employed a reader, who marked on every volume or pamphlet the day when he began and ended his task.

WHITAKER.

Show and mark denote the acts of conscious or unconscious agents; point out, that of conscious agents only: INDICATE (v. Mark, sign), that of unconscious agents only: in this case, what shows, serves as an evidence or proof; what marks, serves to direct or guide; what indicates, serves as an index to point out. That shows the fallacy of forming schemes for the future; it marks the progress of time; it indicates decay.

The glowworm shows the matin to be near,
And 'gins to pale his ineffectual fire.

SHAKESPEARE.

COXE.

Above the steeple shines a plate,
That turns and turns, to indicate

COWPER.

In an extended moral application they preserve the same distinction; to show is to prove in a general way that a thing is or will be; to indicate is to show or point out in a particular manner that a thing is.

That strengthens our argument. Exceptio probat regulam. Some being found, shows that if all remained many would be found.

JOHNSON.

Amidst this wreck of human nature, traces still remain which indicate its author.

BLAIR.

TO SHOW, EXHIBIT, DISPLAY.

To SHOW (v. To show) is here, as before, the generic term; to EXHIBIT (v. To give) and DISPLAY, in French deployer, in all probability changed from the Latin plico, signifying to unfold or set forth to view, are specific: they may all designate the acts either of persons or things: the first, however, does this either in the proper or the improper sense; the latter two rather in the improper sense. To show is an indefinite action applied to every object: things are shown for purposes of convenience; as one shows a book to a friend: exhibit is applied to matters that are extraordinary or unusual; things are exhibited to attract notice; as to exhibit flowers or animals: we show to one or many; we exhibit or display in as public a manner, and to as great numbers, as possible; as to show the marks to the by-standers; to exhibit a figure upon a pole; to display one's finery.

Signor Recupero, who obligingly engages to be our cicerone, has shown us some curious remains of antiquity.

BYTONE.

If any claim redress of injustice, they should exhibit their petition in the street.

SHAKESPEARE.

They are all couched in a pit with their lights put out, which at the very time of our meeting they will at once display to the night.

SHAKESPEARE.

They admit of the same distinction when applied to moral objects: we may show courage, dislike, or any other affection; exhibit skill, prowess, etc., in the field of battle; display heroism, and whatever may shine forth.

The courage he had showed in opposing ship-money raised his reputation to a great height.

CLARENDON.

He has no power of assuming that dignity or elegance, which some who have little of either in common life can exhibit on the stage.

JOHNSON.

Which interwoven Britons seem to raise,
And show the triumph that their shame displays.

DRYDEN.

When said of things, they differ principally in the manner or degree of clearness with which the thing appears to present itself to view: to show is, as before, altogether indefinite, and implies simply to bring to view; exhibit implies to bring inherent properties to light, that is, apparently by a process; to display is to set forth so as to strike the eye: the windows on a frosty morning will show the state of the weather; experiments with the air-pump exhibit the many wonderful and interesting properties of air; the beauties of the creation are peculiarly displayed in the spring season.

Then let us fall, but fall amid our foes,
Despair of life the means of living shows.

DRYDEN.

The world has ever been a great theatre, exhibiting the same repeated scene of the follies of men.

BLAIR.

Thou Heav'n's alternate beauty canst display,
The blush of morning and the Milky Way.

DRYDEN.

SHOW, EXHIBITION, REPRESENTATION, SIGHT, SPECTACLE.

SHOW signifies the thing shown (v. To show); EXHIBITION signifies the thing exhibited (v. To show); REPRESENTATION, the thing represented; SIGHT, the thing to be seen; and SPECTACLE, from the Latin specto, stands for the thing to be beheld.

Show is here, as in the former article, the most general term. Everything set forth to view is shown; and, if set forth for the amusement of others, it is a show. This is the common idea included in the terms exhibition and representation: but show is a term of vulgar meaning and application; the others have a higher use and signification. The show consists of that which merely pleases the eye; it is not a matter either of taste or art, but merely of curiosity: an exhibition, on the contrary, presents some effort of talent or some work of genius; and a representation sets forth the image or imitation of something by the power of art: hence we speak of a show of wild beasts; an exhibition of paintings; and a theatrical representation. The conjuror makes a show of his tricks at a fair to the wonder of the gazing multitude; the artist makes an exhibition of his works; representations of men and manners are given on the stage.

Charm'd with the wonders of the show,

On ev'ry side, above, below,

She now of this or that inquires,

What least was understood admires.

GAY.

Copley's picture of Lord Chatham's death is an exhibition of itself.

BEATTIE.

There are many virtues which in their own nature are incapable of any outward representation.

ADDISON.

Shows, exhibitions, and representations are presented by some one to the view of others; sights and spectacles present themselves to view. Sight, like show, is a vulgar term; and spectacle the nobler term. Whatever is to be seen to excite notice is a sight, in which general sense it would comprehend every show, but in its particular sense it includes only that which casually offers itself to view: a spectacle, on the contrary, is that species of sight which has something in it to interest either the heart or the head of the observer: processions, reviews, sports, and the like, are sights; but battles, bull-fights, or public games of any description, are spectacles, which interest, but shock the feelings.

Their various arms afford a pleasing sight.

DRYDEN.

The weary Britons, whose warrable youth

Was by Maximilian lately ledd away,

Were to those pagans made an open pray,

And daily spectacle of sad decay.

SPENSER.

SHOW, OUTSIDE, APPEARANCE, SEMBLANCE.

WHERE there is SHOW (v. To show) there must be OUTSIDE and APPEARANCE; but there may be the last without the former. The term show always denotes an action, and refers to some person or thing as agent; but the outside may be merely the passive quality of some thing. We speak, therefore, of a thing as mere show, to signify that what is shown is all that exists; and in this sense it may be termed mere outside, as consisting only of what is on the outside. In describing a house, however, we speak of its outside, and not of its show; as also of the outside of a book, and not of the show. Appearance denotes an action as well as show; but the former is the act of an unconscious agent, the latter of one that is conscious and voluntary: the appearance presents itself to the view; the show is purposely presented to view. A person makes a show so as to be seen by others; his appearance is that which shows itself in him. To look only to show, or to be concerned for show only, signifies to be concerned for that only which will attract notice; to look only to the outside signifies to be concerned only for that which may be seen in a thing, to the disregard of that which is not seen: to look only to appearances signifies the same as the former, except that outside is said in the proper sense of that which literally strikes the eye; but appearances extend to a man's conduct, and whatever may affect his reputation.

You'll find the friendship of the world is show,
Mere outward show. SAVAGE.

The greater part of men behold nothing more than the rotation of human affairs. This is only the outside of things. BLAIR.

Every accusation against persons of rank was heard with pleasure (by James I. of Scotland).
Every appearance of guilt was examined with
rigor. ROBERTSON.

SEMBLANCE or seeming (v. To seem) always conveys the idea of an unreal appearance, or at least is contrasted with that which is real; he who only wears the semblance of friendship would be ill deserving the confidence of a friend.

But man, the wildest beast of prey,
Wears friendship's semblance to betray. MOORE.

SHOW, PARADE, OSTENTATION.

THESE terms are synonymous when they imply abstract actions: SHOW is here, as in the preceding article, taken in the vulgar sense; OSTENTATION and

PARADE include the idea of something particular. Show consists simply in letting that be seen which a person might if he pleased keep out of view; parade is a studious effort to show, it is that which serves to attract notice: in this manner a person may make a show of his equipage or furniture, who sets it out to be seen; he makes a parade of his wealth if he sets it forth with any artifice or formality so as to make it more striking. Ostentation is, like parade, a studied show, but it refers rather to the intention of the person than to the method by which the show is made. Show and parade may, therefore, according to the circumstances, serve the purpose of ostentation. A person makes a show of his liberality, or a parade of his gifts, and thus he gratifies his ostentation.

'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,
Nor customary suits of solemn black,
Nor the dejected 'havior of the visage,
Together with all forms, modes, shows of grief,
That can denote me truly sad. SHAKESPEARE.
Be rich, but of your wealth make no parade.
SWIFT.

His charity to those in want, and bounty to learned men, was extraordinary, but without ostentation. BURNET.

When taken in reference to things, the show is opposed to the reality; it is that which shows itself: the parade and ostentation is that which is ceremonious and artificial: the former in respect to what strikes the eye, and the latter in respect to what strikes the mind.

Great in themselves,
They smile superior of external show.
SOMERVILLE.

It was not in the mere parade of royalty that the Mexican potentates exhibited their power.
ROBERTSON.

We are dazzled with the splendor of titles, the ostentation of learning, and the noise of victories. SPECTATOR.

SHOWY, GAUDY, GAY.

SHOWY, having or being full of show
(v. Show, outside), is mostly an epithet of dispraise; that which is showy has seldom anything to deserve notice beyond that which catches the eye: GAUDY, from the Latin gaudeo, to rejoice, signifies literally full of joy; and is applied figuratively to the exterior of objects, but with the annexed bad idea of being striking to an excess: GAY, on the contrary, which is only a contraction of gaudy, is used in the same sense as an epithet of praise. Some things may be showy, and in their nature properly so; thus the tail of a peacock is showy: artificial objects may likewise be showy, but they will not be preferred by persons of taste: that which is gaudy is always artificial, and is always chosen by the vain, the vulgar, and the ignorant; a maid-servant will bedizen herself with gaudy-colored ribbons. That which is gay is either nature itself, or nature imitated in the best manner: spring is a gay season, and flowers are its gayest accompaniments.

Men of warm imaginations neglect solid and substantial happiness for what is showy and superficial. ADDISON.

The gaudy, babbling, and remorseful day
Is crept into the bosom of the sea. SHAKESPEARE.

Jocund day
Upon the mountain-tops sits gayly dress'd. SHAKESPEARE.

SICK, SICKLY, DISEASED, MORBID.

SICK denotes a partial state, SICKLY a permanent state, of the body, a proneness to be sick: he who is sick may be made well; but he who is sickly is seldom really well: all persons are liable to be sick, though few have the misfortune to be sickly: a person may be sick from the effect of cold, violent exercise, and the like; but he is sickly only from constitution.

For aught I see, they are as sick that surfeit
with too much, as they that starve with nothing. SHAKESPEARE.

Both Homer and Virgil were of a very delicate and sickly constitution. WALSH.

Sickly expresses a permanent state of indisposition unless otherwise qualified; but DISEASED expresses a violent state of derangement without specifying its duration; it may be for a time only, or for a permanency: the person, or his constitution, is sickly; the person, or his frame, or particular parts, as his lungs, his inside, his brain, and the like, may be diseased.

Would we know what health and ease are worth, let us ask one that is sickly and in pain, and we have the price. GREW.

They should choose such places as were open to the favorable aspects and influence of the heavens, where there was a well-tempered soil, clear air, pure springs of water, that diseased persons coming from unhealthy places might obtain recovery. BATES.

Sick, sickly, and diseased may all be used in a moral application; MORBID is used in no other, except in a technical sense. Sick denotes a partial state, as before, namely, a state of disgust, and is always associated with the object of the sickness; we are sick of turbulent enjoyments, and seek for tranquillity: sickly and morbid are applied to the habitual state of the feelings or character; a sickly sentimentality, a morbid sensibility: diseased is applied in general to individuals or communities, to persons or to things; a person's mind is in a diseased state when it is under the influence of corrupt passions or principles; society is in a diseased state when it is overgrown with wealth and luxury.

He was not so sick of his master as of his work. L'ESTRANGE.

There affectation, with a sickly mien,
Shows in her cheek the roses of eighteen. POPE.

For a mind diseased with vain longings after unattainable advantages, no medicine can be prescribed. JOHNSON.

While the distempers of a relaxed fibre prognosticate all the morbid force of convulsion in the body of the state, the steadiness of the physician is overpowered by the very aspect of the disease. BURKE.

SICKNESS, ILLNESS, INDISPOSITION.

SICKNESS denotes the state of being sick (v. Sick): ILLNESS that of being ill (v. Ill): INDISPOSITION that of being not well disposed. Sickness denotes the state generally or particularly; illness denotes it particularly: we speak of sickness as opposed to good health; in sickness or in health; but of the illness of a particular person: when sickness is said of the individual, it designates a protracted state; a person may be said to have much sickness in his family. Illness denotes only a particular or partial sickness: a person is said to have had an illness at this or that time, in this or that place, for this or that period. Indisposition is a slight illness, such a one as is capable of deranging him either in his enjoyments or in his business; colds are the ordinary causes of indisposition.

Sickness is a sort of earthly old age; it teaches us a diffidence in our earthly state. POPE.

This is the first letter that I have ventured upon, which will be written, I fear, vacillans-literis; as Tully says, Tyro's letters were after his recovery from an illness. ATTERBURY.

It is not, as you conceive, an indisposition of body, but the mind's disease. FORD.

SIGN, SIGNAL.

SIGN and SIGNAL are both derived from the same source (v. Mark, sign), and the latter is but a species of the former. The sign enables us to recognize an object; it is, therefore, sometimes natural: signal serves to give warning; it is always arbitrary. The movements which are visible in the countenance are commonly the signs of what passes in the heart; the beat of the drum is the signal for soldiers to repair to their post. We converse with those who are present by signs; we make ourselves understood by those who are at a distance by means of signals.

The nod that ratifies the will divine,
The faithful, fix'd, irrevocable sign,
This seals thy suit.

POPE.

Then first the trembling earth the signal gave,
And flashing fires enlighten all the cave.

DAYDEN.

SIGNAL, MEMORABLE.

SIGNAL signifies serving as a sign, MEMORABLE signifies worthy to be remembered. They both express the idea of extraordinary, or being distinguished from every other thing: whatever is signal deserves to be stamped on the mind, and to serve as a sign of some property or characteristic; whatever is memorable impresses upon the memory, and refuses to be forgotten: the former applies to the moral character; the latter to events and times: the Scriptures furnish us with many signal instances of God's vengeance against impenitent sinners, as also of his favor toward those who obey his will; the Reformation is a memorable event in the annals of ecclesiastical history.

We find, in the Acts of the Apostles, not only no opposition to Christianity from the Pharisees, but several signal occasions in which they assisted its first teachers. WOTTON.

That such deliverances are actually afforded, those three memorable examples of Abimelech, Esau, and Balaam sufficiently demonstrate.

SOUTH.

TO SIGNALIZE, DISTINGUISH.

To SIGNALIZE, or make one's self a sign of anything, is a much stronger term than simply to DISTINGUISH; it is in the power of many to do the latter, but few only have the power of effecting the former: the English have always signalized themselves for their unconquerable valor in battle; there is no nation that has not distinguished itself, at some period or another, in war.

The knight of La Mancha gravely recounts to his companion the adventures by which he is to signalize himself. JOHNSON.

The valued file
Distinguishes the swift, the slow, the subtle.
SHAKESPEARE.

SIGNIFICANT, EXPRESSIVE.

THE SIGNIFICANT is that which serves as a sign; the EXPRESSIVE is that which speaks out or declares; the latter is therefore a stronger term than the former: a look is significant when it is made to express an idea that passes in the mind; but it is expressive when it is made to express a feeling of the whole mind or heart: looks are but occasionally significant, but the countenance may be habitually expressive. Significant is applied in an indifferent sense, according to the nature of the thing signified; but expressive is always applied to that which is good: a significant look may convey a very bad idea; but an expressive countenance always expresses good feeling.

I could not help giving my friend the merchant a significant look upon this occasion.

CUMBERLAND.

Through her expressive eyes her soul distinctly spoke.

LITTLETON.

The distinction between these words is the same when applied to things as to persons: a word is significant of whatever it is made to signify, but a word is expressive according to the force with which it conveys an idea. The term significant, in this case, simply explains the nature; but the epithet expressive characterizes it as something good: technical terms are significant only of the precise ideas which belong to the art; most languages have some terms which are peculiarly expressive, and consequently adapted for poetry.

Common life is full of this kind of significant expressions, by knocking, beckoning, frowning, and pointing. HOLDER.

The English, madam, particularly what we call the plain English, is a very copious and expressive language. RICHARDSON.

SIGNIFICATION, MEANING, IMPORT,
SENSE.

THE SIGNIFICATION (v. To express) is that which is signified to another; the MEANING is that which the person means to express: this latter word, therefore, is properly used in connection with the person meaning.

A lie consists in this, that it is a false signification knowingly and voluntarily used. SOUTH.

When beyond her expectation I hit upon her meaning, I can perceive a sudden cloud of disappointment spread over her face. JOHNSON.

The signification of a word is that which it is made to signify, and the meaning is that which it is meant to express: in this sense, therefore, we may indifferently say the proper, improper, metaphorical, general, etc., signification or meaning of words; but, in reference to individuals, meaning is more proper than signification, as to convey a meaning, to attach a meaning to a word, and not to convey or attach a signification.

It was very frequent to dedicate their enemy's armor and hang it in their temples, but the Lacedæmonians were forbidden this custom, which perhaps may be the meaning of Cleomenes's reply.

On the other hand, it is more appropriate to say a literal signification than a literal meaning.

The use of the word minister is brought down to the literal signification of it, a servant; for now to serve and to minister, servile and ministerial, are terms equivalent. SOUTH.

There is also this further distinction between signify and mean, that the latter is applied in its proper sense to things as well as words.

What means this shouting? SHAKESPEARE.

IMPORT, from im or in and porto, to carry, signifying that which is carried or conveyed to the understanding, is most allied to signification, inasmuch as it is applied to single words. The signification may include the whole or any part of what is understood by a word; the import is the whole that is comprehended under a word. The signification of words may be learned by definition, but their full import can be collected only from examples.

To draw near to God is an expression of awful and mysterious import. BLAIR.

SENSE (v. Feeling), signifying that which is perceived by the senses, is most nearly allied to the word meaning, inasmuch as they both refer to the mind of the individual; but the sense being that which is rational and consistent with sense, is that which is taken or admitted abstractedly.

Satan, in tempting our Lord, separated the word "stone" from its metaphorical meaning, to change the sense of the promise and promote his own malicious intentions. JONES.

It is no hard matter for witty men to put perverse senses on Scripture to favor their heretical doctrines. SHERLOCK.

TO SIGNIFY, IMPLY.

SIGNIFY, v. To express. IMPLY, from the Latin implico, to fold in, signifies to fold or involve an idea in any object.

These terms may be employed either as respects actions or words. In the first case signify is the act of the person making known by means of a sign, as we signify our approbation by a look; imply marks the value or force of the action; our assent is implied in our silence. When applied to words or marks, signify denotes the positive and established act of the thing; imply is its relative act: a word signifies whatever it is made literally to stand for; it implies that which it stands for figuratively or morally. The term house signifies that which is constructed for a dwelling; the term residence implies something superior to a house. A cross, thus, +, signifies addition in arithmetic or algebra; a long stroke, thus —, with a break in the text of a work, implies that the whole sentence is not completed. It frequently happens that words which signify nothing particular in themselves may be made to imply a great deal by the tone, the manner, and the connection.

Words signify not immediately and primarily things themselves, but the conceptions of the mind concerning things. SOUTH.

Pleasure implies a proportion and agreement to the respective states and conditions of men. SOUTH.

TO SIGNIFY, AVAIL.

SIGNIFY (v. To signify) is here employed with regard to events of life, and their relative importance. AVAIL (v. To avail) is never used otherwise. That which a thing signifies is what it contains; if it signifies nothing, it contains nothing, and is worth nothing; if it signifies much, it contains much, or is worth much. That which avails produces; if it avails nothing, it produces nothing, is of no use; if it avails much, it produces or is worth much. We consider the end as to its signification, and the means as to their avail. Although it is of little or no signification to a man what becomes of his remains, yet no one can be reconciled to the idea of leaving them to be exposed to contempt; words are but too often of little avail to curb the unruly wills of children.

As for wonders, what signifieth telling us of them? CUMBERLAND.

What avail a parcel of statutes against gaming, when they who make them conspire together for the infraction of them? CUMBERLAND.

SILENCE, TACITURNITY.

THE Latins have the two verbs silere and taceo: the former of which is interpreted by some to signify to cease to speak; and the latter not to begin to speak; others maintain the direct contrary. According to the present use of the words, SILENCE expresses less than TACITURNITY: the silent man seldom speaks, the taciturn man will not speak at all. The Latins designated the most profound silence by the epithet of taciturnus silentia.

Taciturnity is always of some duration, arising either from necessity or from a particular frame of mind.

Pythagoras enjoined his scholars an absolute silence for a long novitiate. I am far from approving such a taciturnity; but I highly approve the end and intent of Pythagoras's injunction. EARL OF CHATHAM.

I have talked more already than I have formerly done in three visits. You remember my taciturnity, never to be forgotten by those who know me. COWPER.

Silence always supposes something occasional that is adopted to suit the convenience of the party.

Silence is the perfectest herald of joy: I were but little happy, if I could say how much. SHAKESPEARE.

SILENT, TACIT.

SILENT (v. Silence) characterizes either the person or the thing: a person is silent as opposed to one that talks; a place is silent as opposed to one that is noisy. TACIT (v. Silence) characterizes only the act of the person; a person gives a tacit consent, or there was a tacit agreement between the parties.

The people beheld the violence of their conduct in silent fright, internally disapproving, yet not daring to avow their detestation. GOLDSMITH.

In elective governments there is a tacit covenant that the king of their own making shall make his makers princes. L'ESTRANGE.

SILENT, DUMB, MUTE, SPEECHLESS.

NOT speaking is the common idea included in the signification of these terms, which differ either in the cause or the circumstance: SILENT (v. Silence) is altogether an indefinite and general term, expressing little more than the common idea. We may be silent because we will not speak, or we may be silent because we cannot speak; but in distinction from the other terms it is always employed in the former case. DUMB, from the German dumm, stupid or idiotic, denotes a physical incapacity to speak: hence persons are said to be born dumb; they may likewise be dumb from temporary physical causes, as from grief, shame, and the like, a person may be struck dumb. MUTE, in Latin mutus, Greek mutros, from muw, to shut, signifies a shut mouth, a temporary disability to speak from arbitrary and incidental causes: hence the office of mutes, or of persons who engage not to speak for a certain time; and, in like manner, persons are said to be mute who dare not give utterance to their thoughts.

But silent, breathing rage, resolv'd and skill'd
By mutual aid to fix a doubtful field,
Swift march the Greeks. POPE.

The truth of it is, half the great talkers in the nation would be struck dumb were this fountain of discourse (party lies) dried up. ADDISON.

Long mute he stood, and, leaning on his staff,
His wonder witness'd with an idiot laugh. DRYDEN.

SPEECHLESS, or void of speech, denotes a physical incapacity to speak from incidental causes; as when a person falls down speechless in an apoplectic fit, or in consequence of a violent contusion.

But who can paint the lover as he stood,
Pierc'd by severe amazement, hating life,
Speechless, and fix'd in all the death of woe? THOMSON.

The terms silent, mute, and dumb are also applied to things as well as persons, the former two in the sense of not sending forth a sound; as the silent grove, a mute tongue, or a mute letter: dumb, in the sense of being without words; as dumb show.

And just before the confines of the wood,
The gliding Lethe leads her silent flood.

DAYDEN.

'Tis listening fear and dumb amazement all.

THOMSON.

Mute was his tongue, and upright stood his hair.

DAYDEN.

SIMILE, SIMILITUDE, COMPARISON.

SIMILE and SIMILITUDE are both drawn from the Latin similis, like: the former signifying the thing that is like, the latter either the thing that is like, or the quality of being like: in the former sense only it is to be compared with simile, when employed as a figure of speech or thought; everything is a simile which associates objects together on account of any real or supposed likeness between them; but a similitude signifies a prolonged or continued simile. The latter may be expressed in a few words, as when we say the godlike Achilles; but the former enters into minute circumstances of COMPARISON, as when Homer compares any of his heroes fighting and defending themselves against multitudes to lions who are attacked by dogs and men. Every simile is more or less a comparison, but every comparison is not a simile: the latter compares things only as far as they are alike, but the former extends to those things which are different: in this manner, there may be a comparison between large things and small, although there can be no good simile.

There are also several noble similes and allusions in the first book of Paradise Lost.

ADDISON.

Such as have a natural bent to solitude (to carry on the former similitude) are like waters which may be forced into fountains.

POPE.

Your image of worshipping once a year in a certain place, in imitation of the Jews, is but a comparison and simile non est idem.

JOHNSON.

SIMPLE, SINGLE, SINGULAR.

SIMPLE, in Latin simplex or sine plica, without a fold, is opposed to the complex, which has many folds, or to the compound, which has several parts involved or connected with each other. SINGLE and SINGULAR (v. One) are opposed, one to double, and the other to multifarious. We may speak of a simple circumstance as independent of anything; of a single instance or circumstance as unaccompanied by any other; and a singular instance as one that rarely has its like. In the moral application to the person, simplicity, as far as it is opposed to duplicity in the heart, can never be excessive: but when it lies in the head, so that it cannot penetrate the folds and doublings of other persons, it is a fault. Singleness of heart and intention is that species of simplicity which is altogether to be admired: singularity may be either good or bad according to circumstances; to be singular in virtue is to be truly good; but to be singular in manner is affectation, which is at variance with genuine simplicity, if not directly opposed to it.

Nothing extraneous must cleave to the eye in the act of seeing; its bare object must be as naked as truth, as simple and unmixed as sincerity.

SOUTH.

Mankind with other animals compare,
Single, how weak and impotent they are!

JENYNS.

From the union of the crowns to the Revolution in 1688, Scotland was placed in a political situation the most singular and most unhappy.

ROBERTSON.

SIMPLE, SILLY, FOOLISH.

THE SIMPLE (v. Simple), when applied to the understanding, implies such a contracted power as is incapable of combination; SILLY, which is but a variation of simple, and FOOLISH, i. e., like a fool, rise in sense upon the former, signifying either the perversion or the total deficiency of understanding; the behavior of a person may be silly who from any excess of feeling loses his sense of propriety; the conduct of a person will be foolish who has not judgment to direct himself. Country people may be simple owing to their want of knowledge; children will be silly in company if they have too much liberty given to them; there are some persons who never acquire wisdom enough to prevent them from committing foolish errors.

And had the simple natives

Observ'd his sage advice,
Their wealth and fame some years ago
Had reach'd above the skies.

SWIFT.

Two gods a stilly woman have undone.

DRYDEN.

Virgil justly thought it a foolish figure for a grave man to be overtaken by death, while he was weighing the cadence of words and measuring verses.

WALSH.

SIMULATION, DISSIMULATION.

SIMULATION, from similis, is the making one's self like what one is not; and DISSIMULATION, from dissimilis, unlike, is the making one's self appear unlike what one really is. The hypocrite puts on the semblance of virtue to recommend himself to the virtuous; the disssembler conceals his vices when he wants to gain the simple or ignorant to his side.

Simulation is a pretence of what is not, and dissimulation is a concealment of what is.

TATLER.

He would never suffer any man to depart from him with an opinion that he was inclined to gratify him, when in truth he was not holding that dissimulation to be the worst sort of lying.

CLARENDON.

SINCERE, HONEST, TRUE, PLAIN.

SINCERE (v. Candid) is here the most comprehensive term: HONEST (v. Honesty), TRUE, and PLAIN (v. Even) are but modes of sincerity.

Sincerity is a fundamental characteristic of the person; honesty is but a part of sincerity, it denotes simply the absence of intentional or fraudulent concealment; we look for a sincere friend to tell us everything; we look for an honest companion who will speak without disguise; truth is a characteristic of sincerity, for a sincere friend is a true friend; but sincerity is, properly speaking, only a mode of truth. Sincere and honest are personal characteristics; true is a characteristic of the thing, as a sincere man, an honest confession, a true statement.

The more sincere you are, the better it will fare with you at the great day of account. In the mean time give us leave to be sincere too in condemning heartily what we disapprove.

WATERLAND.

He never applies to the passions or prejudices of his audience: when they listen with attention and honest minds, he never fails of carrying his point.

ADDISON.

Fear not my truth; the moral of my wit
Is plain and true.

SHAKESPEARE.

A sincere man must needs be plain, because plainness consists in an unvarnished style; and the sincere man will always adopt that mode of speech which expresses his sentiments most truly; but a person may be occasionally plain in his speech who is not so from sincerity. The plain, whether it respects the language or the conduct, is that which is divested of everything extraneous or artificial, and so far plainness is an auxiliary to truth, by enabling the truth to be better seen.

Poetical ornaments destroy that character of truth and plainness which ought to characterize history.

REYNOLDS.

SITUATION, CONDITION, STATE, PRE-DICAMENT, FLIGHT, CASE.

SITUATION (v. Place) is said generally of objects as they respect others; CONDITION (v. Condition), as they respect themselves: our situation consists of those external circumstances in respect of property, honor, liberty, and the like, which affect our standing in society generally. Whatever affects our person immediately is our condition: a person who is unable to pay a sum of money to save himself from a prison is in a bad situation: a traveller who is left in a ditch robbed and wounded is in a bad condition.

The man who has a character of his own is little changed by varying his situation.

Mrs. MONTAGUE.

It is indeed not easy to prescribe a successful manner of approach to the distressed or necessitous, whose condition subjects every kind of behavior equally to miscarriage.

JOHNSON.

Situation and condition are said of that which is contingent and changeable, the latter still more so than the former; STATE, from sto, signifying that position in which one stands, is said of that which is comparatively stable or established. A tradesman is in a good situation who is in the way of carrying on a good trade: his affairs are in a good state if he is enabled to answer every demand and to keep up his credit. Hence it is that we speak of the state of health and the state of the mind, not the situation or condition, because the body and mind are considered as to their general frame, and not as to any relative or particular circumstances; so likewise a state of infancy, a state of guilt, a state of innocence, and the like; but not either a situation or a condition.

Your situation is an odd one; the duchess is your treasurer, and Mr. Pope tells me you are the duke's. SWIFT.

Patience itself is one virtue by which we are prepared for that state in which evil shall be no more. JOHNSON.

When speaking of bodies, there is the same distinction in the terms as in regard to individuals. An army may be either in a situation, a condition, or a state. An army that is on service may be in a critical situation with respect to the enemy and its own comparative weakness; it may be in a deplorable condition if it stand in need of provisions and necessities: an army that is at home will be in a good or bad state, according to the regulations of the commander-in-chief. Of a prince who is threatened with invasion from foreign enemies, and with a rebellion from his subjects, we should not say that his condition, but his situation, was critical. Of a prince, however, who like Alfred was obliged to fly, and to seek safety in disguise and poverty, we should speak of his hard condition: the state of a prince cannot be spoken of, but the state of his affairs and government may; hence, likewise, state may with most propriety be said of a nation: but situation seldom, unless in respect to other nations, and condition never. On the other hand, when speaking of the poor, we seldom employ the term situation, because they are seldom considered as a body in relation to other bodies: we mostly speak of their condition as better or worse, according as they have more or less of the comforts of life; and of their state as regards their moral habits.

No situation could be more unfavorable than that in which it (the army) found itself. GOLDSMITH.

And oh! what man's condition can be worse Than his whom plenty starves, and blessings curse?

The beggars but a common fate deplore,
The rich poor man's emphatically poor.

COWLEY.

DRYDEN.

These terms may likewise be applied to inanimate objects; and, upon the same grounds, a house is in a good situation as respects the surrounding objects; it is in a good or bad condition as respects the painting, and exterior altogether; it is in a bad state as respects the beams, plaster, roof, and interior structure altogether. The hand of a watch is in a different situation every hour; the watch itself may be in a bad condition if the wheels are clogged with dirt; but in a good state if the works are altogether sound and fit for service.

We have been admiring the wonderful strength of this place both by nature and art; it is certainly the happiest situation that can be imagined. BAYDENE.

Six of the houses of her ancestors were in ruins. The church of Skipton, in consequence of the damage it had sustained during the siege of the castle, was in little better condition.

WHITAKER.

There are many remains of antiquity in this city, indeed most of them are in a very ruinous state. BAYDENE.

Situation and condition are either permanent or temporary. The PREDICAMENT, from the Latin predico, to assert or declare, signifies the committing one's self by an assertion; and, when applied to circumstances, it expresses a temporary embarrassed situation occasioned by an act of one's own: hence we always speak of bringing ourselves into a predicament. PLIGHT, contracted from the Latin placatus, participle of placo, to fold, signifies any circumstance in which one is disagreeably entangled; and CASE (v. Case) signifies anything which may befall us, or into which we fall, mostly, though not necessarily, contrary to our inclination. Those latter two terms, therefore, denote a species of temporary condition, for they both express that which happens to the object itself, without reference to any other. A person is in an unpleasant situation who is shut up in a stage-coach with disagreeable company. He is in an awkward predicament when, in attempting to please one friend, he displeases another. He may be in a wretched plight if he is overturned in a stage at night, and at a distance from any habitation. He will be in evil case if he is compelled to put up with a spare and poor diet.

Satan beheld their plight,
And to his mates thus in derision call'd.

SIZE, MAGNITUDE, GREATNESS, BULK.

SIZE, from the Latin cisus and cardo,
to cut, signifying that which is cut or
framed according to a certain proportion,
is a general term including all manner
of dimension or measurement; MAGNI-
TITUDE, from the Latin magnitudo, answering literally to the English word GREAT-NESS, is employed in science or in an abstract sense to denote some specific measurement; greatness is an unscientific term applied in the same sense to objects in general: size is indefinite, it never characterizes anything either as large or small; but magnitudo and greatness
always suppose something great; and BULK (v. Bulky) denotes a considerable degree of greatness: things which are diminutive in size will often have an extraordinary degree of beauty, or some other adventitious perfection to compensate the deficiency; astronomers have classed the stars according to their different magnitudes; greatness has been considered as
one source of the sublime; bulk is that species of greatness which destroys the symmetry, and consequently the beauty,
of objects.

Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size.

SKETCH, OUTLINES.

A SKETCH may form a whole; OUT-
LINES are but a part: the sketch may comprehend the outlines, and some of the particulars; outlines, as the term bespeaks, comprehend only the line on the exterior: the sketch, in drawing, may serve as a landscape, as it presents some of the features of a country; but the outlines serve only as bounding lines, within which
the sketch may be formed. So in the moral application, we speak of the sketches

of countries, characters, manners, and the like, which serve as a description; but of
the outlines of a plan, of a work, a project, and the like, which serve as a basis
on which the subordinate parts are to be formed: barbarous nations present us
with rude sketches of nature; an abridgment is little more than the outlines of a larger work.

In few, to close the whole,
The moral muse has shadow'd out a sketch
Of most our weakness needs believe or do.

YOUNG.

SKIN, HIDE, PEEL, RIND.

SKIN, which is in German schin, Swedish skinn, Danish skind, probably connected with the Greek σκηρος, a tent or covering, is the term in most general use;
it is applicable both to human creatures
and to animals: HIDE, in Saxon hyd,
German haut, Low German huth, Latin
cutis, from the same root as the Greek
κευθειν, to hide, cover, is used only for the skins of large animals: we speak of the skins of birds or insects; but of the hides
of oxen or horses and other animals,
which are to be separated from the body
and converted into leather. Skin is equally applied to the inanimate and the ani-
mate world; but PEEL, in German fell,
etc., Latin pellis, a skin, in Greek πελλος
or φλοιος, bark, which is from φλωω, to burst or crack, because bark is easily broken, and RIND, in all probability changed from round, signifying that which goes round and envelops, belong
only to inanimate objects: the skin is generally said of that which is interior,
in distinction from the exterior, which is the peel: an orange has both its peel and
its thin skin underneath; an apple, a pear, and the like, has a peel. The peel is a soft substance on the outside; the rind is generally interior, and of a harder substance: in regard to a stick, we speak of its peel and its inner skin; in regard to a tree, we speak of its bark and its rind: hence, likewise, the term rind
is applied to cheese, and other incrusted
substances that envelop bodies.

The priest on skins of offerings takes his ease,

SLACK, LOOSE.

SLACK, in Saxon slaec, Low German slack, French lache, Latin laxus, and LOOSE, in Saxon laes, both from the Hebrew halatz, to make free or loose, differ more in application than in sense: they are both opposed to that which is close bound; but slack is said only of that which is tied, or that with which anything is tied; while loose is said of any substances, the parts of which do not adhere closely: a rope is slack in opposition to the tight rope, which is stretched to its full extent; and in general cords or strings are said to be slack which fail in the requisite degree of tightness; but they are said to be loose in an indefinite manner, without conveying any collateral idea: thus the string of an instrument is denominated slack rather than loose; on the other hand, loose is said of many bodies to which the word slack cannot be applied: a garment is loose, but not slack; the leg of a table is loose, but not slack.

The vein in the arm is that which Aretæus commonly opens; and he gives a particular caution in this case to make a slack compression, for fear of producing a convulsion. ARBUTHNOT.
War wearied hath perform'd what war can do,
And to disorder'd rage let loose the reins. MILTON.

In the moral application, that which admits of additional activity is denominated slack; and that which fails in consistency and close adherence is loose: trade is slack, or a person's zeal, etc., becomes slack; but an engagement is loose, and principles are loose.

Nor were it just, would he resume that shape,
That slack devotion should his thunder 'scape. WALLER.

Nor fear that he who sits so loose to life,
Should too much shun its labors and its strife. DENHAM.

TO SLANT, SLOPE.

SLANT is probably a variation of leaned, and SLOPE of slip, expressive of a sideward movement or direction: they are the same in sense, but different in application: slant is said of small bodies only; slope is said indifferently of all bodies, large and small: a book may be made to slant by lying in part on another book on a desk or a table; but a piece of ground is said to slope.

As late the clouds,
Justling or push'd with winds, rude in their shock,

Fire the slant lightning. MILTON.
Its uplands sloping deck the mountain's side. GOLDSMITH.

TO SLEEP, SLUMBER, DOZE, DROWSE, NAP.

SLEEP, in Saxon slapan, low German slap, German schlaf, is supposed to come from the low German slap or slack, slack, because sleep denotes an entire relaxation of the physical frame. SLUMBER, in Saxon slumeran, etc., is but an intensive verb of schlummern, which is a variation from the preceding slapan, etc. DOZE, in low German dusen, in all probability comes from the same root as the Latin dormio, to sleep. DROWSE is a variation of doze. NAP is in all probability a variation of nod and nod.

Sleep is the general term, which designates in an indefinite manner that state of the body to which all animated beings are subject at certain seasons in the course of nature; to slumber is to sleep lightly and softly; to doze is to incline to sleep, or to begin sleeping; to nap is to sleep for a time: every one who is not indisposed sleeps during the night; those who are accustomed to wake at a certain hour of the morning commonly slumber only after that time; there are many who, though they cannot sleep in a carriage, will yet be obliged to doze if they travel in the night; in hot climates the middle of the day is commonly chosen for a nap.

From carelessness it shall fall into a slumber,
and from a slumber it shall settle into a deep and long sleep. SOUTH.

He drowzed upon his couch. SOUTH.

And see! delighted, down he drops, secure
Of sweet refreshment, ease without annoy,
A luscious noonday nap. SHERSTONE.

SLEEPY, DROWSY, LETHARGIC.

SLEEPY (v. To sleep) expresses either a temporary or a permanent state:

DROWSY, which comes from the low German drusen, and is a variation of dose (v. To sleep), expresses mostly a temporary state; LETHARGIC, from lethargy, in Latin lethargia, Greek ληθαργια, compounded of ληθη, forgetfulness, and αργος, swift, signifying a proneness to forgetfulness or sleep, describes a permanent or habitual state.

Sleepy, as a temporary state, expresses also what is natural or seasonable; drowsiness expresses an inclination to sleep at unseasonable hours; it is natural to be sleepy at the hour when we are accustomed to retire to rest; it is common to be drowsy when sitting still after dinner. Sleepiness, as a permanent state, is an infirmity to which some persons are subject constitutionally; lethargy is a disease with which people, otherwise the most wakeful, may be occasionally attacked.

She wak'd her sleepy crew,
And, rising hasty, took a short adieu. DRYDEN.
Drowsy am I, and yet can rarely sleep. SIDNEY.

Too long Jove lull'd us in lethargic charms,
But now in peals of thunder calls to arms. DRYDEN.

TO SLIP, SLIDE, GLIDE.

SLIP is in low German slipan, Latin labor, to slip, and libo, to pour, Greek λειβομαι, to pour down as water does, and the Hebrew salap, to turn aside. SLIDE is a variation of slip, and GLIDE of slide.

To slip is an involuntary, and slide a voluntary, motion: those who go on the ice in fear will slip; boys slide on the ice by way of amusement. To slip and slide are lateral movements of the feet; but to glide is the movement of the whole body, and just that easy motion which is made by slipping, sliding, flying, or swimming: a person glides along the surface of the ice when he slides; a vessel glides along through the water.

A skilful dancer slips willingly, and makes a seeming stumble that you may think him in great danger. DRYDEN.

Thessander bold, and Sthenelus their guide,
And dire Ulysses down the cable slide.

And softly let the running waters glide.

DRYDEN.

In the moral and figurative application, a person slips who commits unintentional errors; he slides into a course of life who wittingly, and yet without difficulty, falls into the practice and habits which are recommended; he glides through life if he pursues his course smoothly and without interruption.

Every one finds that many of the ideas which he desired to retain have irretrievably slipped away. JOHNSON.

SLOW, DILATORY, TARDY, TEDIOUS.

SLOW is doubtless connected with sloth and slide, which kind of motion when walking is the slowest and the laziest. DILATORY, from the Latin de-fero, dilatatus, to defer, signifies prone to defer. TARDY, from the Latin tardus, signifies literally slow. TEDIOUS, from the Latin tædium, weariness, signifies causing weariness.

Slow is a general and unqualified term applicable to the motion of any object, or to the motions and actions of persons in particular, and to their dispositions also; dilatory relates to the disposition only of persons: we are slow in what we are about; we are dilatory in setting about a thing. Slow is applied to corporeal or mental actions; a person may be slow in walking, or slow in conceiving; tardy is applicable to mental actions; we are tardy in our proceedings or our progress; we are tardy in making up accounts or in concluding a treaty. We may be slow with propriety or not, to our own inconvenience or that of others; when we are tedious we are always so improperly: "To be slow and sure" is a vulgar proverb, but a great truth; by this we do ourselves good, and inconvenience no one; but he who is tedious is slow to the annoyance of others: a prolix writer must always be tedious, for he keeps the reader long in suspense before he comes to the conclusion of a period.

TO SMEAR, DAUB.

To SMEAR is literally to do over with smear, in Saxon smear, German schmeer, in Greek μυρεω, a salve. To DAUB, from do and ub, über, over, signifies literally to do over with anything unseemly, or in an unsightly manner.

To smear in the literal sense is applied to such substances as may be rubbed like grease over a body; if said of grease itself, it may be proper, as coachmen smear the coach-wheels with tar or grease; but if said of anything else, it is an improper action, and tends to disfigure, as children smear their hands with ink, or smear their clothes with dirt. To smear and daub are both actions which tend to disfigure; but we smear by means of rubbing over; we daub by rubbing, throwing, or any way covering over: thus a child smears the window with his finger, or he daubs the wall with dirt.

Smear'd as she was with black Gorgonian blood,
The fury sprang above the Stygian flood.

DRYDEN.

He's honest, though daub'd with the dust of the mill.

CUNNINGHAM.

By a figurative application, smear is applied to bad writing, or whatever is soiled or contaminated, and daub to bad painting, or to whatever is executed coarsely or clumsily: indifferent writers who wish to excel are fond of retouching their letters until they make their performance a sad smear; bad artists, who are injudicious in the use of their pencil, load their paintings with color, and convert them into daubs.

Why had I not, with charitable hand,
Took up a beggar's issue at my gates?
Who, smear'd thus, and mir'd with infamy,
I might have said no part of it is mine.

SHAKESPEARE.

In truth the age demanded nothing correct,
nothing complete; capable of tasting the power
of Dryden's numbers, and the majesty of Knel-ler's heads, it overlooked doggerel and daubing.

WALPOLE.

SMELL, SCENT, ODOR, PERFUME, FRAGRANCE.

SMELL and melt are in all probability connected together, because smells arise from the evaporation of bodies. SCENT, changed from sent, comes from the Latin sentio, to perceive or feel. ODOR, in Latin odor, comes from oleo, in Greek ὀζω, to smell. PERFUME, compounded of per or pro, and fumo or fumus, a smoke or vapor, that is, the vapor that issues forth. FRAGRANCE, in Latin fragrantia, comes from fragro, anciently frago, that is, to perfume or smell like the fraga or strawberry.

Smell and scent are said either of that which receives, or that which gives the smell; the odor, the perfume, and fragrance, of that which communicates the smell. In the first case, smell is said generally of all living things without distinction; scent is said only of such animals as have this peculiar faculty of tracing objects by their smell: some persons have a much quicker smell than others, and some have an acuter smell of particular objects than they have of things in general: dogs are remarkable for their quickness of scent, by which they can trace their masters and other objects at an immense distance; other animals are gifted with this faculty to a surprising degree, which serves them as a means of defence against their enemies.

Next in the nostrils she doth use the smell;

As God the breath of life in them did give,
So makes he now his power in them to dwell,
To judge all airs, whereby we breathe and live.

DAVIES.

Its (the dog's) scent is exquisite, when his nose is moist.

FENNANT.

In the second case, smell and scent are compared with odor, perfume, and fragrance, either as respects the objects communicating the smell, or the nature of the smell which is communicated. Smell is indefinite in its sense, and universal in its application; scent, odor, perfume, and fragrance are species of smell: every object is said to smell which acts on the olfactory nerves; flowers, fruits, woods, earth, water, and the like, have a smell; scent is most commonly applied to the smell which proceeds from animal bodies; the odor is said of that which is artificial or extraneous; the perfume and fragrance of that which is natural: the burning of things produces an odor; the perfume and fragrance arises from flowers or sweet-smelling herbs, spices, and the like. The terms smell and odor do not specify the exact nature of that which issues from bodies; they may both be either pleasant or unpleasant; but smell, if taken in certain connections, signifies a bad smell, and odor signifies that which is sweet: meat which is kept too long will have a smell, that is, of course, a bad smell; the odors from a sacrifice are acceptable, that is, the sweet odors ascend to heaven. Perfume is properly a wide-spreading smell, and when taken without any epithet signifies a pleasant smell; fragrance never signifies anything but what is good; it is the sweetest and most powerful perfume: the perfume from flowers and shrubs is as grateful to one sense as their colors and conformation are to the other; the fragrance from groves of myrtle and orange trees surpasses the beauty of their fruits or foliage.

All sweet smells have joined with them some earthy or crude odors. BACON.

Then curses his conspiring feet, whose scent Betrays that safety which their swiftness lent. DENHAM.

So flowers are gathered to adorn a grave,

At last a soft and solemn breathing sound
Rose like a steam of rich distilled perfumes. MILTON.

Soft vernal fragrance clothed the flowing earth. MASON.

TO SOAK, DRENCH, STEEP.

SOAK is a variation of suck. DRENCH is a variation of drink. STEEP, in Saxon steapan, etc., from the Hebrew salep, signifies to overflow or overwhelm.

The idea of communicating or receiving a liquid is common to these terms. A person's clothes are soaked in rain when the water has penetrated every thread; he himself is drenched in the rain when it has penetrated, as it were, his very body; drench, therefore, in this case only expresses the idea of soak in a stronger manner. To steep is a species of soaking employed as an artificial process; to soak is, however, a permanent action by which hard things are rendered soft; to steep is a temporary action by which soft bodies become penetrated with a liquid; thus salt meat requires to be soaked; fruits are steeped in brandy.

Drill'd through the sandy stratum, every way
The waters with the sandy stratum rise,
And clear and sweeten as they soak along. THOMSON.

And deck with fruitful trees the fields around,
And with refreshing waters drench the ground. DRYDEN.

O sleep, O gentle sleep,
Nature's soft nurse! how have I frighted thee,
That thou no more wilt weigh my eyelids down,
And steep my senses in forgetfulness? SHAKESPEARE.

SOBER, GRAVE.

SOBER (v. Abstinent) expresses the absence of all exhilaration of spirits: GRAVE (v. Grave) expresses a weight in the intellectual operations which makes them proceed slowly. Sobriety is therefore a more natural and ordinary state for the human mind than gravity: it behooves every man to be sober in all situations; but those who fill the most important stations of life must be grave. Even in our pleasures we may observe sobriety, which keeps us from every unseemly ebullition of mirth; but on particular occasions, where the importance of the subject ought to weigh on the mind, it becomes us to be grave. At a feast we have need of sobriety; at a funeral we have need of gravity.

Now came still evening on, and twilight gray
Had in her sober liv'ry all things clad. MILTON.

So spake the cherub, and his grave rebuke,
Severe in youthful beauty, added grace
Invincible. MILTON.

Sobriety extends to many more objects than gravity; we must be sober in our thoughts and opinions, as well as in our outward conduct and behavior; but we can be grave, properly speaking, only in our looks and our outward deportment.

He had just sentiments of the dignity of human nature in him, and a universal charity for it in others; not measuring the wisdom he studied by the subtilty and curiosity of speculation, but by a sober and due government of his own actions. LLOYD.

Skill'd in the globe and sphere, he gravely stands,
And with his compass measures seas and lands. DRYDEN.

SOCIAL, SOCIABLE.

SOCIAL, from socius, a companion, signifies belonging or allied to a companion, having the disposition of a companion; SOCIABLE, from the same, signifies able or fit to be a companion; the former is an active, the latter a passive quality: social people seek others; sociable people are sought for by others. It is possible for a man to be social, and not sociable; to be sociable, and not social: he who draws his pleasures from society without communicating his share to the common stock of entertainments is social, but not sociable; men of a taciturn disposition are often in this case; they receive more than they give: he, on the contrary, who has talents to please company, but not the inclination to go into company, may be sociable, but is seldom social; of this description are humorists who go into company to gratify their pride, and stay away to indulge their humor.

Social friends

Attun'd to happy union of soul. THOMSON.

To make man mild, and sociable to man,

To cultivate the wild licentious savage
With wisdom, discipline. ADDISON.

Social and sociable are likewise applicable to things, with a similar distinction; social intercourse is that intercourse which men have together for the purposes of society; social pleasures are what they enjoy by associating together: a path or a carriage is denominated sociable which encourages the association of many.

Absolute solitude is not good for us; the social affections must be cherished. BRATTIE.

Sciences are of a sociable disposition, and flourish best in the neighborhood of each other.

BLACKSTONE.

SOCIETY, COMPANY.

SOCIETY (v. Association) and COMPANY (v. Association) here express either the persons associating, the act of associating, or the state of being associated. In either case society is a general, and company a particular, term; as respects persons associating, society comprehends either all the associated part of mankind, as when we speak of the laws of society, the well-being of society; or it is said only of a particular number of individuals associated, in which latter case it comes nearest to company, and differs from it only as to the purpose of the association. A society is always formed for some solid purpose, as the Humane Society; and a company is always brought together for pleasure or profit, as has already been observed. Good sense teaches us the necessity of conforming to the rules of the society to which we belong: good-breeding prescribes to us to render ourselves agreeable to the company of which we form a part.

I am here, at present, quite alone, which comes nearest to the happiness one finds in the society of those one loves best. MRS. MONTAGU.

Knowledge of men and manners, and conversation of the best company of both sexes, is necessary. DAYDEN.

When expressing the abstract action of associating, the term society is even more general and indefinite than before; it expresses that which is common to mankind; and company that which is peculiar to individuals. The love of society is inherent in our nature; it is weakened or destroyed only by the vice of our constitution, or the derangement of our system: every one naturally likes the company of his own friends and connections in preference to that of strangers. Society is a permanent and habitual act; company is only a particular act suited to the occasion: it behooves us to shun the society of those from whom we can learn no good, although we may sometimes be obliged to be in their company. The society of intelligent men is desirable for those who are entering life; the company of facetious men is agreeable in travelling.

Unhappy he, who from the first of joys,
Society, cut off, is left alone
Amid this world of death.

THOMSON.

Company, though it may relieve a man from his melancholy, cannot secure him from his conscience. SOUTH.

SOFT, MILD, GENTLE, MEEK.

SOFT, in Saxon soft, German sanzf, comes most probably from the Saxon sib, Gothic sef, Hebrew sabbath, rest. MILD, in Saxon milde, milde, German, etc., milde, is connected with our melt and milk, the Latin mollis, Greek μελικοσ, μελισσω, to soothe with soft words, and μελι, honey, etc. GENTLE, v. Gentle. MEEK, like the Latin mitis, may in all probability come from the Greek μειω, to make less, signifying to make one's self small, to be humble.

All these terms denote the absence of an unpleasant action, sometimes also a positively pleasant action, and sometimes a positive readiness to yield to the action of other bodies. Soft is taken in these different senses, as a soft pressure or tread which is not easily felt or heard, and a soft substance that yields readily to the touch or pressure. Mild and gentle are mostly taken in the sense of not acting with an unpleasant force; as mild cheese, or mild fruits, gentle motion. Meek is taken in the passive sense of not resisting force to force. The first three terms have a physical and moral application; the latter only a moral application. Soft is applied to such objects as act pleasantly in point of strength on the ear or the eye; as a soft voice, a soft light; or pleasantly in point of smoothness on the feeling; as a soft cushion, a soft skin. Mild and gentle are applied to objects that act not unpleasantly on the senses; as mild beer, not too strong either for the palate or the body; mild air, that is, not unpleasantly cold; gentle exercise, gentle motion, not violent or excessive in degree: so a gentle stream, and a gentle rain. These terms are, agreeably to this distinction, applied to the same objects; a soft voice, soft music, as that which is positively pleasant; a gentle voice is one not loud.

And ever against eating cares,
Lap me in soft Lydian airs. MILTON.
Close at mine ear one called me forth to walk,
With gentle voice. MILTON.

A soft air or climate is positively pleasant; a mild air or climate is simply without any undue cold; a gentle wind is opposed to one that is boisterous.

Soft stillness, and the night,
Become the touches of sweet harmony. SHAKESPEARE.

Such as were permitted soon went forward to the milder climates. GOLDSMITH.
As when the woods by gentle winds are stirr'd.
DAYDEN.

Soft is sometimes applied to motion in the purely negative sense; as a soft step, i. e., one made without great pressure of the foot; a gentle motion is one that is made slowly, not quick. It is necessary to tread softly when no noise is to be made; and to move gently when one is ill.

Pray you tread softly, that the blind mole may not
Hear a foot fall. SHAKESPEARE.

How inevitably does immoderate laughter end in a sigh, which is only nature's recovering itself after a force done to it; but the religious pleasure of a well-disposed mind moves gently, and therefore constantly. SOUTH.

So likewise when these terms are applied to objects that act on the moral feelings, they admit of a similar distinction. Words are either soft, mild, or gentle; soft words are calculated to soften or diminish the angry feeling of others. The proverb says, "A soft answer turneth away wrath." A reproof is mild, inasmuch as it does not wound the feelings; a censure, or admonition, or a reproach, is gentle, inasmuch as it is free from asperity. So likewise punishments are mild that inflict little pain; means of coercion are gentle that are not violent. Manners are soft, mild, and gentle, but softness in this case is not always commendable. Too much softness in the manners of a man is inconsistent with manly firmness. Mildness and gentleness are more generally commendable. Mild manners are peculiarly becoming in superiors, or those who have the power of controlling others, provided they do not interfere with good order. Gentle manners are becoming in all persons who take a part in social life. Softness of manner may likewise be assumed, but mildness and gentleness are always genuine; the former arising from the temper, the latter either from the temper or from good-breeding, of which it is the greatest mark.

"It is not by the sword, nor by strength of arm," replied Valeria, "that we are to prevail. These belong not to us. Soft moving words must be our weapons." HOOKS.

Though he used very frankly to deny, yet the manner of it was so gentle and obliging, and his condescension such to inform the persons whom he could not satisfy, that few departed from him with ill will or ill wishes. CLARENDON.

When these terms are employed as characteristics of the person or his disposition, they are comparable with meek, which is used only in this sense. Soft,

as far as it denotes a susceptibility of soft or tender emotions, may and ought to exist in both sexes; but it ought to be the peculiar characteristic of the female sex; mildness, as a natural gift, may disqualify a man for command, unless it be tempered by firmness and discretion. Gentleness, as a part of the character, is not so much to be recommended as gentleness from habit.

And much he blames the softness of his mind,
Obnoxious to the charms of womankind.

DRYDEN.

She had all the courage and liberality of the other sex, united to the devotion, order, and economy (perhaps not all the softness) of her own.

WHITTAKER.

He united in a most remarkable degree the seemingly repugnant characters of the mildest of men, and the most vehement of orators.

MACINTOSH.

Let no complaisance, no gentleness of temper, no weak desire of pleasing on your part, no wheedling, coaxing, nor flattery on other people's, make you recede one jot from any point that reason and prudence have bid you pursue.

CHESTERFIELD.

Meekness denotes the forbearance to use force, even in cases of peculiar provocation: in those who are called upon to direct or command it may be carried to an excess.

A yielding timid meekness is always abused and insulted by the unjust and the unfeeling, but meekness, when sustained by the fortiter in re, is always respected and commonly successful.

CHESTERFIELD.

Gentle, mild, and meek are likewise applied to animals: the former to designate that easy flow of spirits which fits them for being guided in their movements, and the latter to mark that passive temper that submits to every kind of treatment, however harsh, without an indication even of displeasure. A horse is gentle, as opposed to one that is spirited; the former is devoid of that impetus in himself to move, which renders the other ungovernable: the lamb is a pattern of meekness, and yields to the knife of the butcher without a struggle or a groan.

How meek, how patient, the mild creature lies,
What softness in its melancholy face,
What dumb-complaining innocence appears!

THOMSON.

They (the Arabian mares) are less vicious, of a gentler nature, and not so apt to neigh.

GOLDSMITH.

SOLICITATION, IMPORTUNITY.

SOLICITATION is general; IMPORTUNITY is particular: it is importunate or troublesome solicitation. Solicitation is itself indeed that which gives trouble to a certain extent, but it is not always unreasonable: there may be cases in which we may yield to the solicitations of friends, to do that which we have no objection to be obliged to do; but importunity is that solicitation which never ceases to apply for that which it is not agreeable to give. We may sometimes be urgent in our solicitations of a friend to accept some proffered honor; the solicitation, however, in this case, although it may even be troublesome, yet it is sweetened by the motive of the action: the importunity of beggars is often a politic means of extorting money from the passenger.

Although the devil cannot compel a man to sin, yet he can follow a man with continual solicitations.

SOUTH.

The torment of expectation is not easily to be borne when the heart has no rival engagements to withdraw it from the importunities of desire.

JOHNSON.

SOLITARY, SOLE, ONLY, SINGLE.

ALL these terms are more or less opposed to several or many. SOLITARY and SOLE, both derived from solus, alone or whole, signify one left by itself; the former mostly in application to particular sensible objects, the latter in regard mostly to moral objects: a solitary shrub expresses not only one shrub, but one that has been left to itself: the sole cause or reason signifies that reason or cause which stands unsupported by anything else. ONLY, that is, only, signifying the quality of unity, does not include the idea of desertion or deprivation, but it comprehends that of want or deficiency: he who has only one shilling in his pocket means to imply that he wants more, or ought to have more. SINGLE, which is an abbreviation of singular (v. Simple), signifies simply one or more detached from others, without conveying any other collateral idea: a single sheet of paper may be sometimes more convenient than a double one; a single shilling may be all that is necessary for the present purpose: there may be single ones, as well as a single one; but the other terms exclude the idea of there being anything else. A solitary act of generosity is not sufficient to characterize a man as generous: with most criminals the sole ground of their defence rests upon their not having learned to know and do better: harsh language and severe looks are not the only means of correcting the faults of others: single instances of extraordinary talents now and then present themselves in the course of an age.

The cattle in the fields and meadows green,
Those rare and solitary, these in flocks.

MILTON.

All things are but inspid to a man, in comparison of that one which is the sole minion of his fancy.

SOUTH.

Will save us trial, what the least can do,
Singles against the wicked.

MILTON.

In the adverbial form, solely, only, and singly are employed with a similar distinction. The disasters which attend an unsuccessful military enterprise are seldom to be attributed solely to the incapacity of the general: there are many circumstances both in the natural and moral world which are to be accounted for only by admitting a providence as presented to us in Divine revelation: there are many things which men could not effect singly that might be effected by them conjointly.

You knew my father well, and in him me,
Left solely heir to all his lands.

SHAKESPEARE.

The practice of virtue is attended not only with present quiet and satisfaction, but with comfortable hope of a future recompense.

NELSON.

They tend to the perfection of human nature, and to make men singly and personally good.

TILLOTSON.

SOLITARY, DESERT, DESOLATE.

SOLITARY, v. Alone. DESERT is the same as deserted. DESOLATE, in Latin desolatus, signifies made solitary.

All these epithets are applied to places, but with different modifications of the common idea of solitude which belongs to them. Solitary simply denotes the absence of all beings of the same kind: thus a place is solitary to a man where there is no human being but himself; and it is solitary to a brute, when there are no brutes with which it can hold society. Desert conveys the idea of a place made solitary by being shunned, from its unfitness as a place of residence; all deserts are places of such wildness as seem to frighten away almost all inhabitants. Desolate conveys the idea of a place made solitary, or bare of inhabitants, and all traces of habitation, by violent means: desolation is solitude coupled with wretchedness; every country may become desolate which is exposed to the inroads of a ravaging army, and a person may be desolate who feels himself unable to associate with others.

The first time we behold the hero (Ulysses), we find him disconsolately sitting on the solitary shore, sighing to return to Ithaca.

WHARTON.

A peopled city made a desert place.

DRYDEN.

Supporting and supported, polish'd friends
And dear relations mingle into bliss;
But this the rugged savage never felt,
E'en desolate in crowds.

THOMSON.

TO SOLVE, RESOLVE.

SOLVE and RESOLVE both come from the Latin solvo, in Greek λυω, in Hebrew sal, to loosen.

Between solve and resolve there is no considerable difference either in sense or application: the former seems merely to speak of unfolding in a general manner that which is wrapped up in obscurity; to resolve is rather to unfold it by the particular method of carrying one back to first principles; we solve a problem, and resolve a difficulty.

He would solve a high dispute
With conjugal caresses.

MILTON.

Something yet of doubt remains,

Which only thy solution can resolve.

MILTON.

SOME, ANY.

SOME, in Saxon sum, connected with the word sum, signifying a collected or specified quantity, is altogether restrictive in its sense: ANY, from a one, is altogether universal and indefinite. Some applies to one particular part in distinction from the rest: any to every individual part without distinction. Some think this, and others that: any person might believe if he would; any one can conquer his passions who calls in the aid of religion. In consequence of this distinction in sense, some can only be used in particular affirmative propositions; but any, which is equivalent to all, may be either in negative, interrogative, or hypothetical propositions: some say so: does any one believe it? He will not give to any.

Some to the shores do fly,
Some to the woods, or whither fear advis'd.

DANIEL.

He is a path, if any be misled,
 He is a robe, if any naked be,
 If any chanced to hunger, he is bread,
 If any be a bondsman, he is free. FLETCHER.

SOON, EARLY, BETIMES.

ALL these words are expressive of time; but SOON respects some future period in general; EARLY, or ere, before, and BETIMES, or by the time, before a given time, respect some particular period at no great distance. A person may come soon or early; in the former case he may not be long in coming from the time that the words are spoken; in the latter case he comes before the time appointed. He who rises soon does nothing extraordinary; but he who rises early or betimes exceeds the usual hour considerably. Soon is said mostly of particular acts, and is always dated from the time of the person speaking, if not otherwise expressed; come soon signifies after the present moment: early and betimes, if not otherwise expressed, have always respect to some specific time appointed; come early will signify a visit, a meeting, and the like; do it betimes will signify before the thing to be done is wanted: in this manner, both are employed for the actions of youth. An early attention to religious duties will render them habitual and pleasing; we must begin betimes to bring the stubborn will into subjection.

But soon, too soon / the lover turns his eyes;
 Again she falls—again she dies—she dies.

POPE.

Pope not being sent early to school, was taught to read by an aunt. JOHNSON.

Happy is the man who betimes acquires a relish for holy solitude. HORNÆ.

SORRY, GRIEVED, HURT.

SORRY and GRIEVED are epithets somewhat differing from their primitives sorrow and grief (v. Affliction), inasmuch as they are applied to ordinary subjects. We speak of being sorry for anything, however trivial, which concerns ourselves; but we are commonly grieved for that which concerns others. I am sorry that I was not at home when a person called upon me; I am grieved that it is not in my power to serve a friend who stands in need. Both these terms respect only that which we do ourselves: HURT (v. To displease and To injure) respects that which is done to us, denoting painful feeling from hurt or wounded feelings; we are hurt at being treated with disrespect.

The ass, approaching next, confess'd
 That in his heart he lov'd a jest;
 One fault he hath, is sorry for't,
 His ears are half a foot too short.

SWIFT.

The mimic ape began to chatter,
 How evil tongues his name bespatter;
 He saw, and he was grieved to see't,
 His zeal was sometimes indiscreet.

SWIFT.

No man is hurt, at least few are so, by hearing his neighbor esteemed a worthy man.

BLAIR.

SOUL, MIND.

THESE terms, or the equivalents to them, have been employed by all civilized nations to designate that part of human nature which is distinct from matter. The SOUL, however, from the German seele, etc., and the Greek ψαω, to live, like the anima of the Latin, which comes from the Greek ανεμος, wind or breath, is represented to our minds by the subtlest or most ethereal of sensible objects, namely, breath or spirit, and denotes properly the quickening or vital principle. MIND, on the contrary, from the Greek μενος, which signifies strength, is that sort of power which is closely allied to, and in a great measure dependent upon, corporeal organization: the former is, therefore, the immortal, and the latter the mortal, part of us; the former connects us with angels, the latter with brutes; in the former we distinguish consciousness and will, which is possessed by no other created being that we know of; in the latter we distinguish nothing but the power of receiving impressions from external objects, which we call ideas, and which we have in common with the brutes. Poets and philosophers speak of the soul in the same strain, as the active and living principle.

Man's soul in a perpetual motion flows,
 And to no outward cause that motion owes.

DENHAM.

In bashful coyness, or in maiden pride,
The soft return conceal'd, save when it stole
In sidelong glances from her downcast eyes,
Or from her swelling soul in stifled sighs.

THOMSON.

The soul consists of many faculties, as the understanding, and the will, with all the senses, both outward and inward; or, to speak more philosophically, the soul can exert herself in many different ways of action.

ADDISON.

The ancients, though unaided by the light of Divine revelation, yet represented the soul as a distinct principle. The Payche of the Greeks, which was the name they gave to the human soul, was feigned to be one of their incorporeal or celestial beings. The anima of the Latins was taken precisely in the modern sense of the soul, by which it was distinguished from the animus or mind. Thus the Emperor Adrian is said on his dying bed to have addressed his soul in words which clearly denote what he thought of its independent existence:

Animula vagula, blandula,
Quæ nunc abibis in loca?
Hospes comesque corporis,
Pallidula, rigida, undula,
Nec (ut soles) dabis joca!

The mind, being considered as an attribute to the soul, is taken sometimes for one faculty, and sometimes for another; as for the understanding, when we say a person is not in his right mind.

I am a very foolish fond old man;
I fear I am not in my perfect mind.

SHAKESPEARE.

Sometimes for the intellectual power:

I thought the eternal mind
Had made us masters.

DRYDEN.

Or for the intellectual capacity:

We say that learning's endless, and blame fate
For not allowing life a longer date;
He did the utmost bounds of knowledge find,
He found them not so large as was his mind.

COWLEY.

Or for the imagination or conception.

In the judgment of Aristotle and Bacon, the true poet forms his imitations of nature after a model of ideal perfection, which perhaps has no existence but in his own mind.

BEATTIE.

Sometimes the word mind is employed to denote the operations of the thinking faculty, the thoughts or opinions:

The ambiguous god,
In these mysterious words his mind express'd;
Some truths revealed, in terms involved the rest.

DRYDEN.

The earth was not of my mind,
If you suppose as fearing you it shook.

SHAKESPEARE.

Or the will, choice, determination, as in the colloquial phrase, to have a mind to do a thing.

All the arguments to a good life will be very insignificant to a man that hath a mind to be wicked, when remission of sins may be had on such cheap terms.

TILLOTSON.

Our question is, whether all be sin which is done without direction by Scripture, and not whether the Israelites did at any time amiss by following their own minds without asking counsel of God.

HOOKE.

Sometimes it stands for the memory, as in the familiar expressions to call to mind, put in mind, etc.

The king knows their disposition; a small touch will put him in mind of them.

BACON.

These, and more than I to mind can bring,
Menalcas has not yet forgot to sing.

DRYDEN.

They will put him in mind of his own waking thoughts, ere these dreams had as yet made their impressions on his fancy.

ATTENBURY.

A wholesome law, time out of mind,
Had been confirm'd by fate's decree.

SWIFT.

Lastly, the mind is considered as the seat of all the faculties:

Every faculty is a distinct taste in the mind, and hath objects accommodated to its proper relish.

ADDISON.

And also of the passions or affections.

E'en from the body's purity, the mind

Receives a secret sympathetic aid.

THOMSON.

This word, being often used for the soul giving life, is attributed abusively to madmen when we say that they are of a distracted mind, instead of a broken understanding: which word mind we use also for opinion, as I am of this or that mind; and sometimes for men's conditions or virtues, as he is of an honest mind, or a man of a just mind; sometimes for affection, as I do this for my mind's sake, etc.

RALEIGH.

The soul being the better part of a man, is taken for the man's self; as Horace says, in allusion to his friend Virgil, "et servos animæ dimidium meæ;" hence the term is figuratively extended, in its application, to denote a human being:

The moral is the case of every soul of us.

L'ESTRANGE.

It is a republic; there are in it a hundred boroughs, and about a thousand souls.

ADDISON.

The poor soul sat singing by a sycamore-tree.

SHAKESPEARE.

Or the individual in general.

Join voices, all ye living souls. Ye birds
That singing up to heaven-gate ascend
Bear on your wings and in your notes his praise.
MILTON.

Also, what is excellent, the essential
or principal part of a thing, the spirit.

Thou sun, of this great world both eye and soul.
MILTON.

He has the very soul of bounty. SHAKESPEARE.
There is some soul of goodness in things evil,
Would men observingly distil it out.
SHAKESPEARE.

SOUND, SANE, HEALTHY.

SOUND and SANE, in Latin sanus, comes probably from sanguis, the blood, because in that lies the seat of health or sickness. HEALTHY, v. Healthy.

Sound is extended in its application to all things that are in the state in which they ought to be, so as to preserve their vitality; thus, animals and vegetables are said to be sound when in the former there is nothing amiss in their breath, and in the latter in their root. By a figurative application, wood and other things may be said to be sound when they are entirely free from any symptom of decay; sane is applicable to human beings, in the same sense, but with reference to the mind; a sane person is opposed to one that is insane.

He hath a heart as sound as a bell, and his tongue is the clapper: for what his heart thinks his tongue speaks. SHAKESPEARE.

How pregnant sometimes his replies are,
A happiness that often madness hits on,
Which sanity and reason could not be
So prosperously delivered of. SHAKESPEARE.

The mind is also said to be sound when it is in a perfect state to form right opinions.

But Capys, and the rest of sounder mind,
The fatal present to the flames design'd.
DRYDEN.

Healthy expresses more than either sound or sane; we are healthy in every part, but we are sound in that which is essential for life; he who is sound may live, but he who is healthy enjoys life.

But the course of succession (to the crown) is the healthy habit of the British constitution.
BURKE.

SOUND, TONE.

SOUND, in Latin sonus, and TONE, in Latin tonus, may probably both come from the Greek ροσος, from τενω, to stretch or exert, signifying simply an exertion of the voice; and that is connected with the Hebrew shaon, a noise.

Sound is that which issues from any body, so as to become audible; tone is a species of sound which is produced from particular bodies: a sound may be accidental; we may hear the sounds of waters or leaves, of animals or men: tones are those particular sounds or modulations of sound, which are made either to express a particular feeling or to produce harmony; a sheep will cry for its lost young in a tone of distress; an organ is so formed as to send forth the most solemn tones.

The sounds of the voice, according to the various touches which raise them, form themselves into an acute or grave, quick or slow, loud or soft, tone.
HUGHES.

SPACE, ROOM.

SPACE is in Latin spatium, Greek σπαδιον, Æol. σπαδιον, a race-ground. ROOM is in Saxon, etc., rum, Hebrew ra-mah, a wide place.

These are both abstract terms, expressive of that portion of the universe which is supposed not to be occupied by any solid body: space is a general term, which includes within itself that which infinitely surpasses our comprehension; room is a limited term, which comprehends those portions of space which are artificially formed: space is either extended or bounded; room is always a bounded space: the space between two objects is either natural, incidental, or designedly formed; the room is that which is the fruit of design, to suit the convenience of persons: there is a sufficient space between the heavenly bodies to admit of their moving without confusion; the value of a house essentially depends upon the quantity of room which it affords: in a row of trees there must always be vacant spaces between each tree; in a coach there will be only room for a given number of persons.

The man of wealth and pride
Takes up a space that many poor supplied.
GOLDSMITH.

For the whole world, without a native home,
Is nothing but a prison of a larger room.
COWLEY.

Space is only taken in the natural sense; room is also employed in the moral application: in every person there is ample room for amendment or improvement.

He was incapable of laying traps for discourse, or putting other people's conversation aside to make room for his own. CUMBERLAND.

TO SPEAK, SAY, TELL.

SPEAK, in Saxon specan, is probably changed from the German sprechen, and connected with brechen, to break, the Latin precor, to pray, and the Hebrew barek, to bless. SAY, in Saxon seegan, German sagen, Latin seco or sequor, changed into dico, and Hebrew shoch, to speak or say. TELL, in Saxon taellan, low German tellan, etc., is probably an onomatopœia in language.

To speak may simply consist in uttering an articulate sound; but to say is to communicate some idea by means of words: a child begins to speak the moment it opens its lips to utter any acknowledged sound; but it will be some time before it can say anything: a person is said to speak high or low, distinctly or indistinctly; but he says that which is true or false, right or wrong: a dumb man cannot speak; a fool cannot say anything that is worth hearing: we speak languages, we speak sense or nonsense, we speak intelligibly or unintelligibly; but we say what we think at the time.

He that questioneth much shall learn much, and content much, for he shall give occasion to those whom he asketh to please themselves in speaking. BACON.

He possessed to admiration that rare faculty of always saying enough, and not too much, on any subject. CUMBERLAND.

In an extended sense, speak may refer as much to sense as to sound; but then it applies only to general cases, and say to particular and passing circumstances of life: it is a great abuse of the gift of speech not to speak the truth; it is very culpable in a person to say that he will do a thing and not to do it.

In what I now shall say of him, I have spoken the truth conscientiously. CUMBERLAND.

To say and tell are both the ordinary actions of men in their daily intercourse; but say is very partial, it may comprehend single unconnected sentences, or even single words: we may say yes or no; but we tell that which is connected, and which forms more or less of a narrative. To say is to communicate that which passes in our own minds, to express our ideas and feelings as they rise; to tell is to communicate events or circumstances respecting ourselves or others: it is not good to let children say foolish things for the sake of talking; it is still worse for them to be encouraged in telling everything they hear: when every one is allowed to say what he likes and what he thinks, there will commonly be more speakers than hearers; those who accustom themselves to tell long stories impose a tax upon others, which is not repaid by the pleasure of their company.

Say, Yorke (for sure, if any, thou canst tell), What virtue is, who practise it so well? JENYNS.

TO SPEAK, TALK, CONVERSE, DISCOURSE.

THE idea of communicating with, or communicating to, another, by means of signs, is common in the signification of all these terms: to SPEAK (v. To speak) is an indefinite term, specifying no circumstance of the action; we may speak only one word or many; but TALK, which is but a variation of tell (v. To speak), is a mode of speaking, namely, for a continuance: we may speak from various motives; we talk for pleasure; we CONVERSE (v. Conversation) for improvement, or intellectual gratification: we speak with or to a person; we talk commonly to others; we converse with others. Speaking a language is quite distinct from writing it: those who think least talk most: conversation is the rational employment of social beings, who seek by an interchange of sentiments to purify the affections, and improve the understanding.

Falsehood is a speaking against our thoughts. SOUTH.

Talkers are commonly vain, and credulous withal; for he that talketh what he knoweth, will also talk what he knoweth not. BACON.

Words learned by rote a parrot may rehearse, But talk is not always to converse. COWPER.
Go, therefore, half this day, as friend with friend, Converse with Adam. MILTON.

Conversation is the act of many together; DISCOURSE, in Latin discursus, expressing properly an examining or deliberating upon, like talk, may be the act of one addressing himself to others; parents and teachers discourse with young people on moral duties.

Let thy discourse be such, that thou mayst give Profit to others, or from them receive. DENHAM.

SPECIAL, SPECIFIC, PARTICULAR.

SPECIAL, in Latin specialis, signifies belonging to the species; SPECIFIC, in Latin specificus, from species, a species, and facio, to make, signifies making a species; PARTICULAR, belonging to a particle or small part. The special is that which comes under the general; the particular is that which comes under the special: hence we speak of a special rule; but a particular case. Particular and specific are both applied to the properties of individuals; but particular is said of the contingent circumstances of things, specific of their inherent properties: every plant has something particular in itself different from others, it is either longer or shorter, weaker or stronger; but its specific property is that which it has in common with its species: particular is, therefore, the term adapted to loose discourse; specific is a scientific term which describes things minutely.

God claims it as a special part of his prerogative to have the entire disposal of riches. SOUTH.

Every state has a particular principle of happiness, and this principle may in each be carried to a mischievous excess. GOLDSMITH.

The imputation of being a fool is a thing which mankind, of all others, is the most impatient of, it being a blot upon the prime and specific perfection of human nature. SOUTH.

The same may be said of particularize and specify: we particularize for the sake of information; we specify for the sake of instruction: in describing a man's person and dress we particularize if we mention everything singly which can be said upon it; in delineating a plan it is necessary to specify time, place, distance, materials, and everything else which may be connected with the carrying it into execution.

St. Peter doth not specify what these waters were. BURNET.

The numbers I particularize are about thirty-six millions. BURKE.

TO SPEND, EXHAUST, DRAIN.

SPEND, contracted from expend, in Latin expendo, to pay away, signifies to give from one's self. EXHAUST, from the Latin exaurio, to draw out, signifies to draw out all that there is. DRAIN, a variation of draw, signifies to draw dry.

The idea of taking from the substance of anything is common to these terms; but to spend is to deprive it in a less degree than to exhaust, and that in a less degree than to drain: every one who exerts himself, in that degree spends his strength; if the exertions are violent he exhausts himself; a country which is drained of men is supposed to have no more left. To spend may be applied to that which is either external or inherent in a body; exhaust to that which is inherent; drain to that which is external of the body in which it is contained: we may speak of spending our wealth, our resources, our time, and the like; but of exhausting our strength, our vigor, our voice, and the like; of draining, in the proper application, a vessel of its liquid, or, in the improper application, draining a treasury of its contents: hence arises this further distinction, that to spend and to exhaust may tend, more or less, to the injury of a body; but to drain may be to its advantage. Inasmuch as what is spent or exhausted may be more or less essential to the soundness of a body, it cannot be parted with without diminishing its value, or even destroying its existence; as when a fortune is spent it is gone, or when a person's strength is exhausted he is no longer able to move: on the other hand, to drain, though a more complete evacuation, is not always injurious, but sometimes even useful to a body; as when the land is drained of a superabundance of water.

Your tears for such a death in vain you spend, Which straight in immortality shall end.

DENHAM.

Many of our provisions for ease or happiness are exhausted by the present day. JOHNSON.

Teaching is not a flow of words nor the draining of an hour-glass. SOUTH.

TO SPEND, OR EXPEND, WASTE, DISSIPATE, SQUANDER.

SPEND and EXPEND are variations from the Latin expendo; but spend implies simply to turn to some purpose, or make use of; to expend carries with it likewise the idea of exhausting; and WASTE, moreover, comprehends the idea of exhausting to no good purpose: we spend money when we purchase anything with it; we expend it when we lay it out in large quantities, so as essentially to diminish its quantity: individuals spend what they have; government expends vast sums in conducting the affairs of a nation; all persons waste their property who have not sufficient discretion to use it well: we spend our time, or our lives, in any employment; we expend our strength and faculties upon some arduous undertaking; we waste our time and talents in trifles.

Then, having spent the last remains of light,
They give their bodies due repose at night.

DRYDEN.

The King of England wasted the French king's country, and thereby caused him to expend such sums of money as exceeded the debt.

HAYWARD.

What numbers, guiltless of their own disease,
Are snatch'd by sudden death, or waste by slow degrees!

JENYNS.

DISSIPATE, in Latin dissipatus, from dissipo, that is dis and cipo, in Greek σῑπω, to scatter, signifies to scatter different ways, that is, to waste by throwing away in all directions: SQUANDER, which is a variation of wander, signifies to make to run wide apart. Both these terms, therefore, denote modes of wasting; but the former seems peculiarly applicable to that which is wasted in detail upon different objects, and by a distraction of the mind; the latter respects rather the act of wasting in the gross, in large quantities, by planless profusion: young men are apt to dissipate their property in pleasures; the open, generous, and thoughtless are apt to squander their property.

He pitied man, and much he pitied those Whom falsely smiling fate has curs'd with means
To dissipate their days in quest of joy.

ARMSTRONG.

To how many temptations are all, but especially the young and gay, exposed, to squander their whole time amidst the circles of levity.

BLAIR.

SPIRITUOUS, SPIRITED, SPIRITUAL,
GHOSTLY.

SPIRITUOUS signifies having spirit as a physical property, after the manner of spirituous liquors: SPIRITED is applicable to the animal spirits of either men or brutes; a person or a horse may be spirited.

The spirituous and benign matter most apt for generation.

SMITH.

Dryden's translation of Virgil is noble and spirited.

JOHNSON.

What is SPIRITUAL is after the manner of a spirit, and what is GHOSTLY is like a ghost: although originally the same in meaning, the former being derived from the Latin spiritus, and the latter from the German geist, and both signifying what is not corporeal, yet they have acquired a difference of application. Spiritual objects are mostly distinguished from those of sense.

Virginity is better than the married life; not that it is more holy, but that it is a freedom from cares, an opportunity to spend more time in spiritual employments.

JEREMY TAYLOR.

Hence it is that the spiritual is opposed to the temporal.

She loves them as her spiritual children, and they reverence her as their spiritual mother, with an affection far above that of the fondest friend.

LAW.

Thou art reverend

Touching thy spiritual function, not thy life.

SHAKESPEARE.

Ghostly is more immediately opposed to the carnal or the secular, and is a term, therefore, of more solemn import.

The grace of the Spirit is much more precious than worldly benefits, and our ghostly evils of greater importance than the harm which the body feeleth.

HOOKE.

To deny me the ghostly comfort of my chaplains seems a greater barbarity than is ever used by Christians.

KING CHARLES.

SPREAD, SCATTER, DISPERSE.

SPREAD (v. To spread) applies equally to divisible or indivisible bodies; we spread our money on the table, or we may spread a cloth on the table: but SCATTER, like scatter, is a frequentative of shake (v. To shake), and is applicable to divisible bodies only; we scatter corn on the ground. To spread may be an act of design or otherwise, but mostly the former; as when we spread books or papers before us: scatter is mostly an act without design; a child scatters the papers on the floor. When taken, however, as an act of design, it is done without order; but spread is an act done in order; thus hay is spread out to dry, but corn is scattered over the land.

All in a row
Advancing broad, or wheeling round the field,
They spread their breathing harvest to the sun.
THOMSON.

Each leader now his scatter'd force conjoins.
POPE.

Things may spread in one direction, or at least without separation; but they DISPERSE (v. To dispel) in many directions, so as to destroy the continuity of bodies: a leaf spreads as it opens in all its parts, and a tree also spreads as its branches increase; but a multitude dispersed, an army dispersed. Between scatter and disperse there is no other difference than that one is immethodical and often involuntary, the other systematic and intentional: flowers are scattered along a path which accidentally fall from the hand; a mob is dispersed by an act of authority: sheep are scattered along the hills; religious tracts are dispersed among the poor: the disciples were scattered as sheep without a shepherd, after the delivery of our Saviour into the hands of the Jews; they dispersed themselves, after his ascension, over every part of the world.

The stately trees fast spread their branches.
MILTON.

Shall funeral eloquence her colors spread,
And scatter roses on the wealthy dead?
YOUNG.

Straight to the tents the troops dispersing
bend.
POPE.

TO SPREAD, EXPAND, DIFFUSE.

SPREAD, in Saxon spredan, low German spredan, high German spreiten, is an intensive of breit, broad, signifying to stretch wide. EXPAND, in Latin expando, compounded of ex and pando, to open, and the Greek φαίω, to show or make appear, signifies to open out wide. DIFFUSE, v. Diffuse.

To spread is the general, the other two are particular terms. To spread may be said of anything which occupies more space than it has done, whether by a direct separation of its parts, or by an accession to the substance; but to expand is to spread by means of extending or unfolding the parts: a mist spreads over the earth; a flower expands its leaves: a tree spreads by the growth of its branches; the opening bud expands when it feels the genial warmth of the sun. Diffusion is that process of spreading which consists literally in pouring out in different ways.

See where the winding vale its lavish stores
Irriguous spreads.
THOMSON.

As from the face of heaven the shatter'd clouds
Tumultuous rove, th' interminable sky
Sublimer swells, and o'er the world expands
A purer azure.
THOMSON.

His head above the floods he gently reared,
And, as he rose, his golden horns appear'd;
That on the forehead shone divinely bright,
And o'er the banks diffused a yellow light.
ADDISON.

Spread and expand are used likewise in a moral application; diffuse is seldom used in any other application: spread is here, as before, equally indefinite as to the mode of the action; everything spreads, and it spreads in any way; but expansion is that gradual process by which an object opens or unfolds itself after the manner of a flower. Evils spread, and reports spread; the mind expands, and prospects expand; knowledge diffuses itself, or cheerfulness is diffused throughout a company.

About this time the heresy of Wickliffe, or Lollardism, as it was called, began to spread.
GOLDSMITH.

Man in society is like a flower
Blown in its native bud; 'tis then alone
His faculties expanded in full bloom,
Shine forth.
COWPER.

A chief renown'd in war,
Whose race shall bear aloft the Latin name,
And through the conquered world diffuse our fame.
DRYDEN.

TO SPREAD, CIRCULATE, PROPAGATE, DISSEMINATE.

To SPREAD (v. To spread, expand) is said of any object material or spiritual; the rest are mostly employed in the moral application. To spread is to extend to an indefinite width; to CIRCULATE is to spread within a circle: thus news spreads through a country; but a story circulates in a village, or from house to house, or a report is circulated in a neighborhood.

Love would between the rich and needy stand,
And spread heaven's bounty with an equal hand.
WALLER.

Our God, when heaven and earth he did create,
Form'd man, who should of both participate :
If our lives' motions theirs must imitate,
Our knowledge, like our blood, must circulate.
DENHAM.

Spread and circulate are the acts of persons or things; PROPAGATE and DISSEMINATE are the acts of persons only. The thing spreads and circulates, or it is spread and circulated by some one; it is always propagated and disseminated by some one. Propagate, from the Latin propago, a breed, and disseminate, from semen, a seed, are here figuratively employed as modes of spreading, according to the natural operations of increasing the quantity of anything which is implied in the first two terms. What is propagated is supposed to generate new subjects: as when doctrines, either good or bad, are propagated among the people so as to make them converts; what is disseminated is supposed to be sown in different parts; thus principles are disseminated among youth.

He shall extend his propagated sway
Beyond the solar year, without the starry way.
DRYDEN.

Nature seems to have taken care to disseminate her blessings among the different regions of the world.
ADDISON.

SPRING, FOUNTAIN, SOURCE.

SPRING denotes that which springs; the word, therefore, carries us back to the point from which the water issues. FOUNTAIN, in Latin fons, from fundo, to pour out, signifies that from which anything is poured, and comprehends in it a collection or certain quantity of water, both natural and artificial: and SOURCE, in the Latin of the Middle Ages surgicia, is obviously from surgo, to rise, and carries us back to the place whence the water takes its rise. Springs are to be found by digging a sufficient depth in all parts of the earth: in mountainous countries, and also in the East, we read of fountains which form themselves, and supply the surrounding parts with refreshing streams: the sources of rivers are mostly to be traced to some mountain.

It has so many springs breaking out of the sides of the hills, and such vast quantities of wood to make pipes, that it is no wonder they are so well stocked with fountains. ADDISON.

Fast by a brook or fountain's murmuring stream.
BRATTLE.

I forgot to mention that we passed the source of the famous cold river Il Fiume Freddo: it rises at once out of the earth a large stream.
BYRDONE.

These terms are all used in a figurative sense: spring is taken for that which is always flowing; fountain for that which contains an abundant supply for a stream; and source for the channel through which from the commencement any event comes to pass.

The heart of the citizen is a perennial spring of energy to the State.
BURKE.

Eternal King! the author of all being,
Fountain of light, thyself invisible. MILTON.

These are thy blessings, industry! rough power!
Yet the kind source of every gentle art.
THOMSON.

TO. SPRING, START, STARTLE, SHRINK.

THE idea of a sudden motion is expressed by all these terms, but the circumstances and mode differ in all; SPRING (v. To spring) is indefinite in these respects, and is therefore the most general term. To spring and START, which is in all probability an intensive of stir, may be either voluntary or involuntary movements, but the former is mostly voluntary, and the latter involuntary; a person springs out of bed, or one animal springs upon another; a person or animal starts from a certain point to begin running, or starts with fright from one side to the other. To STARTLE, which is a frequentative of start, is always an involuntary action; a horse starts by suddenly flying from the point on which he stands; but if he startles he seems to fly back on himself and stops his course; to spring and start, therefore, always carry a person farther from a given point; but startle and SHRINK, which is probably an intensive of sink, signifying to sink into itself, are movements within one's self; startling is a sudden convulsion of the frame which makes a person to stand in hesitation whether to proceed or not; shrinking is a contraction of the frame within itself; any sudden and unexpected sound makes a person startle; the approach of any frightful object makes him shrink back; spring and start are mostly employed only in the proper sense of corporeal movements: startle and shrink are employed in regard to the movements of the mind as well as the body.

Death wounds to cure; we fall, we rise, we reign,
Spring from our fetters, and fasten in the skies.
YOUNG.

A shape within the wat'ry gleam appear'd,
Bending to look on me: I started back,
It started back.
MILTON.

'Tis listening fear and dumb amazement,
When to the startled eye the sudden glance
Appears far south, eruptive through the cloud.
THOMSON.

There is a horror in the scene of a ravaged country which makes nature shrink back at the reflection.
HARRING.

TO SPRINKLE, BEDEW.

To SPRINKLE is a frequentative of spring, and denotes either an act of nature or design: to BEDEW is to cover with dew, which is an operation of nature. By sprinkling, a liquid falls in sensible drops upon the earth; by bedewing, it covers by imperceptible drops: rain sprinkles the earth; dew bedews it.

The prince with living water sprinkled o'er
His limbs and body.
DRYDEN.
The silver streams, which from this spring increase,
Bedew all Christian hearts with drops of peace.
BEAUMONT.

So likewise, figuratively, things are sprinkled with flour; the cheeks are bedewed with tears.

Wings he wore
Of many a colored plume, sprinkled with gold.
MILTON.

And all the while salt tears bedewed the hearers' cheeks.
SPENSER.

TO SPROUT, BUD.

SPROUT, in Saxon sprytan, low German sprouten, is doubtless connected with the German spritzen, to spurt, spreiten, to spread, and the like. To BUD is to put forth buds; the noun bud is a variation from button, which it resembles in form. To sprout is to come forth from the stem; to bud, to put forth in buds.

The sprouting leaves that saw you here,
And call'd their fellows to the sight.
COWLEY.

Noble objects are to the mind what sunbeams are to a bud or flower; they open or unfold, as it were, the leaves of it, put it upon exerting and spreading every way, and call forth all those powers that lie hid and locked up in it.

ATTENBURY.

SPURIOUS, SUPPOSITITIOUS, COUNTERFEIT.

SPURIOUS, in Latin spurius, or Greek σπουδαῖον, that is, one conceived by a woman, because the ancients called the female spurium; hence, one who is of uncertain origin on the father's side is termed spurious. SUPPOSITITIOUS, from suppose, signifies to be supposed or conjectured, in distinction from being positively known. COUNTERFEIT, v. To imitate.

All these terms are modes of the false; the former two indirectly, the latter directly: whatever is uncertain that might be certain, and whatever is conjectural that might be conclusive, are by implication false; that which is made in imitation of another thing, so as to pass for it as the true one, is positively false. Hence, the distinction between these terms, and the ground of their applications. An illegitimate offspring is said to be spurious in the literal sense of the word, the father in this case being always uncertain; and any offspring which is termed spurious falls necessarily under the imputation of not being the offspring of the person whose name they bear. In the same manner an edition of a work is termed spurious which comes out under a false name, or a name different from that in the title-page: supposititious expresses more or less of falsehood, according to the nature of the thing. A supposititious parent implies little less than a directly false parent; but in speaking of the origin of any person in remote periods of antiquity, it may be merely supposititious or conjectural from the want of information. Counterfeit respects rather works of art which are exposed to imitation: coin is counterfeit which bears a false stamp, and every invention which comes out under the sanction of the inventor's name is likewise a counterfeit if not made by himself or by his consent.

Being to take leave of England, I thought it very handsome to take my leave also of you, and my dearly honored mother, Oxford; otherwise both of you may have just grounds to cry me up: you for a forgetful friend, she for an ungrateful son, if not some spurious issue.
HOWELL.

The fabulous tales of early British history, supposititious treaties and charters, are the proofs on which Edward founded his title to the sovereignty of Scotland. ROBERTSON.

Words may be counterfelt,
False coin'd, and current only from the tongue,
Without the mind. SOUTHEAN.

TO SPURT, SPOUT.

To SPURT and SPOUT are, like the German spritzen, variations of spreiten, to spread (v. To spread), and springen, to spring (v. To arise); they both express the idea of sending forth liquid in small quantities from a cavity; the former, however, does not always include the idea of the cavity, but simply that of springing up; the latter is, however, confined to the circumstance of issuing forth from some place; dirt may be spurted in the face by means of kicking it up; or blood may be spurted out of a vein when it is opened, water out of the mouth, and the like; but a liquid spouts out from a pipe. To spurt is a sudden action arising from a momentary impetus given to a liquid either intentionally or incidentally; the beer will spurt from a barrel when the vent-peg is removed: to spout is a continued action produced by a perpetual impetus which the liquid receives equally from design or accident; the water spouts out from a pipe which is denominated a spout, or it will spout out from any cavity in the earth, or in a rock which may resemble a spout; a person may likewise spout water in a stream from his mouth.

Far from the parent stream it boils again
Fresh into day, and all the glittering hill
Is bright with spouting rills. THOMSON.

If from the puncture of a lancet, the manner
of the spurting out of the blood will show it.

WHEMAN.

Hence the figurative application of these terms; any sudden conceit which compels a person to an eccentric action is a spurt, particularly if it springs from ill-humor or caprice; a female will sometimes take a spurt and treat her intimate friends very coldly, either from a fancied offence or a fancied superiority; to spout, on the other hand, is to send forth a stream of words in imitation of the stream of liquid, and is applied to those who affect to turn speakers, or who recite in an affected manner.

His skill in coachmanship or driving chaise,
In bilking tavern bills, and spouting plays.

COWPER.

STAFF, STAY, PROP, SUPPORT.

FROM STAFF in the literal sense (v. Staff) comes staff in the figurative application: anything may be denominated a staff which holds up after the manner of a staff, particularly as it respects persons; bread is said to be the staff of life; one person may serve as a staff to another.

It would much please him,
That of his fortunes you would make a staff
To lean upon. SHAKESPEARE.

The staff serves in a state of motion; the STAY and PROP are employed for objects in a state of rest: the stay makes a thing stay for the time being, it keeps it in its place; it is equally applied to persons and things: we may be a stay to a person who is falling by letting his body rest against us; in the same manner buttresses against a wall, and shores against a building, serve the purpose of stays while they are repairing. For the same reason that part of a female's dress which serves as a stay to the body is denominated stays: the prop keeps a thing up for a permanency; every pillar on which a building rests is a prop; whatever, therefore, requires to be raised from the ground and kept in that state may be set upon props. SUPPORT (v. To hold, keep) is a general term, and in its most general sense comprehends all the others as species: whatever supports, that is, bears the weight of an object, is a support, whether in a state of motion like a staff, or in a state of rest like a stay or prop.

Their trees serve as so many stays for their vines, which hang like garlands from tree to tree. ADDISON.

Whate'er thy many fingers can entwine,
Proves thy support, and all its strength is thine;
Tho' nature gave not legs, it gave thee hands,
By which thy prop, thy prouder cedar stands. DENHAM.

Staff, stay, and prop are applied figuratively in the sense of a support, with a similar distinction between them.

Hope is a lover's staff; walk hence with that,
And manage it against despairing thought.

SHAKESPEARE.

If hope precarious, and of things when gain'd
Of little moment and as little stay,
Can sweeten toils, and dangers into joys,
What then that hope which nothing can defeat?

YOUNG.

Support is applied in the proper sense to moral as well as sensible objects: hope is the support of the mind under the most trying circumstances; religion, as the foundation of all our hopes, is the best and surest support under affliction.

I could not but reflect upon the greatness of his grief for the loss of one who has ever been a support to him under all other afflictions.

ADDISON.

STAFF, STICK, CRUTCH.

STAFF, in low German staff, etc., in Latin stipes, in Greek στυπη, comes from στυπω, stipo, to fix. STICK signifies that which can be stuck in the ground. CRUTCH, as changed from cross, is a staff or stick which has a crossbar at the top.

The ruling idea in a staff is that of firmness and fixedness; it is employed for leaning upon: the ruling idea in the stick is that of sharpness with which it can penetrate; it is used for walking and ordinary purposes: the ruling idea in the crutch is its form, which serves the specific purpose of support in case of lameness; a staff can never be small, but a stick may be large; a crutch is in size more of a staff than a common stick.

"You are going, my boy," cried I, "to London on foot, in the manner Hooker, your great ancestor, travelled there before you: take from me the same horse that was given him by the good Bishop Jewel, this staff."

GOLDSMITH.

He thrust a stick into the crevices of the rock.

BYRON.

Propp'd on his crutch, he drags with many a groan

The load of life, yet dreads to lay it down.

BROWNE.

TO STAGGER, REEL, TOTTER.

STAGGER is in all probability a frequentative from the German steigen, and the Greek στρογγυλν, to go, signifying to go backward and forward. To REEL signifies to go like a reel in a winding manner. TOTTER is most probably connected with the German zittern, to tremble, because to totter is a tremulous action.

All these terms designate an involuntary and an unsteady motion; they vary both in the cause and the mode of the action; staggering and reeling are occasioned either by drunkenness or sickness; tottering is purely the effect of weakness, particularly the weakness of old age: a drunken man always staggers as he walks; one who is giddy reels from one part to another: to stagger is a much less degree of unsteadiness than to reel; for he who staggers is only thrown a little out of the straight path, but he who reels altogether loses his equilibrium; reeling is commonly succeeded by falling. To stagger and reel are said as to the carriage of the whole body; but totter has particular reference to the limbs; the knees and the legs totter, and consequently the footsteps become tottering. In an extended application, the mountains may be said to stagger and to reel in an earthquake: the houses may totter from their very bases. In a figurative application, the faith or the resolution of a person staggers when its hold on the mind is shaken, and begins to give way; a nation or a government will totter when it is torn by intestine convulsions.

Nathless, it bore his foe not from his cell,
But made him stagger as he were not well.

SPENSER.

The clouds, commix'd
With stars, swift gliding sweep along the sky:
All nature reels.

THOMSON.

Troy nods from high, and totters to her fall.

DRYDEN.

TO STAIN, SOIL, SULLY, TARNISH.

STAIN, v. Blenish. SOIL and SULLY, from the French souiller, signifying to smear with dirt. TARNISH, in French ternir, probably from the Latin terere, to bruise.

All these terms imply the act of diminishing the brightness of an object; but the term stain denotes something grosser than the other terms, and is applied to inferior objects: things which are not remarkable for purity or brightness may be stained, as hands when stained with blood, or a wall stained with chalk; nothing is sullied or tarnished but what has some intrinsic value; a fine picture or piece of writing may be easily soiled by a touch of the finger; the finest glass is the soonest tarnished: hence, in the moral application, a man's life may be stained by the commission of some gross immorality: his honor may be sullied, or his glory tarnished.

Thou, rather than thy justice should be stained,
Didst stain the cross.

YOUNG.

I cannot endure to be mistaken, or suffer my purer affections to be soiled with the odious attributes of covetousness and ambitious falsehood.

LORD WESTWORTH.

Oaths would debase the dignity of virtue, Else I could swear by him, the power who clothed The sun with light, and gave yon starry host Their chaste unsullied lustre.

FRANCIS.

I am not now what I once was; for, since I parted from thee, fate has tarnished my glories.

TRAPP.

TO STAND, STOP, REST, STAGNATE.

To STAND, in German stehen, etc., Latin sto, Greek στημι, to stand, Hebrew sut, to settle. STOP, in Saxon stoppan, etc., conveys the ideas of pressing, thickening, like the Latin stipa, and the Greek στίβη; whence it has been made in English to express immovability. REST, v. Ruse. STAGNATE, in Latin stagnatus, participle of stagnare, comes from stagnum, a pool, and that either from sto, to stand, because waters stand perpetually in a pool, or from the Greek στέγος, an enclosure, because a pool is an enclosure for waters.

The absence of motion is expressed by all these terms; stand is the most general of all the terms: to stand is simply not to move; to stop is to cease to move: we stand either for want of inclination or power to move; but we stop from a disinclination to go on: to rest is to stop from an express dislike to motion; we may stop for purposes of convenience, or because we have no farther to go, but we rest from fatigue.

The leaders having charge from you to stand, Will not go off until they hear you speak.

SHAKESPEARE.

He seemed as if he wished to stop, but was impelled forward by an invisible power.

HAWKSWORTH.

Thither let us tend From off the tossing of these fiery waves, Then rest, if any rest can harbor there.

SHAKESPEARE.

To stagnate is only a species of standing as respects liquids; water may both stand and stagnate; but the former is a temporary, the latter a permanent stand: water stands in a puddle, but it stagnates in a pond or in any confined space.

Where Ufens glides along the lowly lands, Or the black water of Pomptina skunds.

DRYDEN.

The water which now rises must all have stagnated.

WOODWARD.

All these terms admit of an extended application; business stands still, or there is a stand to business; a mercantile house stops, or stops payment; an affair rests undecided, or rests in the hands of a person; trade stagnates.

Whither can we run, Where make a stand?

DRYDEN.

I am afraid, should I put a stop now to this design, now that it is so near being completed, I shall find it difficult to resume it.

MELMOTH'S PLINT.

Who rests of immortality assur'd Is safe, whatever ills are here endur'd.

JENYNS.

The soul, deprived of those ventilations of passions which arise from social intercourse, is reduced to a state of stagnation.

BEATTIE.

STATE, REALM, COMMONWEALTH.

THE STATE is that consolidated part of a nation in which lies its power and greatness. The REALM, from royaume, a kingdom, is any state whose government is monarchical. The COMMONWEALTH is the grand body of a nation, consisting both of the government and people, which forms the commonweal, welfare, or wealth.

The ruling idea in the sense and application of the word state is that of government in its most abstract sense; affairs of State may either respect the internal regulations of a country, or they may respect the arrangements of different states with each other. The term realm is employed for the nation at large, but confined to such nations as are monarchical and aristocratical; peers of the realm sit in the English Parliament by their own right. The term commonwealth refers rather to the aggregate body of men and their possessions, than to the government of a country: it is the business of the minister to consult the interests of the commonwealth.

No man that understands the State of Poland and the United Provinces will be able to range them under any particular names of government that have been invented.

TEMPLE.

Then Saturn came, who fled the power of Jove, Robb'd of his realms, and banished from above.

DRYDEN.

Civil dissension is a viperous worm, That gnaws the bowels of the commonwealth.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO STICK, CLEAVE, ADHERE.

STICK is in Saxon stican, low German steken, Latin stigo, Greek στίγω, to prick, Hebrew stock, to press. CLEAVE, in Saxon cleofen, low German kliven, Danish klæve, is connected with our words glue and lime, in Latin gluten, Greek κόλλα, lime. ADHERE, v. To attach.

These terms all express the being joined to a body so as not to part from it without an effort. Stick, which is the general and familiar expression, denotes a junction more or less close: things may stick very slightly, so as to come off with the smallest touch, or things may be made to stick together so fast that they cannot be separated; wetted paper may stick for a time, and by means of glue may stick firmly.

The green caterpillar breedeth in the inward parts of roses not blown where the dew sticketh.
BACON.

What sticks may stick in any manner, but what adheres, when said of natural bodies, adheres by the sticking on the outer surface: a foot sticks in the mud; wax adheres to the fingers. Adhesion, denoting a property of matter, is a scientific term.

Why, therefore, may not the minute parts of other bodies, if they be conveniently shaped for adhesion, stick to one another, as well as to this spirit?
BOYLE.

Cleave is seldomer used than either of the other terms, but always implies a close adhesion produced by some particular cause.

See! how the mould, as loath to leave
So sweet a burden, still doth cleave.
WALLER.

Stick and adhere may also be applied figuratively, with the like distinction.

Adieu, then, O my soul's far better part;
Thy image sticks so close
That the blood follows from my rending heart.
DRYDEN.

That there's a God from nature's voice, is clear;
And yet what errors to this truth adhere!
JENYNS.

As the act of conscious agents, stick is, as before, the familiar expression, whether applied to material or spiritual objects; a person may stick with his body or his mind to anything: in both cases it is an act of determination or perseverance.

The boys were gaudily dressed, and made a pretty appearance. We were surprised to see how well they stuck on (their horses).
BRYDENE.

A person cleaves or adheres to an object, in the former case out of feeling, in the latter case from principle: a drowning man will cleave to anything by which he can be saved; a conscientious man adheres to the truth.

Gold and his gains no more employ his mind,
But, driving o'er the billows with the wind,
Cleaves to one faithful plank, and leaves the rest behind.
ROWE.

He showed his firm adherence to it (religion).
ADDISON.

TO STIFLE, SUPPRESS, SMOTHER.

STIFLE is a frequentative of stuff, in Latin stipo, and Greek στυφω, to make tight or close. SUPPRESS, v. To repress. SMOTHER, as a frequentative of smut or smoke, signifies to cover with smut or smoke.

Stifle and smother in their literal sense will be more properly considered under the article of Suffocate, etc. (v. To suffocate); they are here taken in a moral application. The leading idea in all these terms is that of keeping out of view: stifle is applicable to the feelings only; suppress to the feelings or to outward circumstances; smother to outward circumstances only: we stifle resentment; we suppress anger: the former is an act of some continuance; the latter is the act of the moment: we stifle our resentment by abstaining to take any measures of retaliation; we suppress the rising emotion of anger, so as not to give it utterance or even the expression of a look. It requires time and powerful motives to stifle, but only a single effort to suppress: nothing but a long course of vice can enable a man to stifle the admonitions and reproaches of conscience; a sense of prudence may sometimes lead a man to suppress the joy which an occurrence produces in his mind. In regard to outward circumstances, we say that a book is suppressed by the authority of government; that vice is suppressed by the exertions of those who have power: an affair is smothered so that it shall not become generally known, or the fire is smothered under the embers.

Art, brainless art! our furious charioteer
(For nature's voice unstifled would recall),
Drives headlong to the precipice of death.

YOUNG.

They foresaw the violence with which this indignation would burst out after being so long suppressed.

ROBERTSON.

Great and generous principles not being kept up and cherished, but smothered in sensual delights, God suffers them to sink into low and inglorious satisfaction.

SOUTH.

TO STIR, MOVE.

STIR is in German stören, old German stiren or steren, Latin turbo, Greek τυρβην or θορυβην, trouble or tumult. MOVE, v. Motion.

Stir is here a specific, move a generic term: we may move in any manner, but to stir is to move so as to disturb the rest and composure either of the body or mind; the term stir is therefore mostly employed in cases where any motion, however small, is a disturbance; a soldier must not stir from the post which he has to defend; atrocious criminals or persons raving mad are bound hand and foot, that they may not stir.

At first the groves are scarcely seen to stir.

THOMSON.

I've read that things inanimate have mov'd,
And as with living souls have been inform'd,
By magic numbers and persuasive sounds.

CONGREVE.

STOCK, STORE.

STOCK, from stick, stock, stow, and stuff, signifies any quantity laid up. STORE, in Welsh stor, comes from the Hebrew salar, to hide.

The ideas of wealth and stability being naturally allied, it is not surprising that stock, which expresses the latter idea, should also be put for the former, particularly as the abundance here referred to serves as a foundation, in the same manner as stock in the literal sense does to a tree. Store likewise implies a quantity; but, agreeable to the derivation of the word, it implies an accumulated quantity. Any quantity of materials which is in hand may serve as a stock for a given purpose; thus a few shillings with some persons may be their stock in trade: any quantity of materials brought together for a given purpose may serve as a store; thus the industrious ant collects a store of grain for the winter. The stock is that which must increase of itself; it is the source and foundation of industry: the store is that which we must add to occasionally; it is that from which we draw in time of need. By a stock we gain riches; by a store we guard against want.

Prodigal men

Feel not their own stock wasting. B. JONSON.

He left great store of arms. CLARENDON.

The same distinction subsists between these words in their moral application; he who wishes to speak a foreign language must have a stock of familiar words; stores of learning are frequently lost to the world for want of means and opportunity to bring them forth to public view.

He had thereby an opportunity to gain a new stock of reputation and honor. CLARENDON.

It will not suffice to rally all one's little utmost into one's discourse, which can constitute a divine. Any man would then quickly be drained; and his short stock would serve but for one meeting in ordinary converse; therefore these must be store, plenty, and a treasure, lest he turn broker in divinity.

SOUTH.

As verbs, to stock and to store both signify to provide; but the former is a provision for the present use, and the latter for some future purpose: a tradesman stocks himself with such articles as are most salable; a fortress or a ship is stored: a person stocks himself with patience, or stores his memory with knowledge.

Finding his country pretty well stocked with inhabitants, he instituted a poll. POTTER.

To store the vessel let the care be mine. POPE.

STORY, TALE.

THE STORY (v. Anecdote) is either an actual fact or something feigned; the TALE (v. Fable) is always feigned: stories are circulated respecting the accidents and occurrences which happen to persons in the same place; tales of distress are told by many merely to excite compassion. When both are taken for that which is fictitious, the story is either an untruth, or falsifying of some fact, or it is altogether an invention; the tale is always an invention. As an untruth, the story is commonly told by children; and as a fiction, the story is commonly made for children: the tale is of deeper invention, formed by men of mature understanding, and adapted for persons of mature years.

Meantime the village rouses up the fire,
While well attested, and as well believed,
Heard solemn, goes the goblin story round.

THOMSON.

He makes that pow'r to trembling nations known,
But rarely this, not for each vulgar end,
As superstitious idle tales pretend. JENYNS.

STRAIGHT, RIGHT, DIRECT.

STRAIGHT, from the Latin strictus, participle of stringo, to tighten or bind, signifies confined, that is, turning neither to the right nor left. Straight is applied, therefore, in its proper sense, to corporeal objects; a path which is straight, is kept within a shorter space than if it were curved. RIGHT and DIRECT, from the Latin rectus, regulated or made as it ought, are said of that which is made by the force of the understanding, or by an actual effort, what one wishes it to be: hence, the mathematician speaks of a right line, as the line which lies most justly between two points, and has been made the basis of mathematical figures; and the moralist speaks of the right opinion, as that which has been formed by the best rule of the understanding; and, on the same ground, we speak of a direct answer, as that which has been framed so as to bring soonest and easiest to the point desired.

Truth is the shortest and nearest way to our end, carrying us thither in a straight line.

TILLOTSON.

Then from pole to pole
He views in breadth, and, without longer pause,
Down right into the world's first region throws
His flight precipitant. MILTON.

There be that are in nature faithful and sincere, and plain and direct, not crafty and involved. BACON.

STRAIN, SPRAIN, STRESS, FORCE.

STRAIN and SPRAIN are without doubt variations of the same word, namely, the Latin stringo, to pull tight, or to stretch; they have now, however, a distinct application: to strain is to extend beyond its ordinary length by some extraordinary effort; to sprain is to strain so as to put out of its place, or extend to an injurious length: the ankle and the wrist are liable to be sprained by a contusion; the back and other parts of the body may be strained by over-exertion.

In all pain there is a deformity by a solution of continuity, as in cutting, or by a tendency to solution, as in convulsions and strains. GREW.
Should the big last extend the shoe too wide,
The sudden turn may stretch the swelling vein,
Thy cracking joint unhinge or ankle sprain. GAY.

Strain and STRESS are kindred terms, as being both variations of stretch and stringo; but they differ now very considerably in their application: figuratively we speak of straining a nerve, or straining a point, to express making great exertions, even beyond our ordinary powers; and morally we speak of laying a stress upon any particular measure or mode of action, signifying to give a thing importance: the strain (v. Stress) may be put for the course of sentiment which we express, and the manner of expressing it; the stress (v. Stress) may be put for the efforts of the voice in uttering a word or syllable: a writer may proceed in a strain of panegyric or invective; a speaker or a reader lays a stress on certain words by way of distinguishing them from others. To strain is properly a species of FORCING; we may force in a variety of ways, that is, by the exercise of force upon different bodies, and in different directions; but to strain is to exercise force by stretching or prolonging bodies; thus to strain a cord is to pull it to its full extent; but we may speak of forcing any hard substance in, or forcing it out, or forcing it through, or forcing it from a body: a door or a lock may be forced by violently breaking them; but a door or a lock may be strained by putting the hinges or the spring out of their place. So, likewise, a person may be said to force himself to speak, when by a violent exertion he gives utterance to his words; but he strains his throat or his voice when he exercises the force on the throat or lungs so as to extend them. Force and stress, as nouns, are in like manner comparable when they are applied to the mode of utterance; we must use a certain force in the pronunciation of every word; this, therefore, is indefinite and general; but the stress is that particular and strong degree of force which is exerted in the pronunciation of certain words.

There was then (before the fall) no poring, no struggling with memory, no straining for invention. SOUTH.

Was ever any one observed to come out of a tavern fit for his study, or indeed for anything requiring stress? SOUTH.

Oppose not rage, while rage is in its force.

SHAKESPEARE.

STRAIT, NARROW.

STRAIT, in Latin strictus, participle of stringo, to bind close, signifies bound tight, that is, brought into a small compass: NARROW, which is a variation of near, expresses a mode of nearness or closeness. Strait is a particular term; narrow is general: straitness is an artificial mode of narrowness; a coat is strait which is made to compress a body within a small compass: narrow is either the artificial or the natural property of a body; as a narrow ribbon, or a narrow leaf. That which is strait is so by the means of other bodies, as a piece of water confined close on each side by land is called a strait: whatever is bounded by sides that are near each other is narrow; thus a piece of land whose prolonged sides are at a small distance from each other is narrow.

They are afraid to meet her if they have missed the church, but then they are more afraid to see her, if they are laced as strait as they can possibly be. LAW.

No narrow frith
He had to pass. MILTON.

The same distinction applies to these terms in their moral or extended use.

A faithless heart, how despicably small,
Too strait aught great or generous to receive! YOUNG.

Men should accustom themselves by the light of particulars to enlarge their minds to the amplitude of the world, and not reduce the world to the narrowness of their minds. BACON.

STRANGER, FOREIGNER, ALIEN.

STRANGER, in French étranger, Lat. in extraneus or extra, in Greek ἐξ, signifies out of, that is, out of another country: FOREIGNER, from foris, abroad, and ALIEN, from alienus, another's, have obviously the same original meaning: they have, however, deviated in their acceptations.

Stranger is a general term, and applies to one not known, or not an inhabitant, whether of the same or another country; foreigner is applied only to strangers of another country; and alien to one who has no political or natural tie. Ulysses, after his return from the Trojan war, was a stranger in his own house; the French are foreigners in England, and the English in France; neither can enjoy, as aliens, the same privileges in a foreign country as they do in their own: the laws of hospitality require us to treat strangers with more ceremony than we do members of the same family, or very intimate friends: the lower orders of the English are apt to treat foreigners with an undeserved contempt; every alien is obliged, in time of war, to have a license for residing in England.

In primitive times the Athenians excluded all strangers, that is, all that were not members of their commonwealth. POTTER.

I am a most poor woman, and a foreigner,
Not born in your dominions. SHAKESPEARE.

Like you, an alien in a land unknown,
I learn to pity woes so like my own. DRYDEN.

Stranger is sometimes taken for one not acquainted with an object, or not experienced in its effects: foreigner is used only in the proper sense; but the epithet foreign sometimes signifies not belonging to an object: alien is applied in its natural sense to that which is unconnected by any tie.

I was no stranger to the original; I had also studied Virgil's design, and his disposition of it. POPE.

All the distinctions of this little life
Are quite cutaneous, quite foreign to the man. YOUNG.

To the foster-parent give the care
Of thy superfluous brood; she'll cherish kind
The alien offspring. SOMERVILLE.

STREAM, CURRENT, TIDE.

A FLUID body in a progressive motion is the object described in common by these terms: STREAM is the most general, the other two are but modes of the stream: stream, in Saxon stream, in German strom, is an onomatopœia which describes the prolongation of any body in a narrow line along the surface; a CURRENT, from curro, to run, is a stream running in a particular direction; and a TIDE, from tide, in German zeit, time, is a periodical stream or current. All rivers are streams, which are more or less gentle according to the nature of the ground through which they pass; the force of the current is very much increased by the confinement of any water between rocks, or by means of artificial impediments: the tide is high or low, strong or weak, at different hours of the day; when the tide is high, the current is strongest.

Beneath the hedge or near the stream

A worm is known to stray,

That throws by night a lucid beam

Which disappears by day.

COWPER.

His body is said to have been found some time afterward near Taurominium (about thirty miles distant), it having been observed that what is swallowed up by Charybdis is carried south by the current, and thrown out upon that coast.

BRYDNER.

When in her gulfs the rushing sea subsides,
She drains the ocean with her reflux tides.

POPE.

From knowing the proper application of these terms, their figurative and moral application become obvious: a stream of air or a stream of light is a prolonged moving body of air or light; so a stream of charity, bounty, and the like, is that which flows in a stream: a current of air is a particular stream of air passing through or between other bodies, as the current of air in a house; so the current of men's minds or opinions, that is, the running in a particular line: the tide being a temporary stream; fashion, or the ruling propensity of the day, may be denominated a tide: it is sometimes vain to attempt to stem the tide of folly, it is therefore wiser to get out of its reach.

When now the rapid stream of eloquence
Rears all before it, passion, reason, sense,
Can its dread thunder or its lightning's force
Derive their essence from a mortal source?

JENYNS.

With secret course, which no loud storms annoy,
Gilds the smooth current of domestic joy.

GOLDENITE.

There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which taken at the flood leads on to fortune.

SHAKESPEARE.

TO STRENGTHEN, FORTIFY, INVIGORATE.

STRENGTHEN, from strength, and FORTIFY, from fortis and facio, signify to make strong: INVIGORATE signifies to put in vigor (v. Energy).

Whatever adds to the strength, be it in ever so small a degree, strengthens; exercise strengthens either body or mind: whatever gives strength for a particular emergence fortifies; religion fortifies the mind against adversity: whatever adds to the strength, so as to give a positive degree of strength, invigorates; morning exercise in fine weather invigorates.

There is a certain bias toward knowledge in every mind, which may be strengthened and improved.

BUDGE.

This relation will not be wholly without its use, if those who languish under any part of its sufferings shall be enabled to fortify their patience by reflecting that they feel only those afflictions from which the abilities of Savage could not exempt him.

JOHNSON.

For much the pack
(Rous'd from their dark alcoves) delight to stretch

And bask in his invigorating ray. SOMERVILLE.

STRENUOUS, BOLD.

STRENUOUS, in Latin strenuus, from the Greek σtrenuus, undaunted, untamed, that is, σtrenuus, to be without all rein or control, expresses much more than BOLD (v. Bold); boldness is a prominent idea, but it is only one idea which enters into the signification of strenuousness; this combines likewise fearlessness, activity, and ardor. An advocate in a cause may be strenuous, or merely bold: in the former case he omits nothing that can be either said or done in favor of the cause, he is always on the alert, he heeds no difficulties or danger; but in the latter case he only displays his spirit in the undisguised declaration of his sentiments. Strenuous supporters of any opinion are always strongly convinced of the truth of that which they support, and warmly impressed with a sense of its importance; but the bold supporter of an opinion may be impelled rather with the desire of showing his boldness than maintaining his point.

While the good weather continued, I strolled about the country, and made many strenuous attempts to run away from this odious giddiness.

BRATTLE.

Fortune befriends the bold.

DAYDEN.

STRESS, STRAIN, EMPHASIS, ACCENT.

STRESS (v. Strain) and STRAIN (v. Strain) are general both in sense and application; the former still more than the latter: EMPHASIS, from the Greek ἔμφασις, to appear, signifying making to appear, and ACCENT, in Latin accentus, from cano, to sing, signifying to suit the tune or tone of the voice, are modes of the stress. Stress is applicable to all bodies, the powers of which may be tried by exertion; as the stress upon a rope, upon a shaft of a carriage, a wheel or spring in a machine: the strain is an excessive stress, by which a thing is thrown out of its course; there may be a strain in most cases where there is a stress: but stress and strain are to be compared with emphasis and accent, particularly in the exertion of the voice, in which case the stress is a strong and special exertion of the voice on one word, or one part of a word, so as to distinguish it from another; but the strain is the undue exertion of the voice beyond its usual pitch, in the utterance of one or more words: we lay a stress for the convenience of others; but when we strain the voice it is as much to the annoyance of others as it is hurtful to ourselves. The stress may consist in an elevation of voice, or a prolonged utterance; the emphasis is that species of stress which is employed to distinguish one word or syllable from another: the stress may be accidental; but the emphasis is an intentional stress: ignorant people and children are often led to lay the stress on little and unimportant words in a sentence; speakers sometimes find it convenient to mark particular words, to which they attach a value, by the emphasis with which they utter them. The stress may be casual or regular, on words or syllables; the accent is that kind of regulated stress which is laid on one syllable to distinguish it from another: there are many words in our own language, such as subject, object, present, and the like, where, to distinguish the verb from the noun, the accent falls on the last syllable for the former, and on the first syllable for the latter.

Those English syllables which I call long ones receive a peculiar stress of voice from their acute or circumflex accent, as in quickly, dōwry.

FOSTER.

Singing differs from vociferation in this, that it consists in a certain harmony; nor is it performed with so much straining of the voice.

JAMES.

Emphasis not so much regards the time as a certain grandeur whereby some letter, syllable, word, or sentence is rendered more remarkable than the rest by a more vigorous pronunciation and a long stay upon it.

HOLDER.

The correctness and harmony of English verse depends entirely upon its being composed of a certain number of syllables, and its having the accents of those syllables properly placed.

TYA WHITT.

In reference to the use of words, these terms may admit of a further distinction; for we may lay a stress or emphasis on a particular point of our reasoning, in the first case, by enlarging upon it longer than on other points; or, in the second case, by the use of stronger expressions or epithets. The strain or accent may be employed to designate the tone or manner in which we express ourselves, that is, the spirit of our discourse: in familiar language, we talk of a person's proceeding in a strain of panegyric, or of censure; but, in poetry, persons are said to pour forth their complaints in tender accents.

After such a mighty stress, so irrationally laid upon two slight, empty words ("self-consciousness" and "mutual consciousness"), have they made anything but the author himself (Sherlock on the Trinity) better understood? SOUTH.

The idle, who are neither wise for this world nor the next, are emphatically called by Doctor Tillotson "fools at large." SPECTATOR.

SOUTH.

For thee my tuneful accents will I raise.

DRYDEN.

STRICT, SEVERE.

STRICT, from strictus, bound or confined, characterizes the thing which binds or keeps in control: SEVERE (v. Audere) characterizes in the proper sense the disposition of the person to inflict pain, and in an extended application the thing which inflicts pain. The term strict is, therefore, taken always in the good sense; severe is good or bad, according to circumstances: he who has authority over others must be strict in enforcing obedience, in keeping good order, and a proper attention to their duties; but it is possible to be very severe in punishing those who are under us, and yet very lax in all matters that our duty demands of us.

If a strict hand be kept over children, they will at that age be tractable.

LOCKE.

Lycurgus then, who bow'd beneath the force Of strictest discipline, severely wise, All human passions.

THOMSON.

Strict may with propriety be applied to one's self as well as others: severe is applied to one's self, only to denote self-mortification.

He was so strict in the observation of his word and promise as a commander, that he was not to be persuaded to stay in the West when he found it was not in his power to perform his agreement.

CLARENDON.

Those infirmities and that license which he had formerly indulged to himself, he put off with severity.

CLARENDON.

STRIFE, CONTENTION.

STRIFE and CONTENTION, though derived from the verbs strive and contend (v. To strive), have this further distinction, that they are both taken in the bad sense for acts of anger or passion; in this case strife is mostly used for verbal strife, where each party strives against the other by the use of contumelious or provoking expressions; contention is used for an angry striving with others, either in respect to matters of opinion or matters of claim, in which each party seeks to get the better of the other. Strife is the result of a quarrelsome humor; contention, of a restless, selfish, and greedy humor: strife is most commonly to be found in private life; contention but too frequently mingles itself in all the affairs of men.

A solid and substantial greatness of soul looks down with a generous neglect on the censures and applauses of the multitude, and places a man beyond the little noise and strife of tongues.

ADDISON.

Contention bold with iron lungs,
And slander with her hundred tongues. MOORE.

STRIVE, CONTEND, VIE.

STRIVE, in Saxon stræfan, Dutch streven, like the Latin strapo, to bustle, comes in all probability from the Hebrew rob, to contend, to prosecute a claim, properly signifying to use an effort. CONTEND, v. To contend. VIE may either be changed from vieu, signifying to look at with the desire to excel, or from the Saxon wigan, to contend with.

To strive is the act of individuals without regard to others; as when a person strives to get a living, or to improve himself; to contend and vie both denote the act of an individual in reference to others; as to contend in a lawsuit, to vie in dress. To strive may sometimes be applied where there is more than one party, as to strive for the mastery; but in this case the efforts of the individual are more distinctly considered than when we speak of contending for a prize; for this reason these words may be applied in precisely the same connection, but still with this distinction.

Mad as the seas and the winds, when both contend
Which is the master. SHAKESPEARE.

Mad as the winds
When for the empire of the main they strive. DENNIS.

Striving consists always of some active effort, as when persons strive at the oar; contending may proceed verbally, as when men contend for their opinions; and vying may be indicated by any expression of the wish to put one's self in a state of competition with another; as persons vie with each other in the grandeur of their houses or equipages.

They both seemed to vie with each other in holding out a brilliant example to the rest of the fleet. CLARKE.

Contend may be used in a moral application, as to contend with difficulties; and vie may be used figuratively, as one flower may be said to vie with another in the beauty of its colors.

One of the most alarming evils with which he had to contend was intestine dissension. BUSEY.

Shall a form
Of elemental dross, of mould'ring clay,
Vie with these charms imperial? MASON.

STRONG, ROBUST, STURDY.

STRONG is in all probability a variation of strict, which is in German strenge, because strength is altogether derived from the close texture of bodies. ROBUST, in Latin robustus, from robur, signifies literally having the strength of oak. STURDY, like the word stout, steady (v. Firm), comes in all probability from stehen, to stand, signifying capable of standing.

Strong is here the generic term; the others are specific, or specify strength under different circumstances; robust is a positive and high degree of strength arising from a peculiar bodily make. A man may be strong from the strength of his constitution, from the power which is inherent in his frame; but a robust man has strength both from the size and texture of his body, he has a bone and nerve which is endowed with great power. A little man may be strong, although not robust; a tall, stout man, in full health, may be termed robust. A man may be strong in one part of his body and not in another; he may be stronger at one time, from particular circumstances, than he is at another: but a robust man is strong

In his whole body; and, as he is robust by nature, he will cease to be so only from disease.

If thou hast strength, 'twas Heaven that strength bestow'd. POPE.

The huntsman, ever gay, robust, and bold,
Defies the noxious vapor. SOMERVILLE.

Sturdiness lies both in the make of the body and the temper of the mind: a sturdy man is capable of making resistance, and ready to make it; he must be naturally strong, and not of slender make, but he need not be robust: a sturdy peasant presents us with a man who, both by nature and habit, is formed for withstanding the inroads of an enemy.

This must be done, and I would fain see
Mortal so sturdy as to gainsay. HUDIBRAS.

Things as well as persons may be said to be strong, as opposed to the weak; as a strong rope, a strong staff: robust and sturdy are only said of persons, or things personal; as a robust make, a robust habit; a sturdy air, a sturdy stroke.

Full on the ankle fell the ponderous stone,
Burst the strong nerves and crush'd the solid bone. POPE.

Beef may confer robustness on my son's limbs,
but will debilitate his mind. ARBUTHNOT.

Beneath their sturdy strokes the billows roar.
DRYDEN.

STUPID, DULL.

STUPID, in Latin stupidus, from stupere, to be amazed or bewildered, expresses an amazement which is equivalent to a deprivation of understanding: DULL is connected with the German toll and Swedish stolig, mad, and the Latin stultus, simple or foolish, and denotes a simple deficiency. Stupidity in its proper sense is natural to a man, although a particular circumstance may have a similar effect upon the understanding; he who is questioned in the presence of others may appear very stupid in that which is otherwise very familiar to him. Dull is an incidental quality, arising principally from the state of the animal spirits: a writer may sometimes be dull who is otherwise vivacious and pointed; a person may be dull in a large circle, while he is very lively in private intercourse.

A stupid butt is only fit for the conversation of ordinary people. ADDISON.

It is the great advantage of a trading nation that there are very few in it so dull and heavy who may not be placed in stations of life which may give them an opportunity of making their fortunes. ADDISON.

SUAVITY, URBANITY.

SUAVITY is literally sweetness; and URBANITY the refinement of the city, in distinction from the country: inasmuch, therefore, as a polite education tends to soften the mind and the manners, it produces suavity; but suavity may sometimes arise from natural temper, and exist, therefore, without urbanity; although there cannot be urbanity without suavity. By the suavity of our manners we gain the love of those around us; by the urbanity of our manners we render ourselves agreeable companions: hence also arises another distinction, that the term suavity may be applied to other things, as the voice, or the style; but urbanity to manners only.

The suavity of Menander's style might be more to Plutarch's taste than the irregular sublimity of Aristophanes. CUMERLAND.

The virtue called urbanity by the moralists, or a courtly behavior, consists in a desire to please the company. POPE.

SUBJECT, LIABLE, EXPOSED, OBNOXIOUS.

SUBJECT, in Latin subjectus, participle of subjicio, to cast under, signifies thrown underneath. LIABLE, compounded of lie and able, signifies ready to lie near or lie under. EXPOSED, in Latin expositus, participle of expono, compounded of ex and pono, signifies set out, set within the view or reach. OBNOXIOUS, in Latin obnoxius, compounded of ob and noxium, mischief, signifies in the way of mischief.

All these terms are applied to those circumstances in human life by which we are affected independently of our own choice. Direct necessity is included in the term subject; whatever we are obliged to suffer, that we are subject to; we may apply remedies to remove the evil, but often in vain: liable conveys more the idea of casualties; we may suffer that which we are liable to, but we may also escape the evil if we are careful: exposed conveys the idea of a passive state, into which we may be brought either through our own means or through the instrumentalities of others; we are exposed to that which we are not in a condition to keep off from ourselves; it is frequently not in our power to guard against the evil: obnoxious signifies properly exposed to the mischief of anything; as obnoxious to the multitude, that is, exposed to their resentment: a person may avoid bringing himself into this state, but he cannot avoid the consequences which will ensue from being thus involved. We are subject to disease, or subject to death; this is the irrevocable law of our nature: tender people are liable to catch cold; all persons are liable to make mistakes: a person is exposed to insults who provokes the anger of a low-bred man: a minister sometimes renders himself obnoxious to the people.

When we see our enemies and friends gliding away before us, let us not forget that we are all subject to the general law of mortality.

JOHNSON.

The sinner is not only liable to that disappointment of success which so often frustrates all the designs of men, but liable to a disappointment still more cruel, of being successful and miserable at once.

BLAIR.

On the bare earth expos'd he lies,
With not a friend to close his eyes.

DRYDEN.

On the death of Lord Coventry, his loss was more visible and manifest in his successor, a man extremely obnoxious to the people on the subject of ship-money.

CLARENDON.

Subject, liable, and exposed may be applied to things as well as persons, with a similar distinction: things are subject by nature, as subject to decay; liable by accident, as liable to be broken; exposed by situation, or for want of protection, as exposed to the cutting winds. Obnoxious is said only of persons, or that which is personal.

The devout man aspires after some principles of more perfect felicity, which shall not be subject to change or decay.

BLAIR.

The having two eyes might thus be said to be rather an inconvenience than a benefit; since one eye would answer the purpose of sight as well as two, and be less liable to illusion. But it is otherwise.

GOLDSMITH.

The Spaniard's design by this allegory was to show the many assaults to which the life of man is exposed.

ADDISON.

And much he blames the softness of his mind,
Obnoxious to the charms of woman-kind.

DRYDEN.

To subject and expose, as verbs, are taken in the same sense: a person sub- jects himself to impertinent freedoms by descending to indecent familiarities with his inferiors; he exposes himself to the derision of his equals by an affectation of superiority.

These feudal services being almost entirely arbitrary, subjected the tenants to many vexations.

ADAM SMITH.

The ancient Grecians seemed to have treated the bodies of their dead enemies in a very indecent manner, exposing them to scorn and ignominy.

POTTER.

SUBJECT, SUBORDINATE, INFERIOR, SUBSERVIENT.

SUBJECT, v. Subject. SUBORDINATE, compounded of sub and order, signifies to be in an order that is under others. INFERIOR, in Latin inferior, comparative of inferus, low, which probably comes from infero, to cast into, because inferiors are cast into places that are low. SUBSERVIENT, compounded of sub and servio, signifies serving under something else.

These terms may either express the relation of persons to persons or things, or of things to things. Subject in the first case respects the exercise of power; subordinate is said of the station and office; inferior, either of a man's outward circumstances, or of his merits and qualifications; subservient, of one's relative services to another, but always in a bad sense. According to the law of nature, a child should be subject to his parents: according to the law of God and man, he must be subject to his prince: the good order of society cannot be right-ly maintained unless there be some to act in a subordinate capacity: men of inferior talent have a part to act which, in the aggregate, is of no less importance than that which is sustained by men of the highest endowments: men of no principle or character will be most subservient to the base purposes of those who pay them best. It is the part of the prince to protect the subject, and of the subject to love and honor the prince: it is the part of the exalted to treat the subordinate with indulgence, and of the latter to show respect to those under whom they are placed: it is the part of the superior to instruct, assist, and encourage the inferior; it is the part of the latter to be willing to learn, ready to obey, and prompt to execute. It is not necessary for any one to act the degrading part of being subservient to another.

Contemplate the world as subject to the Divine dominion. BLAIR.

Whether dark presages of the night proceed from any latent power of the soul during her abstraction, or from any operation of subordinate spirits, has been a matter of dispute. ADDISON.

A great person gets more by obliging his inferior than disdaining him. SOUTH.

Wicked spirits may by their cunning carry farther on a seeming confederacy or subserviency to the designs of a good angel. DRYDEN.

In the second instance subject has the same sense as in the preceding article (v. Subject), when taken in the relation of things to things; subordinate designates the degree of relative importance between things; inferior designates every circumstance which can render things comparatively higher or lower; subservient designates the relative utility of things under certain circumstances, but not always in the bad sense. All things in this world are subject to change; matters of subordinate consideration ought to be entirely set out of the question when any grand object is to be obtained: things of inferior value must necessarily sell for an inferior price: there is nothing so insignificant but it may be made subservient to some purpose.

Those countries where there are volcanoes are most subject to earthquakes. GOLDSMITH.

The idea of pain in its highest degree is much stronger than the highest degree of pleasure, and preserves the same superiority through all the subordinate gradations. BURKE.

I can myself remember the time when in respect of music our reigning taste was in many degrees inferior to the French. SHAFESBURY.

Though a writer may be wrong himself, he may chance to make his errors subservient to the cause of truth. BURKE.

TO SUBJECT, SUBJUGATE, SUBDUE.

SUBJECT signifies to make subject. SUBJUGATE, from jugum, a yoke, signifies to bring under the yoke. SUBDUE, v. To conquer.

Subject is here the generic, the two others specific terms: we may subject either individuals or nations; but we subjugate only nations. We subject ourselves to reproof, to inconvenience, or to the influence of our passions; one nation subjugates another: subjugate and subdue are both employed with regard to nations that are compelled to submit to the conqueror: but subjugate expresses even more than subdue, for it implies to bring into a state of permanent submission; whereas to subdue may be only a nominal and temporary subjection: Cæsar subjugated the Gauls, for he made them subjects to the Roman empire; but Alexander subdued the Indian nations, who revolted after his departure.

Where there is no awe, there will be no subjection. SOUTH.

O fav'rite virgin, that hast warm'd the breast Whose sov'reign dictates subjugate the east. PRIOR.

Thy son (nor is th' appointed season far) In Italy shall wage successful war, Till, after every foe subdu'd, the sun Thrice through the signs his annual race shall run. DRYDEN.

TO SUBSIDE, ABATE, INTERMIT.

SUBSIDE, from the Latin sub and sedeo, signifies to settle to the bottom. ABATE, v. Abate. INTERMIT, from the Latin inter and mitto, signifies to leave a space or interval between.

A settlement after agitation is the peculiar meaning of subside. That which has been put into commotion subsides: heavy particles subside in a fluid that is at rest, and tumults are said to subside: a diminution of strength characterizes the meaning of abate; that which has been high in action may abate; the rain abates after it has been heavy; and a man's anger abates: alternate action and rest is implied in the word intermit; whatever is in action may sometimes cease from action; labor without intermission is out of the power of man.

It was not long before this joy subsided in the remembrance of that dignity from which I had fallen. HAWKSWORTH.

But first to Heav'n thy due devotions pay, And annual gifts on Ceres' altar lay, When winter's rage abates. DRYDEN.

Whether the time of intermission be spent in company or in solitude, the understanding is abstracted from the object of inquiry. JOHNSON.

SUBSTANTIAL, SOLID.

SUBSTANTIAL signifies having a substance: SOLID, from solum, the ground, signifies having a firm foundation. The substantial is opposed to that which is thin and has no consistency: the solid is opposed to the liquid, or that which is of loose consistency. All objects which admit of being handled are in their nature substantial; those which are of so hard a texture as to require to be cut are solid. Substantial food is that which has a consistency in itself, and is capable of giving fulness to the empty stomach: solid food is meat in distinction from drink: so substantial beings are such as consist of flesh and blood, and may be touched, in distinction from those which are airy or spiritual; the earth is solid which is so hardened as not to yield to pressure.

Melancholy spectres visit the ruins of monasteries, and frequent the solitary dwellings of the dead. They pass and repass in unsubstantial images along the forsaken galleries. HARRYE.

A bank was thrown about its rising ground, and, being thus defended from the incursions of the sea, it became firm and solid. GOLDSMITH.

So in the moral application, the substantial is opposed to that which exists in the mind only, and which is frequently fictitious; as a substantial benefit, as distinguished from that which gratifies the mind: the solid is that which rests on reason, and has the properties of durability and reality, as a solid reputation.

Trusting in its own native and substantial worth, Scorns all meretricious ornaments. MILTON.

As the swain columns of ascending smoke,
So solid swells thy grandeur, plummy man. YOUNG.

SUCCESSION, SERIES, ORDER.

SUCCESSION, signifying the act or state of succeeding (v. To follow), is a matter of necessity or casualty: things succeed each other, or they are taken in succession either arbitrarily or by design: the SERIES (v. Series) is a connected succession: the ORDER (v. To place), the ordered or arranged succession. We observe the succession of events as a matter of curiosity; we trace the series of events as a matter of intelligence; we follow the order which the historian has pursued as a matter of judgment: the succession may be slow or quick; the series may be long or short; the order may be correct or incorrect. The present age has afforded a quick succession of events, and presented us with a series of atrocious attempts to disturb the peace of society under the name of liberty. The historian of these times needs only pursue the order which the events themselves point out.

We can conceive of time only by the succession of ideas one to another. HAWKSWORTH.

A number of distinct fables may contain all the topics of moral instruction; yet each must be remembered by a distinct effort of the mind, and will not recur in a series because they have no connection with each other. HAWKSWORTH.

In all verse, however familiar and easy, the words are necessarily thrown out of the order in which they are commonly used.

HAWKSWORTH.

SUCCESSIVE, ALTERNATE.

WHAT is SUCCESSIVE follows directly; what is ALTERNATE follows indirectly. A minister preaches successively who preaches every Sunday uninterruptedly at the same hour; but he preaches alternately if he preaches on one Sunday in the morning, and the other Sunday in the afternoon at the same place. The successive may be accidental or intentional; the alternate is always intentional; it may rain for three successive days, or a fair may be held for three successive days: trees are placed sometimes in alternate order, when every other tree is of the same size and kind.

Like leaves on trees, the race of men is found,
Now green in youth, now withering on the ground;

Another race the following spring supplies,
They fall successive, and successive rise. POPE.

The way of singing the psalms alternately, was when the congregation, dividing themselves into two parts, repeated the psalms by courses, verse for verse. BINGHAM.

TO SUFFOCATE, STIFLE, SMOTHER, CHOKE.

SUFFOCATE, in Latin suffocatus, participle of suffoco, compounded of sub and fax, signifies to constrain or tighten the throat. STIFLE is a frequentative of stuff, that is, to stuff excessively. SMOTHER is a frequentative of smoke. CHOKE is probably a variation of choek, in Saxon ceac, because strangulation is effected by a compression of the throat under the cheek-bone.

These terms express the act of stopping the breath, but under various circumstances and by various means; suffocation is produced by every kind of means, external or internal, and is therefore the most general of these terms; stifling proceeds by internal means, that is, by the admission of foreign bodies into the passages which lead to the respiratory organs: we may be suffocated by excluding the air externally, as by gagging, confining closely, or pressing violently: we may be suffocated or stified by means of vapors, close air, or smoke. To smother is to suffocate by the exclusion of air externally, as by means of any substance with which one is covered or surrounded; as smoke, dust, and the like: to choke is a mode of stifing by means of large bodies, as by a piece of food lodging in the throat.

A suffocating wind the pilgrim smites
With instant death. THOMSON.

Had the wind driven in our faces we had been in no small danger of stifing by sulphur. BERKELEY.

Many of them have crammed great quantities
of scandal down his throat, others have choked
him with lewdness and ribaldry. SOUTH.

The helpless traveller with wild surprise
Sees the dry desert all around him rise,
And, smothered in the dusty whirlwind, dies.
ADDISON.

To choke, in an extended and figurative sense, is to interrupt the action of any body by the intervention of any foreign substance, as a garden is choked with weeds; to stife is altogether to put a stop or end to a thing by keeping it down; as to stife resentment, sighs, etc.: to smother is to choke or prevent free action by covering or surrounding, as good resolutions are smothered by unruly desires or appetites.

Avarice, like some choking weed, teaches the finger to gripe and the hand to oppress.
HARVEY.

When my heart was ready with a sigh to cleave,
I have, with mighty anguish of my soul,
Just at the birth stified this still-born sigh.
SHAKESPEARE.

The love of jealous men breaks out furiously
(when the object of their loves is taken from them), and throws off all mixtures of suspicion which choked and smothered it before.
ADDISON.

SUPERFICIAL, SHALLOW, FLIMSY.

THE SUPERFICIAL is that which lies only at the surface; it is therefore by implication the same as the SHALLOW, which has nothing underneath: shallow being a variation of hollow or empty. Hence a person may be called either superficial or shallow, to indicate that he has not a profundity of knowledge; but, otherwise, superficiality is applied to the exercise of the thinking faculty, and shallowness to its extent. Men of free sentiments are superficial thinkers, although they may not have understandings more shallow than others. Superficial and shallow are applicable to things as well as persons: FLIMSY is applicable to things only. Flimsy most probably comes from flame, that is, flamy, showy, easily seen through. In the proper sense we may speak of giving a superficial covering of paint or color to a body; of a river or piece of water being shallow; of cotton or cloth being flimsy.

It cannot have any extensive, or, if I may so call it, a superficial spread, for then the country would be quickly undermined. GOLDSMITH.

The water in those places is found to grow more shallow. GOLDSMITH.

Those flimsy webs that break as soon as wrought. COWPER.

In the improper sense, a survey or a glance may be superficial which does not extend beyond the superficies of things; a conversation or a discourse may be shallow which does not contain a body of sentiment; and a work or performance may be flimsy which has nothing solid in it to engage the attention.

By much labor we acquire a superficial acquaintance with a few sensible objects. BLAIR.
I know thee to thy bottom; from within
Thy shallow centre to the utmost skin.
DRYDEN.

Proud of a vast extent of flimsy lines. POPE.

SURFACE, SUPERFICIES.

SURFACE, compounded of sur, for super, and face, is a variation of the Latin term SUPERFICIES; and yet they have acquired this distinction, that the former is the vulgar, and the latter the scientific term; of course the former has a more indefinite and general application than the latter. A surface is either even or uneven, smooth or rough; but the mathematician always conceives of a plane superficies on which he founds his operations.

Nor to the surface of enlivened earth,
Graceful with hills and dales and leafy woods,
Her liberal tresses, is thy force confined.
THOMSON.

There is neither a straight line nor an exact superficies in all nature. GOLDSMITH.

Surface, in its moral application, is extended to whatever presents itself first to the mind of the observer.

Errors like straws upon the surface flow,
He who would search for pearls must dive below.
DRYDEN.

Superficies may be applied in its proper and definite sense to other objects than those which relate to science.

Those who have undertaken the task of reconciling mankind to their present state frequently remind us that we view only the superficies of life.
JOHNSON.

TO SURROUND, ENCOMPASS, ENVIRON, ENCIRCLE.

SURROUND, in old French surrounder, signifies, by means of the intensive syllable sur, over, to go all round. ENCOMPASS, compounded of en or in and compass, signifies to bring within a certain compass formed by a circle; so likewise ENVIRON, from the Latin gyrus, and the Greek γυρος, a circle, and also ENCIRCLE, signify to bring within a circle.

Surround is the most literal and general of all these terms, which signify to enclose any object either directly or indirectly. We may surround an object by standing at certain distances all round it; in this manner a person may be surrounded by other persons, and a house surrounded with trees, or an object may be surrounded by enclosing it in every direction, and at every point; in this manner a garden is surrounded by a wall. To encompass is to surround in the latter sense, and applies to objects of a great or indefinite extent: the earth is encompassed by the air, which we term the atmosphere; towns are encompassed by walls. To surround is to go round an object of any form, whether square or circular, long or short; but to environ and to encircle carry with them the idea of forming a circle round an object; thus a town or a valley may be enviored by hills, a basin of water may be encircled by trees, or the head may be encircled by a wreath of flowers.

But not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of ev'n or morn,
But cloud instead, and ever-during dark
Surrounds me.
MILTON.

Where Orpheus on his lyre laments his love,
With beasts encompass'd, and a dancing grove.
DRYDEN.

Of fighting elements, on all sides round
Environ'd.
MILTON.

As in the hollow breast of Apennine,
Beneath the shelter of encircling hills,
A myrtle rises, far from human eye,
So flourish'd, blooming, and unseen by all,
The sweet Lavinia.
THOMSON.

In an extended or moral sense we are said to be surrounded by objects which are in great numbers and in different directions about us: thus a person living in a particular spot where he has many friends may say he is surrounded by his friends, or enviored by objects in such manner that he cannot escape from them; so likewise a particular person may say that he is surrounded by dangers and difficulties: but, in speaking of man in a general sense, we should rather say he is encompassed by dangers, which expresses in a much stronger manner our peculiarly exposed condition.

Behold surrounding kings their pow'r combine,
And one capitulate, and one resign.
JOHNSON.
Ah! what is life? With ill encompass'd round,
Amidst our hope fate strikes the sudden wound.
GAY.

TO SUSTAIN, SUPPORT, MAINTAIN.

SUSTAIN, compounded of sus or sub and teneo, to hold, signifies to hold or keep up. SUPPORT, v. To countenance. MAINTAIN, v. To assert.

The idea of keeping up or preventing from falling is common to these terms, which vary either in the mode or object of the action. To sustain and support are frequently passive, maintain is always active. To sustain and support both imply the bearing or receiving the weight of any object, the former in reference to any great weight, the latter to any weight however small.

With labor spent, no longer can be wield
The heavy falchion, or sustain the shield,
O'erwhelm'd with darts.
DRYDEN.
Stooping to support each flower of tender stalk.
MILTON.

Sustain and support may also imply an active exercise of power or means which bring them still nearer to maintain; in this case sustain is an act of the highest power, support of any ordinary power.

The Lord of all, himself through all diffus'd,
Sustains, and is the life of all that lives.
COWPER.

He was a great lover of his country, and of his religion and justice, which he believed would only support it. CLARENDON.

So in bearing up against any opposing force; but support is here an act for the benefit of others; maintain is an act for one's own benefit: as to sustain a shock; to support one another in battle; to maintain one's self in a contest.

Their whole body amounted to but one thousand men, and these were to sustain the shock of an enemy nearly ten times their number. GOLDSMITH.

Mutual interest induced them (the burghers) to support the king, and the king to support them against the lords. ADAM SMITH.

As compass'd with a wood of spears around,
The lordly lion still maintains his ground,
So Turnus fares. DRYDEN.

Existence is said to be sustained under circumstances of weakness or pressure; it is supported by natural means, as the milk of the mother supports the babe; or indirectly by what supplies the means, as to support one's family by labor: what is maintained is upheld by pecuniary means, as to maintain a family, a fleet, etc.

The weakness of age and infancy was sustained by his bounty. JOHNSON.

Toward any who needed support or encouragement, though unknown, if fairly recommended, he was liberal. CLARENDON.

The fleet equipped at Athens was maintained after the manner prescribed by Themistocles till the time of Demosthenes. POTTER.

In the moral application, what presses on the mind is sustained, or supported, with the like distinction: grievous losses or injuries are sustained; afflictions and disappointments supported.

Wrong he sustains with temper, looks on heav'n,
Nor stoops to think his injurer his foe. YOUNG.

When he beheld them melted into tears, he himself appeared quite unmoved, inwardly supported and comforted in that hour of agony. GOLDSMITH.

Things are supported and maintained voluntarily; the former in respect to what is foreign to us, as to support an assumed character, the latter in respect to what belongs to us, as to maintain one's own character.

Ireland was judged to be the proper theatre to support his assumed character. GOLDSMITH.

God values no man more or less in placing him high and low, but every one as he maintains his post. SOUTH.

SYMMETRY, PROPORTION.

SYMMETRY, in Latin symmetria, Greek συμμετρία, from συμ and μετρον, signifies a measure that accords. PROPORTION, in Latin proportio, compounded of pro and portio, signifies every portion or part according with the other, or with the whole.

The signification of these terms is obviously the same, namely, a due admeasurement of the parts to each other and to the whole: but symmetry has now acquired but a partial application to the human body, or to things nicely fitting each other; and proportion is applied to everything which admits of dimensions, and an adaptation of the parts: hence we speak of symmetry of feature; but proportion of limbs, the proportion of the head to the body.

Sensual delights in enlarged minds give way to the sublimer pleasures of reason, which discover the causes and designs, the frame, connection, and symmetry of things. BERKELEY.

The inventors of stuffed hips had a better eye for due proportion than to add to a redundancy, because in some cases it was convenient to fill up a vacuum. CUMBERLAND.

SYMPATHY, COMPASSION, COMMISERATION, CONDOLENCE.

SYMPATHY, from the Greek συμ or συν, with, and παθος, feeling, has the literal meaning of fellow-feeling, that is, a kindred or like feeling, or feeling in company with another. COMPASSION (v. Pity); COMMISERATION, from the Latin com and miseria, misery; CONDOLENCE, from the Latin con and doleo, to grieve, signify a like suffering, or a suffering in company. Hence it is obvious that, according to the derivation of the words, the sympathy may either be said of pleasure or pain, the rest only of that which is painful. Sympathy preserves its original meaning in its application, for we laugh or cry by sympathy; this may, however, be only a merely physical operation.

You are not young, no more am I; go to, then, there's sympathy: you are merry, so am I: ha! ha! then there's more sympathy. SHAKESPEARE.

Compassion is altogether a moral feeling, which makes us enter into the distresses of others: we may, therefore, sympathize with others, without essentially serving them; but, if we feel compassion, we naturally turn our thoughts toward relieving them.

Their countrymen were particularly attentive to their story, and sympathised with these heroes in all their adventures. ADDISON.

'Mongst those whom honest lives can recommend, Our justice more compassion should extend. DENHAM.

Sympathy, indeed, may sometimes be taken for a secret alliance or kindred feeling between two objects.

Or sympathy, or some connatural force, Powerful at greatest distance to unite With secret amity, things of like kind By secretest conveyance. MILTON.

That mind and body often sympathise Is plain: such is this union nature ties. JENYNS.

Compassion is awakened by any sort of suffering, but particularly those which are attributable to our misfortunes; commiseration is awakened by sufferings arising from our faults; condolence is awakened by the troubles of life, to which all are equally liable. Poverty and want excite our compassion; we endeavor to relieve them: a poor criminal suffering the penalty of the law excites our commiseration; we endeavor, if possible, to mitigate his punishment: the loss which a friend sustains produces condolence; we take the best means of testifying it to him.

I am very sorry that her Majesty did not see this assembly of objects, so proper to excite that charity and compassion which she bears to every one who stands in need of it. ADDISON.

Her lowly plight Immovable, till peace, obtained from fault Acknowledg'd and deplored, in Adam wrought Commiseration. MILTON.

Rather than all must suffer, some must die, Yet nature must condole their misery. DENHAM.

Compassion is the sentiment of one mortal toward another; commiseration is represented as the feeling which our wretchedness excites in the Supreme Being. Compassion may be awakened in persons of any condition; commiseration is awakened toward those who are in an abject state of misery; condolence supposes an entire equality, and is often produced by some common calamity.

The good-natured man is apt to be moved with compassion for those misfortunes and infirmities which another would turn into ridicule. ADDISON.

Then must we those who groan beneath the weight

Of age, disease, or want, commiserate? DENHAM.

Why should I think that all that devout multitude which so lately cried Hosanna in the streets, did not also bear their part in those public condolings (in the crucifixion of our Saviour)? HALL.

SYSTEM, METHOD.

SYSTEM, in Latin systema, Greek συστημα, from συστημι, or συν and ιστημι, to stand together, signifies that which is put together so as to form a whole. METHOD, in Latin methodus, from the Greek μετα and οδος, a way by which anything is effected.

System expresses more than method, which is but a part of system: system is an arrangement of many single or individual objects according to some given rule, so as to make them coalesce; method is the manner of this arrangement, or the principle upon which this arrangement takes place. The term system, however, applies to a complexity of objects; but arrangement, and consequently method, may be applied to everything that is to be put into execution. All sciences must be reduced to system; and without system there is no science: all business requires method; and without method little can be done to any good purpose.

If a better system's thine, Impart it frankly, or make use of mine. FRANCIS.

The great defect of the Seasons is the want of method, but for this I know not that there was any remedy. JOHNSON.

T.

TO TAKE, RECEIVE, ACCEPT.

TAKE, from the Latin tactum, participle of tango, is as much as to get into one's possession by touching or laying hands on it. RECEIVE, in French recevoir, Latin recipio, from re and cipio, signifies to take back; and ACCEPT, from ac or ad and cipio, signifies to take for a special purpose.

To take is the general term, receive and accept are modes of taking. To take is an unqualified action; we take whatever comes in the way; we receive only that which is offered or sent: we take a book from a table; we receive a parcel which has been sent; we take either with or without consent; we receive with the consent, or according to the wishes, of another: a robber takes money from a traveller; a person receives a letter from a friend.

Each takes his seat, and each receives his share.
POPE.

To receive is frequently a passive act; whatever is offered or done to another is received; but to accept is an act of choice: many things, therefore, may be received which cannot be accepted; as a person receives a blow or an insult: so in an engagement one may be said to receive the enemy, who is ready to receive his attack; on the other hand, we accept apologies.

Till, seiz'd with shame, they wheel about and face,
Receives their foes, and raise a threatening cry;
The Tuscans take their turn to fear and fly.

DRYDEN.

She accepted my apology, and we are again reconciled.
BRYDENE.

Some things are both received and accepted, but with the same distinction. What is given as a present may be both received and accepted, but the inferior receives and the superior accepts. What is received comes to a person either by indirect means, or, if by direct means, it comes as a matter of right; but what is accepted is a matter of favor either on the part of the giver or receiver. Rent in law may be both received and accepted; it is received when it is due from the tenant, but it is accepted if it be received from a tenant after he has broken his contract with his landlord. A challenge may be received contrary to the wishes of the receiver, but it rests with himself whether he will accept it or not.

Unransom'd here receives the spotless fair,
Accept the hecatomb the Greeks prepare. POPE.

Animals and things, as well as persons, may take; things may receive; but persons only accept. An animal may take what is offered to it; things take whatever attaches to them, but they receive that which by an express effort is given to them. The chameleon is said to take its hue from the surrounding objects; marble receives its polish from the hands of the workman.

The sapless wood, divested of the bark,
Grows fungous, and takes fire at every spark.
COWPER.

The soft setttee, one elbow at each end,
And in the midst an elbow it receiv'd,
United, yet divided. COWPER.

TALKATIVE, LOQUACIOUS, GARRULOUS.

TALKATIVE implies ready or prone to talk (v. To speak). LOQUACIOUS, from loquor, to speak or talk, has the same original meaning. GARRULOUS, in Latin garrulus, from garris, to blab, signifies prone to tell or make known.

These reproachful epithets differ principally in the degree. To talk is allowable, and consequently it is not altogether so unbecoming to be occasionally talkative; but loquacity, which implies an immoderate propensity to talk, is always bad, whether springing from affectation or an idle temper: and garrulity, which arises from the excessive desire of communicating, is a failing that is pardonable only in the aged, who have generally much to tell.

Every absurdity has a champion to defend it;
for error is always talkative. GOLDSMITH.

Thersites only clamor'd in the throng,
Loquacious, loud, and turbulent of tongue.

POPE.

Pleas'd with that social sweet garrulity,
The poor disbanded vet'ran's sole delight.
SOMERVILLE.

TASTE, FLAVOR, RELISH, SAVOR.

TASTE comes from the Teutonic tasten, to touch lightly, and signifies either the organ which is easily affected, or the act of discriminating by a light touch of the organ, or the quality of the object which affects the organ; in this latter sense it is closely allied to the other terms. FLAVOR most probably comes from the Latin flō, to breathe, signifying the rarefied essence of bodies which affect the organ of taste. RELISH is derived by Minshew from relēcher, to lick again, signifying that which pleases the palate so as to tempt to a renewal of the act of tasting. SAVOR, in Latin sapor and sapio, to smell, taste, or be sensible, most probably comes from the Hebrew sapah, the mouth or palate, which is the organ of taste.

Taste is the most general and indefinite of all these; it is applicable to every object that can be applied to the organ of taste, and to every degree and manner in which the organ can be affected: some things are tasteless, other things have a strong taste, and others a mixed taste. The flavor is the predominating taste, and consequently is applied to such objects as may have a different kind or degree of taste; an apple may not only have the general taste of apple, but also a flavor peculiar to itself; the flavor is commonly said of that which is good; as a fine flavor, a delicious flavor; but it may designate that which is not always agreeable; as the flavor of fish, which is unpleasant in things that do not admit of such a taste. The relish is also a particular taste; but it is that which is artificial, in distinction from the flavor, which may be the natural property. We find the flavor such as it is; we give the relish such as it should be, or we wish it to be: milk and butter receive a flavor from the nature of the food with which the cow is supplied: sauces are used in order to give a relish to the food that is dressed with them.

What order so contriv'd as not to mix
Tastes not well join'd? MILTON.

Every person remembers how great a pleasure he found in sweets while a child; but his taste growing more obtuse with age, he is obliged to use artificial means to excite it. It is then he is found to call in relishes of salts and aromatics.

GOLDSMITH.

The Philippic islands give a flavor to our European bowls. ADDISON.

Savor is a term in less frequent use than the others, but, agreeable to the Latin derivation, it is employed to designate that which smells as well as tastes, a sweet-smelling savor; so likewise, in the moral application, a man's actions or expressions may be said to savor of vanity.

The pleasant savory smell
So quicken'd appetite, that I methought
Could not but taste. MILTON.

Taste and relish may be, moreover, compared as the act or power of tasting or relishing: we taste whatever affects our taste; but we relish that only which pleases our taste: we taste fruits in order to determine whether they are good or bad; we relish fruits as a dessert, or at certain seasons of the day.

When the tongue and the thing to be tasted are extremely dry, no taste ensues. GOLDSMITH.

Were men born with those advantages which they possess by industry, they would probably enjoy them with a blunter relish. GOLDSMITH.

So in the extended or moral application, they are distinguished in the same manner.

Ten thousand thousand precious gifts
My daily thanks employ;
Nor is the least a cheerful heart,
That tastes those gifts with joy. ADDISON.

I love the people,
But do not like to stage me to their eyes,
Though it do well, I do not relish well
Their loud applause. SHAKESPEARE.

TASTE, GENIUS.

TASTE, in all probability from the Latin tactum and tango, to touch, seems to designate the capacity to derive pleasure from an object: GENIUS designates the power we have for accomplishing any object. He who derives particular pleasure from music may be said to have a taste for music; he who makes very great proficiency in the theory and practice of music may be said to have a genius for it. It is obvious, therefore, that we may have a taste without having genius; but it would not be possible to have genius for a thing without having a taste for it: for nothing can so effectually give a taste for any accomplishment as the capacity to learn it, and the susceptibility of all its beauties, which circumstances are inseparable from genius.

The cause of a wrong taste is a defect of judgment. BURKE.

Taste consists in the power of judging, genius in the power of executing. BLACK.

TAX, DUTY, CUSTOM, TOLL, IMPOST, TRIBUTE, CONTRIBUTION.

THE idea of something given by the people to the government is expressed by all these terms. TAX, in French taxe, Latin taxo, from the Greek ραίσω, raîsô, to dispose or put in order, signifies what is disposed in order for each to pay. CUSTOM signifies that which is given under certain circumstances, according to custom. DUTY signifies that which is given as a due or debt. TOLL, in Saxon toll, etc., Latin telonium, Greek τελος, a custom, signifies a particular kind of custom or due.

Tax is the most general of these terms,

and applies to or implies whatever is paid by the people to the government, according to a certain estimate: the customs are a species of tax which are less specific than other taxes, being regulated by custom rather than any definite law; the customs apply particularly to what was customarily given by merchants for the goods which they imported from abroad: the duty is a species of tax more positive and binding than the custom, being a specific estimate of what is due upon goods, according to their value; hence it is not only applied to goods that are imported, but also to many other articles inland: toll is that species of tax which serves for the repair of roads and havens, or the liberty to buy or sell at fairs or other places.

The remission of a debt, the taking off a duty, the giving up a tax, the mending a port, or the making a highway, were not looked upon as improper subjects for a coin. ADDISON.

Strabo tells us that Britain bore heavy taxes, especially the customs on the importation of the Gallic trade. ARBUTHNOT.

The same Prusias joined with the Rhodians against the Byzantines, and stopped them from levying the toll on their trade in the Euxine. ARBUTHNOT.

The preceding terms refer to that which is levied by authority on the people; but they do not directly express the idea of levying or paying: IMPOST, on the contrary, signifies literally that which is imposed; and TRIBUTE that which is paid or yielded; the former, therefore, exclude that idea of coercion which is included in the latter. The tax is levied by the consent of many; the impost is imposed by the will of one; and the tribute is paid at the demand of one or a few: the tax serves for the support of the nation; the impost and the tribute serve to enrich a government. Conquerors lay heavy imposts upon the conquered countries; distant provinces pay a tribute to the princes to whom they owe allegiance. CONTRIBUTION signifies the tribute of many in unison, or for the same end; in this general sense it includes all the other terms; for taxes and imposts are alike paid by many for the same purpose; but, as the predominant idea in contribution is that of common consent, it supposes a degree of freedom in the agent which is incompatible with the exercise of authority expressed by the other terms: hence the term is with more propriety applied to those cases in which men voluntarily unite in giving toward any particular object; as charitable contributions, or contributions in support of a war; but it may be taken in the general sense of a forced payment, as in speaking of military contribution.

Taxes and imposts upon merchants seldom do any good to the king's revenue, for that that he wins in the hundred he loseth in the shire. BACON.

The Athenians having barbarously murdered Androgeus, the son of Minos, were obliged by his father to send a novennial or septennial, or, as others write an annual, tribute of seven young men. POTTER.

The Roman officers sometimes took the liberty of raising contributions of their own accord. POTTER.

These words, tax, tribute, and contribution, have an extended application to other objects besides those which are pecuniary: tax, in the sense of what is laid on without the consent of the person on whom it is imposed; tribute, that which is given to another as his due; and contribution, that which is given by one in common with others for some common object.

And levying thus, and with an easy sway,
A tax of profit from his very play. COWPER.

I pay this tribute without reluctance to the memory of that noble, reverend, learned, and excellent person. BURKE.

The English people are satisfied that the consolations of religion are as necessary as its instructions. They, too, are among the unhappy. They feel personal pain and domestic sorrow. In these they have no privilege, but are subject to pay their full contingent to the contribution levied on mortality. BURKE.

TAX, RATE, ASSESSMENT.

TAX, agreeably to the above explanation (v. Tax), and RATE, from the Latin ratulus and reor, to think or estimate, both derive their principal meaning from the valuation or proportion according to which any sum is demanded from the people; but the tax is imposed directly by the government for public purposes, as the land-tax, and the window-tax; and the rate is imposed indirectly for the local purposes of each parish, as the church-rates, and the poor-rates. The tax or rate is a general rule or ratio, by which a certain sum is raised upon a given number of persons; the ASSESSMENT is the application of that rule to the individual.

They (the French noblesse) paid also a land-tax called the twentieth penny. BURKE.

They paid the church and parish rate, And took, but read not, the receipt. PRIOR.

As to the reimbursement, and the other great objects of public credit, no doubt but that a very moderate and proportionate assessment on the citizens would have provided for all. BURKE.

TO TEASE, VEX, TAUNT, TANTALIZE, TORMENT.

TEASE is most probably a frequentative of tear. VEX, v. To displease. TAUNT is probably contracted from tantalize. TANTALIZE, v. To aggravate. TORMENT, from the Latin tormentum and torqueo, to twist, signifies to give pain by twisting or griping.

The idea of acting upon others so as to produce a painful sentiment is common to all these terms; they differ in the mode of the action, and in the degree of the effect. To tease is applied to that which is most trifling; torment to that which is most serious. We are teased by a fly that buzzes in our ears; we are vexed by the carelessness and stupidity of our servants; we are taunted by the sarcasms of others; we are tantalized by the fair prospects which only present themselves to disappear again; we are tormented by the importunities of troublesome beggars. It is the repetition of unpleasant trifles which teases; it is the crossness and perversity of persons and things which vex; it is the contemptuous and provoking behavior which taunts; it is the disappointment of awakened expectations which tantalizes; it is the repetition of grievous troubles which torments. We may be teased and tormented by that which produces bodily or mental pain; we are vexed, taunted, and tantalized only in the mind. Irritable and nervous people are most easily teased; capitious and fretful people are most easily vexed or taunted; sanguine and eager people are most easily tantalized: in all these cases the imagination or the bodily state of the individual serves to increase the pain: but persons are tormented by such things as inflict positive pain.

Louisa began to take a little mischievous pleasure in teasing. CUMBERLAND.

To hear you prate would veer a saint. GAY.
Sharp was his voice, which, in the shrillest tone,
Thus with injurious taunts attacks the throne. Pope.

When the maid (in Sparta) was once sped, she
Was not suffered to tantalize the male part of the commonwealth. ADDISON.

Truth exerting itself in the searching precepts
Of self-denial and mortification is tormenting to vicious minds. SCOTT.

TEGUMENT, COVERING.

TEGUMENT, in Latin tegumentum, from tego, to cover, is properly but another word to express the sense of COVERING, yet it is now employed in cases where the term covering is inadmissible. Covering signifies mostly that which is artificial; but tegument is employed for that which is natural: clothing is the covering for the body; the skin of vegetable substances, as seeds, is called the tegument. The covering is said of that which covers the outer surface: the tegument is said of that which covers the inner surface; the pods of some seeds are lined with a soft tegument.

In the nutmeg another tegument is the mace between the green pericarpium and the hard shell. RAY.

It is by being naked that he (man) knows the value of covering. GOLDSMITH.

TEMPERAMENT, TEMPERATURE.

TEMPERAMENT and TEMPERATURE are both used to express that state which arises from the tempering of opposite or varying qualities; the temperament is said of animal bodies, and the temperature of the atmosphere. Men of a sanguine temperament ought to be cautious in their diet; all bodies are strongly affected by the temperature of the air.

Without a proper temperament for the particular art which he studies, his utmost pains will be to no purpose. BUDGE.

Oh happy England, where there is such a rare temperature of heat and cold! HOWELL.

TEMPLE, CHURCH.

THESE words designate an edifice destined for the exercise of religion, but with collateral ideas, which sufficiently distinguish them from each other. The templum of the Latins signified originally an open, elevated spot, marked out by the augurs with their lituus, or sacred wand, whence they could best survey the heavens on all sides: the idea, therefore, of spacious, open, and elevated, enters into the meaning of this word, in the same manner as it does into that of the Hebrew word hichel, derived from hechel, which in the Arabic signifies great and lofty. The Greek ναός, from ναιω, to inhabit, signifies a dwelling-place, and, by distinction, the dwelling-place of the Almighty; in which sense the Hebrew word is also taken to denote the high and holy place where Jehovah peculiarly dwelleth, otherwise called the holy heavens, Jehovah's dwelling or resting-place; whence St. Paul calls our bodies the temples of God when the Spirit of God dwelleth in us. The Roman poets used the word templum in a similar sense.

Cœli tonitralia templa. LUCRET.
Qui templa cœli summa sonitu concretit. TERENT.
Contremuit templum magnum Jovis altitonantis. ENNIUS.

The word TEMPLE, therefore, strictly signifies a spacious open place set apart for the peculiar presence and worship of the Divine Being: it is applied with particular propriety to the sacred edifices of the Jews, but may be applied to any sacred place without distinction of religion.

Here we have no temple but the wood, no assembly but horn beasts. SHAKESPEARE.

CHURCH, in Saxon circe, German, etc., kirche, Greek κυριακός, from κύριος, a lord, signifies literally what belonged to a lord, and by Christians was applied to that which belonged to our Lord and Saviour; as the Lord's Supper, the Lord's-day; and, in a particular manner, as the Lord's House; in which sense it has been retained to the present day. A church is therefore a building consecrated to the Lord, and from the earliest periods of building churches this was done by some solemn ordinance.

That churches were consecrated unto none but the Lord only the very general name chiefly doth sufficiently point out: church doth signify no other than the Lord's House. HOOKER.

The word church has by a figure of speech been applied to any building consecrated to the service of the true God.

Truth it is, the patriarchs for a great number of years had neither temple nor church to resort unto. The cause was, they were not stayed in any place, but were in a continual peregrination and wandering that they could not conveniently build any church. BEVERIDGE.

Church, in the sense of a religious assembly, is altogether a different word, bearing no affinity to the word temple.

TEMPORARY, TRANSIENT, TRANSITORY, FLEETING.

TEMPORARY, from tempus, time, characterizes that which is intended to last only for a time, in distinction from that which is permanent; offices depending upon a state of war are temporary, in distinction from those which are connected with internal policy: TRANSIENT, that is, passing, or in the act of passing, characterizes what in its nature exists only for the moment: a glance is transient. TRANSITORY, that is, apt to pass away, characterizes everything in the world which is formed only to exist for a time, and then to pass away; thus our pleasures, and our pains, and our very being, are denominated transitory. FLEETING, which is derived from the verb to fly and flight, is but a stronger term to express the same idea as transitory.

By the force of superior principles the temporary prevalence of passions may be restrained. JOHNSON.

Any sudden diversion of the spirits, or the justling in of a transient thought, is able to deface the little images of things (in the memory). SOUTH.

Man is a transitory being. JOHNSON.

Thus when my fleeting days at last,
Unheeded, silently are past,
Calmly I shall resign my breath,
In life unknown, forgot in death. SPECTATOR.

TENACIOUS, PERTINACIOUS.

To be TENACIOUS is to hold a thing close, to let it go with reluctance: to be PERTINACIOUS is to hold it out in spite of what can be advanced against it, the prepositive syllable per having an intensive force. A man of a tenacious temper insists on trifles that are supposed to affect his importance; a pertinacious temper insists on everything which is apt to affect his opinions. Tenacity and pertinacity are both foibles, but the former is sometimes more excusable than the latter. We may be tenacious of that which is good, as when a man is tenacious of whatever may affect his honor; but we cannot be pertinacious in anything but our opinions, and that too in cases when they are least defensible. It commonly happens that people are most tenacious of being thought to possess that in which they are most deficient, and most pertinacious in maintaining that which is most absurd. A liar is tenacious of his reputation for truth: sophists, freethinkers, and sceptics are the most pertinacious objectors to whatever is established.

So tenacious are we of the old ecclesiastical modes, that very little alteration has been made in them since the fourteenth or fifteenth century; adhering to our old settled maxim, never entirely, nor at once, to depart from antiquity.

BURKE.

The most pertinacious and vehement demonstrator may be wearied in time by continual negation.

JOHNSON.

TENDENCY, DRIFT, SCOPE, AIM.

TENDENCY, from to tend, denotes the property of tending toward a certain point, which is the characteristic of all these words, but this is applied only to things; and DRIFT, from the verb to drive; SCOPE, from the Greek σκοπεῖν, maí, to look; and AIM, from the verb to aim (v. Aim), all characterize the thoughts of a person looking forward into futurity, and directing his actions to a certain point. Hence we speak of the tendency of certain principles or practices as being pernicious; the drift of a person's discourse; the scope which he gives himself either in treating of a subject, or in laying down a plan; or a person's aim to excel, or aim to supplant another, and the like. The tendency of many writings in modern times has been to unhinge the minds of men: where a person wants the services of another, whom he dares not openly solicit, he will discover his wishes by the drift of his discourse: a man of a comprehensive mind will allow himself full scope in digesting his plans for every alteration which circumstances may require when they come to be developed: our desires will naturally give a cast to all our aims; and, so long as they are but innocent, they are necessary to give a proper stimulus to exertion.

It is no wonder if a great deal of knowledge, which is not capable of making a man wise, has a natural tendency to make him vain and arrogant.

ADDISON.

This said, the whole audience soon found out his drift.

The convention was summoned in favor of Swift.

TENET, POSITION.

THE TENET is the opinion which we hold in our minds; the POSITION is that which we lay down for others. Our tenets may be hurtful, our positions false. He who gives up his tenets readily evinces an unstable mind; he who argues on a false position shows more tenacity and subtlety than good-sense. The tenets of the different denominations of Christians are scarcely to be known or distinguished; they often rest upon such trivial points: the positions which an author lays down must be very definite and clear when he wishes to build upon them any theory or system.

The occasion of Luther's being first disgusted with the tenets of the Romish Church is known to every one the least conversant with history.

ROBERTSON.

To the position of Tully, that if virtue could be seen she must be loved, may be added, that if truth could be heard, she must be obeyed.

JOHNSON.

TERM, LIMIT, BOUNDARY.

TERM, in Latin terminus, from the Greek τερμα, an end, is the point that ends, and that to which we direct our steps: LIMIT, from the Latin limex, a landmark, is the line which marks: BOUNDARY, from to bound, is the obstacle which interrupts our progress, and prevents us from passing.

We are either carried toward or away from the term; we either keep within limits, or we overstep them; we contract or extend a boundary. The term and the limit belong to the thing; by them it is ended: the boundary is that which is made or conceived by the person bounding. The term is the point that terminates; the limit is either a line or point which marks where to stop; the boundary is a line which includes a space, and points out the extent beyond which one may not pass. The Straits of Gibraltar was the term of Hercules's voyages: it was said, with more eloquence than truth, that the limits of the Roman empire were those of the world: the sea, the Alps, and the Pyrenees are the natural boundaries of France.

Then heav'd the goddess in her mighty hand
A stone, the limits of the neighboring land.

DRYDEN.

But still his native country lies
Beyond the bound'ries of the skies. COTTON.

So likewise in application to moral objects. We mostly reach the term of our prosperity when we attempt to pass the limits which Providence has assigned to human efforts: human ambition often finds a boundary set to its gratification by circumstances which were the most unlooked for, and apparently the least adapted to bring about such important results. We see the term of our evils only in the term of our life: our desires have no limits; their gratification only serves to extend our prospects indefinitely: those only are happy whose fortune is the boundary of their desires.

No term of time this union shall divide.

DRYDEN.

Corruption is a reciprocal to generation; and they two are as nature's two terms or boundaries, and the guides to life and death. BACON.

Providence has fixed the limits of human enjoyment by immovable boundaries. JOHNSON.

TERRITORY, DOMINION.

BOTH these terms respect a portion of country under a particular government; but the word TERRITORY brings to our minds the land which is included; DOMINION conveys to our minds the power which is exercised: the territory speaks of that which is in its nature bounded; dominion may be said of that which is boundless. A petty prince has his territory; the monarch of a great empire has dominions. It is the object of every ruler to guard his territory against the irruptions of an enemy; ambitious monarchs are always aiming to extend their dominions.

The conquered territory was divided among the Spanish invaders, according to rules which custom had introduced. ROBERTSON.

And, while the heroic Pyrrhus shines in arms,
Our wide dominions shall the world o'errun.

TRAPP.

THANKFULNESS, GRATITUDE.

THANKFULNESS, or a fulness of thanks, is the outward expression of a grateful feeling. GRATITUDE, from the Latin gratitudo, is the feeling itself. Our thankfulness is measured by the number of our words; our gratitude is measured by the nature of our actions. A person appears very thankful at the time who afterward proves very ungrateful. Thankfulness is the beginning of gratitude: gratitude is the completion of thankfulness.

He scarcely would give me thanks for what I had done, for fear that thankfulness might have an introduction of reward. SIDNEY.

Shall the commonness and continuance of these exceeding favors abate and enervate our gratitude, which in all reason should mainly increase and confirm it? BARROW.

THEORY, SPECULATION.

THEORY, from the Greek θεωωμαι, to behold, and SPECULATION, from the Latin speculo, to behold, are both employed to express what is seen with the mind's eye. Theory is the fruit of reflection, it serves the purposes of science; practice will be incomplete when the theory is false; speculation belongs more to the imagination; it has therefore less to do with realities: it is that which is rarely to be reduced to practice, and can therefore seldom be brought to the test of experience.

True piety without cessation to rest
By theories, the practice past is lost. DENHAM.
You were the prime object of my speculation.

HOWELL.

Hence it arises that theory is contrasted sometimes with the practice, to designate its insufficiency to render a man complete; and speculation is put for that which is fanciful and unreal: a general who is so only in theory will acquit himself miserably in the field; a religionist who is so only in speculation will make a wretched Christian.

True Christianity depends on fact;
Religion is not theory, but act. HARTZ.

It is amusing enough to trace the progress of a philosophical fancy let loose in airy speculation. GOLDSMITH.

THEREFORE, CONSEQUENTLY, ACCORDINGLY.

THEREFORE, that is, for this reason, marks a deduction; CONSEQUENTLY,

that is, in consequence, marks a consequence; ACCORDINGLY, that is, according to some thing, implies an agreement or adaptation. Therefore is employed particularly in abstract reasoning; consequently is employed either in reasoning or in the narrative style; accordingly is used principally in the narrative style. Young persons are perpetually liable to fall into error through inexperience; they ought therefore the more willingly to submit themselves to the guidance of those who can direct them: the world is now reduced to a state of little better than moral anarchy; consequently nothing but religion and good government can bring the people back to the use of their sober senses: every preparation was made, and every precaution was taken; accordingly at the fixed hour they proceeded to the place of destination.

If you cut off the top branches of a tree, it will not therefore cease to grow. HUGHES.

Reputation is power; consequently to despoise is to weaken. SOUTH.

The pathetic, as Longinus observes, may animate the sublime; but is not essential to it. Accordingly, as he further remarks, we very often find that those who excel most in stirring up the passions very often want the talent of writing in the sublime manner. ADDISON.

THICK, DENSE.

BETWEEN THICK and DENSE there is little other difference, than that the latter is employed to express that species of thickness which is philosophically considered as the property of the atmosphere in a certain condition: hence we speak of thick in regard to hard or soft bodies, as a thick board or thick cotton; solid or liquid, as a thick cheese or thick milk: but the term dense mostly in regard to the air in its various forms, as a dense air, a dense vapor, a dense cloud, and figuratively a dense population.

He from thick films shall purge the visual ray,
And on the sightless eyeballs pour the day. POPE.

I have discovered, by a long series of observations, that invention and elocution suffer great impediments from dense and impure vapors. JOHNSON.

THIN, SLENDER, SLIGHT, SLIM.

THIN, in Saxon thinne, German dünn, Latin tener, from tendo, in Greek τινω, to extend or draw out, and the Hebrew taken, to grind or reduce to powder.

SLENDER, SLIGHT, and SLIM are all variations from the German schlanke, which are connected with the words slime and sling, as also with the German schlingen, to wind or wreath, and schlange, a serpent, designating the property of length and smallness, which is adapted for bending or twisting. Thin is the generic term, the rest are specific: thin may be said of that which is small and short, as well as small and long; slender is always said of that which is small and long at the same time: a board is thin which wants solidity or substance: a poplar is slender, because its tallness is disproportioned to its magnitude or the dimensions of its circumference. Thinness is sometimes a natural property; slight and slim are applied to that which is artificial: the leaves of trees are of a thin texture; a board may be made slight by continually planing; a paper box is very slim. Thinness is a good property sometimes; thin paper is frequently preferred to that which is thick: slightness and slimness, which is a greater degree of slightness, are always defects; that which is made slight is unfit to bear the stress that will be put upon it; that which is slim is altogether unfit for the purpose proposed: a carriage that is made slight is quickly broken, and always out of repair; paper is altogether too slim to serve the purpose of wood.

Remembrance and reflection, how allied!
What thin partitions sense from thought divide! POPE.

The Ionic order doth represent a feminine kind of slenderness. WOTTON.

Thinness is a natural property of many bodies, whether solid or fluid; slender and slight have a moral and figurative application.

I have found dulness to quicken into sentiment in a thin ether. JOHNSON.

Very slender differences will sometimes part those whom beneficence has united. JOHNSON.

Friendship is often destroyed by a thousand secret and slight competitions. JOHNSON.

TO THINK, REFLECT, PONDER, MUSE.

THINK, in Saxon thinca, German denken, etc., comes from the Hebrew

dan, to direct, rule, or judge. REFLECT, in Latin reflecto, signifies literally to bend back, that is, to bend the mind back on itself. PONDER, from pondus, a weight, signifies to weigh. MUSE, from musa, a song, signifies to dwell upon with the imagination.

To think is a general and indefinite term; to reflect is a particular mode of thinking; to ponder and muse are different modes of reflecting, the former on grave matters, the latter on matters that interest either the affections or the imagination: we think whenever we receive or recall an idea to the mind; but we reflect only by recalling, not one only, but many ideas: we think if we only suffer the ideas to revolve in succession in the mind; but in reflecting we compare, combine, and judge of those ideas which thus pass in the mind: we think, therefore, of things past, as they are pleasurable or otherwise; we reflect upon them as they are applicable to our present condition: we may think on things past, present, or to come; we reflect, ponder, and muse mostly on that which is past or present. The man thinks on the days of his childhood, and wishes them back; the child thinks on the time when he shall be a man, and is impatient until it is come: the man reflects on his past follies, and tries to profit by experience; he ponders on any serious concern that affects his destiny, and muses on the happy events of his childhood.

No man was ever weary of thinking, much less of thinking that he had done well or virtuously. SOUTH.

Let men but reflect upon their own observation, and consider impartially with themselves how few in the world they have known made better by age. SOUTH.

I was sitting on a sofa one evening, after I had been caressed by Amurath, and my imagination kindled as I mused. HAWKSWORTH.

TO THINK, SUPPOSE, IMAGINE, BELIEVE, DEEM.

To THINK is here, as in the preceding article, the generic term. It expresses, in common with the other terms, the act of having a particular idea in the mind; but it is indefinite as to the mode and the object of the action. To think may be the act of the understanding, or merely of the imagination: to SUPPOSE and IMAGINE are rather the acts of the imagination than of the understanding. To think, that is, to have any thought or opinion upon a subject, requires reflection; it is the work of time: to suppose and imagine may be the acts of the moment. We think a thing right or wrong; we suppose it to be true or false; we imagine it to be real or unreal. To think is employed promiscuously in regard to all objects, whether actually existing or not, or, if existing, are above our comprehension: to suppose applies to those which are uncertain or precarious; imagine, to those which are unreal. Think and imagine are said of that which affects the senses immediately; suppose is only said of that which occupies the mind. We think that we hear a noise as soon as the sound catches our attention; in certain states of the body or mind we imagine we hear noises which were never made: we think that a person will come to-day, because he has informed us that he intends to do so; we suppose that he will come to-day, at a certain hour, because he came at the same hour yesterday.

If to conceive how anything can be
From shape extracted, and locality,
Is hard: what think you of the Deity? JENYNS.

It is absurd to suppose that while the relations, in which we stand to our fellow-creatures, naturally call forth certain sentiments and affections, there should be none to correspond to the first and greatest of all beings. BLAIR.

How ridiculous must it be to imagine that the clergy of England favor popery, when they cannot be clergymen without renouncing it.

BEVERIDGE.

In regard to moral points, in which case the word DEEM may be compared with the others, to think is a conclusion drawn from certain premises. I think that a man has acted wrong: to suppose is to take up an idea arbitrarily or at pleasure; we argue upon a supposed case, merely for the sake of argument: to imagine is to take up an idea by accident, or without any connection with the truth or reality; we imagine that a person is offended with us, without being able to assign a single reason for the idea; imaginary evils are even more numerous than those which are real: to deem is to form a conclusion; things are deemed hurtful or otherwise in consequence of observation.

We sometimes think we could a speech produce Much to the purpose, if our tongues were looser.

COWPER.

It moves me more, perhaps, than fully ought,
When some green heads, as void of wit as thought,
Suppose themselves monopolists of sense.

COWPER.

An empty house is by the players deemed the most dreadful sign of popular disapprobation.

HAWKSWORTH.

To think and believe are both opposite to knowing or perceiving; but think is a more partial action than believe: we think as the thing strikes us at the time; we believe from a settled deduction; hence it expresses much less to say that I think a person speaks the truth, than that I believe that he speaks the truth. I think from what I can recollect that such and such were the words, is a vague mode of speech, not admissible in a court of law as positive evidence: the natural question which follows upon this is, do you firmly believe it? to which whoever can answer in the affirmative, with the appearance of sincerity, must be admitted as a testimony. Hence it arises that the word can only be employed in matters that require but little thought in order to come to a conclusion; and believe is applicable to things that must be admitted only on substantial evidence. We are at liberty to say that I think, or I believe that the account is made out right; but, we must say, that I believe, not think, that the Bible is the word of God.

They think that they (the objectors) do not believe it (the Gospel) who do not take care that it should be preached to the poor.

THOUGHTFUL, CONSIDERATE, DELIBERATE.

THOUGHTFUL, or full of thinking (v. To think, reflect); CONSIDERATE, or ready to consider (v. To consider, reflect); and DELIBERATE, ready to deliberate (v. To consult), rise upon each other in their signification: he who is thoughtful does not forget his duty; he who is considerate pauses, and considers properly what is his duty; he who deliberates, considers deliberately. It is a recommendation to a subordinate person to be thoughtful in doing what is wished of him: it is the recommendation of a confidential person to be considerate, as he has often to judge according to his own discretion; it is the recommendation of a person who is acting for himself in critical matters to be deliberate. There is this further distinction in the word deliberate, that it may be used in the bad sense to mark a settled intention to do evil: young people may sometimes plead in extenuation of their guilt that their misdeeds do not arise from deliberate malice.

Men's minds are in general inclined to levity, much more than to thoughtful melancholy.

BLAIR.

Some things will not bear much zeal; and the more earnest we are about them, the less we recommend ourselves to the approbation of sober and considerate men.

TILLOTSON.

There is a vast difference between sins of infirmity and those of presumption, as vast as between inadvertency and deliberation.

SOUTH.

THREAT, MENACE.

THREAT is of Saxon origin; MENACE is of Latin extraction. They do not differ in signification; but, as is frequently the case, the Saxon is the familiar term, and the Latin word is employed only in the higher style. We may be threatened with either small or great evils; but we are menaced only with great evils. One individual threatens to strike another: a general menaces the enemy with an attack. We are threatened by things as well as persons: we are menaced by persons only (or things personified): a person is threatened with a look: he is menaced with a prosecution by his adversary.

TIME, SEASON.

TIME is here the generic term; it is taken either for the whole or the part: SEASON is any given portion of time. We speak of time when the simple idea of time only is to be expressed; as the time of the day, or the time of the year; the season is spoken in reference to some circumstances; the year is divided into four parts, called the seasons, according to the nature of the weather: hence it is that in general that time is called the season which is suitable for any particular purpose; youth is the season for improvement. It is a matter of necessity to choose the time; it is an affair of wisdom to choose the season.

You will often want religion in times of most danger. CHATHAM.

Piso's behavior toward us in this season of affliction has endeared him to us.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF CICERO.

TIME, PERIOD, AGE, DATE, ERA, EPOCH.

TIME (v. Time) is, as before, taken either for time in general, or time in particular; all the other terms are taken for particular portions of time. In the sense of a particular portion of time, the word time is applied generally and indefinitely.

There is a time when we should not only number our days, but our hours. YOUNG.

Time included within any given points is termed a PERIOD, from the Greek περίοδος, signifying a course, round, or any revolution: thus, the period of day, or of night, is the space of time comprehended between the rising and setting, or setting and rising of the sun; the period of a year comprehends the space which, according to astronomers, the earth requires for its annual revolution. So, in an extended and moral application, we have stated periods in our life for particular things: during the period of infancy a child is in a state of total dependence on its parents; a period of apprenticeship has been appointed for youth to learn different trades.

Some experiment would be made how by art to make plants more lasting than their ordinary period, as to make a stalk of wheat last a whole year. BACON.

The period is sometimes taken not only for the space of time included between two points of time, but sometimes for the terminating point; in this sense, to put a period to a thing is to terminate its existence, to destroy it.

But the last period, and the fatal hour, Of Troy is come. DENHAM.

The AGE is the period comprehended within the life of one man, or of numbers living at the same time, and consequently refers to what is done by men living within that period: hence we speak of the different ages that have existed since the commencement of the world, and characterize this or that age by the particular degrees of vice or virtue, genius, and the like, for which it is distinguished.

The story of Haman only shows us what human nature has too generally appeared to be in every age. BLAIR.

The date is properly the point of time which is marked on a writing, either to show the time when it was written, as the date of a letter, or to show when any contract is to be performed, or thing done, as the date of a bill of exchange. As the date in the first case shows when anything has been done, the word date may be applied generally to the time of any past event, as a thing of late date, or early date; so of a thing out of date, which is so long gone by as that the date of it is not known.

This mountain was formed by the first eruption that destroyed the country of Mel Passai, and is of a very old date. BRYDENE.

As the date in the second case shows how long it will be before a thing is to be done, as a bill of short date shows that it has but a short time to run, so the term date may be applied to the duration of any event.

Plantations have one advantage in them which is not to be found in most other works, as they give a pleasure of a more lasting date. ADDISON.

ERA, in Latin era, probably from era, brass, signifying coin with which one computes; and EPOCH, from the Greek εποχή, from επεχω, to stop, signifying a resting-place; both refer to points of time that are in some manner marked or distinguished; but the former is more commonly employed in the literal sense for points of computation in chronology, as the Christian era; the latter is indefinitely employed for any period distinguished by remarkable events: the captivity of the Jews is an epoch in the history of that nation. The terms may also be figuratively employed in the latter sense, as an eventful era.

That period of the Athenian history which is included within the era of Pisistratus, and the death of Menander the comic poet, may justly be styled the literary age of Greece. CUMBERLAND.

The institution of this library (by Pisistratus) forms a signal epocha in the annals of literature. CUMBERLAND.

TIMELY, SEASONABLE.

THE same distinction exists between the epithets TIMELY and SEASONABLE as between time and season in the preceding article. The former signifies within the time, that is, before the time is past; the latter according to the season, or what the season requires. A timely notice prevents that which would otherwise happen; a seasonable hint seldom fails of its effect because it is seasonable. We must not expect to have a timely notice of death, but must be prepared for it at any time; an admonition to one who is on a sick-bed is very seasonable, when given by a minister or a friend. The opposites of these terms are untimely or ill-timed and unseasonable: untimely is directly opposed to timely, signifying before the time appointed; as an untimely death: but ill-timed is indirectly opposed, signifying in the wrong time; as an ill-timed remark.

It imports all men, especially bad men, to think on the judgment, that by a timely repentance they may prevent the woful effects of it.

SOUTH.

What you call a bold, is not only the kindest, but the most seasonable proposal you could have made.

LOCKE.

TIME-SERVING, TEMPORIZING.

TIME-SERVING and TEMPORIZING are both applied to the conduct of one who adapts himself servilely to the time and season; but a time-server is rather active, and a temporizer passive. A time-server avows those opinions which will serve his purpose: the temporizer forbears to avow those which are likely for the time being to hurt him. The former acts from a desire of gain, the latter from a fear of loss. Time-servers are of all parties, as they come in the way: temporizers are of no party, as occasion requires. Sycophant courtiers must always be time-servers: ministers of state are frequently temporizers.

Ward had complied during the late times, and held in by taking the covenant: so he was hated by the high men as a time-server. BURNET.

Feeble and temporising measures will always be the result, when men assemble to deliberate in a situation where they ought to act.

ROBERTSON.

TORMENT, TORTURE.

TORMENT (v. To tease) and TORTURE both come from torqueo, to twist, and express the agony which arises from a violent twisting or griping of any part; but the latter, which is more immediately derived from the verb, expresses much greater violence and consequent pain than the former. Torture is an excess of torment. We may be tormented by a variety of indirect means; but we are mostly said to be tortured by the direct means of the rack, or similar instrument. Torment may be permanent: torture is only for a time, or on certain occasions. It is related in history that a person was once tormented to death, by a violent and incessant beating of drums in his prison: the Indians practice every species of torture upon their prisoners; whence the application of these terms to moral objects. A guilty conscience may torment a man all his life: the horrors of an awakened conscience are a torture to one who is on his death-bed.

Yet in his empire o'er thy abject breast,
His flames and torments only are express'd.

TRADE, COMMERCE, TRAFFIC, DEALING.

TRADE, in Italian tratto, Latin tracto, to treat, signifies the transaction of business. COMMERCE, v. Intercourse. TRAFFIC, in French traffique, Italian traffico, compounded of tra or trans and facio, signifies to make to pass over from hand to hand. DEALING, from the verb to deal, in German theilen, to divide, signifies to get together in parts according to a certain ratio, or at a given price.

The leading idea in trade is that of carrying on business for purposes of gain; the rest are but modes of trade; commerce is a mode of trade by exchange: traffic is a sort of personal trade, a sending from hand to hand; dealing is a bargaining or calculating kind of trade. Trade is either on a large or small scale; commerce is always on a large scale: we may trade retail or wholesale; we always carry on commerce by wholesale: trade is either within or without the country; commerce is always between different countries: there may be a trade between two towns; but there is a commerce between England and America, between France and Germany: hence it arises that the general term trade is of inferior import when compared with commerce. The commerce of a country, in the abstract and general sense, conveys more to our mind, and is a more noble expression, than the trade of the country, as the merchant ranks higher than the tradesman, and a commercial house than a trading concern. Trade may be altogether domestic, and between neighbors; the traffic is that which goes backward and forward between any two or more points: in this manner there may be a great traffic between two towns or cities, as between London and the capitals of the different counties. Trade may consist simply in buying and selling according to a stated valuation; dealings are carried on in matters that admit of a variation: hence we speak of dealers in wool, in corn, seeds, and the like, who buy up portions of these goods, more or less, according to the state of the market.

TO TRANSFIGURE, TRANSFORM, METAMORPHOSE.

TRANSFIGURE is to make to pass over into another figure; TRANSFORM and METAMORPHOSE is to put into another form: the former being said only of spiritual beings, and particularly in reference to our Saviour; the other two terms being applied to that which has a corporeal form.

Transformation is commonly applied to that which changes its outward form; in this manner a harlequin transforms himself into all kinds of shapes and likenesses. Metamorphosis is applied to the form internal as well as external, that is, to the whole nature; in this manner Ovid describes, among others, the metamorphoses of Narcissus into a flower, and Daphne into a laurel: with the same idea we may speak of a rustic being metamorphosed, by the force of art, into a fine gentleman.

We have of this gentleman a piece of the transfiguration, which I think is held a work second to none in the world.

STEELE.

A lady's shift may be metamorphosed into billets-doux, and come into her possession a second time.

ADDISON.

Can a good intention, or rather a very wicked one so miscaled, transform perjury and hypocrisy into merit and perfection?

SOUTH.

TREACHEROUS, TRAITOROUS, TREASONABLE.

THESE epithets are all applied to one who betrays his trust; but TREACHEROUS (v. Faithless) respects a man's private relations; TRAITOROUS, his public relation to his prince and his country: he is a treacherous friend, and a traitorous subject. We may be treacherous to our enemies as well as our friends, for nothing can lessen the obligation to be faithful in keeping a promise; we may be traitorous to our country by abstaining to lend that aid which is in our power. Traitorous and TREASONABLE are both applicable to subjects: but the former is extended to all public acts; the latter only to those which affect the supreme power: a soldier is traitorous who goes over to the side of the enemy against his country; a man is guilty of treasonable practices who meditates the life of the king, or aims at subverting his government: a man may be a traitor under all forms of government: but he can be guilty of treason only in a monarchical state.

This very charge of folly should make men cautious how they listen to the treacherous proposals which come from their own bosom.

SOUTH.

SOUTH.

PRIDEAUX.

TO TREASURE, HOARD.

THE idea of laying up carefully is common to these verbs; but to TREASURE is to lay up for the sake of preserving; to HOARD, to lay up for the sake of accumulating; we treasure up the gifts of a friend; the miser hoards up his money: we attach a real value to that which we treasure; a fictitious value to that which is hoarded. To treasure is used either in the proper or improper sense; to hoard only in the proper sense; we treasure a book on which we set particular value, or we treasure the words or actions of another in our recollection; the miser hoards in his coffers whatever he can scrape together.

Fancy can combine the ideas which memory has treasured.

HAWKSWORTH.

Hoards ev'n beyond the miser's wish abound.

GOLDSMITH.

TREATMENT, USAGE.

TREATMENT implies the act of treating, and USAGE that of using: treatment may be partial or temporary; but usage is properly employed for that which is permanent or continued: a passer-by may meet with ill-treatment; but children and domestics are liable to meet with ill-usage. All persons may meet with treatment from others with whom they casually come in connection; but usage is applied more properly to those who are more or less in the power of others: children may receive good or ill usage from those who have the charge of them, servants from their masters, or wives from their husbands.

By promises of more indulgent treatment, if they would unite with him (Cortes) against their oppressors, he prevailed on the people to supply the Spanish camp with provisions. ROBERTSON.

If we look farther into the world, we shall find this usage (of our Saviour from his own) not so very strange; for kindred is not friendship.

SOUTH.

TREMBLING, TREMOR, TREPIDATION.

ALL these terms are derived from the very same source (v. Agitation), and designate a general state of agitation: TREMBLING is not only the most familiar but also the most indefinite term of the three; TREPIDATION and TREMOR are species of trembling. Trembling expresses any degree of involuntary shaking of the frame, from the affection either of the body or the mind; cold, nervous affections, fear, and the like, are the ordinary causes of trembling: tremor is a slight degree of trembling, which arises mostly from a mental affection; when the spirits are agitated, the mind is thrown into a tremor by any trifling incident: trepidation is more violent than either of the two, and springs from the defective state of the mind; it shows itself in the action, or the different movements of the body, rather than in the body; those who have not the requisite composure of mind to command themselves on all occasions are apt to do what is required of them with trepidation.

And with unmanly tremblings shook the car.

POPE.

The ferocious insolence of Cromwell, the ragged brutality of Harrison, and the general trepidation of fear and wickedness (in the rebel parliament), would make a picture of unexampled variety.

JOHNSON.

Laughter is a vent of any sudden joy that strikes upon the mind, which being too volatile and strong, breaks out in this tremor of the voice.

STEELE.

Trembling and tremulous are applied as epithets, either to persons or things; a trembling voice evinces trepidation of mind, a tremulous voice evinces a tremor of mind: notes in music are sometimes trembling; the motion of the leaves of trees is tremulous.

And read the trembling, unresisting prey. POPE

With cherish'd gaze. THOMSON.

TRIFLING, TRIVIAL, PETTY, FRIVOLOUS, FUTILE.

TRIFLING, TRIVIAL, both come from trivium, a common place of resort where three roads meet, and signify common. PETTY, in French petit, little, in Latin putus, a boy or minion, is probably connected with the Hebrew peti, foolish. FRIVOLOUS, in Latin frivulus, comes in all probability from frio, to crumble into dust, signifying reduced to nothing. FUTILE, in Latin futilis, from futio, to pour out, signifies cast away as worthless.

All these epithets characterize an object as of little or no value: trifling and trivial differ only in degree; the latter denoting a still lower degree of value than the former. What is trifling or trivial is that which does not require any consideration, and may be easily passed over as forgotten: trifling objections can never weigh against solid reason; trivial remarks only expose the shallowness of the remarker: what is petty is beneath our consideration, it ought to be disregarded and held cheap; it would be a petty consideration for a minister of state to look to the small savings of a private family: what is frivolous and futile is disgraceful for any one to consider; the former in relation to all the objects of our pursuit or attachment, the latter only in regard to matters of reasoning; dress is a frivolous occupation when it forms the chief business of a rational being; the objections of freethinkers against revealed religion are as futile as they are mischievous.

We exceed the ancients in doggerel humor, burlesque, and all the trivial arts of ridicule. ADDISON.

There is scarcely any man without some favorite trifle which he values above greater attainments; some desire of petty praise which he cannot patiently suffer to be frustrated. JOHNSON.

It is an endless and frivolous pursuit to act by any other rule than the care of satisfying our own minds. STEELE.

Out of a multiplicity of criticisms by various hands, many are sure to be futile. COWPER.

TROOP, COMPANY.

In a military sense, a TROOP is among the horse what a COMPANY is among the foot; but this is only a partial acceptance of the terms. Troop, in French troupe, Spanish tropa, Latin turba, signifies an indiscriminate multitude; company (v. To accompany) is any number joined together, and bearing each other company: hence we speak of a troop of hunters, a company of players; a troop of horsemen, a company of travellers.

Still may the dog the wandering troops constrain
Of airy ghosts, and vex the guilty train. DRYDEN.

Go, carry Sir John Falstaff to the Fleet;
Take all his company along with him. SHAKESPEARE.

TO TROUBLE, DISTURB, MOLEST.

WHATEVER uneasiness or painful sentiment is produced in the mind by outward circumstances is effected either by TROUBLE (v. Affliction), by DISTURBANCE (v. Commotion), or by MOLESTATION (v. To inconvenience). Trouble is the most general in its application; we may be troubled by the want of a thing, or troubled by that which is unsuitable: we are disturbed and molested only by that which actively troubles. Pecuniary wants are the greatest troubles in life; the perverseness of servants, the indisposition or ill behavior of children, are domestic troubles: but the noise of children is a disturbance, and the prospect of want disturbs the mind. Trouble may be permanent; disturbance and molestation are temporary, and both refer to the peace which is destroyed; a disturbance ruffles or throws out of a tranquil state; a molestation burdens or bears hard either on the body or the mind: noise is always a disturbance to one who wishes to think or to remain in quiet; talking, or any noise, is a molestation to one who is in an irritable frame of body or mind.

Ulysses was exceedingly troubled at the sight of his mother (in the Elysian fields). ADDISON.
No buzzing sounds disturb their golden sleep. DRYDEN.

All use those arms which nature has bestow'd,
Produce their tender progeny, and feed
With care parental, whilst that care they need.
In these lov'd offices completely blest,
No hopes beyond them, nor vain fears molest. JENYNS.

TROUBLESOME, IRKSOME, VEXATIOUS.

THESE epithets are applied to the objects which create trouble or vexation.

IRKSOME is compounded of irk and some, from the German ärger, vexation, which probably comes from the same root as the Greek apoc. TROUBLE-SOME (v. To afflict) is here, as before, the generic term; irksome and VEXTIOUS are species of the troublesome: what is troublesome creates either bodily or mental pain; what is irksome creates a mixture of bodily and mental pain; and what is vexatious creates purely mental pain. What requires great exertion, or a too long continued exertion or exertions, coupled with difficulties, is troublesome: in this sense the laying in stores for the winter is a troublesome work for the ants, and compiling a dictionary is a troublesome labor to the compiler: what requires any exertion which we are unwilling to make, or interrupts the peace which we particularly long for, is irksome; in this sense giving and receiving of visits is irksome to some persons; travelling is irksome to others: what comes across our particular wishes, or disappoints us in a particular manner, is vexatious; in this sense the loss of a prize which we had hoped to gain may be vexatious.

The incursions of troublesome thoughts are often violent and importunate. JOHNSON.

For not to irksome toil, but to delight he made us. MILTON.

The pensive goddess has already taught
How vain is hope, and how vexatious thought. PRIOR.

TRUTH, VERACITY.

TRUTH belongs to the thing; VERACITY to the person: the truth of the story is admitted upon the veracity of the narrator.

I shall think myself obliged for the future to speak always in truth and sincerity of heart. ADDISON.

Many relations of travellers have been slighted as fabulous, till more frequent voyages have confirmed their veracity. JOHNSON.

TRY, TEMPT.

To TRY (v. To attempt) is to call forth one's ordinary powers; to TEMPT (v. To attempt) is a particular species of trial: we try either ourselves or others; we tempt others: we try a person only in the path of his duty; but we may tempt him to depart from his duty: it is necessary to try the fidelity of a servant before you place confidence in him; it is wicked to tempt any one to do that which we should think wrong to do ourselves; our strength is tried by frequent experiments; we are tempted, by the weakness of our principles, to give way to the violence of our passions.

League all your forces then, ye pow'rs above,
Join all, and try the omnipotence of Jove. POPE.
Still the old sting remain'd, and men began
To tempt the serpent, as he tempted man. DENHAM.

TUMULTUOUS, TUMULTUARY.

TUMULTUOUS signifies having tumult; TUMULTUARY, disposed for tumult: the former is applied to objects in general; the latter to persons only: in tumultuous meetings the voice of reason is the last thing that is heard; it is the natural tendency of large and promiscuous assemblies to become tumultuary.

But oh, beyond description happiest he
Who ne'er must roll on life's tumultuous sea. PRIOR.

With tumultuary but irresistible violence, the Scotch insurgents fell upon the churches in that city (Perth). ROBERTSON.

TUMULTUOUS, TURBULENT, SKEDDIOUS, MUTINOUS.

TUMULTUOUS (v. Bustle) describes the disposition to make a noise; those who attend the play-houses, particularly the lower orders, are frequently tumultuous: TURBULENT marks a hostile spirit of resistance to authority; when prisoners are dissatisfied they are frequently turbulent: SEDITIONOUS marks a spirit of resistance to government; in republics the people are often disposed to be seditious: MUTINOUS marks a spirit of resistance against officers either in the army or navy; a general will not fail to quell the first risings of a mutinous spirit. Electioneering mobs are always tumultuous; the young and the ignorant are so averse to control that they are easily led by the example of an individual to be turbulent; among the Romans the people were in the habit of holding seditious meetings, and sometimes the soldiery would be mutinous.

Many civil broils and tumultuous rebellions they overcame, by reason of the continual presence of their king, whose only presence oftentimes constrains the unruly people from a thousand evil occasions. SPENSER.

Men of ambitious and turbulent spirits, that were dissatisfied with privacy, were allowed to engage in matters of state. BENTLEY.

Very many of the nobility in Edinburgh at that time did not appear yet in this seditionous behavior. CLARENDON.

Lend me your guards, that, if persuasion fail,
Force may against the mutinous prevail. WALLER.

TURGID, TUMID, BOMBASTIC.

TURGID and TUMID both signify swollen, but they differ in their application: turgid is most commonly applied to what swells by a physical process, as a turgid vessel; tumid, from the Greek Συμω, the mind, is said of that which seems to swell like the mind inflated with pride, as the tumid waves, denoting an unnatural or unusual swelling.

A bladder moderately filled with air and strongly tied, held near the fire, grew turgid and hard. BOYLE.

So high as heav'd the tumid hills, so low
Down sunk a hollow bottom, broad and deep. MILTON.

They are both applied to words. BOMBASTIC, from bombast, a kind of cotton, signifying puffed up like cotton, is figuratively applicable to words only; but the bombastic includes the sentiments expressed; turgidity is confined mostly to the mode of expression. A writer is turgid, who expresses a simple thought in lofty language: a person is bombastic who deals in large words and introduces high sentiments in common discourse.

The turgidness of a young scribbler might please his magnificent spirit, always upon stilts. WARBURTON.

By his endeavoring too much to set out his bare collections in an affected and bombastic style, they are much neglected. A. WOOD.

Tumid is rather applied to single words than to the style.

Although such expressions may seem tumid and aspiring, yet cannot I scruple to use seeming hyperboles in mentioning felicities, which make the highest hyperboles but seeming ones. BOYLE.

TO TURN, BEND, TWIST, DISTORT, WRING, WREST, WRENCH.

TURN is in French tourner, Greek ροπειν, to turn, and ροπος, a turner's wheel.

BEND, v. Bend. TWIST is in Saxon ge-twistan, and German zweyen, to double, from zwey, two. DISTORT, in Latin distortus, participle of distorqueo, compounded of dis and torqueo, signifies to turn violently aside.

To turn signifies in general to put a thing out of its place in an uneven line; to bend, and the rest, are species of turning: we turn a thing by moving it from one point to another; thus we turn the earth over: to bend is simply to change its direction; thus a stick is bent, or a body may bend its direction to a certain point: to twist is to bend many times, to make many turns: to distort is to turn or bend out of the right course; thus the face is distorted in convulsions. To WRING is to twist with violence; thus linen which has been wetted is wring: to WREST or WRENCH is to separate from a body by means of twisting; thus a stick may be wrested out of the hand, or a hinge wrenched off the door.

Yet still they find a future task remain,
To turn the soil, and break the clods again.

DRYDEN.

Some to the house,
The fold, and dairy, hungry bend their flight.

THOMSON.

But let not on thy hook the tortur'd worm,
Convulsive, twist in agonizing folds.

THOMSON.

We saw their stern, distorted looks from far.

DRYDEN.

Our bodies are unhappily made the weapons of sin; therefore we must, by an austere course of duty, first wring these weapons out of its hands.

SOUTH.

She wrench'd the jav'lin with her dying hands.

DRYDEN.

The same distinction holds good in the figurative or moral application: we turn a person from his design; we bend the will of a person; we twist the meaning of words to suit our purposes; we distort them so as to give them an entirely false meaning; we wring a confession from one; or wrest the meaning of a person's words.

Strong passion dwells on that object which has seized and taken possession of the soul; it is too much occupied and filled by it to turn its view aside. BLAIR.

Men will not bend their wits to examine whether things wherewith they have been accustomed be good or evil. HOOKER.

Something must be distorted beside the intent of the sovereign inditer. FRACHAM.

To wring this sentence, to wreat thereby out of men's hands the knowledge of God's doctrines, is without all reason.

ASCHAM.

Wreathing the text to the old giant's sense,
That Heav'n once more must suffer violence.

DENHAM.

TURN, BENT.

THESE words are only compared here in the figurative application, as respects the state of a person's inclination: the TURN is, therefore, as before, indefinite as to the degree; it is the first rising inclination: BENT is a positively strong turn, a confirmed inclination; a child may early discover a turn for music or drawing; but the real bent of his genius is not known until he has made a proficiency in his education, and has had an opportunity of trying different things: it may be very well to indulge the turn of mind; it is of great importance to follow the bent of the mind as far as respects arts and sciences.

I need not tell you how a man of Mr. Rowe's turn entertained me.

POPE.

I know the bent of your present attention is directed toward the eloquence of the bar.

MELMOTH'S LETTERS OF PLINY.

TO TURN, WIND, WHIRL, TWIRL, WRITHE.

To TURN (v. To turn) is, as before, the generic term; the rest are but modes of turning: WIND is to turn a thing round in a regular manner; WHIRL, to turn it round in a violent manner;
TWIRL, to turn it round in any irregular and unmeaning way; WRITHE, to turn round in convulsion within itself.
A worm seldom moves in a straight line;
it is, therefore, always turning: sometimes it lies, and sometimes it writhes in agony: a wheel is whirled round by the force of gunpowder: a top is twirled by a child in play.

How has this poison lost its wonted ways?
It should have burned its passage, not have linger'd

In the blind labyrinths and crooked turnings
Of human composition.

DRYDEN.

The tracks of Providence like rivers wind,
Here run before us, there retreat behind.

HIGGINS.

He was no civil ruffian; none of those
Who lie with twisted locks, betray with shrugs.

THOMSON.

Man is but man, inconstant still, and various;
There's no to-morrow in him like to-day;

Perhaps the atoms, whirling in his brain,
Make him think honestly this present hour;
The next, a swarm of base, ungrateful thoughts
May mount aloft.

DRYDEN.

I had used my eye to such a quick succession of objects, that, in the most precipitate scour, I could catch a sentence out of each author.

STEELE.

Dying, he bellow'd out his dread remorse,
And worith'd with seeming anguish of the soul.

SHIRLEY.

UNBELIEF, INFIDELITY, INCREDULITY.

UNBELIEF (v. Belief) respects matters in general; INFIDELITY (v. Faithful) is unbelief as respects Divine revelation;
INCREDULITY is unbelief in ordinary matters. Unbelief is taken in an indefinite and negative sense; it is the want of belief in any particular thing that may or may not be believed. The term unbelief does not of itself convey any re-proachful meaning; it signifies properly a general disposition not to believe.

Were his revelations important, I should be less inclined to unbelief.

BEATTIE.

We may be unbelievers in indifferent as well as the most important matters, but the term unbeliever taken absolutely means one who disbelieves sacred truths.

One gets by heart a catalogue of title-pages and editions; and immediately, to become conspicuous, declares that he is an unbeliever.

ADDISON.

Infidelity is a more active state of mind; it supposes a violent and total rejection of that which ought to be believed: incredulity is also an active state of mind, in which we refuse belief in matters that may or may not be rejected.
The Jews are unbelievers in the mission of our Saviour; the Turks are infidels, inasmuch as they do not believe in the Bible: Deists and Atheists are likewise infidels, inasmuch as they set themselves up against Divine revelation; well-informed people are always incredulous of stories respecting ghosts and apparitions.

Belief and profession will speak a Christian but very faintly, when thy conversation proclaims thee an infidel.

SOUTH.

The youth hears all the predictions of the aged with obstinate incredulity.

JOHNSON.

TO UNCOVER, DISCOVER, DISCLOSE.

To UNCOVER, like DISCOVER, implies to take off the covering; but the former refers mostly to an artificial, material, and occasional covering; the latter to a natural, moral, and habitual covering: plants are uncovered, that they may receive the benefit of the air: they are discovered to gratify the researches of the botanist.

We should uncover our nakedness by throwing off that Christian religion which has hitherto been our boast and comfort. BURE.

Since, you know, you cannot see yourself
So well as by reflection, I, your glass,
Will modestly discover to yourself
That of yourself which you know not of. SHAKESPEARE.

To discover and DISCLOSE (v. To publish) both signify to lay open, but they differ in the object and manner of the action: to discover is to remove the covering which hides a thing from view, whether it be there by accident or design; to disclose is to open that which has been closed: as many things may be covered which are not closed, such things may, by drawing aside the covering, be discovered: a country is properly discovered, or a plant growing in some heretofore unknown place may be discovered; whatever is disclosed must have been previously closed or enclosed in some other body; as to disclose the treasures which lie buried in the earth.

Go, draw aside the curtains, and discover
The several caskets to this noble prince. SHAKESPEARE.

The shells being broken, struck off, and gone,
the stone included in them is thereby disclosed and set at liberty. WOODWARD.

So in the figurative or moral application, a plot may be discovered, but a secret which lies deep in the bosom may be disclosed.

He shall never, by any alteration in me, discover my knowledge of his mistake. POPE.

If I disclose my passion,
Our friendship's at an end: if I conceal it,
The world will call me false. ADDISON.

UNDER, BELOW, BENEATH.

UNDER, like hind in behind, and the German unter, hinter, etc., are all connected with the preposition in, implying the relation of enclosure. BELOW denotes the state of being low; and BENEATH, from the German nieder, and the Greek νεφε or εμφε, downward, has the same original signification. It is evident, therefore, from the above, that the preposition under denotes any situation of retirement or concealment; below, any situation of inferiority or lowness; and beneath, the same, only in a still greater degree. We are covered or sheltered by that which we stand under; we excel or rise above that which is below us; we look down upon that which is beneath us: we live under the protection of government; the sun disappears when it is below the horizon; we are apt to tread upon that which is altogether beneath us.

All sublunary comforts imitate the changeableness, as well as feel the influence, of the planet they are under. SOUTH.

Our minds are here and there, below, above;
Nothing that's mortal can so quickly move. DENHAM.

How can anything better be expected than rust and canker, when men will rather dig their treasure from beneath than fetch it from above? SOUTH.

UNDERSTANDING, INTELLECT, INTELLIGENCE.

UNDERSTANDING (v. To conceive), being the Saxon word, is employed to describe a familiar and easy power or operation of the mind in forming distinct ideas of things. INTELLECT (v. Intellect) is employed to mark the same operation in regard to higher and more abstruse objects. The understanding applies to the first exercise of the rational powers: it is therefore aptly said of children and savages that they employ their understandings on the simple objects of perception; a child uses his understanding to distinguish the dimensions of objects, or to apply the right names to the things that come before his notice.

By understanding, I mean that faculty whereby we are enabled to apprehend the objects of knowledge, generals as well as particulars, absent things as well as present, and to judge of their truth or falsehood, good or evil. WILKINS.

Intellect, being a matured state of the understanding, is most properly applied to the efforts of those who have their powers in full vigor: we speak of understanding as the characteristic distinction between man and brute; but human beings are distinguished from each other by the measure of their intellect. We may expect the youngest children to employ an understanding according to the opportunities which they have of using their senses; we are gratified when we see great intellect in the youth whom we are instructing.

The light within us is (since the fall) become darkness; and the understanding, that should be eyes to the blind faculty of the will, is blind itself. SOUTH.

All those arts and inventions which vulgar minds gaze at, the ingenious pursue, and all admire, are but the relics of an intellect defaced with sin and time. SOUTH.

Intellect and INTELLIGENCE are derived from the same word; but intellect is applied merely to human power, and intelligence to the spiritual power of higher beings; as the intelligence of angels: so, when applied to human beings, it is taken in the most abstract sense for the intellectual power: hence we speak of intelligence as displayed in the countenance of a child whose looks evince that he has exerted his intellect, and thereby proved that it exists.

Silent as the ecstatic bliss
Of souls, that by intelligence converse. OTWAY.

UNDETERMINED, UNSETTLED, UNSTEADY, WAVERING.

UNDETERMINED (v. To determine) is a temporary state of the mind; UNSETTLED is commonly more lasting: we are undetermined in the ordinary concerns of life; we are unsettled in matters of opinion: we may be undetermined whether we shall go or stay; we are unsettled in our faith or religious profession.

Undetermined and unsettled are applied to particular objects; UNSTEADY and WAVERING are habits of the mind: to be unsteady is, in fact, to be habitually unsettled in regard to all objects. An unsettled character is one that has no settled principles: an unsteady character has an unfitness in himself to settle. Undetermined describes one uniform state of mind, namely, the want of determination: wavering describes a changeable state, namely, the state of determining variously at different times. Undetermined is always taken in an indifferent, wavering mostly in a bad, sense: we may frequently be undetermined from the nature of the case, which does not present motives for determining; but a person is mostly wavering, from a defect in his character, in cases where he might determine. A parent may with reason be undetermined as to the line of life which he shall choose for his son: men of soft and timid characters are always wavering in the most trivial, as well as the most important, concerns of life.

We suffer the last part of life to steal from us in weak hopes of some fortuitous occurrence or drowsy equilibrations of undetermined counsel. JOHNSON.

Uncertain and unsettled as Cicero was, he seems fired with the contemplation of immortality. PEARCE.

You will find soberness and truth in the proper teachers of religion, and much understanding and vanity in others. EARL WENTWORTH.

Yet such, we find, they are as can control
The servile actions of our wavering soul. PRIOR.

TO UNFOLD, UNRAVEL, DEVELOP.

To UNFOLD is to open that which has been folded; to UNRAVEL is to open that which has been ravelled or tangled; to DEVELOP is to open that which has been wrapped in an envelope. The application of these terms therefore to moral objects is obvious: what has been folded and kept secret is unfolded; in this manner a hidden transaction is unfolded, by being related circumstantially: what has been entangled in any mystery or confusion is unravelled: in this manner a mysterious transaction is unravelled, if any circumstance is fully accounted for: what has been wrapped up so as to be entirely shut out from view is developed; in this manner the plot of a play or novel, or the talent of a person, is developed.

And to the sage-instructing eye unfold
The various twine of light. THOMSON.

You must be sure to unravel all your designs to a jealous man. ADDISON.

The character of Tiberius is extremely difficult to develop. CUMBERLAND.

UNHAPPY, MISERABLE, WRETCHED.

UNHAPPY is literally not to be happy; this is the negative condition of many who might be happy if they pleased. MISERABLE, from misericor, to pity, is to deserve pity; that is, to be positively and extremely unhappy: this is the lot only of a comparatively few: WRETCHED, from our word wreck, the Saxon wrecca, an exile, and the like, signifies cast away or abandoned; that is, particularly miserable, which is the lot of still fewer. As happiness lies properly in the mind, unhappy is taken in the proper sense, with regard to the state of the feelings; but is figuratively extended to the outward circumstances which occasion the painful feelings; we lead an unhappy life, or are in an unhappy condition: as that which excites the compassion of others must be external, and the state of abandonment must of itself be an outward state, miserable and wretched are properly applied to the outward circumstances which cause the pain, and improperly to the pain which is occasioned. We can measure the force of these words, that is to say, the degree of unhappiness which they express, only by the circumstance which causes the unhappiness. An unhappy man is indefinite; as we may be unhappy from slight circumstances, or from those which are important; a child may be said to be unhappy at the loss of a plaything; a man is unhappy who leads a vicious life: miserable and wretched are more limited in their application; a child cannot be either miserable or wretched and he who is so has some serious cause, either in his own mind or in his circumstances, to make him so: a man is miserable who is tormented by his conscience; a mother will be wretched who sees her child violently torn from her.

Such is the fate unhappy women find,
And such the curse entail'd upon our kind.

Rowe.

God, according to his universal way of working, graciously turns these follies (from the passions) so far to the advantage of his miserable creatures, as to be the present solace and support of their distresses.

WARBURTON.

'Tis murmur, discontent, distrust,
That makes you wretched.

GAY.

UNIMPORTANT, INSIGNIFICANT, IMMATERIAL, INCONSIDERABLE.

THE want of importance, of consideration, of signification, and of matter or substance, is expressed by these terms. They differ, therefore, principally according to the meaning of the primitives; but they are so closely allied that they may be employed sometimes indifferently. UNIMPORTANT regards the consequences of our actions: it is unimportant whether we use this or that word in certain cases: INCONSIDERABLE and INSIGNIFICANT respects those things which may attract notice: the former is more adapted to the grave style, to designate the comparative low value of things; the latter is a familiar term which seems to convey a contemptuous meaning: in a description, we may say that the number, the size, the quantity, etc., is inconsiderable; in speaking of persons, we may say they are insignificant in stature, look, talent, station, and the like; or, speaking of things, an insignificant production, or an insignificant word: IMMATERIAL is a species of the unimportant, which is applied only to familiar subjects; it is immaterial whether we go to-day or to-morrow; it is immaterial whether we have a few or many.

Nino and Guerra made no discoveries of any importance. ROBERTSON.

That the soul cannot be proved mortal by any principle of natural reason is I think no inconsiderable point gained. SOUVE.

If, in the judgment of impartial persons, the arguments be strong enough to convince an unbiassed mind, it is not material whether every wrangling atheist will sit down contented with them. STILLINGFLEET.

UNLESS, EXCEPT.

UNLESS, which is equivalent to if less, if not, or if one fail, is employed only for the particular case; but EXCEPT has always a reference to some general rule, of which an exception is hereby signified: I shall not do it unless he ask me; no one can enter except those who are provided with tickets.

Unless money can be borrowed, trade cannot be carried on. BLACKSTONE.

If a wife continues in the use of her jewels till her husband's death, she shall afterward retain them against his executors and administrators, and all other persons except creditors.

BLACKSTONE.

UNOFFENDING, INOFFENSIVE, HARMLESS.

UNOFFENDING denotes the act of not offending: INOFFENSIVE, the property of not being disposed or apt to offend: HARMLESS, the property of being void of harm. Unoffending expresses, therefore, only a partial state; inoffensive and harmless mark the disposition and character. A child is unoffending as long as he does nothing to offend others; but he may be offensive if he discover an unamiable temper, or has unpleasant manners: a creature is inoffensive that has nothing in itself that can offend; but that is harmless which has neither the will nor the power to harm. Domestic animals are frequently very inoffensive; it is a great recommendation of a quack medicine to say that it is harmless.

The unoffending royal little ones were not only condemned to languish in solitude and darkness, but their bodies left to perish with disease.

SEWARD.

MILTON.

When the disciple is questioned about the studies of his master, he makes report of some minute and frivolous researches which are introduced only for the purpose of raising a harmless laugh.

CUMBERLAND.

UNRULY, UNGOVERNABLE, REFRAC- TORY.

UNRULY marks the want of disposition to be ruled; UNGOVERNABLE, an absolute incapacity to be governed: the former is a temporary or partial error, the latter is an habitual defect in the temper: a volatile child will be occasionally unruly; any child of strong passions will become ungovernable by excessive indulgence: we say that our wills are unruly and our tempers are ungovernable. REFRACTORY, from the Latin refringo, to break open, marks the disposition to break everything down before it: it is the excess of the unruly with regard to children: the unruly is, however, negative; but the refractory is positive: an unruly child objects to be ruled; a refractory child sets up a positive resistance to all rule; an unruly child may be altogether silent and passive; a refractory child always commits himself by some act of intemperance in word or deed: he is unruly, if in any degree he gives trouble in the ruling; he is refractory, if he refuses altogether to be ruled.

How hardly is the restive, unruly will of man first tamed and broke to duty.

CUMBERLAND.

GOLDSMITH.

UNSEARCHABLE, INSCRUTABLE.

THESE terms are both applied to things set above the understanding of man, but not altogether indifferently; for that which is UNSEARCHABLE is not set at so great a distance from us as that which is INSCRUTABLE: for that which is searched is in common concerns easier to be found than that which requires a scrutiny. The ways of God are all to us finite creatures more or less unsearchable; but the mysterious plans of Providence, as frequently evinced in the affairs of men, are altogether inscrutable.

Things else by me unsearchable, now heard
With wonder.

MILTON.

To expect that the intricacies of science will be pierced by a careless glance, is to expect a particular privilege; but to suppose that the maze is inscrutable to diligence, is to enchain the mind in voluntary shackles.

JOHNSON.

UNSPEAKABLE, INEFFABLE, UNUTTER- ABLE, INEXPRESSIBLE.

UNSPEAKABLE and INEFFABLE, from the Latin for, to speak, have precisely the same meaning; but the unspeakable is said of objects in general, particularly of that which is above human conception, and surpasses the power of language to describe; as the unspeakable goodness of God: INEFFABLE is said of such objects as cannot be painted in words with adequate force; as the ineffable sweetness of a person's look: UNUTTERABLE and INEXPRESSIBLE are extended in their signification to that which is incommunicable by signs from one being to another; thus grief is unutterable which it is not in the power of the sufferer by any sounds to bring home to the feelings of another; grief is inexpressible which is not to be expressed by looks, or words, or any signs. Unutterable is therefore applied only to the individual who wishes to give utterance; inexpressible may be said of that which is to be expressed concerning others: our own pains are unutterable; the sweetness of a person's countenance is inexpressible.

The vast difference of God's nature from ours makes the difference between them so unspeakably great. SOUTH.

UNTRUTH, FALSEHOOD, FALSITY, LIE.

UNTRUTH is an untrue saying; FALSEHOOD and LIE are false sayings: untruth of itself reflects no disgrace on the agent; it may be unintentional or not: a falsehood and a lie are intentional false sayings, differing only in degree as to the guilt of the offender: a falsehood is not always spoken for the express intention of deceiving, but a lie is uttered only for the worst of purposes. Some persons have a habit of telling falsehoods from the mere love of talking: those who are guilty of bad actions endeavor to conceal them by lies. Children are apt to speak untruths for want of understanding the value of words: travellers, from a love of exaggeration, are apt to introduce falsehoods into their narrations: it is the nature of a lie to increase itself to a tenfold degree; one lie must be backed by many more.

Falsehood is also used in the abstract sense for what is false. FALSITY is never used but in the abstract sense, for the property of the false. The former is general, the latter particular, in the application: the truth or falsehood of an assertion is not always to be distinctly proved; the falsity of any particular person's assertion may be proved by the evidence of others.

Above all things tell no untruth, no, not even in trifles. SIR HENRY STONEY.

Many temptations to falsehood will occur in the disguise of passions too specious to fear much resistance. JOHNSON.

Probability does not make any alteration either in the truth or falsity of things. SOUTH.

The nature of a lie consists in this, that it is a false signification knowingly and voluntarily used. SOUTH.

UNWORTHY, WORTHLESS.

UNWORTHY is a term of less reproach than WORTHLESS; for the former signifies not to be worthy of praise or honor; the latter signifies to be without all worth, and consequently in the fullest sense bad. It may be a mark of modesty or humility to say that I am an unworthy partaker of your kindness; but it would be folly and extravagance to say that I am a worthless partaker of your kindness. There are many unworthy members in every religious community; but every society that is conducted upon proper principles will take care to exclude worthless members. In regard to one another, we are often unworthy of the distinctions or privileges we enjoy; in regard to our Maker, we are all unworthy of his goodness, for we are all worthless in his eyes.

Since in dark sorrow I my days did spend,
Till now disdaining his unworthy end. DENHAM.

The school of Socrates was at one time deserted by everybody except Æschines, the parasite of the tyrant Dionysius, and the most worthless man living. CUMBERLAND.

USAGE, CUSTOM, PRESCRIPTION.

THE USAGE is what one has been long used to do; CUSTOM (v. Custom) is what one generally does; PRESCRIPTION is what is prescribed by usage to be done. The usage acquires force and sanction by dint of time; the custom acquires sanction by the frequency of its being done or the numbers doing it; the prescription acquires force by the authority which prescribes. Hence it arises that customs vary in every age, but that usage and prescription supply the place of written law.

With the national assembly of France, possession is nothing, law and usage are nothing. BURKE.

For, since the time of Saturn's holy reign,
His hospitable customs we retain. DRYDEN.

If in any case the shackles of prescription could be wholly shaken off, on what occasion should it be expected but in the selection of lawful pleasure? JOHNSON.

UTILITY, USE, SERVICE, AVAIL.

UTILITY and USE both come from utor. SERVICE, from the Latin servio, to employ or make use of. AVAIL, from a or ad and vail, in French valoir, and Latin valeo, signifies strength for a given purpose or to a given end.

All these terms imply fitness to be employed to advantage (v. Advantage, Benefit). Utility is applied in a general sense to what may be usefully employed: use to that which is actually so employed; things are said to be of general utility, or a thing is said to be of a particular use.

Those things which have long gone together are confederate, whereas new things piece not so well; but, though they help by their utility, yet they trouble by their inconformity. BACON.

The Greeks in the heroic age seem to have been unacquainted with the use of iron.

ROBERTSON.

The word use refers us to the employment of things generally, and the advantage derived from such use; service, the particular state or capacity of a thing to be usefully employed. It is most proper, therefore, to say that prayers and entreaties are of use; but in speaking of tools, weapons, and the like, to say they are of service. Prudence forbids us to destroy anything that may be of use; economy enjoins upon us not to throw aside anything as long as it is fit for service.

A man with great talents but void of discretion is like Polyphemus in the fable, strong and blind, endued with an irresistible force, which for want of sight is of no use to him. ADDISON.

Perhaps it might be of service to these people (hypochondriacs) to wear some electric substance next their skin, to defend the nerves and fibres from the damp of non-electric air. BRYDENE.

All the preceding terms are taken absolutely: AVAIL is a term of relative import; it respects the circumstances under which a thing may be fit or otherwise to be employed with efficacy. When entreaties are found to be of no avail, females sometimes try the force of tears.

What does it avail, though Seneca had taught as good morality as Christ himself from the mount? CUMBERLAND.

TO UTTER, SPEAK, ARTICULATE, PRONOUNCE.

UTTER, from out, signifies to put out; that is, to send forth a sound: this, therefore, is a more general term than SPEAK, which is to utter an intelligible sound. We may utter a groan; we speak words only, or that which is intended to serve as words. To speak, therefore, is only a species of utterance; a dumb man has utterance, but not speech. ARTICULATE and PRONOUNCE are modes of speaking; to articulate, from articulum, a joint,

is to pronounce distinctly the letters or syllables of words; which is the first effort of a child beginning to speak. It is of great importance to make a child articulate every letter when he first begins to speak or read. To pronounce, from the Latin pronuncio, to speak out loud, is a formal mode of speaking. A child must first articulate the letters and the syllables, then he pronounces or sets forth the whole word; this is necessary before he can speak to be understood.

V.

VACANCY, VACUITY, INANITY.

VACANCY and VACUITY both denote the space unoccupied, or the abstract quality of being unoccupied. INANITY, from the Latin innanis, denotes the abstract quality of emptiness, or of not containing anything; hence the former terms vacancy and vacuity are used in an indifferent sense; inanity always in a bad sense: there may be a vacancy in the mind, or a vacancy in life, which we may or may not fill up as we please; but inanity of character denotes the want of the essentials that constitute a character.

There are vacuities in the happiest life, which it is not in the power of the world to fill.

BLAIR.

When I look up and behold the heavens, it makes me scorn the world and the pleasures thereof, considering the vanity of these and the inanity of the other. HOWELL.

VAIN, INEFFECTUAL, FRUITLESS.

THESE epithets are all applied to our endeavors; but the term VAIN (v. Idle) is the most general and indefinite; the other terms are particular and definite. What we aim at, as well as what we strive for, may be vain; but INEFFECTUAL, that is, not effectual (v. Effective), and FRUITLESS, that is, without fruit, signifying not producing the desired fruit of one's labor, refer only to the termination or value of our labors. When the object aimed at is general in its import, it is common to term the endeavor vain when it cannot attain this object: it is vain to attempt to reform a person's character until he is convinced that he stands in need of reformation; when the means employed are inadequate for the attainment of the particular end, it is usual to call the endeavor ineffectual; cool arguments will be ineffectual in convincing any one inflamed with a particular passion: when labor is specifically employed for the attainment of a particular object, it is usual to term it fruitless if it fail: peace-makers will often find themselves in this condition, that their labors will be rendered fruitless by the violent passions of angry opponents.

Nature aloud calls out for balmy rest,
But all in vain. GENTLEMAN.

After many fruitless overtures, the Inca, despairing of any cordial union with a Spaniard, attacked him by surprise with a numerous body. ROBERTSON.

Thou thyself with scorn
And anger wouldst resent the offer'd wrong,
Though ineffectual found. MILTON.

VALUABLE, PRECIOUS, COSTLY.

VALUABLE signifies fit to be valued; PRECIOUS, having a high price; COSTLY, costing much money. Valuable expresses directly the idea of value; precious and costly express the same idea indirectly: on the other hand, that which is valuable is only said to be fit or deserving of value; but precious and costly denote that which is highly valuable, according to the ordinary measure of valuing objects, that is, by the price they bear; hence, the latter two express the idea much more strongly than the former.

Remote countries cannot convey their commodities by land to those places, when on account of their rarity they are desired and become valuable. ROBERTSON.

It is no improper comparison that a thankful heart is like a box of precious ointment. HOWELL.

The king gave him all the duke's rich furs, and much of his costly household stuff. LLOYD.

They are similarly distinguished in their moral application: a book is valuable according to its contents, or according to the estimate which men set upon it, either individually or collectively. The Bible is the only precious book in the world that has intrinsic value, that is, set above all price. There are many costly things, which are only valuable to the individuals who are disposed to expend money upon them.

What an absurd thing it is to pass over all the valuable parts of a man, and fix our attention on his infirmities! ADDISON.

Christ is sometimes pleased to make the profession of himself costly. SOUTH.

VALUE, WORTH, RATE, PRICE.

VALUE, from the Latin valere, to be strong, respects those essential qualities which constitute its strength. WORTH, in German worth, from währen, to perceive, signifies that good which is experienced or felt to exist in a thing. RATE, v. Proportion. PRICE, in Latin pretium, from the Greek πρᾶσις, to sell, signifies what a thing is sold for.

Value is a general and indefinite term, applied to whatever is conceived to be good in a thing: the worth is that good only which is conceived or known as such. The value, therefore, of a thing is as variable as the humors and circumstances of men; it may be nothing or something very great in the same object at the same time in the eyes of different men. The worth is, however, that value which is acknowledged; it is therefore something more fixed and permanent: we speak of the value of external objects which are determined by taste; but the worth of things as determined by rule. The value of a book that is out of print is fluctuating and uncertain; but its real worth may not be more than what it would fetch for waste paper. The rate and price are the measures of that value or worth; the former in a general, the latter in a particular application to mercantile transactions. Whatever we give in exchange for another thing, whether according to a definite or an indefinite estimation, that is said to be done at a certain rate; thus we purchase pleasure at a dear rate, when it is at the expense of our health: price is the rate of exchange estimated by coin or any other medium: hence price is a fixed rate, and may be figuratively applied in that sense to moral objects; as, when health is expressly sacrificed to pleasure, it may be termed the price of pleasure.

Life has no value as an end, but means.
An end deplorable! A means divine. YOUNG.

If you will take my humor as it runs, you shall have hearty thanks into the bargain for taking it off at such a rate.

EARL OF SHAPTESBURY.

The soul's high price
Is writ in all the conduct of the skies. YOUNG.

TO VALUE, PRIZE, ESTEEM.

To VALUE is in the literal sense to fix a value on a thing. PRIZE, signifying to fix a price, and ESTEEM (v. Esteem), are both modes of valuing.

To value is to set any value, real or supposititious, relative or absolute, on a thing: in this sense men value gold above silver, or an appraiser values goods. To value may either be applied to material or spiritual subjects, to corporeal or mental actions: prize and esteem are taken only as mental actions; the former in reference to sensible or moral objects, the latter only to moral objects: we may value books according to their market price, or we may value them according to their contents; we prize books only for their contents, in which sense prize is a much stronger term than value; we also prize men for their usefulness to society; we esteem their moral characters.

The prize, the beauteous prize, I will resign,
So dearly valu'd, and so justly mine. POPE.

Nothing makes women esteemed by the opposite sex more than chastity; whether it be that we always prize those most who are hardest to come at, or that nothing besides chastity, with its collateral attendants, fidelity and constancy, gives a man a property in the person he loves.

ADDISON.

VARIATION, VARIETY.

VARIATION denotes the act of varying (v. To change); VARIETY denotes the quality of varying, or the thing varied. The astronomer observes the variations in the heavens; the philosopher observes the variations in the climate from year to year. Variety is pleasing to all persons, but to none so much as the young and the fickle: there is an infinite variety in every species of objects, animate or inanimate.

The idea of variation (as a constituent in beauty), without attending so accurately to the manner of variation, has led Mr. Hogarth to consider angular figures as beautiful. BURKE.

As to the colors usually found in beautiful bodies, it may be difficult to ascertain them, because in the several parts of nature there is an infinite variety. BURKE.

VENAL, MERCENARY.

VENAL, from the Latin venalis, signifies salable or ready to be sold, which, applied as it commonly is to persons, is a much stronger term than MERCENARY (v. Mercenary). A venal man gives up all principle for interest; a mercenary man seeks his interest without regard to principle: venal writers are such as write in favor of the cause that can promote them to riches or honors; a servant is commonly a mercenary, who gives his services according as he is paid: those who are loudest in their professions of political purity are the best subjects for a minister to make venal; a mercenary spirit is engendered in the minds of those who devote themselves exclusively to trade.

The minister, well pleas'd at small expense,
To silence so much rude impertinence,
With squeeze and whisper yields to his demands,
And on the venal list enroll'd he stands. JENTINA.

For their assistance they repair to the Northern steel, and bring in an unnatural, mercenary crew. SOUTH.

VENIAL, PARDONABLE.

VENIAL, from the Latin venia, pardon or indulgence, is applied to what may be tolerated without express disparagement to the individual, or direct censure; but the PARDONABLE is that which may only escape severe censure, but cannot be allowed: garrulity is a venial offence in old age; levity in youth is pardonable in single instances.

While the clergy are employed in extirpating mortal sins, I should be glad to rally the world out of indecencies and venial transgressions.

CUMBERLAND

The weaknesses of Elizabeth were not confined to that period of life when they are more paradonable.
ROBERTSON.

VERBAL, VOCAL, ORAL.

VERBAL, from verbum, a word, signifies after the manner of a spoken word; ORAL, from os, a mouth, signifies by word of mouth; and VOCAL, from vox, the voice, signifies by the voice: the former two of these words are used to distinguish the speaking from writing; the latter to distinguish the sounds of the voice from any other sounds, particularly in singing: a verbal message is distinguished from one written on a paper, or in a note; oral tradition is distinguished from that which is handed down to posterity by means of books; vocal music is distinguished from instrumental; vocal sounds are more harmonious than those which proceed from any other bodies.

Among all the Northern nations, shaking of hands was held necessary to bind the bargain, a custom which we still retain in many verbal contracts.
BLACKSTONE.

And join'd their vocal worship to the choir
Of creatures wanting voice.
MILTON.

In the first ages of the world instruction was commonly oral.
JOHNSON.

VEAXATION, MORTIFICATION, CHAGRIN.

VEAXATION (v. To displease) springs from a variety of causes, acting unpleasantly on the inclinations or passions of men; MORTIFICATION (v. To humble) is a strong degree of vezation, which arises from particular circumstances acting on particular passions: the loss of a day's pleasure is a vezation to one who is eager for pleasure; the loss of a prize, or the circumstance of coming into disgrace where we expected honor, is a mortification to an ambitious person. Vezation arises principally from our wishes and views being crossed; mortification, from our pride and self-importance being hurt; CHAGRIN, in French chagrin, from aigrir, and the Latin acer, sharp, signifying a sharp point, arises from a mixture of the two; disappointments are always attended with more or less of vezation, according to the circumstances which give pain and trouble; an exposure of our poverty may be more or less of a mortification, according to the value which we set on wealth and grandeur; a refusal of a request will produce more or less of chagrin, as it is accompanied with circumstances more or less mortifying to our pride.

Poverty is an evil complicated with so many circumstances of uneasiness and vexation, that every man is studious to avoid it.
JOHNSON.

I am mortified by those compliments which were designed to encourage me.
POPE.

VIEW, SURVEY, PROSPECT.

VIEW (v. To look), and SURVEY, compounded of vey or view and sur, over, mark the act of the person, namely, the looking over a thing with more or less attention: PROSPECT, from the Latin prospectus and prospicio, to see before, designates the thing seen. We take a view or survey; the prospect presents itself: the view is of an indefinite extent; the survey is always comprehensive in its nature. Ignorant people take but narrow views of things; men take more or less enlarged views, according to their cultivation: the capacious mind of a genius takes a survey of all nature. The view depends altogether on the train of a person's thoughts; the prospect is set before him, it depends upon the nature of the thing: our views of advancement are sometimes very fallacious; our prospects are very delusive; both occasion disappointment: the former is the keener, as we have to charge the miscalculation upon ourselves. Sometimes our prospects depend upon our views, at least in matters of religion; he who forms erroneous views of a future state has but a wretched prospect beyond the grave.

With inward view
Thence on the ideal kingdom swift she turns
Her eye.

JENYNS.

VIEW, PROSPECT, LANDSCAPE.

VIEW and PROSPECT (v. View, prospect), though applied here to external objects of sense, have a similar distinction as in the preceding article. The view is not only that which may be seen, but that which is actually seen; the prospect is that which may be seen; hence the term view is mostly coupled with the person viewing, although a prospect exists continually, whether seen or not: hence we speak of our view being intercepted, but not our prospect intercepted; a confined or bounded view, but a lively or dreary prospect, or the prospect clears up or extends.

Ye noble few! who here unbending stand
Beneath life's pressure, yet bear up awhile,
And what your bounded view, which only saw
A little part, deemed evil, is no more. THOMSON.

The great eternal scheme,
Involving all, and in a perfect whole
Uniting as the prospect wider spreads
To reason's eye refin'd, clears up apace.

THOMSON.

View is an indefinite term; it may be said either of a number of objects or of a single object, of a whole or of a part: prospect is said only of an aggregate number of objects: we may have a view of a town, of a number of scattered houses, of a single house, or of the spire of a steeple; but the prospect comprehends that which comes within the range of the eye. View may be said of that which is seen directly or indirectly; prospect only of that which directly presents itself to the eye: hence a drawing of an object may be termed a view, although not a prospect. View is confined to no particular objects; prospect mostly respects rural objects; and LANDSCAPE respects no others. Landscape, landskip, or landshap, denote any portion of country which is in a particular form: hence the landscape is a species of prospect. A prospect may be wide, and comprehend an assemblage of objects both of nature and art; but a landscape is narrow, and lies within the compass of the naked eye: hence it is also that landscape may be taken for the drawing of a landscape, and consequently for a species of view: the taking of views or landscapes is the last exercise of the learner in drawing.

Thus was this place
A happy rural seat of various views. MILTON.

DRYDEN.

VIOLENT, FURIOUS, BOISTEROUS, VEHEMENT, IMPETUOUS.

VIOLENT signifies having force (v. Force). FURIOUS signifies having fury (v. Anger). BOISTEROUS in all probability comes from bestir, signifying ready to bestir or come into motion. VEHEMENT, in Latin vehemens, compounded of veho and mens, signifies carried away by the mind or the force of passion. IMPETUOUS signifies having an impetus.

Violent is here the most general term, including the idea of force or violence, which is common to them all; it is as general in its application as in its meaning. When violent and furious are applied to the same objects, the latter expresses a higher degree of the former: a furious whirlwind is violent beyond measure. Violent and boisterous are likewise applied to the same objects; but the boisterous refers only to the violence of the motion or noise: hence we say that a wind is violent, inasmuch as it acts with great force upon all bodies; it is boisterous, inasmuch as it causes the great motion of bodies: impetuous, like boisterous, is also applied to bodies moving with great violence.

Probably the breadth of it (the passage between Scylla and Charybdis) is greatly increased by the violent impetuosity of the current.

BEYDOKE.

SOMERVILLE.

With boisterous sweep, I raise my voice to you.

THOMSON.

The central waters round impetuous rush'd.

THOMSON.

These terms are all applied to persons, or what is personal, with a similar distinction: a man is violent in his opinions, violent in his measures, violent in his resentments; he is furious in his anger, or has a furious temper; he is vehement in his affections or passions, vehement in love, vehement in zeal, vehement in pursuing an object, vehement in expression: violence transfers itself to some external object on which it acts with force; but vehemence respects that species of violence which is confined to the person himself: we may dread violence, because it is always liable to do mischief; we ought to suppress our vehemence, because it is injurious to ourselves: a violent partisan renders himself obnoxious to others; a man who is vehement in any cause puts it out of his own power to be of use. Impetuosity is rather the extreme of violence or vehemence: an impetuous attack is an excessively violent attack; an impetuous character is an excessively vehement character. Boisterous is said of the manner and the behavior rather than the mind.

This gentleman, among a thousand others, is a great instance of the fate of all who are carried away by party-spirit of any side; I wish all etolence may succeed as ill. FORD.

If there be any use of gesticulation, it must be applied to the ignorant and rude, who will be more affected by vehemence than delighted by propriety. JOHNSON.

But there a power steps in and limits the arrogance of raging passions and furious elements. BURKE.

Is there a passion whose impetuous force Disturbs the human breast, and breaking forth With sad eruptions deals destruction round, But, by the magic strains of some soft air, Is harmonized to peace? COWPER.

They in this examination, of which there is printed an account not unentertaining, behaved with the boisterousness of men elated with recent authority. JOHNSON.

VISION, APPARITION, PHANTOM, SPECTRE, GHOST.

VISION, from the Latin visus, seeing or seen, signifies either the act of seeing or thing seen: APPARITION, from appear, signifies the thing that appears. As the thing seen is only the improper signification, the term vision is never employed but in regard to some agent: the vision depends upon the state of the visual organ; the vision of a person whose sight is defective will frequently be fallacious; he will see some things double which are single, long which are short, and the like.

He clasps his lens, if haply they may see,
Close to the part where vision ought to be,
But finds that, though his tubes assist the sight,
They cannot give it, or make darkness light. COWPER.

In like manner, if the sight be miraculously impressed, his vision will enable him to see that which is supernatural: hence it is that vision is either true or false, according to the circumstances of the individual; and a vision, signifying a thing seen, is taken for a supernatural exertion of the vision: apparition, on the contrary, refers us to the object seen; this may be true or false, according to the manner in which it presents itself. Joseph was warned by a vision to fly into Egypt with his family; Mary Magdalene was informed of the resurrection of our Saviour by an apparition: feverish people often think they see visions; timid and credulous people sometimes take trees and posts for apparitions.

Visions and inspirations some expect

Till out of breath he overtakes his fellows,
Who gather round and wonder at the tale
Of horrid apparition. BLAIR.

PHANTOM, from the Greek φανω, to appear, is used for a false apparition, or the appearance of a thing otherwise than what it is; thus the ignis fatuus, vulgarly called Jack-o'-Lantern, is a phantom. SPECTRE, from specio, to behold, and GHOST, from geist, a spirit, are the apparitions of immaterial substances. The spectre is taken for any spiritual being that appears; but ghost is taken only for the spirits of departed men who appear to their fellow-creatures: a spectre is sometimes made to appear on the stage; ghosts exist mostly in the imagination of the young and the ignorant.

The phantoms which haunt a desert are want,
and misery, and danger. JOHNSON.

Rous'd from their slumbers,
In grim array the grisly spectres rise. BLAIR.

The lonely tower
Is also shunn'd, whose mournful chambers hold,
So night-struck fancy dreams, the yelling ghost. THOMSON.

VOTE, SUFFRAGE, VOICE.

VOTE, in Latin votum, from voceo, to vow, is very probably from vox, a voice, signifying the voice that is raised in supplication to heaven. SUFFRAGE, in Latin suffragium, is in all probability compounded of sub and frango, to break out or declare for a thing. VOICE is here figuratively taken for the voice that is raised in favor of a thing.

The vote is the wish itself, whether expressed or not; a person has a vote, that is, the power of wishing; but the suffrage and the voice are the wish that is expressed; a person gives his suffrage or his voice. The vote is the settled and fixed wish, it is that by which social concerns in life are determined; the suffrage is a vote given only in particular cases; the voice is the declared opinion or wish, expressed either by individuals or the public at large. The vote and voice are given either for or against a person or thing; the suffrage is commonly given in favor of a person: in all public assemblies the majority of votes decide the question; members of Parliament are chosen by the suffrages of the people; in the execution of a will, every executor has a voice in all that is transacted.

The popular votes
Inclines here to continue. MILTON.

Reputation is commonly lost, because it never was deserved; and was conferred at first, not by the suffrage of criticism, but by the fondness of friendship. JOHNSON.

The wise of learn'd antiquity proclaim
This truth; the public voices declare the same. JENYNS.

W.

TO WAIT, WAIT FOR, AWAIT, LOOK FOR, EXPECT.

WAIT, WAIT FOR, AWAIT, in German warten, which is an intensive of währen, to see or look, and EXPECT, from the Latin ex, out of, and specto, to behold, both signify originally the same thing as LOOK FOR, i. e., to look with concern for a thing.

All these terms express the action of the mind when directed to future matters of personal concern to the agent. Wait, wait for, and await, differ less in sense than in application, the former two being in familiar use, and the latter only in the grave style: these words imply the looking simply toward an object in a state of suspense or still regard; as to wait until a person arrives, or wait for his arrival; and await the hour of one's death, that is, to keep the mind in readiness for it.

Wait till thy being shall be unfolded. BLAIR.
Not less resolv'd, Antenor's valiant heir
Confronts Achilles, and awaits the war. POPE.

Wait and wait for refer to matters that are remote and obscure in the prospect, or uncertain in the event; await may be applied to that which is considered to be near at hand and probable to happen, and in this sense it is clearly allied to look for and expect, the former of which expresses the acts of the eye as well as the mind, the latter, the act of the mind only, in contemplating an object as very probable or even certain. It is our duty patiently to await the severest trials when they threaten us. When children are too much indulged and caressed, they are apt to look for a repetition of caresses at inconvenient seasons; it is in vain to look for or expect happiness from the conjugal state, when it is not founded on a cordial and mutual regard.

This said, he sat, and expectation held
His looks suspense, awaiting who appeared
To second, or oppose, or undertake
The perilous attempt. MILTON.

If you look for a friend in whose temper there is not to be found the least inequality, you look for a pleasing phantom. BLAIR.

We are not to expect from our intercourse with others, all that satisfaction we fondly wish. BLAIR.

WAKEFUL, WATCHFUL, VIGILANT.

We may be WAKEFUL without being WATCHFUL; but we cannot be watchful without being wakeful. Wakefulness is an affair of the body, and depends upon the temperament; watchfulness is an affair of the will, and depends upon the determination: some persons are more wakeful than they wish to be; few are as watchful as they ought to be. VIGILANCE, from the Latin vigil, and the Greek αγαλλος, αγαλλιαω, to be on the alert, expresses a high degree of watchfulness: a sentinel is watchful who on ordinary occasions keeps good watch; but it is necessary for him, on extraordinary occasions, to be vigilant, in order to detect whatever may pass. We are watchful only in the proper sense of watching; but we may be vigilant in detecting moral as well as natural evils.

Music shall wake her that hath power to charm
Pale sickness, and avert the stings of pain:
Can raise or quell our passions, and be calm
In sweet oblivion the too wakeful sense. FLETCHER.

TO WANDER, TO STROLL, RAMBLE,
ROVE, ROAM, RANGE.

WANDER, in German wandern, is a frequentative of wenden, to turn, signifying to turn frequently. To STROLL is probably an intensive of to roll, that is, to go in a planless manner. RAMBLE, from the Latin re and ambulo, is to walk backward and forward; and ROVE is probably a contraction of ramble. ROAM is connected with our word room, space, signifying to go in a wide space, and the Hebrew rom, to be violently moved backward and forward. RANGE, from the noun range, a rank, row, or extended space, signifies to go over a great space.

The idea of going in an irregular and free manner is common to all these terms. To wander is to go in no fixed path; to stroll is to wander out of a path that we had taken. To wander may be an involuntary action; a person may wander to a great distance, or for an indefinite length of time; in this manner a person wanders who has lost himself in a wood: to stroll is a voluntary action, limited at our discretion; thus when a person takes a walk, he sometimes strolls from one path into another as he pleases: to ramble is to wander without any object, and consequently with more than ordinary irregularity; in this manner he who sets out to take a walk, without knowing or thinking where he shall go, rambles as chance directs: to rove is to wander in the same planless manner, but to a wider extent; a fugitive who does not know his road roves about the country in quest of some retreat: to roam is to wander from the impulse of a troubled mind; in this manner a lunatic who has broken loose may roam about the country; so likewise a person who travels about, because he cannot rest in quiet at home, may also be said to roam in quest of peace: to range is the contrary of to roam; as the former indicates a disordered state of mind, the latter indicates composure and fixedness; we range within certain limits, as the hunter ranges the forest, the shepherd ranges the mountains.

But far about they wander from the grave
Of him, whom his ungentle fortune urg'd
Against his own sad breast to lift the hand
Of implous violence. THOMSON.

TO WANT, NEED, LACK.

To be without is the common idea expressed by these terms; but to WANT is to be without that which contributes to our comfort, or is an object of our desire; to NEED is to be without that which is essential for our existence or our purposes; to LACK, which is probably a variation from lack, and a term not in frequent use, expresses little more than the general idea of being without, unaccompanied by any collateral idea. From the close connection which subsists between desiring and want, it is usual to consider what we want as artificial, and what we need as natural and indispensable: what one man wants is a superfluity to another; but that which is needed by one is in like circumstances needed by all: tender people want a fire when others would be glad not to have it; all persons need warm clothing and a warm house in the winter.

To be rich is to have more than is desired, and more than is wanted. JOHNSON.

The old from such affairs are only freed,
Which vigorous youth and strength of body need. DENHAM.

To want and need may extend indefinitely to many or all objects; to lack, or be deficient, is properly said of a single object; we may want or need everything; we lack one thing, we lack this or that; a rich man may lack understanding, virtue, or religion; he who wants nothing is a happy man; he who needs nothing may be happy if he wants no more than he has; for then he lacks that which alone can make him happy, which is contentment.

WATERMAN, BOATMAN, FERRYMAN.

THESE three terms are employed for persons who are engaged with boats ; but the term WATERMAN is specifically applied to such whose business it is to let out their boats and themselves for a given time ; the BOATMAN may use a boat only occasionally for the transfer of goods ; a FERRYMAN uses a boat only for the conveyance of persons or goods across a particular river or piece of water.

Bubbles of air working upward from the very bottom of the lake, the waterman told us that they are observed always to rise in the same places. ADDISON.

That the hoarse waters from his frigot ran. SPENSER.

WAVE, BILLOW, SURGE, BREAKER.

WAVE, from the Saxon waegan, and German wiegen, to weigh or rock, is applied to water in an undulating state ; it is, therefore, the generic term, and the rest are specific terms : those waves which swell more than ordinarily are termed BILLOWS, which is derived from bulge or bilge, and German balg, the paunch or belly : those waves which rise higher than usual are termed SURGES, from the Latin surgo, to rise : those waves which dash against the shore, or against vessels, with more than ordinary force, are termed BREAKERS.

The wave behind impels the waves before. POPE.
I saw him beat the billows under him,
And ride upon their backs. SHAKESPEARE.

He flies aloft, and with impetuous roar,
Pursues the foaming surges to the shore. DRYDEN.

Now on the mountain wave on high they ride,
Then downward plunge beneath th' involving tide,

Till one who seems in agony to strive,
The whirling breakers heave on shore alive. FALCONER.

WAY, MANNER, METHOD, MODE, COURSE, MEANS.

ALL these words denote the steps which are pursued from the beginning to the completion of any work. The WAY is both general and indefinite ; it is either taken by accident or chosen by design : the MANNER and METHOD are species of the way chosen by design. Whoever attempts to do that which is strange to him, will at first do it in an awkward way ; the manner of conferring a favor is often more than the favor itself ; experience supplies men in the end with a suitable method of carrying on their business.

The ways of Heaven are dark and intricate.

ADDISON.

My mind is taken up in a more melancholy manner. ATTENBURY.

Men are willing to try all methods of reconciling guilt and quiet. JOHNSON.

The method is said of that which requires contrivance ; the MODE, of that which requires practice and habitual attention ; the former being applied to matters of art, and the latter to mechanical actions : the master has a good method of teaching to write ; the scholar has a good or bad mode of holding his pen. The COURSE and the MEANS are the way which we pursue in our moral conduct : the course is the course of measures which are adopted to produce a certain result ; the means collectively for the course which lead to a certain end : in order to obtain legal redress, we must pursue a certain course in law ; law is one means of gaining redress, but we do wisely, if we can, to adopt the safer and pleasanter means of persuasion and cool remonstrance.

Modes of speech, which owe their prevalence to modish folly, die away with their inventors. JOHNSON.

All your sophisters cannot produce anything better adapted to preserve a rational and manly freedom than the course that we have pursued. BURKE.

WEAK, FEEBLE, INFIRM.

WEAK, in Saxon wace, Dutch wack, German schwach, is in all probability an intensive of weich, soft, which comes from weichen, to yield, and this from bewegen, to move. FEEBLE, probably contracted from failable. INFIRM, v. Debility.

The Saxon term weak is here, as it usually is, the familiar and universal term; feeble is suited to a more polished style; infirm is only a species of the weak: we may be weak in body or mind; but we are commonly feeble and infirm only in the body: we may be weak from disease, or weak by nature, it equally conveys the gross idea of a defect: but the term feeble and infirm are qualified expressions for weakness: a child is feeble from its infancy; an old man is feeble from age; the latter may likewise be infirm in consequence of sickness. We pity the weak, but their weakness often gives us pain; we assist the feeble when they attempt to walk; we support the infirm when they are unable to stand. The same distinction exists between weak and feeble in the moral use of the words: a weak attempt to excuse a person conveys a reproachful meaning; but the feeble efforts which we make to defend another may be praiseworthy, although feeble.

You, gallant Vernon! saw
The miserable scene; you pitying saw;
To infant weakness sunk the warrior's arm.

THOMSON.

nishes me.

ATTENBURY.

TO WEAKEN, ENFEEBLE, DEBILITATE,
ENERVATE, INVALIDATE.

TO WEAKEN is to make weak (v. Weak), and is, as before, the generic term: to ENFEEBLE is to make feeble (v. Weak): to DEBILITATE is to cause debility (v. Debility): to ENERVATE is to unnerve; and to INVALIDATE is to make not valid or strong: all of which are but modes of weakening applicable to different objects. To weaken may be either a temporary or permanent act when applied to persons; enfeeble is permanent, either as to the body or the mind: we may be weakened suddenly by severe pain; we are *enfeeble*d in a gradual manner, either by the slow effects of disease or age. To weaken is either a particular or a complete act; to enfeeble, to debilitate, and enervate are properly partial acts: what *enfeeble*s deprives of vital or essential power; what debilitates may lessen power in one particular, though not in another; the severe exercise of any power, such as the memory or the attention, will tend to debilitate that faculty: what enervates acts particularly on the nervous system; it relaxes the frame, and unfits the person for action either of body or mind. To weaken is said of things as well as persons; to invalidate is said of things only: we weaken the force of an argument by an injudicious application; we invalidate the claim of another by proving its informality in law.

No article of faith can be true which weakens the practical part of religion.

WEARISOME, TIRESOME, TEDIOUS.

WEARISOME (v. To weary) is the general and indefinite term; TIRESOME (v. To weary), and TEDIOUS, causing tedium, a specific form of wearisomeness: common things may cause weariness; that which acts painfully is either tiresome or tedious; but in different degrees the repetition of the same sounds will grow tiresome; long waiting in anxious suspense is tedious: there is more of that which is physical in the tiresome, and mental in the tedious.

All weariness presupposes weakness, and consequently every long, importune, wearisome petition is truly and properly a force upon him that is pursued with it.

TO WEARY, TIRE, JADE, HARASS.

TO WEARY is a frequentative of wear, that is, to wear out the strength. To TIRE, from the French tirer and the Latin traho, to draw, signifies to draw out the strength. To JADE is the same as to goad. HARASS, v. Distress.

Long exertion wearies; a little exertion will tire a child or a weak man; forced exertions jade; painful exertions, or exertions coupled with painful circumstances, harass: the horse is jaded who is forced on beyond his strength; the soldier is harassed who in his march is pressed on by a pursuing enemy. We are wearied with thinking when it gives us pain to think any longer; we are tired of our employment when it ceases to give us pleasure; we are jaded by incessant attention to business; we are harassed by perpetual complaints which we cannot redress.

WEIGHT, HEAVINESS, GRAVITY.

WEIGHT, from to weigh, is that which a thing weighs. HEAVINESS, from heavy and heave, signifies the abstract quality of the heavy, or difficult to heave. GRAVITY, from the Latin gravis, likewise denotes the same abstract quality.

Weight is indefinite; whatever may be weighed has a weight, whether large or small: heaviness and gravity are the property of bodies having a great weight. Weight is only opposed to that which has or is supposed to have no weight, that is, what is incorporeal or immaterial; for we may speak of the weight of the lightest conceivable bodies, as the weight of a feather: heaviness is opposed to lightness; the heaviness of lead is opposed to the lightness of a feather. Weight lies absolutely in the thing; heaviness is relatively considered with respect to the person: we estimate the weight of things according to a certain measure; we estimate the heaviness of things by our feelings. Gravity is that species of weight which is scientifically considered as inherent in certain bodies; the term is therefore properly scientific.

Universally a body plunged in water loses as much of its weight as is equal to the weight of a body of water of its own bulk. GOLDSMITH.

The object is concerning the heaviness of several bodies, or the proportion that is required between any weight and the power which may raise it. WILKINS.

Of all bodies considered within the confines of a fluid there is a twofold gravity, true and absolute. QUINCY.

WEIGHT, BURDEN, LOAD.

WEIGHT, v. Weight. BURDEN, from bear, signifies the thing borne. LOAD, in German laden, low German and Dutch laeyen, is connected with our word lay, laid, signifying to lay on or in anything.

The term weight is here considered in common with the other terms, in the sense of a positive weight; by which it is allied to the word burden: the weight is said either of persons or things; the burden more commonly respects persons; the load may be said of either: a person may sink under the weight that rests upon him; a platform may break down from the weight upon it: a person sinks under his burden or load; a cart breaks down from the load. The weight is abstractedly taken for what has weight, without reference to the cause of its being there; burden and load have respect to the person or thing by which they are produced; accident produces the weight; a person takes a burden upon himself, or has it imposed upon him; the load is always laid on: it is not proper to carry any weight that exceeds our strength; those who bear the burden expect to reap the fruit of their labor; he who carries loads must be contented to take such as are given him.

On the tops of the highest mountains, where the air is so pure and refined, and where there is not that immense weight of gross vapors pressing upon the body, the mind acts with greater freedom. BRYDENE.

Camels have their provender Only for bearing burdens, and sore blows For sinking under them. SOMERVILLE.

His barns are stor'd, And groaning staddles bend beneath their load. SOMERVILLE.

In the moral application these terms mark the pain which is produced by a pressure; but the weight and load rather describe the positive severity of the pressure; the burden respects the temper and inclinations of the sufferer; the load is in this case a very great weight: a minister of state has a weight on his mind at all times, from the heavy responsibility which attaches to his station; one who labors under strong apprehensions or dread of an evil has a load on his mind; any sort of employment is a burden to one who wishes to be idle; and time unemployed is a burden to him who wishes to be always in action.

With what oppressive weight will sickness, disappointment, or old age fall upon the spirits of that man who is a stranger to God! BLAIR.

MILTON.

How a man can have a quiet and cheerful mind under a burden and load of guilt, I know not, unless he be very ignorant. RAY.

WELL-BEING, WELFARE, PROSPERITY, HAPPINESS.

WELL-BEING may be said of one or many, but more of a body; the well-being of society depends upon a due subordination of the different ranks of which it is composed. WELFARE, or faring well, from the German fahren, to go, respects the good condition of an individual; a parent is naturally anxious for the welfare of his child. Well-being and welfare consist of such things as more immediately affect our existence: PROSPERITY, which comprehends both well-being and welfare, includes likewise all that can add to the enjoyments of man. The prosperity of a state, or of an individual, therefore, consists in the increase of wealth, power, honors, and the like; as outward circumstances more or less affect the HAPPINESS of man: happiness is, therefore, often substituted for prosperity; but it must never be forgotten that happiness properly lies only in the mind, and that consequently prosperity may exist without happiness; but happiness, at least as far as respects a body of men, cannot exist without some portion of prosperity.

WARBURTON.

WHOLE, ENTIRE, COMPLETE, TOTAL, INTEGRAL.

WHOLE excludes subtraction; ENTIRE excludes division; COMPLETE excludes deficiency: a whole orange has had nothing taken from it; an entire orange is not yet cut; and a complete orange is grown to its full size: it is possible, therefore, for a thing to be whole and not entire: and to be both, and yet not complete: an orange cut into parts is whole while all the parts remain together, but it is not entire; it may be whole as distinguished from a part, entire as far as it has no wound or incision in it; but it may not be a complete orange if it is defective in its growth. Whole is applied to everything of which there may be a part actually or in imagination; as the whole line, the whole day, the whole world: entire is applied only to such things as may be damaged or injured, or is already damaged to its fullest extent; as an entire building, or entire ruin: complete is applied to that which does not require anything further to be done to it; as a complete house, a complete circle, and the like.

The whole island produces corn only sufficient to support its inhabitants for five months, or little more.

INTEGRAL, from integer, entire, has the same signification, but is applied now to parts or numbers not broken.

WICKED, INQUITOUS, NEFARIOUS.

WICKED (v. Bad) is here the generic term ; INQUITOUS, from iniquus, unjust, signifies that species of wickedness which consists in violating the law of right between man and man ; NEFARIOUS, from the Latin nefas, wicked or abominable, is that species of wickedness which consists in violating the most sacred obligations. The term wicked, being indefinite, is commonly applied in a milder sense than iniquitous ; and iniquitous than nefarious : it is wicked to deprive another of his property unlawfully, under any circumstances ; but it is iniquitous if it be done by fraud and circumvention ; and nefarious if it involves any breach of trust ; any undue influence over another, in the making of his will, to the detriment of the rightful heir, is iniquitous ; any underhand dealing of a servant to defraud his master is nefarious.

In the corrupted currents of this world,
Offence's gilded hand may shove by justice ;
And oft 'tis seen, the wicked prize itself
Buys out the law. SHAKESPEARE.

TO WILL, WISH.

THE WILL is that faculty of the soul which is the most prompt and decisive ; it immediately impels to action : the WISH is but a gentle motion of the soul toward a thing. We can will nothing but what we can effect ; we may wish for many things which lie above our reach. The will must be under the entire control of reason, or it will lead a person into every mischief : wishes ought to be under the direction of reason ; or otherwise they may greatly disturb our happiness.

A good inclination is but the first rude draught of virtue ; but the finishing strokes are from the will. SOUTH.

The wishing of a thing is not properly the willing of it : it imports no more than an idle, unoperative complacency in, and desire of, the object. SOUTH.

WILLINGLY, VOLUNTARILY, SPONTANEOUSLY.

To do a thing WILLINGLY is to do it with a good will ; to do a thing VOLUNTARILY is to do it of one's own accord : the former respects one's willingness to comply with the wishes of another ; we do what is asked of us ; it is a mark of good-nature : the latter respects our freedom from foreign influence ; we do that which we like to do ; it is a mark of our sincerity. It is pleasant to see a child do his task willingly ; it is pleasant to see a man voluntarily engage in any service of public good. SPONTANEOUSLY is but a mode of the voluntary, applied, however, more commonly to inanimate objects than to the will of persons : the ground produces spontaneously, when it produces without culture ; and words flow spontaneously which require no effort on the part of the speaker to produce them. If, however, applied to the will, it bespeaks in a stronger degree the totally unbiassed state of the agent's mind : the spontaneous effusions of the heart are more than the voluntary services of benevolence. The willing is opposed to the unwilling, the voluntary to the mechanical or involuntary, the spontaneous to the reluctant or the artificial.

Food not of angels, yet accepted so,

chosen, and then voluntarily continued.

JOHNSON.

Of these none uncontroll'd and lawless rove,
But to some destin'd end spontaneous move.

JENTRE.

WISDOM, PRUDENCE.

WISDOM, from weisen, to know, is the general term ; it embraces the whole of practical knowledge : PRUDENCE (v. Prudent) is a branch of wisdom. Wisdom directs all matters present or to come. Prudence, which acts by foresight, directs what is to come. Rules of conduct are framed by wisdom, and it is the part of prudence to apply these rules to the business of life.

Two things speak much the wisdom of a nation : good laws, and a prudent management of them. STILLINGFLEET.

WIT, HUMOR, SATIRE, IRONY, BURLESQUE.

WIT, like wisdom, according to its original, from wissen, to know, signifies knowledge, but it has so extended its meaning as to signify that faculty of the mind by which knowledge or truth is perceived, and in a more limited sense the faculty of discovering the agreements or disagreements of different ideas. Wit, in this latter sense, is properly a spontaneous faculty, and is, as it were, a natural gift: labored or forced wit is no wit. Reflection and experience supply us with wisdom; study and labor supply us with learning; but wit seizes with an eagle eye that which escapes the notice of the deep thinker, and elicits truths which are in vain sought for with any severe effort.

Wit lies most in the assemblage of ideas, and putting those together with quickness and variety.

ADDISON.

In a true piece of wit all things must be,
Yet all things there agree.

COWLEY.

HUMOR is a species of wit which flows out of the humor of a person. Wit, as distinguished from humor, may consist of a single brilliant thought: but humor runs in a vein; it is not a striking, but an equable and pleasing, flow of wit. Of this description of wit Mr. Addison has given us the most admirable specimens in his writings, who knew best how to explain what wit and humor was, and to illustrate it by his practice.

For sure by wit is chiefly meant
Applying well what we invent:
What humor is not, all the tribe
Of logic-mongers can describe:
Here nature only acts her part,
Unhelp'd by practice, books, or art.

SWIFT.

There is a kind of nature, a certain regularity of thought, which must discover the writer (of humor) to be a man of sense at the same time that he appears altogether given up to caprice.

ADDISON.

Humor may likewise display itself in actions as well as words, whereby it is more strikingly distinguished from wit, which displays itself only in the happy expression of happy thoughts.

I cannot help remarking that sickness which often destroys both wit and wisdom, yet seldom has power to remove that talent which we call humor. Mr. Wycherley showed his in his last compliment paid to his young wife, when he made her promise, on his dying bed, that she would not marry an old man again.

POPE.

SATIRE, from satyr, probably from sai and ira, abounding in anger, and IRONY, from the Greek εἰρωνία, simulation and dissimulation, are personal and censorious sorts of wit; the first of which openly points at the object, and the second in a covert manner takes its aim.

The ordinary subjects of satire are such as excite the greatest indignation in the best temper.

ADDISON.

In writings of humor, figures are sometimes used of so delicate a nature, that it shall often happen that some people will see things in a direct contrary sense to what the author and the majority of the readers understand them: to such the most innocent irony may appear irreligion.

CAMBRIDGE.

BURLESQUE is rather a species of humor than direct wit, which consists in an assemblage of ideas extravagantly discordant. The satire and irony are the most ill-natured kinds of wit; burlesque stands in the lowest rank.

One kind of burlesque represents mean persons in the accoutrements of heroes.

ADDISON.

WONDER, ADMIRE, SURPRISE, ASTONISH, AMAZE.

WONDER, in German wundern, etc., is in all probability a variation of wander; because wonder throws the mind off its bias. ADMIRE, from the Latin miror, and the Hebrew marah, to look at, signifies looking at attentively. SURPRISE, compounded of sur and prise, or the Latin prehendo, signifies to take on a sudden. ASTONISH, from the Latin attonitus, and tonitru, thunder, signifies to strike as it were with the overpowering noise of thunder. AMAZE signifies to be in a maze, so as not to be able to collect one's self.

That particular feeling which anything unusual produces on our minds is expressed by all these terms, but under various modifications. Wonder is the most indefinite in its signification or application, but it is still the least vivid sentiment of all: it amounts to little more than a pausing of the mind, a suspension of the thinking faculty, an incapacity to fix on a discernible point in an object that rouses our curiosity: it is that state which all must experience at times, but none so much as those who are ignorant: they wonder at everything, because they know nothing. Admiration is wonder mixed with esteem or veneration: the admirer suspends his thoughts, not from the vacancy, but the fulness of his mind: he is riveted to an object which for a time absorbs his faculties: nothing but what is great and good excites admiration, and none but cultivated minds are susceptible of it: an ignorant person cannot admire, because he cannot appreciate the value of anything. Surprise and astonishment both arise from that which happens unexpectedly; they are species of wonder differing in degree, and produced only by the events of life: the surprise, as its derivation implies, takes us unawares; we are surprised if that does not happen which we calculate upon, as the absence of a friend whom we looked for; or we are surprised if that happens which we did not calculate upon; thus we are surprised to see a friend returned whom we supposed was on his journey: astonishment may be awakened by similar events which are more unexpected and more unaccountable: thus we are astonished to find a friend at our house whom we had every reason to suppose was many hundred miles off; or we are astonished to hear that a person has got safely through a road which we conceived to be absolutely impassable.

The reader of the Seasons wonders that he never saw before what Thomson shows him.

JOHNSON.

With eyes insatiate and tumultuous joy,
Beholds the presents, and admires the boy.

DRYDEN.

So little do we accustom ourselves to consider the effects of time, that things necessary and certain often surprise us like unexpected contingencies.

JOHNSON.

I have often been astonished, considering that the mutual intercourse between the two countries (France and England) has lately been very great, to find how little you seem to know of us.

BURKE.

Surprise may for a moment startle; astonishment may stupefy and cause an entire suspension of the faculties; but amazement has also a mixture of perturbation. We may be surprised and astonished at things in which we have no particular interest: we are mostly amazed at that which immediately concerns us.

Amazement seizes all; the gen'ral cry
Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die.

DRYDEN.

WONDER, MIRACLE, MARVEL, PRODIGY, MONSTER.

WONDER is that which causes wonder (v. Wonder). MIRACLE, in Latin miraculum, and miror, to wonder; comes from the Hebrew merah, seen, signifying that which strikes the sense. MARVEL is a variation of miracle. PRODIGY, in Latin prodigium, from prodigo, or procul and ago, to launch forth, signifies the thing launching forth. MONSTER, in Latin monstrum, comes from monere, to advise or give notice; because among the Romans any unaccountable appearance was considered as an indication of some future event.

Wonders are natural: miracles are supernatural. The whole creation is full of wonders; the Bible contains an account of the miracles which happened in those days. Wonders are real; marvels are often fictitious; prodigies are extravagant and imaginary. Natural history is full of wonders; travels abound in marvels or in marvellous stories, which are the inventions either of the artful or the ignorant and credulous: ancient history contains numberless accounts of prodigies. Wonders are agreeable to the laws of nature; they are wonderful only as respects ourselves: monsters are violations of the laws of nature. The production of a tree from a grain of seed is a wonder; but the production of a calf with two heads is a monster.

His wisdom such as once it did appear,
Three kingdoms' wonder, and three kingdoms' fear.

DENHAM.

Murder, though it have no tongue, will speak
With most mirac'ulous organ.

SHAKESPEARE.

Ill omens may the guilty tremble at,
Make every accident a prodigy,
And monsters frame where nature never err'd.

LEE.

WORD, TERM, EXPRESSION.

WORD is here the generic term; the other two are specific. Every TERM and EXPRESSION is a word; but every word is not denominated a term or expression. Language consists of words; they are the connected sounds which serve for the communication of thought. Term, from terminus, a boundary, signifies any word that has a specific or limited meaning; expression (v. To express) signifies any word which conveys a forcible meaning. Usage determines words; science fixes terms; sentiment provides expressions. The purity of a style depends on the choice of words; the precision of a writer depends upon the choice of his terms; the force of a writer depends upon the aptitude of his expressions. The grammarian treats on the nature of words; the philosopher weighs the value of scientific terms; the rhetorician estimates the force of expressions.

As all words in few letters live,
Thou to few words all sense dost give. COWLEY.

The use of the word minister is brought down to the literal signification of it, a servant; for now to serve and to minister, servile and ministerial, are terms equivalent. SOUTH.

A maxim, or moral saying, naturally receives this form of the antithesis, because it is designed to be engraven on the memory, which it recalls more easily by the help of such contrasted expressions. BLAIR.

WORK, LABOR, TOIL, DRUDGERY, TASK.

WORK, in Saxon weorc, Greek εργον, Hebrew areg, is the general term, as including that which calls for the exertion of our strength: LABOR (v. To labor) differs from it in the degree of exertion required; it is hard work: TOIL, probably connected with till, expresses a still higher degree of painful exertion: DRUDGERY (v. Servant) implies a mean and degrading work. Every member of society must work for his support, if he is not in independent circumstances: the poor are obliged to labor for their daily subsistence; some are compelled to toil incessantly for the pittance which they earn: drudgery falls to the lot of those who are the lowest in society. A man wishes to complete his work; he is desirous of resting from his labor; he seeks for a respite from his toil; he submits to drudgery.

The masters encourage it, they think it gives them spirits, and makes the work go on more cheerfully. BRYDONS.

But sometimes virtue starves while vice is fed; What then is the reward of virtue? bread; That vice may merit: 'tis the price of toil. The knave deserves it when he tills the soil. POPE.

In childhood the mind and body are both nimble but not strong; they can skip and frisk about with wonderful agility, but hard labor spoils them both. COWPER.

With the unwearied application of a plodding French painter, who draws a shrimp with the most minute exactness, he had all the genius of one of the first masters. Never, I believe, were such talents and drudgery united. COWPER.

TASK, in French tasche, Italian tassa, probably from the Greek τασσω, to order, is a work imposed by others, and consequently more or less burdensome.

Relieves me from my task of servile toil
Daily in the common prison, else enjoined me. MILTON.

Sometimes taken in the good sense for that which one imposes on one's self.

No happier task these faded eyes pursue,
To read and weep is all they now can do. POPE.

WRITER, PENMAN, SCRIBE.

WRITER is an indefinite term; every one who writes is called a writer; but none are PENMEN but such as are expert at their pen. Many who profess to teach writing are themselves but sorry writers: the best penmen are not always the best teachers of writing. The SCRIBE is one who writes for the purpose of copying; he is, therefore, an official writer.

The copying of books for the use of religious houses or common sale, was a business in those days that employed many people; some writers far exceeded others in that art. MASSEY.

Our celebrated penman, Peter Bales, among his other excellences in writing, is said to have improved the art of cryptography. MASSEY.

The office of scribe, a secretary or public writer, was an honorable post among the Jews. MASSEY.

Writer and penman have an extended application to one who writes his own compositions; the former is now used for an author or composer, as the writer of a letter, or the writer of a book (v. Writer); the latter for one who pens down anything worthy of notice for the use of the public.

My wife had scarcely patience to hear me to the end, but railed against the writer with unrestrained resentment. GOLDSMITH.

The descriptions which the Evangelists give, show that both our blessed Lord and the holy penmen of his story were deeply affected. ATTERBURY.

Scribe may be taken for one who performs, as it were, the office of writing for another.

My master being the scribe to himself should write the letter. SHAKESPEARE.

WRITER, AUTHOR.

WRITER refers us to the act of writing; AUTHOR to the act of inventing. There are therefore many writers, who are not authors; but there is no author of books who may not be termed a writer: compilers and contributors to periodical works are properly writers, though not always entitled to the name of authors. Poets and historians are properly termed authors rather than writers.

Many writers have been witty, several have been sublime, and some few have even possessed both these qualities separated. WARBURTON.

An author has the choice of his own thoughts and words, which the translator has not. DAYDEN.

Y.

YOUTHFUL, JUVENILE, PUERILE.

YOUTHFUL signifies full of youth, or in the complete state of youth: JUVENILE, from the Latin juvenis, signifies the same; but PUERILE, from puer, a boy, signifies literally boyish. Hence the first two terms are taken in an indifferent sense; but the latter in a bad sense, or at least always in the sense of what is suitable to a boy only: thus we speak of youthful vigor, youthful employments, juvenile performances, juvenile years, and the like: but puerile objections, puerile conduct, and the like. We expect nothing from a youth but what is juvenile; we are surprised and dissatisfied to see what is puerile in a man.

Chorcbus then, with youthful hopes beguil'd,
Swoll'n with success, and of a daring mind,
This new invention fatally design'd. DRYDEN.

It would be unreasonable to expect much from the immaturity of juvenile years. JOHNSON.

Sometimes juvenile is taken in the bad sense when speaking of youth in contrast with men, as juvenile tricks.

Raw juvenile writers imagine that, by pouring forth figures often, they render their compositions warm and animated. BLAIR.

And puerile may be taken in the indifferent sense for what belongs to a boy.

After the common course of puerile studies, he was put an apprentice to a brewer. JOHNSON.

ASSUMPTION, PRESUMPTION, ARROGANCE (vide also p. 97).

ASSUMPTION, the act of assuming (v. To appropriate). PRESUMPTION, from presume, in Latin presumo, from pre, before, and sumo, to take, signifies to take beforehand, to take for granted. ARROGANCE, v. To appropriate.

Assumption is a person's taking upon himself to act a part which does not belong to him. Presumption is the taking a place which does not belong to him. Assumption has to do with one's general conduct; presumption relates to matters of right and precedence. A person may be guilty of assumption by giving commands when he ought to receive them, or by speaking when he ought to be silent: he is guilty of presumption in taking a seat which is not fit for him. Assumption arises from self-conceit and self-sufficiency, presumption from self-importance. Assumption and presumption both denote a taking to one's self merely, arrogance claiming from others. A person is guilty of assumption and presumption for his own gratification only, without any direct intentional offence to others; but a man cannot be arrogant, be guilty of arrogance, without direct offence to others. The arrogant man exacts deference and homage from others; his demands are as extravagant as his mode of making them is offensive. Children are apt to be assuming, low people to be presuming; persons among the higher orders, inflated with pride and bad passions, are apt to be arrogant.

Arrogant in prosperity, abject in adversity, he (John) neither conciliated affection in the one, nor excited esteem in the other. LINGARD.

TO COMPEL, IMPEL, CONSTRAIN, RESTRAIN.

TO COMPEL and IMPEL are both derived from the verb pello, to drive; the former, by the force of the preposition com, is to drive to any particular action or for a given purpose; but the latter, from the preposition in or in, into, is to force into action generally. A person, therefore, is compelled by outward circumstances, but he is impelled from within: he is compelled by another to go farther than he wished, he is impelled by curiosity to go farther than he intended. CONSTRAIN and RESTRAIN are both from stringo, to bind or oblige. The former, by force of the con or com, to force in a particular manner, or for a particular purpose; the latter by the re, back or again, is to keep back from anything. To constrain, like to compel, is to force to act; to restrain to prevent from acting. Constrain and compel differ only in the degree of force used, constrain signifying a less degree of force than compel. A person who is compelled has no choice whatever left to him; but when he is only constrained, he may do it or not at discretion.

He was compelled by want to attendance and solicitation. JOHNSON.

We cannot avoid observing the homage which the world is constrained to pay to virtue. BLAIR.

Constraint is put on the actions or movements of the body only, restraint on the movements of both body and mind: a person who is in a state of constraint shows his want of freedom in the awkwardness of his movements; he who is in a state of restraint may be unable to move at all. Constraint arises from that which is inherent in the person, restraint is imposed upon him (v. CONSTRAINT, p. 255).

DELUSION, ILLUSION (vide also p. 419).

BOTH these words, being derived from the Latin ludo (v. To deceive), are applied to such matters as act upon the imagination; but delude, by the force of the preposition de, signifies to carry away from the right line, to cause to deviate into error; while illude, from the preposition il, in, in or upon, signifies simply to act on the imagination. The former is therefore taken in a bad sense, but the latter in an indifferent sense. A deranged person falls into different kinds of delusions: as when he fancies himself poor while he is very rich, or that every one who comes in his way is looking at him, or having evil designs against him, and the like; but there may be optical illusions, when an object is made to appear brighter or larger than it really is.

Who therefore seeks in these
True wisdom, finds her not, or by delusion
Far worse, her false resemblance only meets. YOUNG.

While the fond soul,
Wrapt in gay visions of unreal bliss,
Still paints the *illusiv*e form. THOMSON.

TO MENTION, NOTICE.

MENTION, from mens, mind, signifies here to bring to mind. NOTICE (v. To mark). These terms are synonymous only inasmuch as they imply the act of calling things to another person's mind. We mention a thing in direct terms: we notice it indirectly, or in a casual manner; we mention that which may serve as information; we notice that which may be merely of a personal or incidental nature. One friend mentions to another what has passed at a particular meeting: in the course of conversation he notices or calls to the notice of his companion the badness of the road, the wideness of the street, or the like.

The great critic I have before mentioned, though a heathen, has taken notice of the sublime manner in which the lawgiver of the Jews has described the creation. ADDISON.
